122 h 9

A GENERAL

DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical:

IN WHICH

A New and Accurate TRANSLATION of that of the Celebrated

Mr. BAYLE,

WITH THE

CORRECTIONS and OBSERVATIONS printed in the late Edition at Paris, is included; and interſperſed with ſeveral thouſand LIVES never before publiſhed.

The whole containing the Hiſtory of the moſt illuſtrious Perſons of all Ages and Nations, particularly thoſe of Great Britain and Ireland, diſtinguiſhed by their Rank, Actions, Learning and other Accompliſhments.

With Reflections on ſuch Paſſages of Mr. BAYLE, as ſeem to favour Scepticiſm and the Manichee Syſtem.

By the Reverend Mr. JOHN PETER BERNARD;
The Reverend Mr. THOMAS BIRCH, M.A. and F.R.S.
Mr. JOHN LOCKMAN;
And other HANDS.

VOLUME V.

LONDON,

Printed by James Bettenham,

For G. STRAHAN, J. CLARKE, in Cornhill; J. GRAY in the Poultry; J. BATLEY and J. WOOD in Pater-Noſter-Row; J. SHUCKBURGH, C. CORBET, G. HAWKINS in Fleetſtreet; J. WILCOX, A. MILLAR in the Strand; T. OSBORNE in Grays-Inn; J. BRINDLEY in New Bond-ſtreet; C. WARD and R. CHANDLER at the Ship without Temple Bar, and ſold at their Shop in SCARBOROUGH; J. BETTENHAM near, and E. CAVE at St. John's Gate.

M DCC XXXVII.

A NEW

HISTORICAL AND CRITICAL

DICTIONARY

GENERAL

TO

The moſt Illuſtrious PRINCE,

JAMES,

Duke of Hamilton, Chaſtlerault, and Brandon, &c.

This FIFTH VOLUME of the

GENERAL DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical,

Is humbly dedicated by

His GRACE's moſt obliged,

Moſt devoted Servants,

The Authors.

TO

The moſt Illuſtrious PRINCE,

JAMES,

Duke of Hamilton, Chatelerault, and Brandon, &c.

GENERAL DICTIONARY,

Hiſtorical and Critical,

Is humbly dedicated by

His GRACE's moſt obliged,

The Authors.

A GENERAL DICTIONARY Hiſtorical and Critical.

EGERTON (THOMAS) Lord Elleſmere, and Viſcount Brackley, and Lord High Chancellor of England in the reign of King James I, was natural ſon of Sir Richard Egerton of Ridley in Cheſhire (a) [A], and born in that County (b) about the year 1540. He was educated in Brazen-Noſe College in Oxford, where he was entered a Commoner in 1556 in the ſeventeenth year of his age; and continuing there about three years, laid a good foundation of ſolid learning. He removed from thence to Lincoln's-Inn, where he applied himſelf with great ſucceſs to the ſtudy of the Law, and became a very eminent Counſellor (c). June 28, 1581 he was appointed by the Queen her Sollicitor General (d); and ſoon after he was choſen Lent-Reader of the ſaid Inn. June 2, 1592, the Queen made him Attorney General [B]; and afterwards knighted him; and in 1594 appointed him Maſter of the Rolls; and on May 6, 1596, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. In 1598 he was in commiſſion for treating with the Dutch, in order to leſſen her Majeſty's charge of the war with Spain; and with the Lord Buckhurſt and others, ſigned a new treaty at London with the Embaſſadors of the States, whereby the Queen was eaſed of no leſs than twelve thouſand pounds per ann. beſides other advantages. In 1600 he was in commiſſion with the Lord Buckhurſt, Lord Treaſurer, and the Earl of Eſſex, Earl Marſhal, for negotiating affairs with the Senate of Denmark. He was a friend to the Earl of Eſſex [C], and one of thoſe ſent to

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 417. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, ibid. and Fuller's Worthies, in Cheſhire, and Lloyd's State Worthies, pag. 755. 2d edit. London 1670.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(d) Dugdale's Baronage, tom. 3. pag. 414, b.

[A] Natural ſon of Sir Richard Egerton of Ridley in Cheſhire.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (1); but Dr. Fuller (2), and Mr. David Lloyd (3) only tell us in general, that he was extracted from the antient family of the Egertons of Ridley in Cheſhire. Mr. Arthur Collins (4) obſerves, that his Mother was Alice, daughter of Mr. Spark of Bickerton in Cheſhire; and informs us (5), that it is agreed among all our Antiquaries that the antient family of the Egertons is deſcended from the Barons of Malpas in Cheſhire; and that Philip ſecond ſon of David Barons of Malpas being ſeated at Egerton, a manor near Malpas took that ſurname; from whom in lineal deſcent was Sir JOHN EGERTON of Egerton Knight, who fighting valiantly for the Houſe of Lancaſter, under the Lord Audley General for King Henry VI. was ſlain at the battle of Blore-Heath in Staffordſhire on the 23d of September 1459. This Sir John was ſucceeded by PHILIP his eldeſt ſon, who had iſſue John Egerton of Egerton Eſq; and Sir RALPH EGERTON of Ridley in Cheſhire Knight, who was one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-Chamber to King Henry VIII, and appointed by that King Standard-Bearer of England for life; and died about the 20th year of his Majeſty's reign. He was ſucceeded by his ſon RICHARD, who was of age in the 23d year of Henry VIII, and was afterwards knighted, and was father of the Lord Chancellor Egerton, of whom we treat in this Article.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 417. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) In his Worthies in Cheſhire.

(3) State-Worthies, pag. 755. 2d edit. London 1670.

(4) Peerage of England, vol. 1. pag. 466.

(5) Ibid. pag. 464, & ſeqq.

[B] Attorney General.] We have in our hands an original letter of his, while he was in that office, to the Right Honourable his ſingular good Lord, the Lord Burghley, Lord High Treaſurer of England, relating to a Bill to be ſigned for the young Earl of Derby for the office of Chamberlain of the County Palatine of Cheſter. It is as follows: "My moſt humble dutie donn to your "Lordſhip, my Lord the Erle of Derbie, ſoone after "the deathe of the late Erle his father, moved me "earneſtlie by his letter to make a bill readie for her "Majeſtie's ſignature of a graunt of the office of "Chamberlaine of the Countie Palatine of Cheſter to "be paſſed to him from her Majeſtie, as the late Erle "his father had it; to the ende that if her Majeſtie "ſhall be pleaſed uppon his humble ſute to graunte the "place unto him, the bill might be readie to be "offered to her Highnes ſignature, and the delaie "avoided, which otherwiſe might happen by the "abſence of Mr. Sollicitor and me. Hereuppon I "have preſumed to make readie a Bill accordinglie, "and have ſent the ſame to your Lordſhip herein "incloſed, referring the ſame to your Lordſhip's good "conſideration, humbly beſeeching you to pardon my "bouldnes herein. And ſo praying God for your "Lordſhip's health, doe reſt in all things at your "Lordſhip's comaundement. At my Houſe at Dod-"dleſton near Cheſter this laſt of September 1593.

"Moſt humblie to bee comaunded
"by your Lordſhip
"Thomas Egerton."

[C] He was a friend to the Earl of Eſſex.] This appears from his letter to that Lord, when in diſgrace, printed in the Supplement to the Cabala (6), wherein with great ſtrength of reaſon and judgment he endeavours to perſuade him to ſubmit to the Queen. The Earl in anſwer to it, begins thus: My very good Lord, there is not a man this day living, whom I would ſooner make Judge of any queſtion that might concern me, than your ſelf: yet you muſt give me leave to tell you, that in ſome caſes I muſt appeal from all earthly Judges. And if in any, then ſurely in this, when the higheſt Judge on earth hath impoſed upon me the heavieſt puniſhment without tryal or hearing. After which the Earl continues to vindicate himſelf; and concludes thus: I muſt crave your Lordſhip's patience to give him that hath a crabbed fortune leave to uſe a crabbed ſtyle: but whatſoever my ſtyle is, there is no heart more humble, nor more affected to your Lordſhip than that of

(6) Pag. 27.

Your Lordſhip's poor Friend
ESSEX.

After

to know the cauſe of the Earl's aſſembling with his dependants in an hoſtile manner at Eſſex Houſe [D]. On the 21ſt of July 1603 he was advanced to the dignity of a Baron of this Realm, by the title of Lord Elleſmere (e), and upon the 24th of the ſame month was made Lord High Chancellor of England (f). In the beginning of November 1610 he was unanimouſly elected Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford (g). On the 7th of November 1616 he was advanced to the dignity of Viſcount Brackley (h). He wrote ſeveral works relating to the Law. His health declined through age a conſiderable time before his death [E]. He died at York Houſe in the Strand March the 15th $16\frac{1}{17}$, in the ſeventy ſeventh year of his age, and was interred at Dodleſton in Cheſhire (i), leaving a noble poſterity, who enjoy a great eſtate with the title of Duke of Bridgwater. Not long before his death, being weary of his

(e) Camden's Annals of King James I.

(f) Wood, col. 418.

(g) Idem, ibid. and Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 185.

(h) Camden, ubi ſupra.

(i) Idem, ibid. and Wood, col. 418.

After this the Lord Keeper wrote a letter to the Earl (7), which is as follows:

(7) Ibid. pag. 87.

Sir,

" How things proceed here concerning yourſelf, " you ſhall partly underſtand by theſe incloſed. Her " Majeſty is gracious toward you, and you want no " friends to remember and commend your former ſer- " vices. Of theſe particulars you ſhall know more " when we meet. There are ſharp eyes upon you; " your actions public and private are obſerved. It be- " hoveth you therefore to carry your ſelf with all in- " tegrity and ſincerity both of hands and heart, leaſt " you overthrow your own fortunes, and diſcredit " your friends, that are tender and careful of your " reputation and well-doing. So in haſt I commit " you to God, with my very hearty commendations, " and reſt.

" At the Court at " Richmond Oct.
" 21, 1599.

Your aſſured loving Friend,
Thomas Egerton, C. S."

[D] One of thoſe ſent to know the cauſe of the Earl's aſſembling with his dependants in an hoſtile manner at Eſſex-Houſe.] He was ſent for that purpoſe with the Earl of Worceſter, Sir William Knowles, Comptroller of the Houſhold, and the Lord Chief Juſtice Popham. Being after ſome difficulty admitted into the court-yard, but without their attendants, the Lord Keeper found the Earl in the midſt of a confuſed rabble, and addreſſing himſelf to him, ſaid, that the Queen had ſent him and the others, to know the cauſe of their concourſe; and if they had ſuffered any grievances, to promiſe them a fair and equitable redreſs. Whereupon the Earl anſwered him in a louder tone than ordinary, " that " there was a conſpiracy againſt his life; that ſome " were employed to murder him in his bed; that a " great deal of treachery had been uſed againſt him, " and that Letters had been counterfeited under his " hand and ſeal: that they were met in defence of " themſelves, &c." The Lord Keeper preſſing him once more to diſcover his grievances, (as privately as he pleaſed) the rabble interrupted him, crying out, Let us be gone; they do but abuſe your patience; they deſign nothing but to deſtroy and abuſe you, and in the mean while we loſe time. Then the Lord Keeper commanded them, on their allegiance, to lay down their arms. After this the Earl retired into the houſe, and the Lord Keeper with the reſt followed him, on purpoſe to have ſome diſcourſe with him in private; the mob in the mean time uttering theſe expreſſions, Cut their throats, away with that great Seal; clap them in cuſtody. When they had got into the inner apartments, the Earl ordered the doors to be bolted on them, telling them, " that if they would have but a little pa- " tience, he would go and adviſe with the Lord Mayor " and the Sheriffs, and come back again in a ſhort " time." Thus were theſe four of the Privy Council confined, and left in cuſtody of a rabble, in peril of their lives. In the interim the Earl having tried the affections of the Citizens, and found that none would join with him, and that the Lord Admiral was advancing with a ſtrong party againſt him, reſolved to return home, in hopes of obtaining the Queen's favour by the Lord Keeper and the three other Privy-Counſellors, whom he had confined in his houſe. But when Sir John Leviſon, who commanded a party of men at Ludgate, had refuſed Sir Ferdinando Gorges the liberty of a free paſſage for Eſſex, Gorges conſulting his own intereſt perſuaded the Earl to ſend him to his houſe to diſcharge the Counſellors, and with them to intercede with the Queen for his pardon, while there was no blood ſpilt, and her Majeſty remaining in ſome ſuſpenſe, as well as the Citizens. The Earl conſented that the Lord Chief Juſtice Popham ſhould be releaſed, and none elſe; but he refuſing to accept of his liberty, except the Lord Keeper might enjoy the ſame, Gorges diſcharged them all, and went with them by water to the Court. Eſſex having met with a repulſe near the Weſt-Gate of St. Paul's Church, wherein ſome were killed, went to Queen-Hithe with a few friends, who continued firm to him, and there took boats, and retired to his houſe. He was very angry at finding the Lord Keeper and the Privy Counſellors diſcharged; and laying aſide all hopes of aſſiſtance from the City, began to make his own houſe as ſtrong as he could. But was obliged to ſurrender, and afterwards condemned to Death. After he had received ſentence, he deſired to ſpeak with ſome of the Privy-Council; whereupon the Lord Keeper, the Lord Admiral, the Lord Treaſurer, and Sir Robert Cecil, were ſent to him. After he had aſked the Lord Keeper's pardon for detaining him in cuſtody, and Cecil's for accuſing him in the affair of the Infanta, he told them, that the Queen could never be ſafe, as long as he lived; and diſcovered his whole deſigns, impeaching ſeveral perſons. After the Earl was executed, it being thought neceſſary, that ſome puniſhment ſhould be inflicted on thoſe, who were his confederates, the Lord Keeper was in a ſpecial Commiſſion with the Lord Treaſurer, the Lord Admiral, Sir Robert Cecil, Principal Secretary of State, Sir John Forteſcue, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and others, (whereof any two of the beforementioned were to be of the number) to call before them all ſuch as were concerned with Robert, late Earl of Eſſex, Henry, late Earl of Southampton, &c. and to treat and compound with ſuch offenders for the redemption and compoſition of their lands; and on ſealing and ſufficient ſecurity given for the payment of ſuch fines, &c. ſo aſſeſſed by them, to cauſe a pardon to be made out for the ſaid treaſons (8).

(8) Collins's Peerage of England, pag. 470.

[E] His health declined thro' age a conſiderable time before his death]. In the latter end of the year 1615 his Lordſhip was very ill, as appears from ſeveral Letters of Sir Francis Bacon, then attorney General to the King (9). In one dated January 31 he gives his Majeſty this account. For Mr. St. John, your Majeſty knoweth the day draweth on, and my Lord Chancellor's recovery, the ſeaſon, and his age, promiſing not to be haſty, I ſpake with him on Saturday, at which time I found him in bed, but his ſpirits ſtrong, and not ſpent or wearied; and ſpake only of your buſineſs, leading me from one matter to another; and wiſhed, and ſeemed to hope, that he might attend the day for O. S. and it were (as he ſaid) to be his laſt work, to conclude his ſervices, and expreſs his affection towards your Majeſty. In another Letter to the King, dated February 12th 1615, he writes thus: " Your worthy Chancellor, I fear, " goeth his laſt day. God hath hitherto uſed to weed " out ſuch ſervants as grew not fit for your Majeſty; " but now he hath gathered to himſelf a true ſage or " Salvia out of your garden. But your Majeſty's ſer- " vice muſt not be mortal." And thereupon Sir Francis moves the King to conſer the Chancellorſhip on him. Three days after he informed the King of the Chancellor's recovery, as follows. I do find, God be thanked, a ſenſible amendment in my Lord Chancellor.

(9) See the Works of Francis Lord Bacon., vol. 4. edit. London 1730, in fol.

his public employment, and weakened with age, he desired the King's leave to retire. Upon which the King sent Secretary Winwood to him for the Seal, with this message, that himself would be the Under-keeper, and not dispose of it whilst his Lordship lived to bear the name of Chancellor (k). There was a long contest between him and the Lord Chief Justice Coke, concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery and King's-Bench, which was at last determined in favour of the latter (l). Wilson tells us (m) that he died full of virtuous fame. Wood likewise observes (n), that "he was a "most grave and prudent man, a good Lawyer, just and honest, of so quick an ap- "prehension also, and profound judgment, that none of the Bench in his time went be- "yond him." When he saw King James's excessive liberality to some of his courtiers, he advised him to preserve his Crown-lands for his own support, since he or his successors might meet with Parliaments which would not supply his occasions but on such conditions, as would not be very agreeable to him (o).

(k) Aulicus Coquinariæ: Or a Vindication in answer to a Pamphlet intitled, The Court and Character of King James. Pretended to be penned by Sir A. W. and published since his death, 1650, pag. 171. edit. London 1650.

(l) See note [E]; and the Article of COKE (Sir Edward) vol. 4. pag. 384. Rem. [H].

(m) History of Great Britain, being the Life and Reign of King James I. pag. 97. edit. London 1653.

(n) Col. 418.

(o) Lloyd, pag. 757.

I was with him yesterday in private conference about half an hour; and this day again, at such a time as he did seal, which he endureth well, almost the space of an hour, though the vapour of wax be offensive to him. He is free from a fever, perfect in his powers of memory and speech, and not hollow in his voice nor look; he hath no panting or labouring respiration; neither are his coughs dry or weak. But whoever thinketh his disease is but melancholy, he maketh no true judgment of it; but it is plainly a formed and deep cough, with a pectoral surcharge; so that at times he doth almost animam agere. In a Letter to Sir George Villiers, dated Febr. 21 1615, he gives him an account that the Lord Chancellor's health growing with the days, and his resignation being an uncertainty, he desires, by his interest, to be sworn a Privy-Counsellor: adding, that the Lord Chancellor told him the day before, "that if the "King would ask his opinion touching the person he "would recommend to succeed him, upon death or "disability, he would name him for the fittest man;" and Sir Francis asks Villiers's advice, whether use might not be made of that offer? In a Letter likewise of the same date to the King, he begins thus: "I "was yesterday in the afternoon with my Lord Chan- "cellor, according to your commandment, which I "received by the Master of the Horse, and find the "old man well comforted, both towards God, and "towards the world; and that some middle comfort, "which is divine and human, proceeding from your "Majesty, being God's Lieutenant on earth, I am "persuaded, hath been a great cause, that such a sick- "ness hath been portable to such an age. I did not "fail in my conjecture, that this business of Chancery "hath stirred him; he sheweth to despise it, but he "is full of it; and almost like a young Duellist, that "findeth himself behind hand." And proceeding to give his Majesty an account of the affair, he writes thus: The last day of term (and that which all men condemn, the supposed last day of my Lord Chancellor's Life) there were two Indictments preferred of Præmunire for suing in Chancery after judgment in Common Law; the one by Richard Glanvile, the other by William Allen. For the Cases themselves, it were too long to trouble your Majesty with them; but this I will say, if they were set on that preferred them, they were the worst marks-men that ever were, that set them on. For there could not have been chosen two such causes to the honour and advantage of the Chancery for the justness of the Decrees, and the foulness and scandal both of fact and person in those that impeach the Decrees. The Grand Jury consisting of very substantial and intelligent persons would not find the Bills, notwithstanding they were clamoured by the parties, and twice sent back by the Court; and in conclusion resolutely 17 of 19 found an Ignoramus. This attack on the Court of Chancery Sir Francis Bacon imputes to the Lord Chief Justice Coke principally, and in the Letter to the King above cited calls it "a great and public affront, not only to the "reverend and well-deserving person of your Chan- "cellor (and at a time when he was thought to lie a "dying, which was barbarous,) but to your High "Court of Chancery." He advises the King to make some example against the presumption of a Judge in causes, which concern his Majesty; and cites a precedent in Queen Elizabeth's time in the like case, when the Judges answered it on their knees. The Lord Chancellor in the spring of the year being recovering from his indisposition pursued the affair concerning the Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery and King's Bench; and it being brought to an hearing before his Majesty, he in July gave judgment, that the Statute of 27. Edw. III. Cap. 1. & 4. Henr. VI. Cap. 3. did not extend to the Court of Chancery. But the Lord Chancellor sinking under the weight of old age, tho' in full possession of the King's favour, intreated his Majesty by two Letters, printed in the Cabala, to be discharged from that office. His last Letter is as follows:

"Most gracious Sovereign,

"I find through my great age, accompanied with "griefs and infirmities, my sense and conceit is be- "come dull and heavy, my memory decayed, my "judgment weak, my hearing imperfect, my voice "and speech failing and faltering, and in all the "powers and faculties of my mind and body great "debility. Wherefore, conscientiâ imbecillitatis, my "humble suit to your most sacred Majesty, is to be "discharged of this great place, wherein I have "long served, and to have some comfortable testi- "mony under your Royal Hand, that I leave it at this "humble suit, with your gracious favour: so shall "I with comfort number and spend the few days I "have to live, in meditation and prayers to Almighty "God, to preserve your Majesty and all yours, in all "heavenly and earthly felicity and happiness. This "suit I intended some years past ex dictamine rationis "& conscientiæ. Love and fear stayed it; now ne- "cessity constrains me to it; I am utterly unable to "sustain the burthen of this great service, for I am "come to St. Paul's desire, Cupio dissolvi & esse cum "Christo. Wherefore I most humbly beseech your "Majesty most favourably to grant it,

"Your Majesty's most humble and loyal "poor subject and servant
"Thomas Ellesmere, Canc."

The King parted with an old and faithful servant with all imaginable tenderness, and first, as a mark of his favour advanced him to the dignity of Viscount Brackley Nov. 7th 1616; and afterwards resigning the Seal, it was on the 7th of March following committed to the custody of Sir Francis Bacon. T.

EGINHART, Secretary to the Emperor Charles the Great, was a German; he is the most ancient Historian of that nation (a) and wrote very eloquently for a man of the ninth Century, which made some criticks think, that the person who first published this Author (b) polished his style a little; but this conjecture is contradicted by the antient manuscripts (c). Some (d) say that the History he wrote of Charles the Great is so much the more true, because he had conversed familiarly with that Prince. But this is a bad argument; it can only prove that he was well acquainted with the transactions of those times; but was not the memory of the honour which that Prince had done him,

(a) Vossius, de Hist. Latin. pag. 302.

(b) Count Herman de Nuenar.

(c) See F. Labbe, de Scriptor. Eccles. tom. 1. pag. 273.

(d) Sigebert, de Viris illustr. cap. 84. Et ex eo Vossius & Labbe, ubi supra.

him, an inticement to flattery? A modern Author charges him with great partiality [A]. I do not know what we ought to think of his intrigue with a daughter of Charles the Great [B].

EGNATIA

[A] A modern Author charges him with a great partiality.] He goes farther ſtill, and lays ſhameful impoſtures to his charge (1). He aſſerts, that all that has been related concerning the ſlothfulneſs of the Kings of the firſt Family are impertinent ſtories: Theſe Kings having failed to ſupport their authority only thro' the defect of their years; and that ridiculous ſhew of their perſons on a chariot drawn by four oxen being nothing but a bold lye aſſerted by that impoſtor, Eginhart, without the leaſt truth or the leaſt ground (2). He aſſerts, that Eginhart is the inventor of that fable, which ſo many Authors relate as a matter of fact, namely, that Pope Zachary approved the depoſition of King Childeric, and Pepin's uſurpation. By confuting Eginhart, ſays he (3), we confute all thoſe who wrote on his authority. Let us ſee how he confutes him.

" Eginhart was Charles the Great's Chaplain and " his creature, and wrote his life. His only ſtudy " was to invent an infinite number of falſe ſtories, " in order to depreſs the Kings of the Merovingian " family, whom he maliciouſly repreſents as baſe and " ſlothful Princes, with a deſign to palliate and excuſe as much as he could, the criminal attempt of " Pepin's uſurpation. With this view it is, that thro' " a ridiculous ignorance, he repreſents with a beard " children of eight years old, and even children that " were not yet born, and that he loads with infamy " young Princes, who had no other faults, but a life " too ſhort to diſplay their virtues. With the ſame " wicked intention did he invent that ridiculous progreſs of the Kings in a chariot drawn by oxen on " the firſt of May, and their obſcure retreat in the " caſtle of Mamaca, which never was in being: for " at the ſame time that he thus ſhuts up thoſe Kings " in that imaginary ſolitude, it appears from contemporary Authors, that they were at the head of " their armies, or employed about other affairs ſuitable to their age. This wicked deſign of Eginhart " runs viſibly through his whole work; but when he " would mention Childeric's abdication, he thought " that he ſhould entirely clear Pepin, if he could repreſent the Pope as an accomplice of his attempt; " and he has done it with the greateſt inconſideration, " and he has been guilty of ſuch an anachroniſm as " betrays the groſſeſt ignorance. For he ſays, that " Childeric was degraded by Pope Stephen's command; " Juſſu Stephani Pontificis exauctoratus; now Pepin was " proclaimed King before Stephen was made a Pope, " ſince he was not elected at Rome but towards the " end of March in the year 752, and Pepin was pro- " claimed as ſoon as the firſt of March. He is even " ſuch a bad Chronologer, that tho' he was almoſt " contemporary with Pepin, yet he aſſerts, that this " Prince reigned fifteen years after Childeric had had " his Crown ſhaved (4). Now Pepin died in the " month of September 768, and had been proclaimed " in March 752, ſo that he reigned ſixteen years and " an half; we ſee therefore how little credit this fabulous " Writer deſerves. And how ſhould he aſſert any thing " certain concerning the reigns of Childeric and Pepin, " ſince he owns himſelf ſo ignorant and ſo little acquainted with Books, that having undertook to " write the hiſtory of Charles the Great, he ſays, " that he ſhall not relate any thing concerning the infancy and younger years of that Prince, becauſe at " the time he wrote there was not one perſon living, " who could furniſh him with any particulars or memoirs concerning thoſe times? Nec quiſquam modo ſupereſſe invenitur, qui horum ſe dicat habere notitiam: i. e. There is not one perſon to be found, who ſays, he is acquainted with thoſe times. Hence it appears " from what authentic Memoirs he collected his Hiſtory (5), and ſpoke of paſt events."

I am not at leiſure to examine whether this whole charge is well grounded. I ſhall only obſerve, that the Author ſeems to be much more in the right, when he refutes what is aſſerted concerning the requeſt made by the French to the Pope, and concerning the Pope's anſwer. The requeſt has not the leaſt ſhadow of common ſenſe, and the anſwer is ridiculouſly unjuſt.

[B] I do not know what we ought to think of his intrigue with a daughter of Charles the Great.] Marquard Freher has publiſhed a chronicle (6), in which we read that our Eginhart inſinuated himſelf ſo well into the favour of Imma Charles the Great's daughter, that he obtained from her whatever he deſired. Charles the Great having found out this intrigue, did not do like the Emperor Auguſtus (7); for he married the two lovers together, and gave them a fine eſtate in land. Freher does not give any credit to the ſtory. See letter the CIVth in a collection of letters written to Goldaſt, and publiſhed in the year 1688. He is the Author of that letter, and obſerves there that Vincent of Beauvais relates ſuch another ſtory concerning the Emperor Henry III. I am perſuaded that moſt of my Readers would be angry with me, if I were not to relate in this place how Charles the Great came to be acquainted with Eginhart's intrigue, and that they will be pleaſed to find here this little ſtory. This is the reaſon why I ſhall give a ſhort account of it in this article.

Eginhart being Chaplain and Secretary to Charles the Great diſcharged ſo well all his functions, that he was generally beloved, and moſt dearly by Imma the Emperor's daughter, for whom alſo he entertained a very great affection. They dreaded the conſequences, for which reaſon they durſt not join too cloſe together, but notwithſtanding this their love increaſed daily. At laſt when he could no longer refrain the violence of his paſſion, he reſolved to do a bold action. One night he crept into the apartment of the Princeſs, knocked ſoftly at her door, and was admitted into her chamber as a man who had ſomething to ſay to her by the Emperor's order: but he immediately ſpoke of other things, and quenched his flame in the moſt agreeable manner. Denique cum idem vir egregius irremediabiliter amando æſtuaret, aureſque virginis per internuncium appellare nec præſumeret, noviſſime ſumpta de ſemet ipſo fiducia nocturno tempore latenter ad puellæ tendebat habitaculum. Ibidemque pulſans clanculum, & intrare permiſſus tanquam allocuturus juvenculam de regali mandato, ſtatim verſa vice ſolus cum ſola ſecretis uſus alloquiis, & datis amplexibus cupito ſatisfecit amori (8). He deſigned to retire back before the break of day; but he perceived, that whilſt he had been diverting himſelf with Imma, it had ſnowed very much; ſo that he feared leſt the print of his feet ſhould betray him; he talked with the Princeſs of his uneaſineſs; and they conſulted together how they could get over this difficulty: at laſt the Princeſs found out a very good expedient; ſhe offered to take her lover upon her ſhoulders, and to carry him to the other ſide of the ſnow. Cumque nimia ſollicitudine fluctuantes quid facto opus eſſet deliberarent, tandem elegantiſſima juvencula, quam audacem faciebat amor, conſilium dedit, ut ipſa quidem ſuper ſe incidentem inclinata exciperet, eumque uſque ad locum illius hoſpitio contiguum ante lucanum deportaret, ibique eo depoſito per eadem veſtigia cautius obſervata reaire (9). The Emperor had paſſed that whole night without ſleeping; and it is thought that this want of ſleep happened by a particular direction of Providence (10). He roſe very early, and looking out of the window, he ſaw his daughter, who could hardly walk with the burthen ſhe carried, and who after ſhe had ſet it down, made all the haſte ſhe could back again. Intuitus eſt filiam ſuam ſub præfato onere nutanti greſſu vix incedere, & ad conflictum locum depoſita quam geſtabat ſarcina celeri repedare curſu (11). He was moved with admiration and grief; but thinking that there was ſomething divine in this, he reſolved to diſſemble. Quibus multo intuitu perſpectis, Imperator partim admiratione partim dolore permotus, non tamen abſque divina diſpoſitione id fieri reputans, ſeſe continuit, & viſa interim ſilentio ſuppreſſit. Eginhart who was perſuaded that this action could not continue long ſecret, reſolved to retire, and went and threw himſelf at the Emperor's feet to beg his permiſſion, alledging that his long ſervices had not been rewarded. The Emperor anſwered, that he would think of it, and appointed him a certain day, on which he would acquaint him with his will and pleaſure. The day being come, he ſummoned his Council together,

(1) See the book intitled, L'Eſprit de Gerſon, chap. 35. pag. 204: it was printed in the year 1691, in 12mo.

(2) Chap. 36. pag. 206.

(3) Ibid. chap. 36. pag. 217.

(4) This cenſure is ill-grounded, for Eginhart made uſe of the following expreſſion, fifteen years or more; cum per 15 annos, aut eo amplius Francis imperaret. In Vita Caroli Magni.

(5) This whole cenſure falls to the ground, as ſoon as one reads the whole paſſage in Eginhart, where we meet with theſe words; quia neque ſcriptis aliquando declaratum eſt. i. e. " Becauſe it was " never publiſhed in writing." which ſuppoſes, that he conſulted either the writings, or perſons then living. There might be books containing other things, tho' none were found concerning Charles the Great's infancy.

(6) Chronicon Lauriſhamenſis Cœnobii, publiſhed by Freber inter Rei Germanicæ Scriptores.

(7) It is thought that he baniſhed Ovid, becauſe he believed him to be too much favoured by Julia.

(8) Chronicon Lauriſhamenſe, pag. 62.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Eam noctem, Imperator, divino (ut creditur) nutu inſomnem duxit. ibid.

(11) Ibid.

EGNATIA, a City of Italy, in the country of the Salentines, between Bari and Brindiſi (a). It was conſiderable only on account of the miraculous ſtone which it boaſted to be poſſeſſed of [A]. If every body had been of Horace's mind, that ſtone would have contributed more to the ſhame than to the glory of the inhabitants of Egnatia. He laughs at their pretended miracle, and leaves it to be believed by the Jews [B]. There were other places in ancient times where the like prodigies were pretended [C], and together, and there declared the crime of his Secretary, giving a particular account of what he had ſeen, and aſked the Council's advice in an affair, which was a diſgrace to his family. Imperatoriam inquiens Majeſtatem nimis injuriatam eſſe et deſpectatam in indigna filiæ ſuæ notariique ſui copulatione, & exinde non mediocri ſeſe agitari perturbatione. Quibus nimio ſtupore perculſis, & de rei novitate & magnitudine quibuſdam adhuc ambigentibus, Rex innotuit eis evidentius, referens eis a primordio quid per ſemet ipſum oculata fide cognoverit, conſiliumque eorum atque ſententiam expoſtulans ſuper hoc (12). The ſentiments were divided, ſeveral Counſellors voted for a ſevere puniſhment. Others having duly weighed the whole affair, adviſed the Emperor to determine it himſelf according to his divine wiſdom. His deciſion was as follows. He declared that if he puniſhed Eginhart, he would thereby rather increaſe than leſſen the diſhonour of his family, that therefore he choſe rather to hide this infamy under the veil of marriage (13). The lover was called in and told, that in order to anſwer the complaints he had made of not being paid for his long ſervices, the Emperor's daughter was given him in marriage. I ſhall give you my daughter, ſaid Charles the Great to him, that portreſs who carried you ſo kindly on her ſhoulders (24). They ſent immediately for the Princeſs, and gave her to Eginhart with as good a portion as the daughter of ſo great a Prince could have. Protinus ad Regis edictum cum multo comitatu adducta eſt ejus filia, quæ roſeo vultum perfuſa rubore tradita eſt per manus Patris in manus prædicti Eginhardi, cum dote plurima prædiorum quoque nonnullorum, cum innumeris aureis, argenteiſque donariis, aliiſque precioſis ſuppellectilibus (15).

(a) Theſe two Cities were called, the one Barium, and the other Brunduſium.

(12) Ibid. pag. 63.

(13) Tam triſtis facti a notario non exigam pœnas, per quas infamia filiæ meæ magis videbitur augeri quam minui. Unde dignius & laudabilius imperii noſtri gloriæ arbitramur congruere, ut data adoleſcentiæ venia legitimo eos matrimonio conjungam, & rei probroſæ honeſtatis colorem ſuperducam. Ibid.

(14) Juri veſtro nuptum tradam meam filiam, veſtram ſcil. portatricem, quæ quandoque alte ſuccincta veſtræ ſubvectioni ſatis ſe morigeram exhibuit. Ibid.

(15) Ibid.

This is the ſubſtance of the whole ſtory; there are few tales in Boccacio's Decameron, nor in the Queen of Navarre's Heptameron, which would equal this if it were wittily adorned; and I am ſure that in Monſr. la Fontaine's hands it would have become one of the moſt pleaſant tales that ever was read. The cut before it would afford a new kind of parallel between the effects of love and thoſe of friendſhip, between Æneas loaded with his father Anchiſes, and Imma loaded with her gallant. Charles the Great (16) perceiving at a diſtance that portteſs, would not be one of the leaſt ornaments of the picture, if the Painter could happily repreſent the reflections which that kind father made on this occaſion. Imma is here like Petronius's matron of Epheſus, the perſon who finds out the expedients; but ſhe employs her own body for the remedy that was wanted (α).

(16) Some ſay he got up with a deſign to obſerve the Stars. See Comieres in his Treatiſe on Comets, pag. 238.

* (α) Mr. Bayle did not know, or did not remember here, that Jacob Cats, Great Penſionary of Holland, put this ſtory or tale into Dutch verſe. It is to be found amongſt his Works printed at Amſterdam in 1658, folio. There muſt have been an Edition of it before this, as appears by the date of the Edition of the following Book. There are in this three cuts, the firſt of which repreſents by ſome Books Eginhart teaching Imma, and afterwards they both appear kiſſing one another ſtanding. The ſecond repreſents Imma carrying Eginhart upon her ſhoulders; Charles the Great ſees them from a window of his Palace, and two of his guards arreſt them by his order. In the third, Eginhart and Imma appear before Charles the Great, who determines their fate. Caſpar Barlæus has alſo turned this tale into Latin Hexameter verſes, which are a tranſlation of thoſe of Cats with this title, Virgo Ἀνδροφόρος, ſive Emmæ Caroli Magni filiæ Eginardum ſcriptorem Amaſium ſuum humeris portantis fata & nuptiæ. i. e. "The Virgin Man-Carrier; or the fate "and marriage of Emma Charles the Great's daughter, who carried the Secretary Eginhart her lover on "her ſhoulders." This pretty Poem is found in page 161 &c. of the Book intitled, Faces Auguſtæ ſive Poematia, quibus illuſtriores nuptiæ a Nobili & Illuſtri Viro D. Jacobo Catſio Ill. & Præpoſ. Holl. ac Friſiæ Occidentalis Ord. Syndico, antehac Belgicis Verſibus conſcriptæ, jam a Caſpare Barlæo & Cornelio Boyo Latino Carmine celebrantur. Ad Sereniſſimam Principem Elizabetham Fred. Regis Bohemiæ & Electoris Palatini Filiam. Dordraci 1643, in 8vo. There are but two cuts in this Book, page 175, and 179, which are the two laſt mentioned above. This Poem is alſo to be found, but without cuts in page 642 &c. of the following Book; Caſparis Barlæi Antverpiani Poemata, editio quarta, altera plus parte auctior; Pars prima Heroicorum, Amſt. 1645, in 12mo.

Mr. John Hermann Schmincke, in a Latin Diſſertation printed in the Book, intitled, Eginhartus de Vita & Geſtis Caroli Magni, &c. which he publiſhed in 1711. Trajecti ad Rhenum ex Officina Gulielmi vande Water, in 4to, proves that Imma was not Charles the Great's daughter: and the Authors of the Journal of Trevoux mentioning this Book in December 1711, page 656, ſhew, that they are of the ſame opinion. They continued in it, when in April 1715, page 640, they ſpoke of a Poem and of another Work of Father John Weinckens, which are printed in the Book, intitled, Naurchia Seligenſtadiana, &c. Francof. ad Mænum, apud Joan. Philip. Andræam, 1714. in folio. This Father aſſerts in his Poem, that Imma was Charles the Great's daughter, but he ſays the contrary in Chap. the 2d of his other Work, where he relates and explodes the ſtory of a criminal converſation between Eginhart, and Imma, Charles the Great's daughter, which was followed by their marriage. Crit. Rem.]

[A] It was conſiderable only on account of the miraculous ſtone which it boaſted to be poſſeſſed of.] The wood, which was laid on this Stone, immediately took fire of it ſelf. Reperitur apud auctores .... in Salentino oppido Egnatia, impoſito ligno in ſaxum quoddam ibi ſacrum, protinus flammam exiſtere (1). We ſhall ſee preſently that this Stone was at the entrance of the Temple, and that it kindled the incenſe.

(1) Plinius, lib. 2. cap. 107.

[B] Horace laughs at their pretended miracle, and leaves it to be believed by the Jews.] He expreſſes himſelf in this manner:

- - - - - - - Dehinc Gnatia lymphis
Iratis exſtructa dedit riſuſque jocoſque,
Dum flamma ſine, thura liqueſcere limine ſacro
Perſuadere cupit. Credat Judæus Apella
Non ego (2).

(2) Horat. Sat. 5. lib. 1. ver. 97.

That is,

" Here we had ſport enough, and cauſe to ſmile,
" For ſome, that would our eaſy faith beguile,
" Would needs perſuade, that in their ſacred Quire
" Sweet incenſe burns without the help of fire:
" Ah, let the Jews believe it, if they pleaſe,
" Not I." Creech.

Monſr. Dacier (3) declares for thoſe who believe that Horace inſults the Jewiſh nation in this paſſage for no other reaſon than becauſe he was not unacquainted with what was told of the ſacrifice of Elijah, viz. that a fire from heaven had conſumed the offering. I find no inconvenience in this thought of Mr. Dacier: I ſhall only ſay that Horace might as well have referred theſe things to be believed by the Perſians as by the Jews: Ferunt ſi juſtum eſt credi etiam ignem cælitus lapſum apud ſe ſempiternis foculis cuſtodire, cujus portionem exiguam ut fauſtam præiſſe quondam Aſiaticis regibus dicunt. i. e. "They pretend, if it be reaſonable "to believe them, that they keep fire which fell from "heaven perpetually burning, a ſmall portion where-"of, they ſay, was formerly carried before the Aſi-"atic Kings as promiſing good fortune." Thus Ammianus Marcellinus has expreſſed himſelf, ſpeaking of the Magi of Perſia, in the 6th Chapter of the 23d Book.

(3) In his Remarks on theſe words of Horace.

[C] There were other places .... where the like prodigies and even more extraordinary ones [D]. The credulity of the people encouraged the Directors of Religion to vie with one another in the forging of miracles.

prodigies were pretended.] Solinus mentions a hill which was yet more miraculous than the Temple of Egnatia. It was in Sicily near Agrigentum. There was no need to put fire on the altar: it was ſufficient to lay vine-branches in order upon it; and they lighted of themſelves, were they ever ſo green, provided the ſacrifice was agreeable to the God to whom it was offered. In that caſe, the flame did not only kindle ſpontaneouſly, but it alſo ſpread itſelf on every ſide, as it were to catch at thoſe who were feaſting on the ſacrifice, and did no manner of harm to thoſe it touched. They only knew, by that ſign, that nothing was wanting to the ceremonies of the day. Nec longè indè collis Vulcanius, in quo qui divinæ rei operantur, ligna vitea ſuper aras ſtruunt, nec ignis adponitur in hanc congeriem: cum proſicias intulerunt, ſi adeſt Deus, ſi ſacrum probatur, ſarmenta licet viridia ſponte concipiunt, & nullo inflagrante halitu, ab ipſo numine ſit accendium. Ibi epulantes adludit flamma, quæ flexuoſis exceſſibus vagabunda, quem contigerit non adurit: nec aliud eſt quàm imago nuncia perfecti ritè voti (4). This is more conformable to the events of Scripture, and much more ſingular than the miracle of Egnatia. A celeſtial fire ſent down on the victims ſometimes teſtified among the Jews that God was pleaſed with their worſhip (5); and it is a more expreſs ſign of a particular providence to ſee that the fire does not kindle of itſelf, except when the hearts of the worſhippers are well diſpoſed, than to ſee it kindle of itſelf at all times. This latter caſe may admit ſuſpicions of a natural cauſe, or of a trick: the other does not admit of any, or admits them leſs. Servius affirms that anciently the fire was not lighted on the altar, but that they drew down a divine fire by Prayers. Apud majores aræ non incendebantur, ſed ignem divinum precibus eliciebant qui incendebat altaria (6). Pauſanias relates, as an eye-witneſs, a thing ſufficiently ſurprizing. There were two cities in Lydia, where what I am going to relate was practiſed. Each of theſe two cities had a Temple, wherein was a chapel appointed for the ceremony in queſtion. Aſhes of a very peculiar colour were to be ſeen on the altar of the chapel. A Magus entered into it, and having laid ſome dry wood on the altar of that chapel, and wound a tiara round his head, recited certain prayers contained in a Book; and this being done, a very bright flame was ſeen to ariſe from the hearth, without any fire being put to the wood (7). This man was bolder than the Greek Prieſts, who make people believe that yearly, at the feſtival of Eaſter, they receive in a chapel of the holy Sepulchre a celeſtial fire which God miraculouſly grants them. It is a ceremony which is performed in private. As the Latin Prieſts have not adopted this piece of deceit, they are the firſt to ridicule it; and they boldly tell the Greeks, when they go to ſhut themſelves up in the chapel appointed for this pretended miracle, You would be finely caught, if you ſhould not have choſen a good ſteel.

I omit the particular inſtances where the fire has kindled of itſelf on the altars, as a happy preſage to certain perſons. This was one of the preſages of the grandeur of Tiberius. Ingreſſo primam expeditionem ac per Macedoniam ducente exercitum in Syriam accidit, ut apud Philippos ſacratæ olim victricium legionum aræ ſponte ſubitis collucerent ignibus (8). i e. "When he "ſet out on his firſt expedition, and was leading his "army through Macedonia to Syria, it happened that "at Philippi the altars of the victorious legions, "which had been conſecrated ſome time before, ſud-"denly blazed of their own accord with ſpontaneous "fire." Seleucus by a like ſign was informed of his future elevation (9). The Conſulſhip of Cicero was preceded by a like preſage: Cicero was told of it by his wife, and inſerted it in a Poem. He might eaſily have known that there was nothing ſupernatural therein: it frequently happens that if wine be thrown on warm aſhes, among which there are almoſt always ſome live coals, the ſpirits of the wine take fire; and this was the whole of the prodigy which Cicero's wife related to her huſband. Hoc uxori Ciceronis dicitur contigiſſe, cum peracto ſacrificio libare vellet in cinerem; ex ipſo cinere flamma eodem anno Conſulem futurum oſtendit ejus maritum, ſicut Cicero in ſuo teſtatur poëmate (10). Others ſay this prodigy was ſeen by the Ladies who celebrated the feſtival of the good Goddeſs. The fire which was lighted on the altar ſeemed to be extinguiſhed, and yet there ſuddenly aroſe a great flame from the midſt of the aſhes and brands (11). This might be very natural: we ſee every day that the remains of a faggot which flamed no longer rekindle of themſelves. The Ladies were alarmed; but the Veſtals adviſed Cicero's wife to go quickly and tell him that he ſhould execute his deſigns for the preſervation of his country, and that the Goddeſs promiſed him ſucceſs. The matter then under conſideration was what ſhould be done with the accomplices of Catiline, who were detained in priſon. Cicero's wife immediately obeyed the direction of the Veſtals, and encouraged her huſband (12). This has very much the air of one ſtory grafted on another. They may have changed the circumſtances of the fact which Cicero embelliſhed his Poem with, and ſo inſtead of one prodigy they may have publiſhed two. However it be, it did not paſs into a Religious Maxim that a fire which kindled of it ſelf was always a lucky omen; for we ſee in Virgil that on a like accident it is wiſhed the preſage may be good.

Aſpice: corripuit tremulis altaria flammis
Sponte ſua, dum ferre moror, cinis ipſe. Bonum ſit (13).

" See, while my laſt endeavours I delay,
" The waking aſhes riſe, and round our Altars play
" May it prove good!" Dryden.

Servius's Remark, which may be ſeen in the margin, was the proof Saldenus ſhould have made uſe of; for that which he alledges is good for nothing. Licet & factum nonnunquam ſit, ſays he (14), ut ignes illi non tantum boni ſed & infauſti quicquam præſignificarint. i. e. " Tho' it ſometimes happened that theſe fires did " not foreſhew good only, but miſchief likewiſe." Whereupon he cites the adventure of Lavinia mentioned by Virgil in the ſeventh Book of the Æneid. But the prodigy which we read of there, does not conſiſt in the fire's kindling on the altar of itſelf, but in the fire's leaping on the long hair of Lavinia, and burning all her head-dreſs. She was ſtanding by her father at the altar.

---- Caſtis ADOLET dum altaria TÆDIS,
Et juxta genitorem adſtat Lavinia virgo,
Viſa (nefas) longis comprendere crinibus ignem,
Atque omnem ornatum flamma crepitante cremari (15).

---- " When fair Lavinia fed the fire
" Before the Gods, and ſtood beſide her Sire;
" Strange to relate, the flames, involv'd in ſmoke
" Of incenſe, from the ſacred altar broke;
" Caught her diſhevell'd hair, and rich attire."

Read what Livy relates of the flame which was ſeen round the head of Servius Tullius (16).

[D] . . . And even ſome more extraordinary.] The Temple of Venus, on the mountain of Eryx in Sicily, was one of the moſt famous among the ancient Pagans. A thouſand things diſtinguiſhed it; but I ſhall ſpeak of no more than one. The great altar ſtood in the open air, ſub dio: the flame kept in upon it night and day, without live coals, without aſhes, without firebrands, and in the midſt of the dew, and of herbs which grew up every night (17).

(4) Solinus, cap. 5. pag. m. 20.

(5) See above the Remark [H] of the Article ABEL.

(6) Servius, in Æneid. lib. 12. ver. 200.

(7) Ἄνευ δὲ δὴ πυρὸς ἀνάγκη πᾶσα ἀφθῆναι τὰ ξύλα, καὶ περιφανῆ φλόγα ἐξ αὐτῶν ἐκλάμψαι. Sponte ſua è lignis nullo igne admoto puriſſima emicat flamma. Pauſan. lib. 5. ſub finem, pag. m. 176.

(8) Sueton. in Tiberio, cap. 14. Dion relates the ſame thing; lib. 54. ad ann. 734. pag. m. 603.

(9) Appianus, in Syriacis, pag. m. 82.

(10) Servius, in Virgil. Eclog. 8. ver. 106.

(11) Plutarchus, in Cicerone, pag. 870.

(12) Plutarch. ibid.

(13) Virgil. Eclog. 8. ver. 105. On which Servius remarks; Optat ut hoc ſignum bonum ſit, quia ignis medius eſt, & qui poſſit etiam nocere. i. e. " She wiſhes " this may be a " good ſign, be-" cauſe fire is " neutral, and " may alſo do " hurt."

(14) Salden. Otia Theol. pag. 336.

(15) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 7. ver. 71.

(16) Livius, Dec. 1. lib. 1. cap. 39.

(17) Ælian. Hiſt. Animal. lib. 10. cap. 50.

EGNATIUS (JOHN BAPTIST), one of the moſt learned men in the ſixteenth Century, taught the Belles Lettres with great reputation at Venice his native country. He made himſelf ſo ſerviceable to the youth, that when in his old age he deſired to be be declared emeritus *, he did not obtain it [A], becauſe it was thought this would be a detriment to the Students. He obtained at laſt in his decrepit age the diſcharge which he deſired, and received from the Commonwealth of Venice a glorious and profitable teſtimony of the particular eſteem they had for him [B]. The Works which he publiſhed [C], give but an imperfect notion of his merit; for he ſpoke much better than his

* That is, to be diſcharged from his Functions.

[A] He made himſelf ſo ſerviceable to the youth, that when in his old age he deſired to be declared Emeritus, he did not obtain it.] This is what one of his ſcholars acquainted the public with. Nos qui juvenes eramus, ſays he (1), illum, cujus ætas jam ſeneſcebat, ut jam tum ceſſaret, imprudenter fortaſſe quidem, ſed tamen amice monebamus, illud uſurpantes:

(1) Sebaſtianus Corradus in Quæſtura, initio.

Solve ſeneſcentem mature ſanus equum, ne
Peccet ad extremum ridendus, & ilia ducat.

Ille vero, qui vir prudentiſſimus eſſet, & optime, qui ſit orbis in rebus humanis, noſcet, ut in otium ſolitudinemque ſe conferre cupiebat, ſic etiam ſæpe tentavit, ſed, quod cupiebat, a Senatu Veneto, qui juventutem talis & tanti Viri conſuetudine fructuque privari nolebat, id nunquam, niſi ſenex admodum, potuit impetrare. i. e. "We, "who were young men, ſeeing that he began to grow "old, deſired him, imprudently perhaps, but yet out "of friendſhip to leave off reading lectures, quoting "the following verſes,

"And while 'tis well releaſe thy aged horſe,
"Leſt when he runs but with unequal force
"And ſtretches hard to win, he breaks his wind,
"Derided, diſtanc'd, baſely lags behind.
CREECH.

"And he who was a very prudent man, and perfect-"ly acquainted with the viciſſitude of worldly things, "deſired to lead a quiet and retired life, and often "endeavoured it: but he could not obtain what he "deſired from the Senate of Venice, who would not "ſuffer that the youth ſhould be deprived of the con-"verſation and benefit of ſo great a man, ſo that "his requeſt was not granted him till he was very "old."

[B] He received from the Commonwealth of Venice a glorious and profitable teſtimony of the particular eſteem they had for him.] The favour he received from the Senate was, that tho' he did no longer teach, yet he ſhould have yearly the ſame ſtipend he had enjoyed when he uſed to read Lectures, and by a Decree of the Council of the Ten it was ordered that his eſtate ſhould be free from all kind of taxes. This is Monſieur Du Ryer's tranſlation of a Latin paſſage in Thuanus. Eas (bonas literas) non mediocri ſtudio illuſtravit, & ſcriptis & publica XL annorum profeſſione cum ſumma totius Italiæ admiratione; & ob id ab illuſtriſſimo ſenatu eam gratiam conſecutus, ut quamquam publico munere defunctus, eodem ſtipendio, quod profitendo meruerat, quotannis donaretur, & ejus bona ex decemviralis Conſilii decreto publico cenſu eximerentur (2). i. e. "He has with great zeal il-"luſtrated the Belles Lettres both by his writings, and "by his public Lectures during forty years, which "gained him the greateſt applauſe from all Italy; by "this he ingratiated himſelf ſo well into the favour of "the moſt illuſtrious Senate, that tho' he did no longer "teach, &c." Ghilini does not altogether confirm this; he aſſerts, that Egnatius's ſtipend was of 300 crowns when he performed the functions of his Profeſſorſhip, and of 200 only, ſince he had been diſcharged of them (3). The ſhort encomium on Egnatius, which is prefixed to his poſthumous Treatiſe de Exemplis illuſtrium Virorum, does not mention all theſe particulars, but we find there, Vir & Scientia & Religione inſignis, . . . adeo univerſæ Venetæ civitati ob ſingularem eruditionem ac morum probitatem charus, ut ex Senatus decreto ducentis aureis nummis quotannis jam publico munere defunctus ac plane emeritus, quoad vixerit, donaretur. i. e. "He was a man eminent by his "knowledge and piety . . . . and ſo much beloved by "the whole Commonwealth of Venice on account of "his great learning and virtue, that tho' he was diſ-"charged from his functions, and entirely incapable "of them any longer, yet the Senate decreed him a "yearly penſion of two hundred crowns during his "life."

(2) Thuan. lib. 12. pag. 253. col. 1. ad ann. 1553.

(3) Ghilini, Teatro, Part 1. pag. 96, 97.

[C] The Works which he publiſhed.] Geſner has given the following catalogue of them. De Romanis Principibus vel Cæſaribus Libri tres (4). This work contains a ſhort account of the Lives of the Emperors from Julius Cæſar to Conſtantine Paleologus, and from Charles the Great to Maximilian. I. It was tranſlated into French by Maitre Geofroy Tory de Bourges; and this Tranſlation was printed at Paris in the year 1529 (5). The Abbot de Marolles gave another French Tranſlation of it in the year 1664. Ghilini has made two Books of this (6), for he mentions that, intitled de Cæſaribus Libri tres, as a diſtinct work from that de Romanis Principibus. Thus it is that the Writers of Catalogues impertinently multiply on a thouſand occaſions the works of an Author. But let us continue to tranſcribe Geſner. Item Annotationes in Vitas Cæſarum apud Suetonium, nempe Æliani, Spartiani, Julii Capitolini, Lampridii, Flavii Vopiſci, Trebellii Pollionis, Vulcatii Gallicani. Theſe words have been faithfully tranſcribed by the Epitomizers of Geſner, and yet it was very eaſy to obſerve, that they are full of blunders. There ſhould not have been a comma after Æliani, and inſtead of Æliani it ſhould have been Ælii. The worſt is, that even ſuppoſing theſe words to be exact, it muſt of neceſſity be ſuppoſed that Ælianus, Spartianus, Julius Capitolinus, Lampridius, Flavius Vopiſcus, Trebellius Pollio, and Vulcatius Gallicanus were Roman Emperors, whoſe Lives Suetonius wrote; which is ſuch an abſurd and monſtrous ſuppoſition, that there is no ſchool-boy of the ſecond form but would laugh at it. How then came it to be admitted for a true one by Joſiah Simler, and John James Friſius, who epitomized Geſner and made a Supplement to his work? They are more inexcuſable than Geſner: For if he ſaw the proof-ſheets of his works, he may have overlooked the omiſſions of the Printer. It happens but too often, that when we correct the proofs, our head is ſo full of what we wrote in our copy, that we read it by heart, and without taking notice of what the Printer ſkipped. The other Books of Egnatius cited by Geſner are, De Origine Turcarum (of the origin of the Turks). Obſervationes in Ovidium, (Obſervations upon Ovid). Interpretamenta in familiares Epiſtolas Ciceronis, (Explications of Tully's familiar Epiſtles). Panegyricus in Francorum Regem (7), (a Panegyrick on the French King). Racemationes, quæ obſcuriores aliquot Authorum locos interpretantur (8), (A Collection of Notes, in which ſome of the moſt difficult paſſages in ſeveral Authors are explained). Exemplorum Libri novem, (Nine Books of Examples). Ghilini aſſerts, that this Author's Notes in Dioſcoridem ab Hermolao Barbaro tranſlatum (upon Hermolaus Barbarus's Tranſlation of Dioſcorides) and his Oration ad Meretrices (to the lewd women) have been publiſhed. The Abbot de Marolles (9) obſerves, that the ſmall Treatiſe of the Origine of the Turks, written by our Egnatius, is printed in the Collection of Pieces containing the Hiſtory of the Government of Turkey and of the Ottoman Empire, printed by John Oporin, in the year 1556. Obſerve that the nine Books of Examples were printed after his death. He wrote this work in his old age after the method of Valerius Maximus; but he did not live long enough to put a finiſhing hand to it. He recommended it by his laſt Will to the noble Marco Molino, Procurator of St. Marc, who ordered his ſon to publiſh it. This ſon acquitted himſelf of the Commiſſion quickly enough. The Dedication, which he prefixed to the Book, is dated April the 30th 1554, and contains in a few words a very good encomium on Egnatius, whoſe death is there placed on the 2d of July 1553 (10). The Edition which I make uſe of was printed at Paris, apud Bernardum Turiſanum via Jacobæa ſub Aldina Bibliotheca, 1554, in 12mo. i. e. "By Bernard Turiſan, in James's Street, near the Li-"brary of Aldus, 1554, 12mo." The title of the Book is, Joannis Baptiſtæ Egnatii viri doctiſſimi de Exemplis illuſtrium Virorum Venetæ civitatis atque aliarum Gentium. i. e. "The moſt learned John Baptiſt Egnatius's

(4) Geſner, in Biblioth. pag. 387.

(5) See the Abbot de Marolles in his Augmentation de l'Hiſtoire Romaine, tom. 2. pag. 287.

(6) Ghilini, Teatro, Part 1. pag. 97.

(7) Geſner's Epitomizer obſerves, that it was printed at Venice in the year 1540.

(8) Gruter has inſerted them into the 1ſt volume of the Theſaurus Criticus.

(9) Augument. de l'Hiſt. Romaine, tom. 2. pag. 287.

(10) I think we ought to follow this date rather than the IV Non. Quintil. (i. e. July the 4th) of Thuanus.

he wrote, and he ſhewed his excellent memory and extenſive learning much more in his lectures and converſations, than in his books [D]. He was not leſs commendable for his virtue, than for his learning [E]; and it is aſſerted, that his good morals were an honour to the Eccleſiaſtical Order, to which he had devoted himſelf (a). He died at the (a) Thuan. lib. 12. pag. 253. See below quotation (10).

" natius's Treatiſe of the Examples of the eminent " Men of the Republic of Venice, and of other Na- " tions."

[D] He ſpoke much better than he wrote, and ſhewed . . . . his learning much more in his Lectures than in his Books.] Corradus obſerves, that they, who charged Egnatius with ignorance, could be much eaſier refuted by the teſtimony of thoſe perſons, who had heard that Profeſſor, than by his works. Quamvis ipſius ſcriptis, quæ jam multa leguntur, facile refutare poſſemus; quia tamen ille multo melius, ut Ser. Galba, ut Q. Hortenſius, ut alii, dixit, quam ſcripſit, facilius eos teſtibus, qui ſunt adhuc innumerabiles, confutari poſſe, ſi res poſcat, arbitramur (11). i. e. " Tho' they might be ea- " ſily refuted by his works, which are in great num- " ber, yet as he, like Sergius Galba and Quintus Hor- " tenſius, and others, ſpoke better than he wrote, I " think, that if it be neceſſary, they can be more ea- " ſily refuted ſtill by witneſs, of whom there are ſtill " numberleſs living." He relates a very curious particular. Egnatius delivering once an Oration, which he had learnt by heart, was juſt going to finiſh, when he ſaw the Pope's Nuncio coming in. He began again his diſcourſe, and repeated in other words what he had already ſaid, but with a much greater eloquence than the firſt time, ſo that his friends adviſed him not to write his Oration for the future. Nos certe, quod omnes, qui tum Venetiis erant, audire potuerunt, affirmare non dubitamus; illum, quum Pontificis olim Legatus Orationi, quam memoriter jam penè totam dixerat, interveniſſet, illud idem, quod pronunciârat, diverſis verbis à principio repetitum multò melius elegantiuſque dixiſſe. Quare, quum deſcendiſſet, ſic nos illi diximus. Tu vero poſthac nihil unquam ſcribito (12). In order to know the extent of his learning and the ſtrength of his memory, you muſt read the following paſſage, where you will find, that the Senators of Venice went often to conſult him. Habuit vir ille, quod de L. Lucullo dicitur, divinam quandam memoriam rerum; quas quidem res penè omnes ut legerat, vel audiverat, ſic iis, qui ſcire volebant, memoriter jucundeque narrabat. Res vero tam mutas ille legerat, vel audiverat, ut omnium maxime ſtudioſus, atque etiam plane curioſus fuit, ut de omni re, quæcunque in diſceptationem, quæſtionemque vocaretur, copioſiſſimè tanquam Gorgias, poſſet, & ſoleret etiam ſæpe diſputare. Nam de jure civili cautè, de totius orbis, & cæli regionibus, ac gentium moribus perite, de poëtica divinitus, de Philoſophia ſapienter, atque de religione pie reſpondebat. Quod ſi quis eum ut de rebus ad hiſtoriam, vel ad rhetoricam pertinentibus loqueretur, rogaſſet, id ille ſic libenter, ſic humaniter, ſic ornate, ſic copioſe faciebat, ut verè Lydus, quod agunt, in campum videretur eſſe provocatus. Quare præter ſtudioſos adoleſcentes, quorum maxima frequentia Egnatii janua & veſtibulum frequentari ſolebant, multi nobiliſſimi & optimi Senatores, ut magnis de rebus deliberarent, ad eum penè quotidie veniebant ita, ut ejus domus oraculum totius civitatis vere poſſit appellari (13). i. e. " What has " been ſaid of Lucullus may be ſaid of this great " man; he had almoſt a divine memory: whatever " he had read or heard, he could relate by heart and " in a very agreeable manner, to thoſe who deſired " to know it from him. And as he applied himſelf " to every thing, and with the utmoſt diligence, he " had read and heard ſo many things, that whatever " queſtion came to be propoſed, he could, like Gor- " gias, treat of it at length, and uſed to do it: For " he diſcourſed upon the Civil Law prudently, upon " Geography, Aſtronomy, and the manners of diffe- " rent Nations learnedly, upon Poetry divinely, upon " Philoſophy wiſely, and upon Religion piouſly. If " any perſon deſired him to diſcourſe of things relat- " ing to Hiſtory or Rhetorick, he did it ſo willingly, " ſo kindly, with ſo much eloquence and ſo fully, " that one might very well apply to him that proverb, " to challenge a Lydian to fight.* So that beſides the " young Students, of whom there was always a great " number of Egnatius's houſe, ſeveral of the moſt no- " ble and eminent Senators uſed to go to him almoſt " every day, to confer with him upon the moſt weighty " affairs; for which reaſon his houſe might truly be " ſtiled the Oracle of the Commonwealth."

(11) Corradus, in Quæſtura, pag. 12.

(12) Idem. ibid.

(13) Idem, ibid. pag. 3.

* The Lydians were famous for fighting on horſe-back.

[E] He was not leſs commendable for his virtue, than for his learning.] This Encomium Eraſmus paſſes upon him, at the ſame time that he will not allow him to have been a Ciceronian Author. See the marginal note (14). Ghilini alſo ſays, that Egnatius made himſelf beloved by his learning and virtue; Per la ſingulare ſua dottrina e integrita di cuſtomi (15). The Author of the Dedication, which I have already mentioned, enlarges very much upon this ſubject, and in a poſitive manner; for after having expatiated upon Egnatius's intellectual talents, I mean, upon his memory, imagination, learning and eloquence, his art of mixing gentleneſs with gravity in his cenſures, and of teaching the youth, he concludes with theſe words. Poſtremo vero, ſi omnes ejus mores diligenter inſpicias, perfectum ſane atque abſolutum innocentiſſimæ vitæ exemplar ſeſe offert. Univerſa enim ejus vita nihil aliud quam ardentiſſimam Religionem Chriſtianamque pietatem ſpirat. Poterat omnis Veneta Civitas in hoc uno perinde ac in puriſſimo ſpeculo ſeſe ad omnem pietatem eruditionemque componere (16). i. e. " If you carefully " obſerve his morals, you will find in him a perfect " pattern of the moſt innocent life. For his whole " life offers nothing elſe but the moſt fervent devotion " and Chriſtian piety. All the Citizens of Venice " might ſee in him alone, as in a moſt pure glaſs, " how they ought to behave themſelves, in order to " acquire all kinds of virtue and learning." He ſeems to have ſuch ſtrong reaſons for what he aſſerts, that he does not take the leaſt pains to refute thoſe, who had publiſhed in a ſatyrical Letter, that Egnatius lived and died an Infidel. Illud unum præterire nequeo, homunciones quoſdam nefario ſcelere audaces, in tam ſingularis, tamque omnium judicio probati viri memoriam invectos, atque male conſarcinata Epiſtola, ac vix cohærenti tam placidos manes violaſſe fuiſſe auſus. Ut jam exclamare libeat, O mores! ô tempora! Unde repente tam inopinata atque immania Monſtra? Unde iſti tam infeſti Calidonii Apri ſpumoſo ore in præclaram omnium virtutum ſylvam debacchantes, univerſamque optimi ac doctiſſimi viri famæ exiſtimationique ſegetem indigne devaſtantes? Ergo iterum opus eſt Hercule? Jam 13 inſtat labor? Dii veſtram fidem! Sed attende quæſo quid præclari iſti Cenſores damnent. Egnatium parum Chriſtianè vixiſſe, atque eâdem, quâ vixerit, pietate defunctum eſſe. Id nimirum quod quemvis hominem Chriſtianum offendere potuiſſet. Sed quâ tandem in urbe hoc leviſſimi homines mentiti ſunt? Nempe in illa, quæ hunc genuit, educavit, atque ad ampliſſ. honores ſummo judicio promovit, ac publicis decretis totius decoravit. O inſignem audaciam! ô manifeſtam calumniam! Vides quàm liberè quàm confidenter pronuncient, quàm gravem notam defuncto homini inurant. Quid quæſo reliquum erit Chriſtiano homini, ſi religionem adimas, non ſolum in cætera vita, ſed etiam ſub ipſum mortis tempus, quando vel perditiſſimi homines reſipiſcere ſolent? Verum ne tam argutum illorum mendacium non careret ratione ἀξιώματα protulerunt; quod etiam, ne præter rerum ſcientiam, linguarum cognitionem illis deeſſe putes, Græcè explicarunt, ἀδύνατον ἔστι καλῶς ζῶντα μὴ κακῶς ἀποθανεῖν. Sed præſtiterit fortaſſe hanc illorum dementiam riſiſſe (17). i. e. " But I muſt not " omit obſerving, that ſome audacious wretches, by " a moſt horrid attempt, have dared to inveigh againſt " the memory of this eminent man, ſo much eſteem- " ed by all perſons, and to diſturb his aſhes in an ill " contrived and hardly conſiſtent Epiſtle: So that we " may very well exclaim, Oh the wicked times we live " in! Whence came on a ſudden theſe unexpected and " horrid Monſters? Whence theſe Calydonian Boars " raging with a foaming mouth thro' this noble fo- " reſt of all kind of virtues, and miſerably laying " waſte the whole harveſt of the reputation and fame " of this moſt eminent and learned man? Shall we " then want again an Hercules; Is there a thirteenth " labour ready for him? Good God! But pray ob- " ſerve, what theſe great Criticks charge is. That

(14) Virum non minus probum & integrum, quam eruditum & eloquentem nominaſti, ſed cui Tulliani cognominis bonorem negant doctorum ſuffragia. Docte loqui maluit quam Ciceroniane, & quod voluit aſſequutus eſt. Eraſmus, in Ciceroniano, pag. m. 72.

(15) Ghilini, Teatro, tom. 1. pag. 97.

(16) Marcus Molinus, Epiſtola Dedicat. Exemplor. Egnatij. See alſo the end of the Remark [B].

(17) Marcus Molinus, Epiſtola Dedicat. Exemplor. Egnatii.

(b) Idem, ibid. the age of fourſcore, July the 4th 1553 (b) and left his eſtate and his fine library to three illuſtrious families of Venice [F]. There was publiſhed ſoon after a letter, in which he was accuſed of having had no Religion neither during his life, nor at his death (c). I have obſerved in another place (d), that he was at variance with Sabellicus, but that they were again reconciled together. It is pretended that he was ſo much vexed at the literary injuries he received from Robortel, that he would be revenged of him ſword in hand (e). The Cenſure which Monſieur Teſſier paſſed on the Tranſlator of Thuanus, might have been extended further, even on the original it ſelf [G]. We ſhall have ſomething to obſerve againſt Moreri [H].

(c) See the Remark [E].

(d) In the Remark [F] of the Article SABELLICUS.

(e) See the Article HIPPONAX, Remark [F], towards the end.

" Egnatius did not live like a Chriſtian, and that he " died with as little piety as he lived; which would " have given offence to every Chriſtian. But in what " City do theſe wicked men aſſert this falſity. In " that, where Egnatius was born, where he was edu- " cated, where by public Decrees he has ſo often and " ſo juſtly received the greateſt honours. Oh, what " great audaciouſneſs, what manifeſt calumny! You " ſee how freely and with how much confidence they " ſpeak, and with how great infamy they load the " deceaſed. What will a Chriſtian have left, if you " ſuppoſe him to have no piety at all, not only in the " courſe of his life, but even at the hour of death, " when even the moſt profligate uſe to repent? But " that their artful lye might not appear to be entirely " groundleſs, they ſupport it by a ſentence, which " they quote in Greek, that they may not ſeem to be " as unacquainted with the languages as they are with " facts: the ſentence is, it is impoſſible, that he who " leads a bad life, ſhould die well. But it would per- " haps have been better to laugh only at their mad- " neſs."

[F] He left his eſtate and fine library to three illuſtrious families of Venice.] It contained a great many medals, and antiques. Read the following words of Thuanus. Treis ampliſſimas patricii ſanguinis familias, Molinam, Lauretanam, & Bragadenam, ſupremis tabulis hæredes inſtituit. Qua in hæreditate præcipue numeratur copioſa librorum ſuppellex, nummis antiquis aureis, argenteis & æriis, aliiſque præterea veteris ævi monumentis inſtructiſſima (18). i. e. " By his laſt will he made three " Patrician families his heirs, namely thoſe of Molino, " Lauredano and Bragadeno. The chief of his eſtate " conſiſted in a large library, which was well ſup- " plied with gold, ſilver and braſs medals, and other " antiques."

(18) Thuanus, lib. 12. pag. 253.

[G] Mr. Teiſſier's Cenſure .... might have been extended .... on the original it ſelf.] Let us firſt give Du Ryer's words. " John Baptiſt Egnatius was of " Venice, of a good but poor family; and he was a " diſciple of Angelo Politio, who revived in Italy the " Belles Lettres which were almoſt dead, and who having " read lectures during forty years with the admiration " of all Italy, received this favour from the Senate " &c (19)." Mr. Teiſſier's obſervation upon this is as follows (20). If we would mind the grammatical conſtruction of Mr. Du Ryer's words, it would ſeem as tho' Angelo Politio, who reſtored the Belles Lettres in Italy, did alſo teach forty years at Venice. Yet it is certain, that Thuanus meant this of Egnatius, and that Politio, who was one of the moſt learned and polite writers of his time, died in the fortieth year of his age in 1553 (21). This Critick might have made two other obſervations: the one is that the Latin name Politianus ſhould be tranſlated Politien (in French) and not Politio, which is a name unknown in the Republic of Letters, when Angelus Politianus is meant. The ſecond, that Thuanus is not the innocent cauſe of his Tranſlator's error; for his words are ſo diſpoſed, that they cannot be better tranſlated than du Ryer has done. Hic & annus abſtulit, ſays he (22), Johannem Baptiſtam Egnatium, familia honeſta, ſed in tenui re, Venetiis natum, Angeli Politiani, qui bonas literas in Italia intermortuas excitavit, diſcipulum, quique eas non mediocri ſtudio illuſtravit & ſcriptis & publica x annorum profeſſione cum ſumma totius Italiæ admiratione. Perizonius has obſerved (23) that modern Writers are often the cauſe of the darkneſs and equivocation, which is to be found in the Latin tongue, by the bad diſpoſition in which they put their words.

(19) Du Ryer, Traduction de Mr. de Thou, quoted by Teiſſier, tom. 1. pag. 74. edit. of 1696.

(20) Teiſſier, ibid. pag. 75.

(21) This is an error of the preſs. It ſhould have been 1494, as it is in the firſt edition of Mr. Teiſſier.

(22) Thuanus, lib. 12. pag. 253.

(23) See Perizonius's Writings againſt Francius.

[H] We ſhall have ſomething to obſerve againſt Moreri.] I. He ſhould not have ſaid that Egnatius was in vogue towards the end of the fifteenth Century. This is a very improper expreſſion concerning a man, who did not dye till the year 1553. II. He ſhould not have alledged as a Proof of this Profeſſor's old age, that Geſner ſaw him at Venice in the year 1543: he ought to have ſaid that he lived ten years longer. But as Voſſius quoted only this obſervation of Geſner (24), I do not wonder that Moreri went not farther. I am much more ſurpriſed that Voſſius did not know what he might have learned from the Epitomizer of Geſner, and from Thuanus, concerning the year in which Egnatius died.

(24) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 678.

EIMERIC (NICHOLAS) a Dominican Friar, and Inquiſitor General in the Kingdom of Arragon in the fourteenth Century. His Directorium Inquiſitorum was printed at Barcelona in the year 1503. Francis Pegna cauſed two Editions of it to be publiſhed at Rome; the one in 1578, the other in 1585.

ELICH (LEWIS PHILIP) in Latin Elichius, lived in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. I think that he was a native of Marpurg *. He held a public diſpute there de Magia Diabolica, and deſigned to publiſh a book upon the ſame ſubject, with a Preface full of very bad things (a); but he was forbidden to do it; and the Magiſtrates having cauſed his houſe to be ſearched, they found there ſeveral books, on which he had written notes, that were a little ſcandalous (b). Thoſe books were ſeized, and he was ſummoned to appear before the Judges. He promiſed on his oath, and in writing, that he would renounce that frivolous ſtudy; and yet he publiſhed his book at Francfort in the year 1607 [A], and prefixed to it a very outragious preface againſt the Academical Senate of Marpurg. They would have call'd him to an account, but he made his eſcape, and turned a Roman Catholic (c). This is but a part of the evil that is ſaid of him in the printed piece, which I quote. In 1609 he publiſhed at Francfort another book intitled, Innocentius,

* In Upper-Heſſe.

(a) Cum præfatione ſpurca, & pietati moribuſque adverſa. Tobias Tandlerus, in Repulſione Calumniarum Elichii.

(b) Plurimi libri ſcholiis enormibus ac non tolerandis conſpurcati. Idem, ibid.

(c) Taken from Tobias Tandlerus, in Repulſione Calumniarum Elichii.

[A] He publiſhed his book at Francfort in the year 1607.] He intitled it de Dæmonomagia, de Dæmonis cacurgia & Lamiarum energia. i. e. " Of the magic " of the devils, of their power to do evil, and of the " power of Sorcerers." He refuted very proudly thoſe who doubt of what is ſaid of the Devils, and the Sorcerers, and of their being really carried to their nocturnal meetings. He attacked particularly Tobias Tandler, Profeſſor of Phyſick at Wittemberg, who had publiſhed in 1606 an oration de faſcino & incantatione (of faſcination and bewitching). When Tandler reprinted this oration with ſome other pieces of the ſame nature in 1608, he added to it a very ſhort anſwer to Elichius's ſlanders. It is from thence that I have taken the materials of this Article.

Innocentius, ſive de Miſeria Hominis libri tres, ad ignominiam & confuſionem ſuperborum editi. i. e. "Three Books on the Miſery of Man, publiſhed to the ſhame and confuſion "of the proud."

ELICHMAN (JOHN), a native of Sileſia, practiſed phyſic at Leyden (a). In the year 1638 he married a woman of a Burgomaſter's family (b). He did not enjoy her long, for he died in the year 1639 (c). He underſtood ſixteen languages (d), and was ſo well ſkilled in the Perſian, that, in the judgment of Salmaſius, Europe has never produced a man who equalled him in that point, and perhaps never will (e). He was of opinion that the German and Perſian languages were derived from the ſame original, and he gave ſeveral reaſons for it (f). He wrote a letter in Arabic (g), which was printed at Jena in the year 1636. His Diſſertation De termino vitæ ſecundum mentem Orientalium (h), appeared in the year 1639. It would have been much longer, if he had not died while he was writing it. His Latin Tranſlation of the Table of Cebes, [and the golden verſes of Pythagoras, from the Arabic,] was printed at Leyden in the year 1640, together with the Arabic Verſion, and the Greek, by the care of Salmaſius, who prefixed thereto a very ample Preface.

(a) Crenius, in Præfatione Faſcis I Exercitationum Philologico-Hiſtoricarum.

(b) Beverovicius, de Vitæ termino, Parte 3. pag. m. 139.

(c) Konig, Bibliotb. pag. 270.

(d) Chriſtianus Ravius, pag. 12 primæ Panegyricæ, apud Crenium, ibid.

(e) Salmaſ. Præfat. in Tabul. Arabic. Cebetis.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) De Uſu Linguæ Arabicæ in Medicina. See Konig, Bibl. pag. 270.

(h) It is at the End of the 3d Part of Beverovicius's Work de Termino Vitæ.

ELIJAH, one of the greateſt Prophets of the Old Teſtament lived under the reign of Ahab. His true Hiſtory may be found in Moreri's Dictionary, to which I refer my readers, and content my ſelf with relating ſome apocryphal ſtories which concern him. There was a pretty common tradition among the Jews (a), importing that he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from Phineas the ſon of the High-prieſt Eleazar [A], and that the Prophet who lived among men, one while under the name of Phineas, and another while under the name of Elijah, was not a man, but an angel (b). S. Epiphanius relates a thing which cannot be more reaſonably admitted than this, I mean the viſion of Sobac the father of Elijah. After his wife was delivered, he thought he ſaw ſome men cloathed in white who ſaluted the new-born infant, covered him with fire, and made him ſwallow ſome of the flame. Theſe were the ſwaddling cloaths in which they wrapped up the little Elijah. This was the milk they fed him with. Sobac went to conſult the Oracle at Jeruſalem, and learned what his viſion ſignified. He was aſſured that his ſon ſhould dwell in light, and that he ſhould judge Iſrael by fire and the ſword (c) [B]. It has been long a pretty common opinion among Chriſtians that Elijah is not dead, and that God preſerves him alive, either in the terreſtrial paradiſe, or

(a) Videri poteſt ea traditio in Tractatu Juchaſim folio 11 quam etiam amplectitur R. Salomon apud Iranum &c. Egidius Camarcius, de Rebus geſtis Eliæ, pag. 71.

(b) Hanc eorum traditionem referunt Liranus, Abulenſis, Magallianus, Serarius. Idem, ibid. pag. 100.

(c) Epiphan. de Vitis Prophet. pag. m. 237. [Vide etiam Chronic. Paſchale, pag. 161.]

[A] A tradition . . . . importing that he ought not to be diſtinguiſhed from Phineas, the ſon of the High Prieſt Eleazar.] This tradition is very ancient; for Origen has made mention of it (1). I believe it has been founded on the promiſes which were made to Phineas, after he had killed the man who was defiling himſelf with a Midianitiſh woman. Franciſcus Georgius Venetus (2) does not recede from this opinion of the Rabbins. Peter Damian (3) ſeems to embrace it with all his heart: he believes that Phineas, on account of the great zeal which fired him at the ſight of ſo ſcandalous an object, will be preſerved alive in the terreſtrial Paradiſe till the end of the world, and that it is he who under the name of the Prophet Elijah was taken up by a chariot of fire. He cites a paſſage of Scripture (4), to ſhew that Phineas was ſtill living in David's time.

(1) Tractat. VII in Joannem, apud Egidium Camartum, de Rebus geſtis Eliæ, pag. 71.

(2) Tom. 6. Problem. 361. apud Camart. ibid.

(3) Lib. 1. Epiſt. 6. apud Camart. pag. 72.

(4) 1 Chron. ix. 19, 20.

[B] He was aſſured . . . . that he ſhould judge Iſrael by fire and the ſword.] This does not ill ſuit that ſpirit of revenge with which Elijah was animated on ſome occaſions (5); as when he cauſed Baal's Prieſts to be maſſacred (6), and when he brought down fire from heaven on the ſoldiers of his King (7). Thoſe Divines who are againſt Toleration, are not well pleaſed to be put in mind that Jeſus Chriſt has aboliſhed this ſpirit (8): ſuch an advertiſement is a troubleſome piece of inſtruction; and they would willingly ſay, as Felix did, to whoever mentions it to them, Go thy way for this time, when we have a convenient ſeaſon, we will call for thee (9). I am not at all ſurprized at their being vexed becauſe they are prevented from gaining themſelves authority from ſuch an example; for what can be ſeen more ſtrong in favour of thoſe who maſſacre people out of zeal for Religion than the conduct of Elijah? A man who had no character in the State, no civil employment, no ſhare in the right of the Sword: a man, I ſay, whoſe office conſiſted only in prophecying, aſſembles all the Prophets of Baal, who were 450; he adds to them the Prophets of the Groves, which were to the number of 400, and had the honour to eat at the Queen's table (10); he convinces them by a miracle that they worſhipped a falſe God; and immediately gives orders to ſeize them (11), and to take care that not one of them ſhould eſcape, and cauſes all their throats to be cut, without vouchſafing to aſk King Ahab, who was there preſent, whether he approved of the action, and without having exhorted them to converſion. It cannot be ſaid that they had acted againſt their conſcience (12); for if they had believed that Baal was a falſe God, they would not have expoſed themſelves to the trial, and by the credit they had with the Queen, they might eaſily have eluded the Prophet Elijah's challenge. We ſee, moreover, that they invoke their Deity with all poſſible ardour, and give themſelves a hundred gaſhes in honour of him. They expected, without doubt, to be heard. Divines, in order to juſtify Elijah, are obliged to acknowledge that he inviſibly received from God an extraordinary and ſpecial miſſion to put thoſe Prophets to death, and that God revealed to him that they were reprobates whom no exhortation to repentance could move (13). Peter Martyr indeed alledges the Laws of Moſes againſt Idolaters, the Law of retaliation &c; but after all he reduces his argument to particular inſpiration, and to that there is no reply among Chriſtians. Omnia hæc privato inſtinctu Dei agebantur contra legem in communi propoſitam. Ipſe legiſlator cum aliquid contra ſuas leges jubet, mandatum ejus pro lege habendum eſt (14). i. e. "All theſe things were done by the particular inſpi-"ration of God, contrary to the Law eſtabliſhed in "common caſes. When the Legiſlator himſelf com-"mands any thing againſt his own Laws, his com-"mand is to be taken for a Law." However, never was impertinence equal to that of the Franciſcan Feuardent, who accuſes Peter Martyr of having uttered injurious expreſſions againſt the Prophet Elijah, and contradicting himſelf afterwards. Pergit idem (Vermilius) ſays he (15), vineta ſua, quod aiunt, cædere, cum ſcribit, ad id vocatus erat Elias ut judicia divinæ ſeveritatis exſequeretur, nec ex ſeipſo verum ex Deo & Angeli monitu ita duriter ſe gerebat. Potuit quidem ſpecie tenus homicida videri, nec tamen pro tali habendus eſt, cum ſolum fuerit Dei miniſter. i. e. "He proceeds "to make free with himſelf, writing that Elijah was "peculiarly called to execute the judgments of God's "ſeverity, and that he did not act in ſo cruel a manner "of himſelf, but in purſuance of the divine direction, "and the admonition of an Angel. He might, in-"deed, ſeem a murderer in outward appearance; but "yet he ought not to be conſidered as ſuch, ſince he

(5) Spiritum ſeveritatis & ultionis exertum fuiſſe in Elia & collegis magis quam in diſcipulis Evangelicis. Martyr, in lib. II Regum, cap. 1.

(6) 1 Kings xviii. 40.

(7) 2 Kings, chap. i.

(8) Luke ix. 55, 56.

(9) Acts, xxiv. 26.

(10) 1 Kings, xviii. 19.

(11) Ibid. ver. 40.

(12) The Author of the Philoſophical Commentary ſeems to ſuppoſe this, the better to get clear of the Objection which the Teachers of perſecution found on the conduct of Elijah.

(13) Certus erat Spiritu Dei eos non eſſe convertendos aut immutandos. Petrus Martyr, Comment. in I Libr. Regum, cap. 18. folio m. 141 verſo.

(14) Ibid. folio 141.

(15) Feuardent. Theomach. Calviniſt. lib. 9. cap. 3. pag. m. 437. He quotes Martyr's Commentary on the 1ſt Book of Kings, chap. 1. and quotes him faithfully.

or in heaven, or elſewhere, to employ him towards the end of the world againſt Antichriſt. Some aſſert that he will then ſuffer martyrdom, and that he and Enoch are the two witneſſes ſpoken of in the eleventh chapter of the Revelations (d): and as they attribute to him moreover a moſt ſtrict continency (e), they conclude he will be honoured with three crowns, of a Doctor, a Virgin, and a Martyr (f). It is pretended that his continence ſurpaſſed that of the other Prophets who lived in celibacy; for he was not contented with never knowing woman himſelf, but obliged his diſciples alſo to renounce the ſex (g); and it is he who is looked upon as the firſt Founder of the Monaſtic Life. The Carmelites boaſt themſelves to be derived from his Inſtitution, and tell a thouſand ſtories which the other Monks do not let paſs with impunity. Nothing is more impudent than a certain ſtory of the Gnoſtics concerning this Prophet [C]. The Revelation of Elijah has generally paſſed among the Fathers for a forgery; but Origen ſeems to ſpeak of a book of this Prophet's as of a genuine production [D]. A tradition has been long talked of which they falſely derive from Elijah, and which affirms that the world ſhall laſt but ſix thouſand years, whereof two thouſand were to precede the Law, two thouſand to be under the Law, and the remaining two thouſand are to be under the Meſſiah (b). The Jews have pretended that Elijah, ſeven years after he had been taken up, wrote a letter from heaven to King Jehoram [E], and that he compoſed in paradiſe the Annals of all Ages (i). Take notice that this Prophet, who is put almoſt on an equal foot with Moſes, is ſo little known with regard to his extraction, that it is yet diſputed whether he was of ſuch or ſuch a country, of ſuch or ſuch a Tribe, &c. (k). I have cited a Minim (l), who deſigned to write a work concerning the actions of Elijah, This work would have

(d) See Alcazar and Viegas on the 11*th Chapter of the* Revelations, quoted by Camart, ibid. pag. 121.

(e) Hieron. lib. 1 adv. Jovin. & multi alii Patres, apud Camart. pag. 277.

(f) Ægid. Camart. pag. 279.

(g) Idem, pag. 278.

(b) Idem, pag. 288. See alſo Beroaldi Chronicon, lib. 2. cap. 3.

(i) See Cunæus, de Republ. Hebræor. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(k) See Petavius in Epiphan. ad Hæreſ. 55. pag. m. 218.

(l) Giles Camart: he had been General of the Order. His Work, intitled, Elias Thesbites, ſive de Rebus Eliæ Prophetæ, Commentarius poſthumus, was printed at Paris, in the year 1631.

"was only the Miniſter of God." Feuardent makes the ſame complaints againſt Calvin: he charges him with having ſaid that "Elias was a wicked man, and guided by too violent a zeal .... that he alſo ſinned by complaining that he alone remained alive after the ſlaughter and perſecution of the Prophets; and that he was carried away by a ſpirit of ſervitude and revenge." Elias fuit homo depravatus, nimis vehementi zelo correptus ... peccavit etiam quiritando ſe ſolum è clade ac perſecutione reſtare: raptus item fuit ſpiritu ſervitutis & vindictæ (16). He quotes Calvin's Commentary on the 2d and 3d verſes of the eleventh chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans. I find nothing like this there. After all, the liberty which theſe Proteſtant Writers have taken to cenſure in ſome particulars the conduct of that Prophet, cannot be found fault with without blaming S. Chryſoſtom (17): Qui acerrimis verbis Eliam crudelitatis & cujuſdam ἀπαθείας arguit. Denique alibi (18) eumdem quaſi penitus ad divina monita inſenſibilem, dum variis factis & exemplis ad commiſerationem induceretur. i. e. "Who in the "ſharpeſt terms charges Elijah with cruelty, and a "kind of inſenſibility; and in another place repreſents him as almoſt quite regardleſs of the divine "admonitions, while he was by various facts and examples moved to mercy."

(16) Ibid. pag. 436.

(17) Homilia in SS. Petrum & Eliam, apud Camart. de Rebus Eliæ Proph. pag. 127.

(18) Homilia de Elia, apud eundem Camart. ibid.

[C] Nothing is more impudent than a certain ſtory of the Gnoſtics concerning this Prophet.] They ſaid that if a ſoul which aſcended to heaven knew not well how to anſwer the Virtues which examined her at the entrance, ſhe was ſent down again to the earth. Above all things it was neceſſary that ſhe ſhould be able to anſwer that ſhe had left no children behind her; for if ſhe anſwered the contrary, ſhe was ſent away, and obliged to continue in the world till ſhe had gathered all her children together, and had reunited herſelf to them. They related that Elijah in his way to heaven met with a great obſtacle, which obliged him to deſcend again to the earth. There came a female Dæmon, who ſaid to him, Stop there: whither are you going? I have children by you, and you cannot aſcend to heaven and leave them behind you on earth. And how, anſwered he, could you have children by me? have I not always lived in continence? I have had ſome by you for all that, replied ſhe, I have taken advantage of your dreams. They who underſtand Latin will not find this obſcure. Ὅτε ἐνυπνίοις ἐνυπνιαζόμενος πολλάκις ἐν τῇ ἀποῤῥοίᾳ τῶν σωμάτων ἐκινάθης, ἐγὼ ἤμην ἡ μεταλαβοῦσα ἀπό σου τὰ σπέρματα, καὶ γενῶσά σοι υἱούς, Cum in ſomnis effuſione ſeminis ſæpe corpus exhaurires, ego abs te illud excepi, tibique filios peperi (19). St. Epiphanius ſolidly refutes this impertinence by alledging the impoſſibility of it; for the ſpiritual nature of Dæmons does not allow them to be the paſſive ſubject of any generation. It is not ſo eaſy to refute thoſe who ſay that a Dæmon may intervene in quality of an active principle in the production of an animal: not that he can furniſh the neceſſary materials out of the fund of his own ſubſtance, for a ſpirit is an immaterial being; but, ſay they, he may make uſe of the ſeed of a male, and tranſport it to a proper place, and direct in ſuch a manner the motions of matter, that this ſeed may be converted into an organized body. They who hold this poſſible, are in the right to ſay that the child, which ſhould be ſo produced, would be the ſon of the man whoſe ſeed ſhould be ſo made uſe of; for whence comes it, pray, that a man is deemed to be the father of a child conceived in the womb of a creature whom he ſees in a public place, without any other intention than that of ſatisfying his luſt? Is it not becauſe the firſt foundation on which the body of the infant is built was taken from the body of that man? Cannot the ſame be ſaid with reſpect to this other way of generation? The difference would however be great; for they who ſhould become fathers in this extraordinary manner, might notwithſtanding abſolutely preſerve their chaſtity, and conſequently the impertinence of the Gnoſtics is every way extravagant.

(19) Epiph. Hæreſ. 26. lib. 1. tom. 2. num. 13. pag. m. 95.

[D] Origen ſeems to ſpeak of a book of this Prophet's, as of a genuine production.] Explaining theſe words of S. Matthew (20), Then was fulfilled that which was ſpoken by Jeremy the Prophet, ſaying, And they took the thirty pieces of ſilver, &c. he obſerves that it is not to be found in any Book of Scripture, canonical or not canonical, that Jeremy propheſied this, and he ſuſpects that inſtead of Jeremy it ſhould be Zachary, or elſe that Jeremy had written a Book which had never been publiſhed. Hereupon he ſays that Jeremy would not be the only Prophet of whom there were ſome hidden Writings extant, and that Writings of this ſort have been cited by S. Paul. He gives this paſſage as an inſtance of it (21): As it is written, eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. He maintains that it is not to be found in any canonical Book, but only in the hidden Works of the Prophet Elijah. This opinion was cenſured by S. Jerome, after he had ſaid that the paſſage quoted by S. Paul is to be found in Eſaiah (22), not word for word, but as to the ſenſe, which was ſufficient for the Apoſtle (23). The Books attributed to Elijah do not appear in the Catalogue of the Apocryphal Works condemned by Pope Gelaſius. It is notwithſtanding true that the Revelation of Elijah, the Aſſumption of Elijah, &c. paſſed for ſuppoſititious Books (24).

(20) Chap. xxvii. ver. 9.

(21) 1 Cor. ii. 9.

(22) Chap. lxiv. ver. 4.

(23) Quaſi Hebræus ex Hebræis aſſumit Apoſtolus Paulus de authenticis libris in Epiſtola quam ſcripſit ad Corinthios, non verbum ex verbo reddens, quod facere omnino contemnit, ſed ſenſuum exprimens veritatem quibus utitur ad id quod voluerit roborandum. Hieron. in cap. lxiv Iſaiæ.

[E] He wrote a Letter from heaven to King Jeboram.] This opinion is founded on a paſſage of Scripture miſunderſtood. And there came a Writing to him from Elijah the Prophet, ſaying, Thus ſaith the Lord &c. (25). The true ſenſe of this paſſage is, that a Writing was brought to King Jehoram, which had been found among the papers of Elijah.

(24) See Camart. pag. 286, 287.

(25) 2 Chron. xxi. 12.

have been very long; for what the Author's friends have publiſhed of it ſince his death is a Volume of 400 pages in 4to, which contains only the Prolegomena.

You will find in Baronius, that Baſilius the Macedonian, Emperor of Conſtantinople, cauſed Temples to be built in honour and under the name of the Prophet Elijah in his capital city (m). This was one of the proofs which a Carmelite Monk alledged to ſhew that Father Papebroch had raſhly denied, that Mount Carmel may be reckoned among the holy places which the firſt Chriſtian Pilgrims went to viſit (n). Every body ſees the impertinence of this proof. The Reader may find in the book which I quote (o), that a Divine of the Order of St. Francis put the Carmelites of Antwerp to a non-plus in a public diſpute in the year 1594. He attacked a Theſis wherein they aſſerted that Elijah engaged himſelf by a vow to lead a ſingle life. He cited a Jewiſh Doctor named Rabbenu Haccados, that is, our holy Maſter, who lived before Jeſus Chriſt. This Rabbi affirms that Elijah had a brother whoſe wife was barren till the death of Elijah, and conſequently the Prophet could not have conſecrated himſelf to continence; for the Law commanded him to marry his ſiſter-in-law, in caſe ſhe became a widow.

(m) See F. Papebroch, Reſponſ. ad Exhibition. Error. pag. 155.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Papebr. ibid. pag. 227, 228.

ELISHA, the Diſciple of the Prophet Elijah and his ſucceſſors, performed a great number of miracles, as may be ſeen in Moreri. There happened a great prodigy when he was born: the golden Calf which was at Shiloh bellowed ſo loud that it was heard at Jeruſalem. Upon which the High-Prieſt conſulting the ſtones of his breaſt-plate, found that a Prophet was juſt born who would deſtroy the Idols (a). There are reaſons to believe that Epiphanius who relates this, borrowed it from ſome falſe tradition [A]. The Jews, who have aſſerted that when Elijah was become incapable to perform the functions of his office was ordered to reſign it to Eliſha, do not deſerve to be refuted [B].

(a) Epiphanius de Vitis Prophet. pag. m. 237, 238.

ELIZABETH

[A] Epiphanius .... borrowed it from a falſe Tradition.] The lives of the Prophets written by St. Epiphanius are in ſeveral things a tranſcript of a work of the ſame kind compoſed by Dorotheus. Some pretend that this Dorotheus was Biſhop of Tyre (1), and that he ſuffered martyrdom under the Emperor Julian the Apoſtate (2). But Baronius maintains (3) that there never was ſuch a Dorotheus Biſhop of Tyre. Bellarmine owns that the work aſcribed to Dorotheus abounds with idle ſtories (4). An Engliſh Divine has cenſured Epiphanius's account concerning Eliſha in the following manner. I. Epiphanius did not know the ſituation of Abelmuth: he ſaid that Eliſha was born there, and that the place belonged to the tribe of Ruben. He ſhould not have ſaid Abelmuth, but Abelmechol, as appears from 1ſt Book of Kings, chapter the XIXth, verſe the 16th *. If the Tranſcribers have made this blunder, Epiphanius muſt be acquitted of it, and only be anſwerable for the geographical error; for Abelmechol Eliſha's native place was on this ſide of the Jordan (5): it could not therefore be ſituated in the tribe of Reuben; for the portion of that tribe was beyond the river Jordan (6). Dorotheus led Epiphanius into this miſtake. II. When Eliſha was born at Gilgal, the golden Calf which was at Shiloh bellowed. Epiphanius commits here another geographical error, for which Dorotheus is not anſwerable. It is plain that the former takes Abelmuth and Gilgal for the ſame place, in which he is miſtaken. His error is owing to his not underſtanding the true pointing of Dorotheus's words. Dorotheus ſcripſerat, poſtquam Elizæus natus eſt, in Galgalis vitulus aureus mugitum edidit, quomodo interpungendum eſſe locum Dorothei, vel potius authorem interpunxiſſe apparet ex Iſidoro qui ita rem iſtam narrat, Helizæo nato vitulam auream cum magno boatu clamaſſe in Galgalis .... Epiphanius non animadvertens hanc interpunctionem, putavit illud in Galgalis referendum eſſe potius ad ſententiæ partem præcedentem quam ad ſequentem, ad Elizæum potius quam ad vitulum (7). i. e. "Dorotheus had writ, when "Eliſha was born, at Gilgal the calf bellowed: for it "appears from Iſidorus that the words of Dorotheus "muſt be pointed thus, or rather that the author had "really pointed them thus, ſince Iſidorus ſays, Eliſha "being born, the golden Heifer bellowed very loud at "Gilgal. Epiphanius not obſerving this pointing, "thought that theſe words at Gilgal, muſt be referred "to the former, and not to the latter part of the ſen-"tence, to Eliſha and not to the Calf." III. As he miſtook the place where the author whom he tranſcribed had ſuppoſed the golden Calf to be, for Eliſha's native place, he was obliged to find another place for the Idol, and ſuppoſed it at Shiloh, where it never was. It is not neceſſary to obſerve, that the miracle we ſpeak of muſt be applied to one of the golden Calves which Jeroboam ſet up: for as one of them was ſet up at Dan, and the other at Beth-el; one muſt certainly be miſtaken, whether the Calf be ſuppoſed to be at Gilgal, as Dorotheus ſuppoſes it; or as Epiphanius does, at Shiloh. IV. With regard to the miracle itſelf, let us obſerve that Epiphanius might eaſily diſcover the impoſture of it; for if the oracle of the breaſt-plate had anſwered, that the Prophet who was born that day ſhould demoliſh and deſtroy the Idols, Eliſha would have aboliſhed Jeroboam's Idolatry, he would have cauſed the two golden Calves to be melted down or broken in pieces; but he has not done it, it is therefore falſe that the oracle made the anſwer that is aſcribed to it, and conſequently the bellowing of the golden Calf is a mere ſtory. I do not inſiſt upon the Engliſh Doctor's obſervations concerning the diſtance there was between Jeruſalem and the places where Jeroboam's Calves were ſet up; for beſides that the numbers have been altered by the Printers. I do not think that the diſtance is of any weight in this caſe. For it is as eaſy to make the bellowing of a ſtatue be heard at the diſtance of twenty or thirty leagues, as it is to make it be heard at the diſtance of twenty or thirty paces; whoever can perform the latter of theſe miracles will be able to work the former. I wiſh therefore that our Doctor had not been merry upon this ſubject. His jeſt upon Tirinus is extremely ſilly. He ſays, that Tirinus being afraid that a heifer would not be able to bellow ſo loud, has tranſlated the word δάμαλις a cow inſtead of a heifer. Albanus Tirinus interpres ejus operis videtur aliquid tale formidaſſe, cum Græcum vocem (δάμαλις) qua 70 interpretes uſi ſunt, pro vitulo vel vitula, ipſe interpretatus ſit bovem: Bos illa aurea, & quæ ſequuntur, videtur ille mihi metuiſſe ne vitula non poſſet tantum mugitum edere: itaque maluiſſe bovem dicere (8).

(1) The Paris Divines, in their approbation of Dorotheus's Work publiſhed by Margarin de la Bigne in the Bibliotheca Patrum.

(2) Sixtus Senenſis, Biblioth. lib. 4.

(3) Annotat. in Martyrol. apud Reinoldum, de Libris Apocryphis, Præl. 138. pag. 153.

(4) Tom. 1. Controv. 3. lib. 2. cap. 2. apud Reinold. ibid.

* Our Tranſlation has Abelmeholah.

(5) Quemadmodum manifeſtum eſt partim ex 1 Reg. 4. collato cum 3 Joſhuæ, partim, idque planius, ex Judic. 7. Rainoldus, de Libris Apocryph. pag. 157.

(6) See Numbers, chap. the xxxiid, and Joſhua, chap. the xxiid.

(7) Rainoldus, de Libris Apocr. pag. 158.

(8) Rainoldus, de Libris Apocr. pag. 160.

[B] The Jews, who have aſſerted that when Elijah was become incapable to perform the functions of his office, was ordered to reſign it to Eliſha, do not deſerve to be refuted.] Let us firſt tranſcribe the words of the Author who is to be my voucher, and then I ſhall make a ſhort reflection upon it. Judæi enim impingunt Eliæ ſpiritus coercendi impotentiam, qua ineptus fuerit redditus ad prophetiæ munus obeundum, atque adeo juſſus fuerit loco ſui ſucceſſorem aſſumere. i. e. "For the Jews "charge Elijah with an incapacity of reſtraining the "ſpirit, which rendered him improper to diſcharge "the duties of his prophetical office, for which reaſon "he was commanded to reſign it to a ſucceſſor." The Author who ſpeaks thus (9) pretends to ſay nothing but what he read in Peter Martyr, whoſe Commentary on the firſt Book of Kings (10) he quotes. But I met with nothing like this in the place he refers to. However it be, Elijah according to this dream of the Jews, would not have been capable to rule any longer his Enthuſiaſm, or the impetuoſity of his prophetical ſpirit,

(9) Ægidius Camartus, de Rebus geſtis Eliæ, pag. 127. He quotes Peter Martyr Vermilius, in 3 Reg. c. 19. v. 20.

(10) I reckon the firſt book that which the Roman Catholics call the third.

ELIZABETH, Queen of England, and daughter of Henry VIII and Anna Boleyn, has been one of the moſt illuſtrious perſons mentioned in Hiſtory. It would not be doing her ſufficient juſtice, to ſay only, that never woman reigned with more glory than ſhe did. It muſt be added, that there have been but few great Kings, whoſe reigns can be compared with her's [A]. Her reign is the moſt beautiful period in the Engliſh Hiſtory, and it has been the nurſery of a great many able Miniſters [B] and great Stateſmen. The ſame may be aſſerted with regard to warriors (a). I ſhall not ſpend my time in relating the chief particulars of her glorious life: they may be met with in an infinite number of books, which every one can conſult, and ſome of which have been very lately publiſhed (b). I ſhall rather collect ſome circumſtances, which though they be not ſo conſiderable, yet are curious, and have not been related by ſo many Authors. When Holland and Zealand offered to acknowledge her for their Sovereign, ſhe told their Embaſſadors, that it would not be well nor handſome for her to invade other people's proples property, and that the Dutch did wrong to raiſe ſo many diſturbances for the ſake of the maſs. She continued that converſation in a very comical manner [C]. It was perhaps in that audience, that a young man, who had followed the Embaſſadors, expreſſed in a very unpolite manner, the thoughts, which the ſight of ſo beautiful a Queen raiſed in him [D]. He was not the worſe for it. On the contrary, he was particularly diſtinguiſhed rit, and thus like an old man, who through age ſhould too much indulge his paſſionate temper, Elijah would have been forced to have himſelf declared emeritus and to reſign his office to Eliſha, as to a perſon more capable to acquit himſelf worthily of it. How impertinent this is? for, not to obſerve that it does not in the leaſt agree with the Scripture-account, is it not certain, that the ſpirit which ſeized on the Prophets, and which did ſo often carry Elijah from one place to another, was ſuperior to the Prophets, and did not want to be curbed or reſtrained? Add to this, that the danger of going too far is more to be feared from a young man than from an old one.

(a) See F. d'Orleans's words at the end of the Remark [A].

(b) See particularly the Hiſtory of England (in French) by Mr. de Larrey, printed at Rotterdam for Reinier Leers, 1698.

[A] There have been but few great Kings, whoſe reigns can be compared with hers.] That I may not be taxed with running into extremes, in order to flatter this Queen; I ſhall tranſcribe here the glorious character which a Jeſuit gave her in a book which he publiſhed at Paris. Elizabeth, ſays he (1), was a perſon whoſe name immediately imprints in our minds ſuch a noble idea, that it is impoſſible well to expreſs it by any deſcription whatſoever. Never did a crowned head better know the art of government, and committed fewer errors in it, during a long reign. The friends of Charles V could reckon his faults; Elizabeth's enemies have been reduced narrowly to ſearch after hers, and they, whoſe greateſt concern it was to caſt an odium upon her conduct, have admired her. So that in her was fulfilled this ſentence of the Goſpel, that the children of this world are often wiſer in their views and deſigns, than the children of light. Elizabeth's aim was to reign, to govern, to be miſtreſs, to keep her people in ſubmiſſion, neither affecting to weaken her ſubjects, nor to make conqueſts in foreign countries; but yet not ſuffering any perſon to incroach in the leaſt upon the ſovereign power, which ſhe knew perfectly well how to maintain, both by policy and by force. For no perſon in her time had more wit, more ſkill, more judgment than ſhe had. She was not a warlike Princeſs, but ſhe knew ſo well how to train up Warriors, that England had not for a long while ſeen a greater number of them, nor more experienced.

(1) Father d'Orleans, Hiſtoire des Revolut. d'Anglet. tom. 2. pag. 459. of the Paris edition, 1693.

[B] Her reign.... has been the nurſery of a great many able Miniſters.] You may ſee their names and characters in a book printed at Roan in the year 1683, with this title, Fragmenta regalia, ou le Caractére véritable d'Elizabeth Reine d'Angleterre, et de ſes Favoris (The true character of Elizabeth Queen of England, and of her Favourites) This book was originally written in Engliſh by Robert Naunton Secretary of State, and Maſter of the Court of Wards under James I.

This book has been again tranſlated into French (2), and printed with the Secrets des Cours (Secrets of Courts) or the Memoirs of Walſingham. The Tranſlator obſerves, that theſe two books had been long ago printed together, and that he made uſe of the third Edition to tranſlate them. He did not keep the antient title of Fragmenta regalia &c. but put the following title to it. Fragmens, ou Remarques de Robert Nanton ſur le Regne et ſur les Favoirs de la Reine Eliſabeth. i. e. "Fragments, or Remarks of Robert Naunton upon "the reign and the Favourites of Queen Elizabeth."

(2) It was printed in Holland in the year 1694, tho' by an unintelligible myſtery, they have put in the title-page at Cologn, by 1695.

[C] She continued that converſation in a very comical manner.] You have much reaſon indeed, ſaid ſhe, to bluſter as you do at the Maſs; if you will not be preſent at it as at a myſtery, be preſent at it however as at a play. What! if I was now to act that play before you, would you think your ſelves obliged to run away? Obſerve that ſhe was dreſſed in white. I have read this particular in Reinadus's Annals. Recenti multorum memoria obſervari verba ejus ante annos XII ad Aldegondium & Paulum Buyſium Arauſionenſis Patrumque legatos prolata, immerito Hollandos unum ob Miſſæ ſacrum tantos motus ciere, nec decoram iis præfractam adeo adverſus Regem contumaciam: quando fidem divinitati Miſſæ habere non adſtringantur, aſpectarent tanquam fabulam, Quid inquit (& erat candido amicta veſtimento) vobiſne pro flagitio foret, me hoc habitu, ſi hiſtrioniam ordirer, intueri (3)? This was ſufficient to put the Embaſſadors out of countenance.

(3) Reinadus, Annal. lib. 6. pag. 135. ad ann. 1587.

[D] A young man.... expreſſed in a very unpolite manner, the thoughts which the ſight of ſo beautiful a Queen raiſed in him.] I ſhall tranſcribe Du Maurier's words. Prince Maurice, ſays he (4), being once in a very good humour, told my father, that Elizabeth Queen of England, through a weakneſs common to her ſex, deſired very much to be thought beautiful (5); of which he gave the following inſtance. The States General had had ſent a ſolemn Embaſſy of the moſt eminent perſons of the country, and attended by a great many young men of the united Provinces. At their firſt audience a young Dutch Gentleman of their Attendants having attentively conſidered the Queen, ſaid to an Engliſh gentleman with whom he had been acquainted in Holland; that he could not gueſs why People talked ſo indifferently of the Queen's beauty; that they wronged her very much; and that for his part he liked her very well, and that if it were in his power, he would ſhew her, that ſhe was capable to inflame the heart of an honeſt man, adding ſome other gay expreſſions, which one can better imagine, than relate. He ſaid this looking often at the Queen, and then turning himſelf towards the Engliſhman. The Queen who had obſerved the young men more than the Embaſſadors, ſent for the Engliſh gentleman as ſoon as the audience was over, and commanded him upon pain of her indignation, to tell her upon what ſubject the Dutchman diſcourſed with him, for ſhe was ſure that they had talked of her, which ſhe perceived by their air and action. The Engliſhman declined for a long while to anſwer, ſaying they were only trifles, which did not deſerve to be related to her Majeſty. But at laſt the Queen preſſing him very much, he was obliged to tell the truth, and to own that the Dutchman had ſhewed a great love for her royal perſon. The end of this affair was, that each of the Embaſſadors received as a preſent a gold chain of eight hundred crowns, and each of their Attendants one of an hundred crowns; but the Dutchman who had found the Queen ſo beautiful, received a chain worth ſixteen hundred crowns, that is of double the value of that which each of the Embaſſadors received; and he wore it on his neck all his lifetime. Monſieur de Fontenelle has found means to inſert this ſtory with a great deal of art, as he uſes to do, into his Dialogues of the Dead (6).

(4) Du Maurier, Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire de Hollande, pag. 254. of the Paris edit. 1680.

(5) This Queen, who was adorned with a thouſand heroical qualities, had this weakneſs, that ſhe would be thought beautiful by all the world. Upon which I have heard my father ſay, that when he was ſent to her, at every audience he had of her, ſhe uſed to pull off her gloves above an hundred times, to ſhew him her hands, which were very beautiful and very white. Du Maurier, ibid. pag. 256. See the Remark [P].

(6) Part the 1ſt, pag. m. 82.

distinguished for it. This Queen's resentment against Buzenval [E], who had found fault with her manner of pronouncing French, is very remarkable, and may serve for a lesson. What I shall say now is more known. When she came to the Crown she was wavering between the two Religions, and chose at last the Reformed [F]. This was prudently done even with regard to this world. She had never reigned, had not the King of Spain hated France much more than he was zealous for the Catholic Religion [G]. It was this that saved Elizabeth's life. This circumstance may be sufficient to clear her from the crime of ingratitude, with which she has been charged [H]. It is a sad thing that she may [E] This Queen's resentment against Buzenval.] Du Maurier heard his father say, that she was implacable against those that shewed the least contempt for his person. On which occasion he related, that a certain Frenchman, named des Combes, told that Queen that being once at Monsieur du Plessis-Mornay's table, during the siege of Paris, Monsieur du Buzenval, who had been Resident from the French King at London, mimicked her, and asserted that she spoke French very disagreeably, saying often, but with a long and ridiculous accent, paar Dieu, paar maa foi (by God, upon my faith). The Queen remembered this, with a design to be revenged, both of the Jester, and of him who suffered that she should be thus publickly ridiculed. For Monsieur du Plessis having soon after been sent Embassador Extraordinary into England, to ask for assistance against the Leaguers; he was very ill received, and could not obtain any thing. Upon which my father having been sent to the Earl of Essex at Dover, to see whether there was nothing to be expected, the Earl told him that there was some hidden misfortune in this affair, and that he never saw the Queen so much alienated from France. So that in order to appease that Princess, King Henry IV sent the Viscount de Turenne, afterward Duke of Bouillon, Embassador Extraordinary into England, in company with Monsieur de Buzenval, whom he was to leave with the Queen as Embassador Extraordinary. The Viscount was very well received, but she would not see Monsieur de Buzenval; and when Monsieur de Turenne told her that he had the King's command to leave him in England, she told him plainly and absolutely that she would not have any thing to do with him. The Viscount heard from some English, that her aversion was owing to the stories he told of her at the siege of Paris. This Monsieur de Buzenval .... notwithstanding his great ability, committed a great fault by thus publickly ridiculing so powerful a Princess, whose assistance the King greatly wanted at his accession to the Throne; and thus he became very prejudicial both to himself and to his Master; which shews, that one ought always to speak with great respect of persons in a high rank (7).

(7) Du Maurier, Mémoires de Hollande, pag. 256, &c.

[F] She was wavering between the two Religions, and chose at last the Reformed.] It is unquestionable, that if all things had been equal on both sides, she would have preferred the Reformed Religion, before the Roman Catholick, for she had been brought up in the former. But I also think, that in order to avoid the dangers, which she foresaw would follow upon the overthrow of the established Religion, she would have followed it had she found her account in it. The Pope treated her after such a manner (8) as obliged her to turn her eyes upon the Protestant Party; she perceived very clearly that if she continued a Roman Catholick, she must confess that she owed the Crown to a downright usurpation, or to a condescension of the Court of Rome, which would continually expose her title to a thousand cavils. Being a Roman Catholick she was forced to own, that her father's divorce from Catherine of Arragon was void, and consequently that Ann Boleyn could be no other but Henry VIIIth's Concubine. Now in hereditary kingdoms, a bastard cannot exclude a lawful relation without overthrowing a fundamental law, and consequently without being an usurper. Elizabeth was therefore obliged to renounce the Popish Religion, in order to assert that the Pope did wrongfully condemn Ann Boleyn's marriage. But besides she had such a penetrating genius, that she could not but be well acquainted with the situation of the general affairs in Europe; and be sensible that if she declared against the Pope, she would draw all the Protestants on her side, and be thus in a condition to keep up the civil war in the neighbouring countries, as long as she pleased. Mezeray observes that the Court of France alienated the Pope from Queen Elizabeth's interest (9), because that Princess's exclusion might secure the kingdom of England to Mary Stuart Queen of Scotland, and the Dauphin's wife. This was a well contrived design, but France at that time was unlucky.

(8) He sent her word, that she was a bastard, and that he would not make void the bulls of his predecessors; that it was a great boldness in her to have dared to ascend the throne; and that she had not the least favour to expect, unless she renounced all her pretensions, and submitted entirely to the determination of the holy See. Leti, Hist. of Elizabeth, tomi 1. pag. 315, under the year 1558.

(9) The King, whose interest it was not to suffer Elizabeth to wear a Crown, which he thought belonged to the wife of his son the dauphin, contrived matters so, that the Pope did not receive Elizabeth's Embassadors well, and stiled her a bastard. Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. m. 714, under the year 1558.

[G] She had never reigned, had not the King of Spain hated France much more than he was zealous for the Catholic Religion.] One of the chief methods, which God employed to establish the Protestant Religion, and which he still employs to make it prosper, is the natural jealousy there is between France and the House of Austria. Each of these two powers has in its turn chosen to promote the advantage of the Protestants with a design to do a prejudice to its rival, rather than to suffer its rival to enlarge its power by the ruin of the Protestants. Philip II gave a remarkable instance of this strong jealousy. The Queen of England foreseeing that the Roman Catholick Religion would not subsist long in her kingdom if her sister was to succeed her, would have her put to death; but Philip foreseeing another misfortune much more considerable for him than the ruin of the Catholic Religion in England, and which would probably happen, if Elizabeth did not ascend the Throne, secured her from all evil. Here follows what Du Maurier says (10) of this. " Religion " is often made a sacrifice to interest and state-policy; " witness, what the same Queen Elizabeth told my fa- " ther formerly, that she owed her life to Philip II " her brother-in-law, though he was the greatest of " her enemies: and for that reason she kept his picture " by her bed-side, and shewed it to all the world as her " deliverer. And indeed he prevented her sister Mary " from putting her to death. For this Queen Mary " Philip's second wife being a very zealous Roman " Catholic, and very infirm, feared, and not without " reason, lest if her sister Elizabeth who was a Prote- " stant should succeed her, she should banish the Catholic " Religion from England, as she really did afterwards; " and therefore she entreated the King her husband " to have her beheaded, for she was a Prisoner in " the Tower of London. But King Philip opposed " it strongly, lest Mary Stuart Elizabeth's heir, who " was then married with Francis II King of France, " should thus by inheritance become Queen of all Great " Britain, which being united with France, as it would " infallibly be if she had any children, would form by " the union of so many kingdoms, a formidable power, " which would make his great designs of an universal " monarchy vanish away into smoke." As the Author wrote this during the war, which ended by the treaty of Nimeguen in the year 1678, he did not fail to charge the Spaniards with doing themselves what they had so often and so much condemned. They were at that time confederated with Holland, and they had published an infinite number of books against the alliances of France with that same Commonwealth, and with Swedeland. After this Du Maurier added the following remarkable words. " Thus it is plain that " interest alone governs the world, and that a great " Captain was in the right, when he wrote that Princes " rule the nations, but that interest rules the Princes. " Which is so true, that often all that is most sacred " amongst men is made a sacrifice to interest, and that " most Princes follow the rules of justice and religion, " only so far as they agree with that wretched interest." This admirably well confirms what I have observed in other places (11) concerning the RELIGION OF THE SOVEREIGN. Let us add, that the Roman Catholic Religion could not subsist in England; for on the one hand the King of Spain saved Elizabeth's life, and on the other, the King of France would not suffer that this Princess should meet at Rome with kindness, without which she could not continue a Roman Catholick (12).

(10) Mémoires de Hollande, in the Preface. Mr. Bohun Fellow of the Royal Society, in his Treatise of the Character of Queen Elizabeth, translated into French, and printed at the Hague in 1694, owns in pag. 21. that the same State-jealousy prevented Philip from consenting to Elizabeth's death.

(11) Remark [H] of the Article AGESILAUS II, and Remark [C] of ARISTIDES.

(12) See above quotation (9) what has been cited from Mezerai.

[H] .... This circumstance may be sufficient to clear her from the crime of ingratitude, with which she has been charged.] The Jesuit who concealed himself under the name of Andreas Philopatrus (13), in order to confute may juſtly be accuſed of having broken the promiſes ſhe made, when ſhe ſucceeded to her ſiſter. She promiſed to preſerve Popery, which was then the National Religion, and yet ſhe ſoon after aboliſhed it. This conduct proved perhaps extremely ſerviceable to the Proteſtant Religion in the famous Revolution of 1688 [I]. One cannot well repreſent to what a degree calumny has caſt its moſt dangerous venom on this Queen [K]. This was confute this Princeſs's Proclamation againſt the Papiſts publiſhed in 1591, made ſome obſervations upon her complaining of the King of Spain's conduct towards her. This, ſays he, was but a very indifferent return for the favour ſhe had received from this King, who had ſaved her life three times. He was come over to England in July 1554, and married Queen Mary, who was inclined to put Elizabeth to death, as having been accomplice in Sir Thomas Wyat's plot (14). But Philip diſſuaded her from it, and even perſuaded her to ſuffer Elizabeth to come again to Court. A new conſpiracy was diſcovered in March 1555: Elizabeth was ſuſpected of being concerned in it; and it was very gravely debated whether they ſhould make her ſuffer the law; the Queen's Counſellors voted for it; but King Philip and the Spaniards who were of his Council, being of a contrary opinion, it was reſolved to uſe Elizabeth with mercy, and that two Catholick Gentlemen ſhould conſtantly attend her, to have a watchful eye over her actions (15). But ſhe knew ſo well how to impoſe upon them, that they had not the leaſt knowledge of the intrigue ſhe contrived to make Thomas Stafford, who fled into France, return into England, and take upon him the title of King and marry her. He returned actually in April 1557, and made himſelf maſter of a ſea-port town; but he was ſoon after apprehended and capitally puniſhed with ſome perſons of his party. Elizabeth found herſelf at that time in very great danger, and would not have eſcaped capital puniſhment, had not the King of Spain's protection ſaved her life (16). I ſhall not inquire into the truth or falſhood of theſe three conſpiracies; the Reader may find them examined in the Hiſtories of England: I ſhall only obſerve, that the imputation of ungratefulneſs grounded on theſe three favours of King Philip is unreaſonable. For from Elizabeth's acceſſion to the Crown to the Proclamation iſſued in 1591, King Philip behaved towards her in ſuch a manner, as juſtified the complaints which the pretended Philopatrus condemns; but not to inſiſt upon this, I aſſert, that Philip did not deſerve the leaſt thanks for having ſaved Elizabeth's life: He did not do it for her ſake; he had only his own intereſt in view, and he found a great and ſufficient reward in the very preſervation of that Princeſs's life. It was not from a principle of clemency that he uſed her thus, but from a principle of malice againſt France, or at leaſt from a political prudence, which his ambition required. When a favour proceeds from ſuch motives we muſt refer to one of Phædrus's Fables (17) thoſe who in ſuch a caſe complain of ungratefulneſs. Here follows another reflection: Gratitude between ſovereign Princes is not ſubject to the ſame rules, as that from private perſons to each other. Lewis the XIIth has been very much commended for ſaying, that the King of France ought not to take vengeance of the injuries done to the Duke of Orleans. He might almoſt have ſaid with as much reaſon, that the King of France was not obliged to be grateful for the ſervices done to the Duke of Orleans. Do you think that Duke of Orleans, who came to the Crown by a civil war, in which he had been indebted for his victories to the powerful aſſiſtance of a neighbouring Prince, would be obliged to enter into an alliance with that Prince, or not to join with the enemies of that Prince? If he does not enter into an alliance with that benefactor, will he not be ungrateful? Will he not be much more ſo, if he confederates with the Princes who attack his benefactor? It is ſufficient to know one thing in order to reſolve theſe queſtions. Is it the intereſt of the ſtate of which our Duke of Orleans has made himſelf maſter, that the neighbouring Prince who aſſiſted him ſo effectually, ſhould not grow more powerful, and ſhould even loſe ſome of thoſe conqueſts which render him formidable to his neighbours? If this be the caſe, the Duke ought to forget the favours he received, and to ſay that the King of France is not bound to diſcharge the obligations of the Duke of Orleans. He ought not out of gratitude to join with this Prince, whether he be the aggreſſor, or be attacked himſelf; he muſt even ſometimes join with thoſe, who declared war againſt him. This is the law of Politicks, this is State-Juſtice; and it is in conſequence of this State-Juſtice, that Elizabeth did well in her endeavours to thwart Philip the IId's deſigns. The United Provinces had the greateſt obligations to this Queen and to Henry the IVth who were the two ſtrongeſt ſupports of their growing liberty. Yet if it had been the intereſt of the State, that the power either of the Engliſh or of the French ſhould be weakened, the Dutch ought to have concurred in it, together with the enemies of thoſe two nations, and they would very probably have done it. How ſuch a policy agrees with the eternal rules of morality, and how the unchangeable certainty of our ideas of what is honeſt and virtuous is not overthrown by ſuch an oppoſition between the duties of private perſons and thoſe of Princes, is another queſtion. I ſhall only obſerve, that conſidering the condition of civil ſocieties, the public intereſt is like a ſun with regard to a great number of virtues. Theſe virtues are like ſtars which diſappear and vaniſh away before that intereſt. Salus populi ſuprema lex eſto. "The preſervation of the State "muſt be the ſupreme law." Naudé has mentioned ſomething of this in his Coups d'Etat, or State-Policy.

(13) It was Robert Parsons. See Alegambe, pag. 415.

(14) Andreas Philopatrus, Reſponſ. ad Edictum Reginæ Angliæ, pag. m. 88, 89.

(15) Idem, ibid. pag. 90, 91.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Faceres ſi cauſa mea,
Gratum eſſet...
Nunc quia laboras ut fruaris reliquiis
Quas ſunt roſuri, ſimul & ipſos devores,
Noli imputare vanum beneficium mihi. i. e. "If "you did it for "my ſake, it "would be ac- "ceptable to "me.... but "ſince you do it "only, that you "may have the "fragments, and "that you may "devour them "alſo, do not "require of me "any acknow- "ledgment for "an undeſigned "favour." Phædri, Fabul. 22. lib. 1.

[I] This conduct proved perhaps very ſerviceable to the Proteſtant Religion in the... Revolution of 1688.] A ſolemn promiſe made to a whole nation and confirmed with an oath is certainly an obſtacle which a man cannot get over without expoſing his reputation. It may therefore be preſumed, that a Prince who is bound by ſuch a promiſe, will keep it were it only in order to avoid a publick diſgrace. But if in ſome caſes, through a particular privilege of religious ſubjects, it appears a great Queen broke a promiſe of this kind, and yet continued to paſs for an Heroine and the wonder of her age, men dare no longer depend on the good effects, which the apprehenſion of being diſgraced for breaking ones oath may produce. Thus the Engliſh might be perſuaded, that James the IId would not dread the bad conſequence of breaking his word in matters of Religion, and that he would hope this would not be a diſgrace to his reputation any more than it had been to Queen Elizabeth's, whoſe example he only followed. Since therefore the Engliſh could not truſt to his oath, they have laboured betimes to prevent him from imitating their Heroine. Thus it is, that ſome things ſerve different ways both for the preſent time, and for that which is to come. In general we may be aſſured that there is nothing, which has not its uſe in a State (18).

(18) See above the Article DOLABELLA (Publ. Cornel.) in the text, quotation (c).

[K] Calumny has caſt its moſt dangerous venom on this Queen.] Mr. Bohun complains expreſly of four Authors, who are Sanders, Florimond de Raimond, George Cone, and the anonymous Writer, who publiſhed the Didymus Veridicus. He ſays (19), that Sanders not being ſatisfied with defaming Ann Boleyn .... would alſo ſlander and diſgrace Elizabeth. With this view he forged ſeveral obſcene ſtories and the moſt abominable Satyrs againſt her and her Miniſters, endeavouring to make the world believe, that ſhe was guilty of rapine, incontinency, ſhameful debauchery, and of frauds and horrid impoſtures tending to overthrow the Engliſh Nation. The Author of the Didymus Veridicus (20) undertook to offend the ear by the moſt obſcene diſcourſes, and to ruin the reputation of the moſt celebrated Princeſs upon earth..... He contrived a great many falſities, and abſurd and incredible ſtories, ſuch as Poets and Painters imagine and repreſent. We muſt not omit what Mr. Bohun obſerves concerning the penalties eſtabliſhed againſt Libellers. The audacious neſs, ſays he (21), and impudence of the writers of thoſe ſlanderous Books obliged the Queen to treat all thoſe very ſeverely, who compoſed Libels or Verſes to blaſt the reputation of others; ſhe prohibited the ſelling and even the reading of them, and commanded them to be burnt by the common hangman: Her ſeverity extended even on thoſe, was unavoidable, conſidering the ſevere Laws ſhe was obliged to put in execution againſt the Papiſts. Some were capitally puniſhed, and a great many others underwent the hardſhips of a priſon, or the inconveniencies of baniſhment [L], and they were the perſons chiefly, that compoſed ſeveral Libels againſt Elizabeth's reputation. They repreſented her as a monſter of cruelty, avarice and laſciviouſneſs. There are few Proteſtant Writers but who extol the chaſtity of this Princeſs; and it is aſſerted in ſome Memoirs, that ſhe could not expoſe herſelf to become pregnant, without bringing her life into danger [M]: her chaſtity is ſuppoſed to be problematical in the writings of a modern Author, who is of the reformed Religion [N]. It is much eaſier to defend her reputation in that reſpect, and with regard to her proclamations againſt the Papiſts, than with regard to the unfortunate Queen of Scots [O]; and yet one cannot juſtly apply to her the encomium, which thoſe, who ſecretly ſpread falſe rumours to the prejudice or diſgrace of the Adminiſtration, leſt by theſe means the Nation ſhould be excited to ſedition and rebellion. I have not obſerved, that he mentioned an imputation, with which this Queen has been charged, namely, that ſhe was but outwardly a Proteſtant. It has been aſſerted, not only that ſhe owned to the Sieur de Lanſac, that ſhe was perſuaded of the Pope's Primacy (22), and to the Spaniſh Embaſſador, that ſhe believed the Real Preſence of Chriſt's Body in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper (23), but alſo, that ſhe turned out the Biſhops who came to wait upon her in her laſt illneſs. Denique averſionem ejus a tota reformatione & grege Miniſtrorum, horror quem erga Pſeudo-Epiſcopos in ſupremo morbo ad ſe accedentes præ ſe tulit adeo, ut eos Preſbyteros de Sepibus (Phraſis ea eſt Anglorum erga mendaces & meretrices victu tectoque carentes) vocatos ab aſpectu ſuo faceſſere juſſerit, luculenter demonſtrat (24). i. e. "Laſtly her averſion for the whole Reformation, and "for the whole band of Miniſters, appears from the "abhorrence ſhe ſhewed for the falſe Biſhops, who "came to wait upon her in her laſt illneſs, and "whom ſhe ordered to go out of her ſight, calling "them Hedge-Prieſts, which is an expreſſion applied "by the Engliſh to the beggars and lewd women, "who have no houſe nor harbour."

(19) Bohun, Caractere de la Reine Eliſabeth, pag. 412.

(20) Ibid. pag. 414.

(21) Ibid. pag. 417.

[L] A great many others ſuffered the hardſhip of a priſon, or the inconveniencies of a baniſhment.] The Proteſtants of England own it; they do not deny the matter of fact (25). But they maintain that the attempts upon the Government and upon the Queen deſerved that puniſhment. Do not think, that you will find this obſervation in the Libels written by the Roman Catholicks of England. You will indeed ſee in them the puniſhments ſet off with all the flouriſhes of Rhetoric the moſt proper to exaggerate them; but the ſeditious enterprizes, which preceded and were the cauſe of thoſe puniſhments, are not acknowledged. There are few accounts in which the events are not miſplaced. This confuſion is not always owing to a diſhoneſt intention; it is often produced by a zeal too paſſionate, and nature improves upon it, without a downright wickedneſs. For ſuch is the nature of man, that he imagines the evils he ſuffers are very great, and thoſe he makes others ſuffer very inconſiderable: he does not feel the latter, and he feels the former: ſo that he always pretends to have reaſons to complain, even when he remembers that he was the agreſſor; he does not take into the account what he has done; he only ſpeaks of what he has ſuffered. When our zeal is not well regulated it makes us only remember the evils which perſecuted truth undergoes, and makes us forget, that we provoked the perſecutors. If theſe two cauſes are not ſufficient, diſhoneſty, which alone would perplex the order of events, finiſhes the confuſion. However it be, I have obſerved, that the chief difference there is between the accounts of the Roman Catholicks and thoſe of the Proteſtants conſiſts only in the order in which facts are placed. Each party endeavours to give the firſt place to the evils they ſuffered, they relate them with a great many circumſtances, and only touch very lightly upon thoſe, which they made the other party ſuffer by way of repriſals or as a juſt puniſhment. This is what they pretend. Nothing does more than this puzzle the brains of an unbiaſſed reader: for in order to know what is to be blamed or what may be excuſed in the conduct of each party, it is abſolutely neceſſary to conſider the facts in their true order. If the Roman Catholicks had not murthered the Proteſtants, but after they had ſeen them pull down churches, altars, images, and croſſes &c. their cruelty would not have been ſo much to blame. This is the reaſon why it is of ſuch an importance to yield the firſt rank to the adverſary. A modern Author has declared, that he would not examine who are thoſe, that miſplace the events in their accounts (26). Yet in ſome caſes the inquiry is not very difficult; but ſometimes a man would be ſo much perplexed in it, that unleſs he were aſſiſted by ſome revelation, which did the contrary of that, which St. John's does (27), he could not arrive at any certainty by a coherent reaſoning.

[M] It is aſſerted in ſome Memoirs, that ſhe could not expoſe herſelf to become pregnant without bringing her life into danger.] The Hiſtorians, who relate the reaſons why ſhe did not marry, do not omit to mention this, that marriage would have been dangerous to her. Let us hear what Mezerai ſays with regard to the Duke of Alencon. "The affair went ſo far, that "the Queen gave him a ring as a pledge of her word: "but the intrigues of thoſe who were againſt this "match, and her women, who knew the danger ſhe "would be in if ſhe had any children, made ſuch an "outcry about it, and importuned their miſtreſs with "ſo many clamours, that ſhe aſked him the ring a-"gain (28). The Abbot Siri relates, that ſhe commanded her officers not to ſuffer any perſon to touch her body, nor to ſee it naked after her death, for reaſons which they, who know the Hiſtory of this Princeſs, will eaſily gueſs (29). See below the remark [X] towards the end.

[N] Her chaſtity is ſuppoſed to be problematical in the writings of a modern Author . . . of the Reformed Religion.] This Author is Monſieur Leti, whoſe words are as follow (30). "I do not know whether ſhe "was ſo chaſte as is reported; for after all, ſhe was "a Queen, ſhe was beautiful, young, full of wit, ſhe "delighted in a magnificent dreſs, ſhe loved en-"tertainments, balls, pleaſures, and to have the beſt "ſhaped men in her Kingdom for her favourites. "This is all that I can ſay of her to the Reader." One muſt certainly be very charitable, or have a great deal of diſcretion not to ſuſpect there was ſomething immodeſt in the conduct of a young Queen, who has always ſome favourite or another, and who always chooſes him amongſt the braveſt, youngeſt and beſt ſhaped Lords of her Kingdom. If with ſuch a behaviour Elizabeth kept herſelf conſtantly chaſte, as I am willing to believe ſhe did, ſhe has done quite the contrary of this maxim, Si non caſte, ſaltem caute. i. e. "If not with chaſtity, at leaſt with prudence." She cannot be commended for her precautions, for ſhe did not in the leaſt ſave appearances. All that remained to be ſaid in her behalf was, that after all ſhe preferred the reality of chaſtity, and leaving the outworks to the ſuſpicions and cenſure of the public, ſhe was ſatisfied with keeping the body of the town ſecure.

[O] It is much eaſier to defend her reputation in that reſpect . . . . than with regard to the unfortunate Queen of Scots.] There is no doubt a great deal of exaggeration and diſhoneſty in the elogies and vindications of this Queen: but the faults ſhe may have committed do not excuſe Elizabeth, who put her to death. And yet there have been publiſhed a thouſand apologies for this action; for there is nothing ſo abominable, but ſome mercenary Writers will undertake to vindicate it, and without going further than their Polyanthea, they will find ſeveral inſtances of the fact, they intend to juſtify. However after we have read thoſe Apologies with ſome inclination to approve them, we ſoon find the power of ſound reaſon riſe again in us, which diſpels the charms of the eloquent Apologiſt. The proverb of the

(22) Perſon. in Reſp. ad Coquum, cap. 15. pag. 363, 364. apud Henricum Fitz-Simon in Britannomachia Miniſtrorum, lib. 3. cap. 5. pag. 318.

(23) Comiti (poſtea Duci) Feriæ realem Chriſti præſentiam eſſe juravit, quod ejuſdem Ducis teſtantur ad Regem Literæ (Novemb. 16 anni 1558.) in Archivis Cymancæ in Hiſpania conſervatæ. Idem, ibid.

(24) Idem, Fitz-Simon, ibid. He quotes Diſcuſſ. Perſonii c. 2. à pag. 216. ad pag. 220.

(25) See Bohun, Caract. d'Eliſabeth. pag. 411.

(26) See the 1ſt Letter of Critique generale de Maimbourg.

(27) When I ſay this, I ſuppoſe, as Monſieur Jurieu has done, that the Holy Ghoſt has miſplaced things, which Monſieur Jurieu has methodized. Here follows part of the title of the 14th chapter of the 2d book of his Accompliſhment of the Scripture Prophecies. A brief Methodizing of the Events, which the Holy Ghoſt had diſplaced in the Viſions.

(28) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 253. under the year 1581.

(29) Journal des Savans for Sept. 6, 1677, pag. m. 282. In the account of the Memoire recondite di Vittorio Siri.

(30) Leti, Hiſt. of Elizabeth, tom. 2. pag. 513. See alſo pag. 349, &c. where he relates ſeveral particulars and jeſts concerning this Queen's amours.

which a Roman Hiſtorian paſſes on Agrippina; namely, that ſhe got rid of the weakneſſes of her ſex, by applying herſelf to the occupations of men [P]. Pope Sixtus had a particular eſteem for Elizabeth [Q], it is even aſſerted, that he held a ſecret correſpondence the Scripture, Can the Ethiopian change his ſkin, or the leopard his ſpots (31) may be very juſtly applied to thoſe, who have undertaken to juſtify Elizabeth with regard to the puniſhment of the fugitive Queen. We may ſay to every one of them Æthiopem lavas, you undertake to waſh a Black-Moor white. This muſt certainly be true, ſince Mr. Bohun, the great Panegyriſt of this Queen, condemns her abſolutely and with great ſeverity in this reſpect. The worſt action of her whole reign, ſays he (32), was her uſage towards Mary Queen of Scots. This Queen having been expelled by her ſubjects, and deprived not only of her royal Authority, but alſo of her Liberty, her Eſtate and her Crown, came poor and deſolate into England, truſting to Elizabeth's promiſe, who at firſt received her very well, and ordered that ſhe ſhould be uſed like a Queen: But afterwards ſhe kept her cloſe priſoner, and under pretence that Mary conſpired againſt her life, ſhe had her tried, condemned, and executed, and made her a ſad and unheard-of example of her cruel and unjuſt ſeverity. By this action ſhe tainted, if I may ſay ſo, her reign with the innocent blood, both of a Princeſs, to whom ſhe had given ſanctuary, and whom ſhe had received in her dominions.

[P] One cannot juſtly apply to her the encomium .... that ſhe got rid of the weakneſſes of her ſex, by applying herſelf to the occupations of men.] Her ſtrong deſire of being eſteemed beautiful, the care ſhe took to ſet off her beauty, her obliging carriage towards thoſe that appeared to be deeply moved with her charms (33), are undoubtedly ſuch weakneſſes as Agrippina was not guilty of. For if this Roman Lady had been ſubject to thoſe weakneſſes, it could not have been truly ſaid of her, Sed Agrippina æqui impatiens, dominandi avida, virilibus curis fœminarum vitia exuerat (34). i. e. "Agrippina, impatient of an equal, "and eager for rule, diveſted herſelf of the vices of wo-"men, by applying herſelf to the buſineſs of men." She would have ſtill leſs deſerved this great encomium, had ſhe beſtowed on young men the ſame careſſes of which Elizabeth was ſo prodigal. Let us quote an Author who relates, what he has ſeen and heard. He aſſerts that the ceremony of making my Lord Robert Earl of Leiceſter and Baron of Denbigh was done at Weſtminſter with great ſolemnity, the Queen her ſelf aſſiſting at the ceremonial, he kneeling before her with a great gravity. But ſhe could not refrain from putting her hand in his neck, ſmilingly tickling him, the French Embaſſador and I ſtanding by (35). The Author who ſpeaks thus, had been ſent to the Court of Elizabeth by Mary Stuart Queen of Scotland. The Queen my miſtreſs, ſays he (36), had inſtructed me to leave matters of gravity ſometimes, and caſt in merry conceits, leſt otherwiſe I ſhould be wearied, ſhe being well informed of that Queen's natural temper. Therefore in declaring my obſervations of the cuſtoms of Dutchland, Poland and Italy, the buſkins of the women was not forgot, and what country weed I thought beſt becoming Gentlewomen. The Queen ſaid, ſhe had clothes of every ſort, which every day afterwards, ſo long as I was there, ſhe changed. One day ſhe had the Engliſh weed, another the French, and another the Italian, and ſo forth. She aſked me, which of them became her beſt? I anſwered in my judgment the Italian dreſs; which anſwer I found pleaſed her well, for ſhe delighted to ſhew her golden coloured hair, wearing a caul and bonnet as they do in Italy. Her hair was more reddiſh than yellow, curled in appearance naturally. She deſired to know of me, what colour of hair was reputed beſt, and whether my Queen's hair or her's was beſt, and which of the two was faireſt. I anſwered the fairneſs of them both was not their worſt fault. But ſhe was earneſt with me to declare, which of them two I judged faireſt? I ſaid ſhe was the faireſt Queen in England, and mine the faireſt Queen in Scotland (37). Yet ſhe appeared earneſt; I anſwered, they were both the faireſt Ladies in their countries; that her Majeſty was fairer, but my Queen was very lovely. She inquired, which of them was of higheſt Stature? I ſaid, my Queen. Then, ſaid ſhe, ſhe is too high, for I am neither too high nor too low. You ſee here a Queen of England, who minds faſhions and head-dreſſes; nor does it appear that it was a mere amuſement; one would think that ſhe made capital buſineſs of it, if it were not known alſo, how much ſhe applied herſelf to the affairs of the Government. We muſt ſay therefore, that ſhe found time for every thing. She applied herſelf to the State-affairs, as tho' ſhe had minded nothing elſe; and ſhe was careful to dreſs herſelf to an advantage, as tho' this had been her only employment. Conſider on the other hand her converſation with the Envoy of Scotland: It was not ſo much aſking queſtions as putting him to the rack, that he might be forced to own that ſhe was more beautiful than Mary Stuart. Whence it appears, that ſhe looked upon her as her rival in beauty, and by the turn of her converſation, ſhe obliged the people to ſet her above that rival. This is very much like the heart and genius of women. All the world knows with how much art they hunt after praiſes. Sometimes by affecting to depreciate themſelves, that they might be contradicted, at other times by enquiring whether it be true, that ſuch or ſuch women are incomparably beautiful and fair, have a fine ſhape, &c.

Let us obſerve a conſiderable difference there is between Agrippina and Queen Elizabeth. The latter could not reſolve to marry, though ſhe met with men, whom ſhe liked enough to think them worthy of her choice. The former, being a widow and ſtill young, aſked Tiberius for a huſband, and repreſented to him, that an honeſt woman could find no comfort but in a huſband (38). This was ſpeaking plainly; for it is well known, that when a woman is not honeſt, ſhe knows very well, how to ſatisfy her deſires without marrying. The Envoy of Scotland declared very freely to the Queen of England, what he imagined was the reaſon why ſhe would not marry. She eſteemed him as her brother and beſt friend, ſaid ſhe ſpeaking of my Lord Robert, whom ſhe made Earl of Leiceſter, whom ſhe would have herſelf married, had ſhe ever minded to have taken a huſband. But being determined to end her life in virginity, ſhe wiſhed that the Queen her ſiſter might marry him, as meeteſt of all other with whom ſhe could find in her heart to declare her ſecond perſon (39). "You are certainly convinc-"ed, you will never have any children, ſaid the En-"voy of Scotland to her, ſeeing your Majeſty declares "yourſelf reſolved to dye a Virgin. Yes, ſays ſhe, "I am reſolved never to marry, if I be not thereto "neceſſitated by the Queen my ſiſter's harſh behavi-"our towards me. I know the truth of that, Ma-"dam, ſaid I, you need not tell it me. Your Maje-"ſty thinks if you were married, you would be but "Queen of England, and now you are both King "and Queen. I know your ſpirit cannot endure a "maſter (40).

[Q] Pope Sixtus had a particular eſteem for Elizabeth.] He placed her amongſt the three perſons, who alone, in his opinion, deſerved to reign; the other two were himſelf, and Henry IVth King of France. Your Queen, ſaid he once to an Engliſhman, is born fortunate; ſhe governs her Kingdom with great happineſs; ſhe wants only to be married to me, to give the world a ſecond Alexander (41). Monſr. Jurieu has expreſſed this ſomewhat bluntly. "This good "Pope ſaid, that he could have wiſhed to lie only "one night with Elizabeth Queen of England, being "perſuaded that they would make together a new "Alexander the Great. This becomes the gravity "and the chaſtity of a Pope .... This ſame good "Pope ſaid, that Elizabeth was very happy, for cut-"ting off a crowned head, and that he envied her "happineſs (42)." Balzac, by I know not what affectation, has given us inſtead of the Pope's own words, ſome other expreſſions, which are not by far ſo lively and natural. I ſhall tranſcribe the paſſage at length, that the reader may ſee, what praiſes this French Writer beſtowed (43) on this Queen in a Letter he

(31) Jerem. xiii, 23.

(32) Bohun, Caractere de la Reine Elizabeth, pag. 404.

(33) See the Remark [D].

(34) Tacit. Ann. lib. 6. cap. 25.

(35) Sir James Melvil's Memoires, pag. 47.

(36) Ibid. pag. 49, &c.

(37) This anſwer ſignified nothing; for when there is but one Queen in any country, ſhe is of courſe the moſt beautiful Queen, how ugly ſoever ſhe may be. There is a low jeſt, which is, when a woman or a girl ſays, I am the moſt beautiful perſon at table, when ſhe remains there the laſt.

(38) At Agrippina pervicax iræ, & morbo corporis implicata, cum viſeret eam Cæſar, profuſis diu ac per ſilentium lacrymis, mox invidiam & preces orditur: ſubveniret ſolitudini, daret maritum, habilem adhuc juventam ſibi, neque aliud probris quàm ex matrimonio ſolatium. Tacit. Annal. 4. cap. 53. i. e. "Agrippina ſtill "perſiſting in her "reſentment and "ſeized too with "a bodily diſor-"der, received "the Emperor, "coming pur-"poſely to ſee "her, with ma-"ny tears and "long ſilence. "At laſt ſhe "addreſſed him "with invidious "expoſtulations "and prayers, "that *he would "relieve her ſo-"litude, and "give her a "husband. She "was ſtill en-"dowed with "proper youth; "to virtuous "women there "was no conſo-"lation but that "of marriage."

(39) Sir James Melvil's Memoirs, pag. 47.

(40) Ibid. pag. 49.

(41) Leti, Hiſt. d'Elizabeth. tom. 2. pag. 131.

(42) Apologie pour la Reformat. tom. 1. pag. m. 153, 154.

(43) In the 10th Letter of the 6th book, pag. 205. of the edition in folio.

ſpondence with her, to the King of Spain's prejudice. What Monſieur Leti relates of this is not improbable [R]. I have mentioned nothing of this Queen's learning; and yet even in this reſpect ſhe deſerves to be admired (d). Her reign, on which Providence had for ſuch a long time poured out innumerable bleſſings, ended in the moſt diſmal melancholy that ever was heard of [S]. Some pretend that her deep ſorrow was occaſioned by he wrote to an Engliſh Lord (44). I never deſigned, ſays he, to attack the true glory of your Heroine. I thought indeed, that ſhe was to be conſidered with regard to the magnanimity of her ſoul, the fruits of which your whole poſterity will taſte, rather than with regard to a tranſient flower of the body, which not only death will cauſe to drop off, but which alſo fades away at the firſt approach of old age (45). I muſt come from the other world, if I were ignorant of the praiſes ſhe has received in this from every Nation. I know that ſhe has been ſtiled the North-Star, the Goddeſs of the Sea, and the true Thetis. I have read the following words, which Henry the Great wrote to her in his greateſt troubles, and when the League was in the height of its violence, I ſhall be, Madam, your Captain General. Even the Pope who excommunicated her, ſpoke of her with great eſteem, and he was, as you very well know, a Prince of the greateſt wiſdom, and perfectly ſkilled in the Art of Government. He delighted to make the Embaſſadors, who reſided at his Court, ſpeak of her; and ſometimes, when he was in a merry humour, he would ſay, that if he had been married with her, power and authority would have been the iſſue of ſo formidable a match. But tho' ſhe were not arrived to that high degree of reputation, and were diveſted of all thoſe glorious marks of public eſteem, two reaſons, leſs conſiderable indeed in the ſight of the world, but which make a deeper impreſſion on my mind, would oblige me to honour her memory. It is, my Lord, that ſhe did not deſpiſe the Muſes, and that ſhe loved your family (46). I have learnt from Camden how well ſhe was acquainted with polite Literature, ſo far, that ſhe even happily tranſlated into Latin ſome of Sophocles's Tragedies, and ſome of Iſocrates's Orations. I have read in the ſame Author what a ſhare perſons of your family have had in her intimacy, &c.

(d) See the Character of Queen Elizabeth by Mr. Bohun, printed at the Hague in 1694, pag. 5, &c. See alſo Balzac's words in the Remark [Q].

(44) To the Earl of Exeter: the Letter is dated June 25, 1634.

(45) If, as it is probable, he intends to juſtify himſelf in what he had aſſerted in the paſſage quoted towards the end of the text of this Article, he does not proceed in this very ſincerely.

(46) The Earl to whom Balzac wrote, was of the family of the CECILS.

Obſerve that Monſieur Jurieu ought to have quoted d'Aubigné for the ſecond particular; for he had read it only in that Author's Catholic Confeſſion of Sanci, and in his Univerſal Hiſtory. The Pope having cauſed Count de Popoli to be beheaded. . . (theſe are d'Aubigné's words) diverted himſelf amongſt his moſt particular friends with the thought of having cut off an Earl's head. But when he heard what happened in England, he began to think, that no Prince could be compared to the Queen of England, either with regard to happineſs or excellency; and (as tho' he had lamented Alexander's conqueſts) he ſaid of her, O beata fœmina, che ai gustata el piacer di far ſaltare una teſta coronata (47). i. e. "Oh happy woman, who taſted the pleaſure of "cutting off a crowned head."

(47) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſell. tom. 3. liv. 2. chap. 27. pag. m. 279. See alſo the Confeſſion Catholique de Sanci, liv. 1. chap. 1.

[R] What Monſr. Leti aſſerts concerning Sixtus the Vth's ſecret correſpondence with Elizabeth, is not improbable.] Pope Sixtus the Vth hated and dreaded the King of Spain; he muſt therefore have wiſhed him bad ſucceſs, and wiſhed that hereſy were eſtabliſhed in England, rather than that Philip II ſhould become maſter of ſo fine a country. The Popes, as they are ſovereign Princes, ſo they follow the maxims of the Religion of Princes, conſequently they ſacrifice the intereſt of the Roman Catholic Religion, to that of their particular dominions. What advantage would it be for them, that a King of Spain, for inſtance, ſhould ſubdue all the Proteſtants, if by this means he became ſo formidable to the Court of Rome, that they ſhould not dare to refuſe any thing to the Spaniards, leſt they ſhould ſee again ſuch a year as that of 1527 was, when Pope Clement the VIIth was impriſoned? It is a leſſer evil for the Pope, that his authority be not acknowledged in Holland and England, than if it were acknowledged there, and this put ſome Roman Catholic Prince in a condition to obtain every thing at Rome by fair or foul means. If this theoretical principle be not ſufficient to convince the reader, that Sixtus the Vth endeavoured as much as lay in his power, to make the King of Spain's undertakings againſt Elizabeth miſcarry, here follows a matter of fact which will compleat the perſuaſion. When Lewis the XIVth made ſuch quick and conſiderable progreſs againſt the United Provinces in the year 1672, Cardinal Altieri, who in reality was Pope, tho' another was ſtiled Pope Clement the Xth was extremely vexed at the news, becauſe he did not love France, and that the Duke d'Etrée the French Embaſſador mortified him as much as he could (48). And of late we have ſeen Pope Innocent the XIth, who would not hearken to any thing that might be ſerviceable to King James's affairs, and zealouſly promoted whatever might be detrimental to the French (49). The reaſon is, that he dreaded the growth of Lewis the XIVth's power more than he deſired the propagation of the Catholick Religion. He feared to be cruſhed by the overgrown power of that Prince, ſo that he was glad, that the Proteſtants were in a condition to repreſs and to leſſen it. Hence we may better know the happy ſituation, in which the affairs of the Proteſtants are; ſince the perpetual jealouſy there is between the Houſes of Auſtria and Bourbon will always make them find allies and protectors amongſt the Princes of a contrary Religion, but even the Court of Rome will do as occaſion ſhall ſerve, what Sixtus did to the prejudice of the King of Spain, and what Pope Innocent the XIth has done to the prejudice of Lewis the XIVth. This Court is not leſs concerned than the others for the preſervation of the ballance of power.

(48) See the book intitled, Mémoires des Intrigues de la Cour de Rome, depuis l'année 1669 juſques en 1676, printed at Paris in the year 1677, pag. 204, &c.

(49) See the Lettre de Louis XIV au Cardinal d'Etrée, which Monſ. Leti has inſerted in the 2d vol. of the Monarchie Univerſelle, pag. 458.

But to what purpoſe ſhould we enquire for inſtances? Let us only conſider Sixtus himſelf with regard to Henry the Great. It is certain, that when he had obſerved how much the league increaſed the power of Spain, he altered his ſcheme, and favoured the Proteſtant Party in France, and if he had not died, he would have employed all poſſible care to deprive the King of Spain of the Crown of Naples (50). He thwarted the leaguers ſo openly, that the Spaniards threatened to proteſt againſt him, and to ſecure by ſome other means the preſervation of the Church which he forſook (51). His death filled the Leaguers with joy; one of their Preachers (52), when he notified it to the inhabitants of Paris, expreſſed himſelf in the following manner; God has delivered us from a wicked and politick Pope; if he had lived longer men had been very much ſurprized to hear us preach at Paris againſt the Pope, and we ſhould have been obliged to do it (53). Tho' this Pope entered into meaſures contrary to the intereſt of the Roman Catholick Religion, it was not becauſe he had known the great merit of Henry the IVth, and the impoſtures of the leaguers (54), but becauſe the advantages gained by the heretics leſſened the power of the King of Spain whom he hated.

(50) See Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, liv. 4. pag. m. 428.

(51) Maimboorg, ibid.

(52) Aubry, Curate of St. Andrew of the Arches at Paris.

(53) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, liv. 4. pag. 429.

(54) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 427 alledges theſe reaſons; but this is miſtaking the true point.

[S] Her reign . . . . ended in the moſt diſmal melancholy that ever was heard of.] Monſieur Silhon furniſhes me with a Commentary upon theſe words. Who would have thought, ſays he (55), that the courſe of ſuch a reign and of ſuch a life (56) ſhould have ended in a ſurfeit of reigning and living . . . and that there had been a precipice dug at the end of ſo noble a courſe? He gives afterwards the ſubſtance of an account, which eſcaped the knowledge of Hiſtorians, ſays he, and is to be found in a letter, which a Gentleman belonging to the French Embaſſador who reſided with that Princeſs, wrote to one of his friends at Paris. As this letter is printed I chuſe rather to borrow from thence what relates to my ſubject, than to tranſcribe Monſieur Silhon's words. "I muſt tell you, Sir, that it is the common opinion "both of her Phyſicians, and of thoſe who waited "upon her privately in her bed-chamber, that her "diſtemper came only from a ſadneſs, which ſhe kept "ſecret for ſome days before ſhe complained. The "ground of their opinion is, that there did not ap"pear in her any ſymptom of a mortal diſeaſe, be"ſides her old age; her urine, pulſe and eyes having "been as they ſhould to the end of her life: and alſo "that during the whole courſe of her ſickneſs, ſhe "would never make uſe of any of the medicines that "were propoſed to her, notwithſtanding the intreaties "and even the threatnings of an approaching death, "which

(55) Silhon, Miniſtre d'Etat, Parte 3. chap. 7. pag. m. 112.

(56) He had juſt been commending Queen Elizabeth's reign.

by the Earl of Eſſex's death [T]. There are ſome Writers of Controverſy, who have publiſhed a ſilly jeſt, which is not in the leaſt probable (e); they have aſſerted, that the Marſhal de Biron boaſted he had ſeen the head of the reformed Church dance: they ſhould have aſcribed this to another Embaſſador, for Elizabeth was paſſed the age of dancing (f), when Henry IV ſent the Marſhal de Biron to her. If Balzac had took notice of this Queen's age (g), he would not have ſaid that ſhe was ſo beautiful, that the Earl of Eſſex choſe rather to dye, than to petition her for his pardon, leſt he ſhould again be expoſed to her importunate love and fondneſs (h). There is more than one inconſiſtency in theſe words. You will find Moreri's blunders in the Remark [U].

Pope Clement VIII ſpoke of this Queen in a very diſobliging manner, which ſhewed that he was not well acquainted with the condition of England [X].

ELMACINUS

(e) See Oſiander in Gretium de Jure Belli & Pacis, pag. 465.

(f) Several Hiſtorians ſay, that ſhe danced, but other only ſay that ſhe played on the Spinet. See the Remark [C] in the Article GONTAULT (Charles de).

(g) The Earl of Eſſex was executed in 1601, and the Queen was born in 1533.

(h) Balzac, in his Prince. n. 62. Obſerve that he ſays this in a banter, and with a deſign to refute theſe Poets, who preferred this Queen's beauty before Helena, Which is a pitiful confutation.

" which her Phyſicians and attendants made her; as " tho' the fear of being deſpiſed in her old age, or " ſome other ſecret diſcontent, which ſome aſcribe to " the grief, which the Earl of Eſſex's his death cauſed " her (57), made her look for death and long after it. " However it be, the truth is, that as ſoon as ſhe " found herſelf ill, ſhe ſaid ſhe wiſhed to die. She " made no will, nor any declaration of her ſucceſſor, " and ſhe kept her bed but three days before her " death; having been above a fortnight ſitting upon " little cuſhions, ready dreſſed, her eyes caſt down- " wards, and refuſing to ſpeak with and to ſee any " body. However the Archbiſhop of Canterbury Pri- " mate of England, and the Biſhop of London with " his Chaplain attended her to the end; and " ſhe expreſſed a great deal of devotion and gra- " titude towards God (58)." This relation differs very much from Monſieur Leti's account, according to which the Queen was ſeven weeks without reaſoning, raving continually, which was occaſioned by a ſtrong fever, and which ceaſed only three days before ſhe died (59). According to the Abbot Siri's Memoirs, " this Queen " ſitting upon her bed entirely dreſſed, with her eyes " caſt downwards, and her finger in her mouth, in " which poſture ſhe was reſolved to die, called for " her Muſicians, and heard them quietly to her laſt " breath, that ſhe might die, ſays that Author wittily, " come era viſſuta allegramente, merrily as ſhe had " lived (60)." I wonder he does not make her ſay Auguſtus's laſt words (61).

(57) See the following Remark.

(58) Theſe words are taken from a letter inſerted in the Suite des Mémoires d'Etat, printed at Paris in 8vo in the year 1623. The Letter I mention is in page 236 of the 3d volume, and is dated from London April 3, 1603.

(59) Life of Elizabeth, tom. 2. pag. 532.

(60) In the Journal des Savans for Sept. 6, 1677, pag. m. 282.

[T] . . . . Some pretend that her deep ſorrow was occaſioned by the Earl of Eſſex's death.] After the Earl's execution the Queen was for ſome time as gay and lively as ſhe uſed to be; and ſhewed it particularly during the Marſhal de Biron's embaſſy. It is therefore very probable, that if ſhe died with grief for the Earl of Eſſex's death, it was not ſo much becauſe ſhe had been the cauſe of it, as becauſe ſhe came to know, that he had applied to her for mercy by a method which ſhe had promiſed him would be infallible. Monſr. du Maurier will explain to us this riddle. It will not be needleſs nor diſpleaſing, ſays he (62), to add in this place, what the ſame Prince Maurice had from Sir Dudley Carleton the Engliſh Embaſſador to the State of Holland, who is ſo well known under the name of my Lord Dorcheſter, and who was a man of great merit. He ſaid, that Queen Elizabeth gave the Earl of Eſſex a ring in the height of her paſſion for him, ordering him to keep it carefully, and that whatever he could commit, ſhe would pardon him when he ſhould return that pledge. Since that time the Earl's enemies having prevailed with the Queen, who beſides was exaſperated againſt him for the contempt he ſhewed for her beauty, which through age began to decay, ſhe cauſed him to be impeached; when he was condemned ſhe expected that he ſhould ſend her the ring, and would have granted him his pardon according to her promiſe. The Earl finding himſelf in the laſt extremity, applied to Admiral Howard's Lady, who was his relation, and deſired her by a perſon whom he could truſt, to return the ring into the Queen's own hands. But her huſband, who was one of the Earl's greateſt enemies, and to whom ſhe told this imprudently, would not ſuffer her to acquit herſelf of the commiſſion; ſo that the Queen conſented to the Earl's death, being full of indignation againſt ſuch a proud and haughty ſpirit, who choſe rather to die than to implore her mercy. Some time after the Admiral's Lady fell ſick, and being given over by her Phyſicians, ſhe ſent word to the Queen, that ſhe had ſomething of great conſequence to tell her, before ſhe died. The Queen came to her bed-ſide, and having ordered all the attendants to withdraw, the Admiral's Lady returned her, but too late, that ring from the Earl of Eſſex, deſiring to be excuſed that ſhe did not return it ſooner, having been prevented doing it, by her huſband. The Queen retired immediately, being overwhelmed with the utmoſt grief; ſhe ſighed continually for a fortnight following, without taking any nouriſhment, lying a bed entirely dreſſed, and getting up an hundred times a night. At laſt ſhe died with hunger and with grief, becauſe ſhe had conſented to the death of a lover who had applied to her for mercy.

(61) Amicos admiſſos percunctatus, ecquid iis videretur mimum vitæ commode tranſegiſſe, adjecit & clauſulam, &c. Suet. in Auguſto, cap. c. i. e. " Having called " his friends to " him, he asked " them, whether " they thought he " had well acted " the farce of " this life, adding " alſo this verſe " &c."

(62) Du Maurier, Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire de Hollande, pag. 260.

[U] Here follow Moreri's blunders.] I. He ought not to have ſaid, that Elizabeth left in the Church the names of Biſhops, Canons, Curates, &c. The Biſhops of the Church of England are not mere titulary Biſhops, they actually exerciſe all the Epiſcopal Functions, and have over the Curates the ſame hierarchical pre-eminence that is in uſe in the Church of Rome. II. He ſhould not have exaggerated again and again the perſecutions, which the Roman Catholics ſuffered, without taking notice of their rebellions which expoſed them to this ſtorm. A faithful Hiſtorian ſhould have related firſt their conſpiracies againſt the Queen's government, and then the ſevere puniſhment which theſe conſpiracies brought upon them. The tranſpoſition of theſe two things would be a baſe diſhoneſty in an Hiſtorian (63). He could not without perfidiouſneſs make the puniſhment precede, if they were but a conſequence of the conſpiracies. By what name ſhall we then call Moreri's conduct, who entirely omits theſe conſpiracies? Such an omiſſion is not barely a miſtake, it is a crime which the Latins would ſtile ſcelus, or at leaſt flagitium. I conſider Moreri here only as an Author, and if I charge him with a crime, it is only the crime of an Hiſtorian. III. The greateſt crime, ſays he, with which the Queen of Scots was charged, was, that ſhe endeavoured to free herſelf from ſlavery. He is miſtaken, they charged her with other crimes and much more heinous. If he had ſaid this was the greateſt crime of which ſhe could juſtly be accuſed, he might have argued for ſome time, and diſputed his ground by the help of the oppoſite accounts, which the two parties have publiſhed. But to know what the Judges grounded their ſentence upon, is a matter of fact, which is unanſwerably determined in three words; one need only read her trial. Moreri and his abettors have nothing to anſwer to this, nor can they ſay one ſingle word for their vindication. IV. It is not true, that Henry the IIId heard Queen Mary's death with grief, nor that he ſent Bellievre to ſave that unfortunate Princeſs's life. Bellievre's Embaſſy was only a farce. The Leaguers did not fail to charge Henry the IIId with having promoted Mary Stuart's death (64). Monſr. du Maurier has explained this myſtery (65). V. Virginia is not an iſland. VI. Elizabeth did not die the fourth of April, but the third. VII. It is not true, that the fourth of April new ſtyle, is the twenty fourth of March according to the old Calender. VIII. Elizabeth's reign laſted forty four years and ſome months: Moreri ſhould not therefore have ſaid, that ſhe died after ſhe had reigned thirty five years. But what is very ſtrange is, that he reckons but thirty five years for a reign, the beginning of which he places in November 1558, and the end in April 1603. Skill in Mathematicks was not this Princeſs's chief qualification with regard to the ſciences, as Moreri aſſerts it (66). Nay, I do not find, that Mr. Bohun, who gives a particular account (67) of all the ſciences, which ſhe learned, mentions any thing of her reading Euclid. This is then Moreri's IXth blunder.

(63) See above, Rem. [L].

(64) See Louis d'Orleans, in his Catholique Anglois, and Jaques le Boſſu, in pag. 43. of the I Devis.

(65) In the Preface to his Memoirs. See the Critique generale de Maimbourg, Lettre II.

(66) She was very well skilled in all the Sciences, but eſpecially in the Mathematics, Moreri, tom. 1. pag. m. 1092.

(67) Caractere de la Reine Elizabeth, pag. 3, &c.

[X] Pope Clement VIII ſpoke of this Queen in a very diſobliging

ELMACINUS (GEORGE) Author of a Hiſtory of the Saracens, or rather a Chronology of the Mahometan Empire, was born in Egypt towards the middle of the thirteenth Century. I ſhall ſay ſomething of his family [A]. He has brought down his Work from Mahomet to the Chalif Muſtadit Billa *, who died in the year of the Hegira 512 (a). He ſets down year by year, but in few words, what concerns the Saracen Empire, and intermixes therewith ſome paſſages of the Hiſtory of the Eaſtern Chriſtians. He keeps principally to Arabia, Syria, Egypt, and Perſia. His merit muſt needs have been very conſpicuous, ſince, tho' he profeſſed Chriſtianity, he notwithſtanding filled a poſt of diſtinction and truſt near the perſons of the Mahometan Princes (b). Thoſe who conſider the meaſures he ought to keep in that poſt, will not think it ſtrange that he has ſpoken honourably of the Chalifs, and has never made uſe of any injurious terms with reſpect to the Mahometan Religion. There are ſome people ſo ſcrupulouſly ſenſible, that they will not approve of the epithets of Orthodox, Emperor of the Faithful, &c. with which he honours the followers of Mahomet: and yet leſs will they approve of his ſaying, when he ſpeaks of that Impoſtor, Mahomet of glorious memory. They may even go ſo far as to maintain, in conſequence of this language, that he was a Mahometan; but if they do, it will be eaſy to convict them of falſhood [B]. His Hiſtory has been tranſlated from Arabic into Latin by Erpenius, and printed in thoſe two languages at Leyden, in the year 1625, in folio [C].

(a) Which is our year 1118.

(b) The poſt of Secretary. Ipſo velut Notario uſi fuere ad ſecretiora conſilia. Golius, Præf. Hiſt. Saracen.

* Or rather, as the name ought to be written, al Moſtadhher billah.

ELMENHERST

diſobliging manner, which ſhewed that he was not well acquainted with the condition of England.] Here follows what we read in one of Cardinal d'Oſſat's Letters, written from Rome February the 1ſt, 1595. "The "Pope anſwered .... that England had been con- "quered formerly, and might be conquered at pre- "ſent, ſince the difference of Religion cauſed there "great diviſions, and it was governed by an old wo- "man, who had no huſband and no certain ſucceſſor: "that this woman muſt alſo at preſent have exhauſted "her exchequer, having made ſeveral expences; that "beſides, it had been obſerved, that thoſe women "who reigned long, and in their youth and in the "ſtrength of their age loved the amorous ſport, be- "came in their old age the ſcorn of thoſe very men "to whom they proſtituted themſelves. He alledged "to me two Queens of Sicily, who, as he ſaid, "lived after the ſame manner, one of whom ſuffered "when ſhe was old to be boxed by one of thoſe, who "loved her in her younger days: ſo that he thought "Elizabeth could but be now deſpiſed by thoſe, "who formerly loved and eſteemed her: That nei- "ther he nor I were yet ſo old, but for all theſe "reaſons he ſtill hoped, we ſhould ſee her ſubdu- "ed (68)." Monſr. Amelot de la Houſſaye makes three obſervations upon this. The firſt contains theſe words, Clement VIII was certainly miſinformed of the condition of England, which never was more flouriſhing nor more powerful both by ſea and by land, than under Queen Elizabeth's reign; and Sixtus the Vth, his predeceſſor, ſpoke quite otherwiſe of this Queen, of whom he uſed to ſay on every occaſion. Ch'era un gran cervello di Principiſſa, ſhe was a Princeſs of a ſtrong head. The ſecond remark is as follows. "Jane II Queen "of Naples and Sicily ſuffered herſelf to be boxed by "the Seneſchal Giovanni Caracciolo, her lover: but at "laſt ſhe grew tired of it, and cauſed him to be "murthered; which is uſually the end of thoſe Royal "intrigues." Let us ſee the third obſervation. I do not know whether all that has been ſaid or written concerning Queen Elizabeth's amours and lovers is well grounded: but it is certain that ſhe had no Vulva, and that the ſame reaſon, which prevented her from marrying, ought alſo to have prevented her from loving the amorous ſport. She might love indeed, and was really paſſionately in love with the Earl of Eſſex; but conſidering the conſtitution of her body ſhe could not be carnally known by a man without ſuffering the moſt violent pains, nor become pregnant (69) without an unavoidable danger of loſing her life in her labour. She was ſo ſenſible of it, that being one day deſired with the moſt importunate intreaties to marry the Duke of Alençon, who courted her very earneſtly, ſhe anſwered, that ſhe did not think her ſubjects loved her ſo little, as to wiſh her buried before her time.

(68) Lett. d'Oſſat, tom. 2. pag. 399.

(69) See above, the Remark [M].

[A] I ſhall ſay ſomething of his family.] The ſum of it is this: Our Elmacinus was the grandſon of Abultibus, whoſe grandfather had ſettled in Egypt, where the Chalif had granted him certain privileges. This grandfather was a Syrian Merchant and profeſſed Chriſtianity. He left a ſon, who entred into the ſervice of the Court in quality of Notary: Abultibus, the ſon of the latter, was ſkilful in the buſineſs of a Notary, and was preſented by the Magiſtrates of Grand Cairo to the Council of Arabia. He had five ſons, four of whom were Biſhops: the other, named Abulmecarimus, married the ſiſter of Simon Elmacinus, a famous Notary, who having been three years in the ſervice of the Council of War † under Joſeph Saladine (1), turned Monk, and lived above thirty years in that exemplary condition. Abulmecarimus turned Monk likewiſe, after his wife's death, and died in the 606th year of the Hegira. He had had three ſons, the ſecond of whom, who was the father of our Elmacinus, and was named Abuljaſirus Elaamidus, obtained the office of Notary of the Council of War, when his maternal uncle, Simon Elmacinus, quitted it to embrace a monaſtic life. He diſcharged that Office forty five years, and died in the 636th year of the Hegira (2), after a very religious life (2).

† Or rather, employed in keeping and entring the Accounts of the pay given to the Army.

(1) About the year of the Hegira 569, which anſwers to the year of Chriſt 1173.

(2) The 1238th of Chriſt.

(3) Extracted from the Hiſtory of Elmacinus, towards the end.

[The names of our Author and his anceſtors, as given by Mr. Bayle, not being perfectly exact, it may not be amiſs to ſet them down at length. In the title of the firſt part of his work, which is yet in manuſcript only (4), he is called Gergis the ſon of Abu'lYâſer, the ſon of Abu'lMacârem, the ſon of Abu'lTeyyeb, ſurnamed Ebn al Amda, or, as it is in Erpenius's Edition of the ſecond part, Ebn al Amîd. He is alſo honoured with the title of Al Sheikh al Reyis al Makin, i. e. The prime and ſolidly learned Doctor; by the laſt of which Epithets, by Erpenius written Elmacin, he is better known among us than by his true name, George Ebn al Amda. ADD. REM.]

(4) See the Remark [C].

[B] It will be eaſy to convict them of falſhood.] For he has not only omitted to prefix to his work the formal Declaration which the Writers of that Sect are uſed to make, with a ſuperſtitious affectation, that they are Muſulmans: he has not only taken great care to inſert in his Annals ſeveral things which relate to the Chriſtians, and turn to their praiſe; which a Muſulman would avoid as a crime: but we alſo ſee at the end of his work a ſhort account of his family, which teſtifies, in an inconteſtable manner, that he was a Chriſtian. As to the delicacy of thoſe who condemn the uſing of honourable appellations with regard to falſe Religions, ſee the Author of the Critique Generale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme (5).

(5) Letter 30. pag. 289, &c. of the 3d Edition.

[C] His Hiſtory has been tranſlated from Arabic into Latin, and printed in thoſe two languages (6) ... in the year 1625, in folio.] The Tranſlator was already dead, and it was Golius who took care of the Edition, and wrote a Preface to it from which I have taken this Article. We there learn that Erpenius deſigned to add a great many Notes and Illuſtrations to his Verſion. It is pity death prevented him from doing it; for he would have been able to have ſaid a hundred curious things on the ſubject, which, moreover, would be neceſſary for the perfect underſtanding of the original. Elmacinus began his work at the Creation of the World; and Hottinger had that part which reaches from thence to the flight of Mahomet in manuſcript (7).

(6) Note that the Tranſlation was at the ſame time printed apart, without the Arabic.

(7) Hotting. Biblioth. Orient. cap. 2. pag. 75. apud Cave, de Script. Eccleſ. pag. 718.

[The Tranſlation of Erpenius is full of miſtakes, eſpecially

ELMENHORST (GEVERHART) deſerves to be reckoned amongſt the men of letters, who flouriſhed in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. He was a native of Hamburg, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Criticiſm. It appears by the books which he publiſhed [A], that he had read a great deal (a). Scaliger was not of his ſide in his controverſy with Wouwer [B]. He died in the year 1621.

(a) Voëtius, Diſputat. tom. 3. pag. 400. ſtiles him Virum diligentiſſimum, & diffuſiſſimæ lectionis.

His Library was ſtill in being in the year 1648, but his ſon was upon the point of ſelling it, and deſired Voſſius to get him leave to have it ſold by auction at Leyden (b).

(b) Voſſius, Epiſt. DLIV. pag. m. 455.

(8) See Renaudot's Preface to the Anciennes Relations des Indes, &c. pag. 24.

(9) V. Golii, Præf. Hiſt. Saracens & Oakleij Introd. ad Ling. Orient. pag. 144.

eſpecially as to Geography and proper names (8), wherein he deſerves ſome excuſe if we conſider the difficulty of reading the Arabic Manuſcripts truly, and that he was the firſt who made any tolerable progreſs in this kind of learning (9). The French Tranſlation made by Peter Vattier, and printed at Paris in 1657 in 4to, is not a whit better. Note, the Arabic Text was printed apart in 12mo at the ſame time with the folio Edition, and was dedicated by Erpenius's widow to Dr. Lancelot Andrews, Biſhop of Wincheſter. ADD. REM.

[A] The Books which he publiſhed.] He wrote notes upon Minutius Felix, upon Arnobius, upon Gennadius's Treatiſe De Eccleſiaſticis Dogmatibus, upon the Letters of Martial Biſhop of Limoges, and upon Apuleius. But he did not live long enough to ſee this laſt work publiſhed.

Obſerve that in 1618 he publiſhed at Leyden the picture of Cebes with John Caſelius's Latin Tranſlation and Notes.

[B] Scaliger was not of his ſide in his controverſy with Wouwer.] This appears from a Letter of Scaliger, which has been lately inſerted in a Book that abounds with curious things (1). The Author of this Book is a learned man of Germany, named Crenius. The Controverſy between John Wouwer and Elmenhorſt came from their publiſhing each of them Minutius Felix with Notes. Wouwer's edition was ſoon followed by that of our Elmenhorſt, who probably boaſted that his Edition deſerved the preference. Scaliger wrote to him, that ſuch a pretenſion would be ill grounded, and he gave him ſome advices intermixed with complaints. The Letter is dated March the 26th, 1603. The direction is, Ornatiſſimo Juveni Geverhardo Elmenhorſtio. I obſerve this in order to ſhew, that Elmenhorſt died before he was grown an old man.

(1) It is intitled, Animadverſiones Philologicæ & Hiſtoricæ, Roterodami, 1695, in 8vo. See the Addenda & Emendanda of the 2d part of theſe Animadverſiones. The Author owns that this Letter of Scaliger is the 260th of the 3d book of Scaliger's Letters printed at Leyden in 1627.

☞ELYOT (Sir THOMAS), a Gentleman of eminent learning in the ſixteenth Century, was deſcended of a good family in the county of Suffolk, and ſon of Sir Richard Elyot (a). He was educated in Academical Learning in St. Mary's Hall in Oxford (b), [A], where he made a great progreſs in Logic and Philoſophy (c). After he had ſpent ſome years at the Univerſity, he travelled into foreign countries; and upon his return was introduced into the Court; and his excellent genius and extenſive learning recommending him to the favour of King Henry VIII, who was a great patron of men of letters, his Majeſty conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and employed him in ſeveral embaſſies (d), and particularly in 1532 to Rome, about the divorce of Queen Catherine, and afterwards to the Emperor Charles V, about the year 1536 (e). He wrote and tranſlated ſeveral works [B]. He was an excellent Grammarian, Poet, Rhetorician, Philoſopher, Phyſician, Coſmographer, and Hiſtorian; and diſtinguiſhed for his candour, and the innocence and integrity of his life (f). He was admired and beloved by all the men of learning who were his contemporaries; and his memory was celebrated by them in their reſpective works, particularly by Leland (g). He was interred in the Church of Carleton in Cambridgeſhire (b), of which county he had been Sheriff (i), on the 25th of March 1546 (k); and a monument was ſoon after erected over his grave (l). Beſides ſeveral manors which he had in Cambridgeſhire, he had one or more in Hampſhire.

(a) Baleus, Script. illuſtr. Major. Brytanniæ Catalog. Cent. 8. cap. 77. pag. 668. edit. Baſil. 1557 in fol.

(b) Miles Windſore in Collectaneis ſuis ad rem Hiſtoricam pertinentibus, MS. apud Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 67. 2d edit. London 1721. Parker in his Select. Cantabr. makes our Author to have been bred in Jeſus College in Cambridge.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.
(d) Idem, ibid. and Hiſt. & Antiq. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 360.
(e) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.
(f) Pitſeus, de illuſtrib. Angliæ Scriptoribus, ad ann. 1546. num. 969. pag. 734.
(g) In Encomiis eruditor. Viror. pag. 83. edit. Londini 1589.
(b) Baleus and Pitſæus, ubi ſupra.
(i) Wood, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.
(k) Baleus and Pitſeus, ubi ſupra.
(l) Wood, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

[A] Educated in Academical Learning in St. Mary's Hall in Oxford.] The year, when he was firſt entered there, thro' the defect of the Record, cannot be well known; unleſs it ſhould be about the year 1514; for four years after, viz. in 1518, one Thomas Elyot of St. Mary's Hall, was admitted ad lecturam alicujus Libri facultatis artium Logices Ariſtotelis, which is the admiſſion to the Degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in the time of Lent the ſame year he compleated that degree by determination in School-ſtreet. It appears likewiſe, that the ſaid Thomas Elyot was in the beginning of Auguſt 1524 admitted ad Lecturam alicujus Libri Inſtitutionem, that is, to the Degree of Bachelor of the Civil Law (1). Now if we could find, ſays Mr. Wood (2), that Sir Thomas Eliot was about fifty years of age when he died (3), then we may certainly conclude, that Elyot the Bachelor of Arts and of the Civil Law might be the ſame with him; otherwiſe we cannot well do it.

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 67. 2d edit. London 1721.
(2) Ibid.
(3) In 1546.

[B] He wrote and tranſlated ſeveral Works.] I. The Caſtel of Health. London 1541, 1572, 1580, 1595, &c. in 8vo. II. The Governour, in three Books, London 1544, 1547, 1580, &c. in 8vo. III. Of the Education of Children. London in 4to. IV. Banquet of Sapience. London in 8vo. V. Preſervative againſt the Fear of Death. VI. De Rebus Memorabilibus Angliæ. For the compleating of this Work he had read many old Monuments of England (4). VII. A Defence or Apology for good Women. VIII. Bibliotheca Eliotæ: Elyot's Library or Dictionary. London 1541 &c. fol. He tranſlated likewiſe from Greek into Engliſh, The Image of Governance, compiled of the Acts and Sentences by the Emperor Alexander Severus. London 1556, 1594, &c. in 8vo. And from Latin into Engliſh, St. Cyprian's Sermon of the Mortality of Man. London 1534 in 8vo. The Rule of a Chriſtian Life, written by Picus Earl of Mirandola. London 1534 in 8vo. Pitſeus (5) tells us, that he wrote and tranſlated a great many other Works. Et alia multa partim ſcripſit, partim tranſtulit.

(4) See Roger Aſcham's Toxophilus; the School or Partitions of ſhooting, contained in two Books, pag. 28.

(5) De illuſtr. Angl. Scriptor. ad ann. 1546. num. 969. pag. 735.

EMERI (SEBASTIAN) "an Advocate in the Parliament of Paris in the ſeventeenth Century, would never plead the cauſe of the Ducheſs of Angouleme againſt the "Conſtable of Bourbon. He even wrote an outragious libel againſt Poyet, who was afterwards Chancellor of France, becauſe on this occaſion he had baſely paid his court "to thoſe in power. This piece made a great noiſe, and was the occaſion of the Author's diſgrace, who was ordered to retire from Court: he went into Bourbonnois, and "out of grief that he was not permitted to return to Court, he entered into the Order "of St. Francis, which he left afterwards from a deſire of living in a more regular and "ſtrict manner, and entered into the Order of the Carthuſians, of which they would ſoon

" ſoon after have made him General: but he refuſed it ſo obſtinately, that they were obliged " to leave him in his Cell, the ſolitude of which he inviolably reſolved never to diſturb " by the leaſt commerce with ſecular perſons (a)." Monſieur EMERI Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris, is of that family. He inherited the eſtate of Monſieur EMERI his uncle, who died Counſellor in the Court of Aids, in the year 1703, and whoſe father had enjoyed the ſame poſt (b).

(a) Mercure Gallant, for Feb. 1703, pag. 201.

(b) Ibid. pag. 199, 200.

EMMA, daughter of Richard II Duke of Normandy, wife of Ethelred King of England, and Mother of St. Edward alſo King of England, had a great ſhare in the Government during her ſon's reign, and ſo much credit at Court, that the Earl of Kent who had enjoyed great authority under ſeveral reigns, entertained an exceſſive jealouſy againſt her. He would not ſuffer that a woman ſhould ſhare with him the adminiſtration of the ſtate; that is to ſay, generally ſpeaking, the authority of ordering under the Prince's name whatever one pleaſes; and to get rid of this rival contrived the following expedient. He charged her with ſeveral crimes, and prevailed upon ſeveral Lords to confirm his imputations before the King; ſo that this good Prince, who probably would never have had a place in the catalogue of the Saints had it not been for his extreme ſimplicity [A], eaſily believed that his mother was guilty; and went unexpectedly to her, and deprived her of all the treaſures ſhe had hoarded up, alledging that it was ill-gotten wealth, and the fruits of her covetouſneſs. Under this misfortune ſhe had recourſe to the Biſhop of Wincheſter who was her relation: but this furniſhed her enemies with a new handle for calumny; for the Earl of Kent imputed to her as a crime the too frequent viſits ſhe paid to this Prelate [B], and accuſed her of a criminal converſation with him. The King continuing to be credulous, Emma was obliged to clear herſelf by the method cuſtomary in thoſe days, that is to ſay, to walk over red-hot plough-ſhares [C]. This hard tryal proved her innocence very clearly; and the King having owned it, ſubmitted himſelf to the chaſtiſement of the Penitents (a). I do not find what became of the accuſers; and it muſt be confeſſed that the cuſtoms of thoſe ages afford matter for ſeveral reflexions [D].

(a) See Theophilus Raynaud, Hoplothec. Sect. 2. Serie 2. cap. 6. who quotes Polydor Virgil, Nicholas Harpſfeld, and Rodolphus Ceſtrenſis. Obſerve that Father d'Orleans relates this ſtory very exactly in the volume of his Revolutions d'Angleterre.

EMMIUS

[A] Edward her ſon . . . . . would never have had a place in the Catalogue of the Saints, had it not been for his extreme ſimplicity.] I mean that no holy day would ever have been appointed to him by a canonization. It is certain, that they who are on the Throne have much more occaſion for a happy temper than other men, in order to become Saints. If nature has not favoured them with a ſimple, ſweet, meek and humble genius, they conceive ſuch paſſions as make them behave in a manner that does not agree with Chriſtian perfection: but with thoſe qualities I have mentioned they ſuffer themſelves to be led like ſheep by their ſpiritual Directors, which goes a great way towards obtaining one day from the Court of Rome a beatification, and all that follows after it. I do not pretend to exclude the exceptions that may be judged neceſſary. But however it be, the Author whom I cite owned St. Edward's ſimplicity (1).

(1) Reginam Emmam apud filium Edvardum Sanctum quidem ſed ſimplicis animi deboneſtavit. Apud regem omnes ex ſuo ingenio ſimplici & candido (metientem.) Theoph. Raynaudus, Hoplotb. Sect. 2. Serie 2. cap. 6. pag. m. 204. I add the word metientem, becauſe the ſenſe requires it.

[B] They imputed to her as a crime the too frequent viſits ſhe paid to the Biſhop of Wincheſter.] The world has always been cenſorious, and would never believe that the long and frequent converſations between perſons of different ſexes, were free from lewdneſs. Let a woman be a widow, let her be old, let her be a Queen Dowager, let her want advice, and chooſe a Clergyman rather than a Layman for her confident, nothing will defend her againſt bad ſuſpicions, nor againſt the ſtrokes of ſlanderers. Emma is perhaps the hundred thouſandth amongſt the women of high rank, who expoſed their conduct to detraction.

[C] She was obliged to walk over red-hot plough-ſhares.] One Robert, who was afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury, powerfully ſupported the Earl of Kent's Machination. It was owing to him that the Queen was obliged to clear herſelf by the ordeal by fire. The cuſtom of thoſe days required that the perſon accuſed ſhould walk bare-foot over nine red-hot plough-ſhares. It was ordered that Emma ſhould make nine ſteps over theſe ſhares for herſelf, and five for the Biſhop of Wincheſter, for whoſe reputation ſhe was very much concerned. She ſubmitted to this, and ſpent the whole night before in prayers which ſhe offered at St. Swithin's Tomb. The day being come they performed in the ſame Church where ſhe paſſed the night, all the neceſſary ceremonies, after which ſhe walked between two Biſhops over the Plough-ſhare, in the preſence of Edward and of all the great Lords of the Kingdom. She was dreſſed like a common woman, bare to the knee, and ſhe conſtantly look'd up towards heaven. The fire hurted her ſo little, that they were already out of the Church, when ſhe aſked, when they ſhould come to the place where the plough-ſhares were (2): Being told that all was done, ſhe thanked God for the favour he had done her by proving her innocency in ſo authentick a manner. King Edward fell on his knees before his mother, begged her pardon, and in order to atone for the injury done both to her and to the Biſhop of Wincheſter, he would have the Biſhops to diſcipline him: and accordingly they laid his ſhoulders bare, and ſcourged him like a penitent (3). The plough-ſhares were buried in a Monaſtery of Wincheſter.

(2) Cum progrediendo decurſi eſſent vomeres, jamque extra Eccleſiam procederent cingentes Emmam Epiſcopi, interrogavit Emma, ecquando ad vomeres eſſet perventura, quæ rei exitum edocta immenſas gratias pro tanti probri abſterſione Deo egit. Theoph. Raynaudus, Hoploth. Sect. 2. Serie 2. cap. 6. pag. 204.

[D] The cuſtom of thoſe ages affords matter for ſeveral reflections.] The Hiſtories abound with events like this. We read that the ordeal by fire was often employed, and that the perſons who ſubmitted to it cleared themſelves very honourably. Why have they been diſcontinued this great while? Is it becauſe men have obſerved that it was a fallacious method, which might artfully be made to ſucceed in favour of guilty perſons? If that were true, we muſt not think thoſe cleared, who walked over the plough-ſhares without receiving the leaſt hurt. It is becauſe we ought not to tempt God? But why did men tempt him in thoſe days? Why are not thoſe blamed, who encouraged that Practice? Why ſhall we believe, that God diſcovered by a miracle the innocency of a perſon, who did not deſerve ſuch a favour, ſince he had his recourſe to a ſinful action, namely the tempting of God? It is a very hard matter to anſwer theſe difficulties without ſuppoſing occaſional cauſes, but by this ſuppoſition they are eaſily ſolved. It might only be ſuppoſed, that there was an intelligent Being, who took care of the innocent, and whoſe wiſhes determined the firſt Mover not to follow on this occaſion the general Law by which motion is communicated. One may ſuppoſe afterwards, not that this kind of intelligent Beings die, as the Heathens imagined, but that they are employed in ſome other buſineſs, and thus do not preſide any longer over the ordeals. Thus it might happen, that ſome miracles would be common at one time, and ceaſe at another. Nothing could be inferred from thence againſt the unchangeableneſs of the General Laws. We ſhould perhaps be miſtaken, if we believed, that of all the created minds the ſoul of man only is liable to change.

(3) Rex matri ſupplex ad pedes accidit, & pro moleſtia matri ac Epiſcopo Aluino creata, nudo dorſo ritu pœnitentium plagas ab Epiſcopis excepit. Theoph. Raynaudus, Hoploth. pag. 204.

A VERY convenient uſe of the ſyſtem of Occaſional Cauſes.

EMMIUS (UBO) a learned Profeſſor at Groningen, was born at Gretha a village in Eaſt Frieſland, December the 5th, 1547. He was the ſon of a Miniſter of that village [A], and was but nine years old when he was ſent to ſtudy at Embden: he continued there till he was eighteen, when they ſent him to Bremen in the year 1565, that he might improve by the famous John Molanus's lectures. Being returned to his father, he did not go immediately to the Univerſity, but paſſed ſome time at Norden, the College of which place began then to be in repute again. When he was paſt twenty three years he was ſent to Roſtock a flouriſhing Univerſity, where he heard the lectures of David Chytreus, a celebrated Divine and Hiſtorian, and of Henry Bruceus an able Mathematician and Phyſician. The news he received of his father's death obliged him to return into Eaſt-Frieſland, after he had continued above two years at Roſtock: and his mother's grief was the reaſon why he did not take a journey into France, as he had wiſhed to do. He continued with the good old woman three years following, after which, as time had comforted her a little, he went to Geneva, where he ſtaid two years. Being returned into his own country he had the choice of two preferments, either to be a Miniſter, or the Rector of a College. But as he was naturally ſo baſhful that he hardly dared to ſay a word in company (a), he would not venture to engage in the Holy Miniſtry, tho' it was very much his inclination. He choſe therefore to be the Rector of a College (b); and was admitted into that poſt in the year 1579. He made his College flouriſh exceedingly, but he was turned out of his employment in the year 1587 becauſe he would not ſubſcribe the Confeſſion of Auſburg. It was becauſe of this refuſal that ſome zealous Lutherans made him loſe his ſalary, and the liberty of teaching. He was choſen at Leer in the ſame country of Eaſt-Frieſland, in the year 1588 for ſuch a poſt as that which he had loſt. He raiſed the reputation of the College at Leer ſo high, that it ſurpaſſed that of Norden, which the Lutherans could never retrieve from the declining condition into which it fell when Emmius had been depoſed. They had baniſhed from Groningen ſeveral perſons who followed Calvin's reformation. Thoſe of the Exiles who retired to Leer, meeting with the ſame fate as our Emmius, engaged in a particular friendſhip with him. So that when the city of Groningen confederated with the United Provinces, and the Magiſtrates reſolved to reſtore their College, Emmius being recommended by ſeveral perſons, they choſe him to be Rector or Head-Maſter of that College, and they gave him a full power to make or abrogate there, ſuch ſtatues as he ſhould think proper. He entered upon his employment in the year 1594, the 47th of his age, and exerciſed it near twenty years following to the great advantage of the young ſtudents who were ſent in great numbers to that College. At the end of that time the Magiſtrates of Groningen changed their College into an Univerſity (c), and made Emmius Profeſſor of Hiſtory and of the Greek Tongue. He was the firſt Rector of that Univerſity, and one of the chief ornaments of it by his lectures, till the infirmities of old age did not ſuffer him to appear any longer in public. Yet for all that he did not become uſeleſs either to the Republic of Letters, or to the Univerſity of Groningen; for he continued to write books [B], and to impart his wiſe counſels to the Senate of the Univerſity in all important affairs. He was a man whoſe learning was not his only merit. He was capable of adviſing even Princes. William Lewis Count of Naſſau, and Governor of the Provinces of Frieſland and Groningen, conſulted him very often [C], and ſeldom failed to follow his advice. This

(a) A priore ad quam animus fezebat retraxit eum verecunda modeſtia, quæ hereditaria adeo naturæ ejus inſita fuit, ut nimis pene modeſtè de ſe ſentiens, in hominum cœtu fari vix auderet. Vit. Prof. Groning. pag. 42.

(b) It was that of Norden in East-Frieſland.

(c) It was in the year 1614, and not in 1607, as Valerius Andreas ſays, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 842.

[A] He was the ſon of the Miniſter of Gretha.] This Miniſter's name was Emmo Diken. He had been Luther's and Melancthon's diſciple, and was very much eſteemed by John Laſcus, who had for ſome time the adminiſtration of the Churches in thoſe countries. Emmo Diken's wife, the mother of our Ubo Emmius, was the daughter of Egbert Tiarda, who had been thirty years ſucceſſively Burgomaſter of Norden, and who had a brother called Ubo Emmius, a very good Civilian, who gave his name to the perſon, whoſe article we write. Emmo Diken's father was a ſubſtantial country-man, who had the direction of the ſluices at Norden (1).

(1) Taken from Ubo Emmius's Life printed amongſt the Lives of the Profeſſors of Groningen.

[B] He continued to write Books.] It was then, that he compoſed the three Volumes of his Vetus Græcia illuſtrata, (Antient Greece illuſtrated); the firſt of which contains a geographical deſcription of Greece; the ſecond the Hiſtory of Greece; the third the particular form of Government of every State or of every Commonwealth of Greece. If the Printers had made as much haſte as they had promiſed to make, he would have had the pleaſure of ſeeing this work publiſhed before his death: but by their cuſtomary delays it happened that this Book did not come out but in the year 1626 (2). Paul Freher did not know that it was publiſhed (3). The Author had publiſhed ſeveral conſiderable works before he wrote this: ſuch are his Decades rerum Friſicarum, (Decades of the Affairs of Frieſland) and in general all that he compoſed both concerning the Hiſtory of Frieſland and Groningen, and concerning the geographical Deſcription of theſe Countries. Such are alſo his chronological and genealogical Works, which contain the Hiſtory of Rome and an Univerſal Hiſtory written in a very elaborate method. I ſhall ſay nothing of his Hiſtory of William Lewis Count of Naſſau Governor of Frieſland, in which we meet not only with a Panegyrick on that Prince, but alſo a ſhort Hiſtory of the United Provinces from the year 1577 to the year 1614. I ſhall not mention either his Theological Controverſies with Daniel Hofman, or the Book intitled, Vita & ſacra Eleuſinia Davidis Georgii, qui monſtra pudendorum errorum aut furorum veterum à ſe recocta mundo propinavit, ex libris ejus myſticis eruta (4). i. e. "The "Life and infamous myſteries of David George, who "has preſented the world with monſters of ſhameful "errors, or the abominations of the ancients, newly "cooked up by himſelf, extracted from his myſtical "works." When he died he was about compoſing the Hiſtory of Philip of Macedonia Alexander the Great's father. His deſign was to ſhew, for the uſe of the United Provinces, by what fraudulent and indirect means Philip had oppreſſed the liberty of Greece. He had already carried this Hiſtory to the fifteenth year of this King's reign (5).

(2) Vit. Profeſſ. Groning. pag. 50.

(3) Theatr. Freheri, pag. 1521.

(4) Freher. ibid.

(5) Vit. Profeſſ. Groning. pag. 50.

[C] William Lewis Count of Naſſaw . . . conſulted him very often.] It would be doing an injury to Ubbo Emmius's memory, not to acquaint all the world with the honours he received from this Governor of Frieſland. I ſhall tranſcribe therefore what the Writer of

This is an accompliſhment ſeldom to be met with in thoſe that paſſed all their life-time amongſt the duſt of the College. There were ſome other ſingularities obſervable in Emmius; he fixed himſelf at Groningen [D], and rejected all the offers that were made him from ſeveral places; he was not prepoſſeſſed in favour of his native country; for on the contrary, he confuted vigorouſly the idle tales which the Hiſtorians of Frieſland relate concerning the antiquities of their nation [E]. This love of truth raiſed him a great many enemies (d). He died at Groningen December the 9th 1625 in the beginning of his ſeventy ninth year (e). He excelled in the knowledge of Hiſtory [F]. He has his Life ſays of it. Ab eo tempore, quo ſedes ſuas Groningæ habuit, per annos xxvi affectum illuſtriſſimi Principis GUILHELMI LUDOVICI Comitis Naſſoviæ Gubernatoris noſtri quondam laudatiſſimi memoriæ, tam benevolum ſemper & benignum ſenſit Emmius, ut humilioris ſuæ conditionis ſibi conſcius, in ruborem ſæpe daretur. Nam viri hujus cordatum ingenium Neſtoreamque in conſiliis dandis prudentiam ſæpe expertus Heros inclytus, eum ad ſe accerſere, benignè habere, per fidos domeſticos, per literas in maximis negotiis conſulere, & à mente ejus haud temere recedere, in more poſitum habebat (6). i. e.

(d) See the Remark [E].

(e) Taken from his Life printed with the Lives of the Profeſſors of Groningen. This Life is almoſt nothing elſe but the Elogy of Ublo Emmius, which Nicholas Mulerius Doctor of Phyſic and Profeſſor of Mathematics at Groningen, publiſhed without his name in the year 1638.

(6) Ibid. pag. 47.

" After Emmius was ſettled at Groningen, the moſt " illuſtrious Prince WILLIAM LEWIS Count of Naſ- " ſau, and for ſome time our moſt glorious Governor, " treated him during twenty ſix years with ſo much " friendſhip and kindneſs, that he, who was ſenſible " of his low rank, did often bluſh. For this celebrated Hero, who had often experienced this man's great " underſtanding, and Neſtorean wiſdom in giving advice, uſed to call him to him, to receive him kindly, " and to conſult him either by ſome truſty ſervants, " or by letters, and took his advice, unleſs he had " very ſtrong reaſons not to do it."

[D] He fixed himſelf at Groningen.] I have mentioned two or three times (7) this ambulatory life of the Profeſſors. But here is one, who was kept free from the epidemical diſeaſe of thoſe of his profeſſion. Certè præter alios, Dordrechtani his excitati ad ſimilem apud ſe functionem, Emdani vero ad aliud vitæ genus capeſſendum, ampliſſimis propoſitis præmiis eum invitarunt. Sed ille gratiis quibus debebat actis, non ſuum lucellum, ſed Reipublicæ literariæ commodum ſemper quærens, Groningæ, quoad Deo viſum manere, quam alio transferri maluit, & quod aliis in ſimili caſu occinere ſolebat, ipſe ad uſum quoque ſuum revocavit dictum hoc vulgare,

(7) See above, quotation (12) of the Article DECIUS.

Si qua ſede ſedes, quæ ſit tibi commoda ſedes,
Illa ſede ſede, nec ab illa ſede recede (8).

(8) Vita Profeſſ. Groning. pag. 45.

i. e. " The inhabitants of Dort and Leuwarden, beſides " ſeveral others being incited by this (his great ſucceſs at Groningen) invited him to come and fill up a poſt of " the ſame nature in their cities; and thoſe of Emden offered him a poſt of another kind; and all " propoſed a very large ſtipend. But he, having returned them thanks, and minding the advantage of " the Republic of Letters more than his own gain, " choſe to continue at Groningen as long as it ſhould " pleaſe God, rather than to remove to another place, " and he applied to himſelf what he uſed in the ſame " caſe to repeat to others, namely; If you ſit in a ſeat " which is a commodious ſeat for you, ſit in that ſeat, " nor recede from that ſeat *." There are few men like Iſſachar (9) the Patriarch Jacob's ſon.

* We have endeavoured to preſerve the gingle of the original.

(9) He ſaw that reſt was good. Gen. xlix. 15.

[E] He confuted vigorouſly the Idle Tales, which the Hiſtorians of Frieſland relate concerning the Antiquities of their Nation.] The Reader has ſeen above in the Article ABGILLUS how credulous Suffridus Petri is (10). He is not the only one amongſt the Writers of Frieſland who took a delight in relating ſtories; the worſt is that ſome perſons have been angry with thoſe who have exploded them. Ubbo Emmius was cenſured for this and expoſed himſelf to a thouſand calumnies. Do not think it is out of pride, that he affects to ſpeak of his anceſtors both by his father's and his mother's ſide, and of his education. He was obliged to inſiſt upon this in his own vindication: for they have endeavoured to render him deſpicable on all theſe accounts out of hatred to the ſincerity with which he wrote againſt the ancient and fabulous ſtories of his own country. " (11) Patriam & originem paulò accuratius in hiſto- " ria deſcriptam, aliaque ſua poſteris reliquit, ob ſi- " niſtrum quorundam affectum, quibus quaſi ſudes in " oculis erat ingenua viri in dicendo ſcribendoque li- " bertas, præſertim quoties de jure libertateque Fri- " ſiorum mota eſſet controverſia. Coegit quoque hoc " facere eum adverſariorum iniquitas, qui cum fabu- " las ſuas ab eo temni ac reſelli indignis ferrent ani- " mis, eum convitiis conſpuere, & boni nominis ejus " famam lacerare voluerunt, eum μισοφρίσονα eſſe, " hoſtem patriæ, ignarum ignotumque ſibi, & cujus " conditionis ſit, clamitantes. Quibus ille reſponſum hoc " debuit *, Me quod attinet ſum origine & patria Fri- " ſius non minus quam hi, qui me flagellant, ſi modo hu- " juſmodi hi ſunt, honeſta domo utrâque natus, honeſta " quoque in re, in literis voluntate ac ſumptu meorum, " ſine onere aliorum, honeſtè domi foriſque educatus, id- " que cum diminutione hæreditatis meæ. Adverſariis " meis affectu in communem patriam & gentem noſtram " non concedo, ſed affectum veritati in hiſtoriâ vim fa- " cere non patior, intraque terminos me contineo. Ve- " rum tradere tuerique ante omnia laboro, & hunc la- " borem difficilem Friſiis meis impendo gratis, ſolo patriæ " ac veritatis ſtudio ductus, & hoc inter negotia aſſidua " cum valetudinis jacturâ præſto." i. e. " He has given " in his Hiſtory a pretty accurate account of his own " country and of his family, and of ſome other things " relating to himſelf, being determined to it by the ill " humour of ſome perſons, who were offended by this " man's unbiaſſed freedom in ſpeaking and writing, " eſpecially when the rights and liberties of Frieſland " were the ſubject of the controverſy. He was alſo " obliged to do it by the injuſtice of his adverſaries, " who being exaſperated againſt him, becauſe he de- " ſpiſed and confuted their idle ſtories, abuſed him, " and endeavoured to blaſt his reputation, proclaim- " ing him a hater of Frieſland, an enemy to his " Country, an ignorant man, unknown, and of an " obſcure family. To all which he made the fol- " lowing anſwer. As for me, I am originally of Frieſ- " land, which is my native Country, as well as it is " theirs, who ſlander me, if yet they are of that Coun- " try. I am of a diſtinguiſhed family, both by my " father's and by my mother's ſide, and in good circum- " ſtances. I have received a liberal education, by the " good will and at the expence of my parents, both at " home and abroad, without being at any perſon's charge, " and having ſpent thereby part of my patrimony. As " to the love of my Country and Nation, I am not be- " hind any of my adverſaries, but yet I do not ſuffer, " that this love ſhould make me alter in the leaſt the " truth of hiſtory, but I keep my ſelf within bounds. I " endeavour above all things to relate and maintain the " truth; and this labour I beſtow generouſly for the be- " nefit of the Frieſlanders my Countrymen, being influ- " enced only by the love of my country and of truth; and " this I do amidſt a world of buſineſs, and to the conti- " nual impairing of my health."

(11) Vit. Profeſſ. Groning. pag. 40.

* De Orig. & Antiq. Friſ. pag. 3, 4.

(10) He follows a paſſage from Thuanus concerning Suffridus Petri and Emmius. Poſtea a Friſiæ Ordinibus invitatus, Origines, Colonias, Nobilitatem, Libertatem, jura gentis ſuæ illuſtrandæ ſuſcepit; in quibus altius repetendis dum adminiſtis fabularum figmentis nimium ſtilo indulget, multorum reprehenſiones incurrit, ut UBBONI EMMIO, qui eam Provinciam ſumma fide ac admiranda ſimplicitate poſtea executus eſt, potius lampada tradidiſſe, quam ei in ſcribendâ patriâ hiſtoriâ præluxiſſe videatur. Thuan. lib. cxix. pag. 816. ad ann. 1597. i. e. " Suffridus Petri, being invited thereto by the States of Frieſland un- " dertook to illuſtrate the Origin, Colonies, Nobility, Liberty, and Laws of his " own Nation. But beginning with the moſt ancient times, he delighted too much " in relating idle ſtories, for which he was much blamed; ſo that he ſeems rather " to have ſurrendered the task, than to have ſhewed the way to Ubbo Emmius, " who wrote the Hiſtory of his own Country with the greateſt ſincerity and an " admirable candour."

[F] He excelled in the knowledge of Hiſtory.] What has been ſaid of his extenſive knowledge attended with the moſt happy and ready memory, can hardly be credited. It is aſſerted, that without any preparation he could anſwer all manner of queſtions concerning the Hiſtory both ancient and modern of any country whatſoever, without the leaſt miſtake in the circumſtances of times, places, and perſons. He not only knew the actions, events, and motives, but alſo underſtood the intereſt of the ſeveral Nations, the form of their Government, the inclinations of their Princes, the means they employed to enlarge their dominions,

He has been commended by ſeveral eminent men [G], and particularly by Scaliger. He left a family behind him [H]. The Magiſtrates cauſed his picture to be placed in the Town-Houſe.

their alliances, their origin. He knew alſo the figure, ſituation and largeneſs of the cities and forts, the poſition of rivers and high-ways, the turnings and windings of mountains, &c. That the reader may not think this is an exaggeration, I ſhall tranſcribe the very words of the Writer of his Life. In omni omnium populorum ac gentium hiſtoria verſatiſſimus, de cujuſque gentis ac cujuſlibet temporis hiſtoria rogatus ex tempore diſſerebat, recitatis omnium locorum, temporis & perſonarum circumſtantiis, haud ſecus ac ſi præmeditatus & paratus accederet ad hiſtorias iſtas exponendas; ut ſatis appareat non fuiſſe eam ſuperficiariam ipſi cognitionem, quæ multis contigit, ſed quæ paucis exactam, ſolidam ad anteriora penetrantem, atque deſcendentem. Notiſſimas habebat in veteri & nova hiſtoria, non ſolum res geſtas, earumque cauſas & eventus, cujuſque populi πολιτείαν, ſed & urbes arceſque à ſorma, ſitu, magnitudine, ſimulque vias publicas, fluvios, montium tractus, geniumque loci, Principum ingenia, mores, cupiditates, ambitus, arteſque quibus ad honores graſſati, quibus propinquitatibus ſubnixi, quo ſanguine creti (12).

(12) Vitæ Profeſſ. Groning. pag. 48.

[G] He has been commended by ſeveral eminent men.] The Author of his life has collected ſeveral encomiums, which Thuanus, Scaliger, Douza, and ſome others paſſed upon him. They are exceedingly great, eſpecially thoſe which Scaliger wrote. For he ſtiles Ubbo Emmius's Hiſtory of Frieſland a Divine Hiſtory (13).

(13) Hankius, in the volume de Romanorum rerum ſcriptoribus, lib. 2. pag. 188. has collected a great part of the Elogies printed with Emmius's Life.

[H] He left a family behind him.] He married at Norden in the year 1581. His wife who died in childbed, left him a ſon, who died at the age of nineteen. Emmius continued a widower three years, at the end of which he married to his ſecond wife Margaret of Berghen, the daughter of a citizen of Emden who ſurvived him, with two children a ſon and a daughter. The ſon's name was Weſſelus Emmius, and was Miniſter of Groningen when his father died. He had a younger brother who died at Orleans a few months before his father.

(14) Taken from Ubbo Emmius's Life.

☞EMPEDOCLES, a celebrated Philoſopher and Poet among the Antients, was born of a good family [A] at Agrigentum the moſt conſiderable city next Syracuſe (a), in Sicily. He flouriſhed between the 70th and 80th Olympiad [B]. Timæus in the ninth book of his Hiſtory (b) aſſerts, that he heard Pythagoras, and adds, that he was taken ſtealing a Diſſertation of that Philoſopher (as Plato alſo was), and upon this account was expelled the Society; and that he mentions Pythagoras in his verſes [C]. But others were of opinion, that he meant Parmenides there. Neanthes (c) relates, that till Philolaus and Empedocles, the Pythagoreans communicated their diſcourſes; but that after Empedocles had publiſhed them in his Poems, they made an order not to communicate any thing to an Epic Poet. Plato is ſaid likewiſe to have been prohibited in the ſame manner. But which of the Pythagoreans Empedocles heard, he did not mention. The Epiſtle publiſhed under the name of Telauges, which affirms that he was the diſciple of Hippaſus and Brontinus, deſerves no credit (d). Theophraſtus (e) ſays, that he was an emulator and imitator of Parmenides in his Poems, having written among other works a diſcourſe of Nature in verſe. But Hermippus (f) affirms, that he did not emulate Hermippus, but Xenophanes, with whom he lived, and imitated his Poetry, and afterwards applied himſelf to the Pythagoreans. Alcidimas in his Phyſics (g) relates, that Zeno and Empedocles heard Parmenides at the ſame time; and that at laſt both left him, Zeno going to ſtudy Philoſophy by himſelf, and Empedocles to hear Anaxagoras and Pythagoras, imitating the one in the gravity and ſtrictneſs of his life and behaviour, and the other in his Phyſiology. Suidas tells us, that he followed the Pythagorean Philoſophy;

(a) Diogenes Laertius, de Vita &c. Philoſophorum, lib. 8. and Ælian, de Animalib. lib. 9. cap. 64.

(b) Apud Laertium, ubi ſupra.

(c) Apud eundem.

(d) Laertius.

(e) Apud Laert.

(f) Apud eundem.

(g) Apud eundem.

[A] Was born of a good family.] Suidas tells us (1), that he was the ſon of Meto, or, as others ſay, of Archinomus, or, as others, of Xenetus. But Laertius gives the following account of his family (2). He was, as Hippobatus ſays, an Agrigentine, ſon of Meto, ſon of Empedocles. This is confirmed by Timæus in the XVth Book of his Hiſtories, where he obſerves, that there was one Empedocles an eminent perſon, grandfather to the Poet. Hermippus gives the ſame account; and Heraclides, in his Treatiſe concerning iſlands * affirms, that his grandfather was of a noble family, and kept chariot-horſes. Eratoſthenes in his Olympionics ſaith, upon the teſtimony of Ariſtotle, that Meto was Victor in the LXXIſt Olympiad. But Apollodorus the Grammarian aſſerts, that it was Empedocles, who was ſon of Meto. Glaucus writes, that he came to the Thurians ſoon after their city was built; and immediately adds, that thoſe who relate that he was baniſhed his country, and came to Syracuſe, and fought with the Syracuſians againſt the Athenians, ſeemed to him to be quite miſtaken; ſince Empedocles was either dead at that time, or very old. The latter is not at all probable, for Ariſtotle ſaith, that he and Heraclitus died in the LXth year of their age; but he, who won the race in the LXXIſt Olympiad, was of the ſame name. And thus the time is ſet down by Apollodorus. Satyrus in his Lives obſerves, that Empedocles was the ſon of Exænetus, and that he had a ſon named Exænetus, and that in the ſame Olympiad Empedocles won the horſe-race, and his ſon was victor at wreſtling; or according to Heraclides in his Ἐπιτομὴ, won the foot-race. But we find in the Commentaries of Phavorinus, that in the Olympic games Empedocles ſacrificed an oxe made of honey and flower, and that he had a brother named Callicratides. But Telauges, the ſon of Pythagoras, in his Epiſtle to Philolaus ſaith, that Empedocles was ſon of Archinomus. He tells us himſelf in the beginning of his Luſtrations or Καθαρμοὶ, that he was of Agrigentum;

(1) In Voce Ἐμπεδοκλῆς.

(2) De Vitâ &c. Philoſophorum, lib. 8.

* Ἐν τῷ περὶ νήσων: ſo it is read in Frobenius's edition; but in Stephens's it is, περὶ νόσων, i. e. concerning Diſeaſes.

Ὦ φίλοι οἱ μέγα ἄξυ κατὰ ξανθὸν Ἀκράγαντος
Ναίετ' ἀν' ἄκρα πόλιος.

(3) Baſil Kennet's Lives and Characters of the antient Greek Poets, Part 2. pag. 51. edit. London 1697, in 8vo.

[B] He flouriſhed between the LXXth and LXXXth Olympiad.] The conſtant report of his ſtudying Philoſophy under Telauges the ſon of Pythagoras, juſtifies the fixing him in this period. But if we believe what ſome affirm, that he was inſtructed by Pythagoras himſelf, he muſt undoubtedly be antienter than the LXXth Olympiad, in which that great Philoſopher is ſaid to have died (3). On the other hand he is brought down ſomewhat lower than the LXXXth Olympiad by Euſebius, whoſe account is approved of by Scaliger (4). Calviſius (5) tells us, that he flouriſhed in the LXXXth Olympiad, in the year of the world 3493, and before Chriſt 455. Voſſius aſſerts (6), that he lived about the LXXXIVth Olympiad.

(4) In Euſeb ad Num. M. D. C. I.

(5) Opus Chronologicum, pag. 246. edit. Francofurt. 1685.

(6) De Hiſt. Latinis, lib. 4. cap. 2. See likewiſe Aldobrandini and Menage upon Laertius.

[C] And that he mentions Pythagoras in his Verſes.] The Verſes are as follow:

Ἦν δέ τις ἐν πίνυσιν ἀνὴρ περιώσια εἰδὼς,
Ὃς δὴ μήκιστον πραπίδων ἐκτήσατο πλοῦτον (7).

(7) Laertium, ubi ſupra. and Porphyr. in Vita Pythagoræ.

'Mongſt theſe was one in things ſublimeſt ſkill'd,
His mind with all the wealth of learning fill'd.
Stanley.

But ſome were of opinion, that he meant this of Parmenides.

loſophy ; which is confirmed by ſeveral of his verſes ſtill extant [D]. Several wonderful particulars are related of him [E]. Neanthes of Cyzicum (i) relates, that upon the death of Meto there began a tyranny at Agrigentum ; but that Empedocles perſuaded the Agrigentines to give over ſedition, and to ſettle a civil parity ; and that he himſelf being very rich beſtowed portions upon a great many maids, who had no fortunes, and cloathed himſelf in purple, and wore a golden girdle, as Phavorinus affirms (k), and a Delphic Crown, and wore his hair long, and had ſervants attending on him, and carried great ſeverity in his countenance. The Citizens likewiſe, when they met him, paid ſuch profound reſpect to him, as if thoſe circumſtances had been the marks of Regal Authority. However Ariſtotle (l) tells us, that he was a great lover of liberty, and extremely averſe to ſtate and command, refuſing a Kingdom which was offered to him, as Xanthus obſerves in his book concerning him (m), and preferring a moderate condition to the grandeur of Royalty. Timæus gives the ſame account, adding the reaſon of his inclination to a Democracy ; for being invited by one of the Governors, and the company falling to drink before ſupper, he ordered the ſupper to be brought in ; but the Gentleman who had invited him, ſaid, that he ſtaid for the chief Magiſtrate (n), who, as ſoon as he came, was appointed Sympoſiarch, or Maſter of the Feaſt ; for ſo it was ordered by the perſon who had made the invitation. He began to diſcover a tyrannical humour, commanding him to drink, or elſe that the wine ſhould be poured on his head. Empedocles for the preſent ſaid nothing, but the next day he cited, both the Inviter and Sympoſiarch before the Court, and condemned them to death. This was the beginning of

(i) Apud Laertium.

(k) In his Ἀπομνημονεύματα, apud Laertium.

(l) Apud eundem.

(m) Apud eundem.

(n) Τῆς Βουλῆς ὑπερέτην.

[D] Suidas tells us, that he followed the Pythagorean Philoſophy; which is confirmed by ſeveral of his Verſes ſtill extant.] Among others are theſe which follow ;

Χαίρετ.' ἐγὼ δ' ὑμῶν Θεὸς ἄμβροτος, οὐκ ἔτι θνητὸς Πωλεῦμαι (7).

Farewell, Friends, mortal I ſhall be no more.
Stanley.

Ἤδη γάρ ποτ' ἐγὼ γενόμην κοῦρός τε κόρη τε
Θάμνος τ' οἰωνός τε, καὶ ἐξ ἁλὸς ἔμπυρος ἰχθύς (8).

A boy I was, then did a maid become.
And next a plant, a bird, and ſcaly fiſh.

(7) See Suidas, ubi ſupra.

(8) Laertius.

[E] Several wonderful particulars are related of him.] Timæus (9) relates, that the Eteſian winds blowing very ſtrongly, ſo that they deſtroyed the fruit, he ordered that a great number of aſſes ſhould be flead, and bottles made of their ſkins, and placed on the tops of the hills to receive the blaſts ; by which means the force of the winds was abated. This gained him the title of Κωλυσανέμας, i. e. The Chaſer away of the Winds. Plutarch (10) relates of him a fact of the ſame kind, that by ſtopping a cleft of a mountain, out of which there iſſued an unwholſome ſouthern blaſt on the plains, he was ſuppoſed to have delivered the country from the plague. The ſame cure he wrought among the Salinuntians by a different method ; for they being, as Diodorus the Epheſian ſaith (11), infeſted with the peſtilence occaſioned by the noiſomneſs of the river, whereof the men died, and the women could not without great difficulty be delivered ; Empedocles at his own charge conveyed two other rivers, which ran near it, into this channel ; by which mixture the water became ſweet, and the plague ceaſed. Jamblichus tells us (12), that a young man drawing a ſword upon Anchitus his hoſt, and going to kill him becauſe the latter had in a public trial condemned his father to death, Empedocles prevented it by ſinging out of Homer,

Νηπενθὲς τ' ἄχολόντε κακῶν ἐπίληθον ἁπάντων,

Nepenthe calming anger, eaſing grief ;

by which means Anchitus was reſcued from the guilt of murder, and became afterwards one of the moſt eminent of his diſciples. Hermippus (13) ſays, that our Philoſopher cured Panthea, a woman of Agrigentum, after ſhe was given over by all the Phyſicians. But the moſt memorable cure, was that, which he performed upon a woman, who had lain ſeven days dead, according to Pliny (14) ; but as Galen (15) more exactly out of Heraclides, deſcribes it, "breathleſs and "without pulſe, differing in nothing from a dead body, "ſaving that ſhe had a little warmth about the middle "parts of her body. The Book of Heraclides was "intitled, The Breathleſs Woman. And it was a controverſy amongſt the Phyſicians who were preſent, "whether ſhe was dead or alive." Heraclides (16) adds, that Empedocles acquainted Pauſanias with the whole affair ; and that the breathleſs woman could preſerve herſelf thirty days without breathing or eating. Whence he ſtiles Empedocles both a Phyſician and a Prophet, confirmed even by his own Verſes :

(9) Lib. 18. Hiſt. apud Laertium.

(10) Contra Colotem, & de Curioſitate.

(11) Apud Laertium.

(12) In Vitâ Pythagoræ. c. 25.

(13) Apud Laertium.

(14) Lib. 7. cap. 52.

(15) Cap. 52. De Locis affectis, lib. 6.

(16) Apud Laert.

Ὦ φίλοι οἱ μέγα ἄξυ κατὰ ξανθῆ Ἀκράγαντος
Ναίετ' ἂν ἄκρα πόλεως, ἀγαθᾶν μελεδήμονες ἔργων
Χαίρετ'. ἐγὼ δ' ὑμῖν Θεὸς ἄμβροτος, οὐκ ἔτι θνητὸς
Πωλεῦμαι μετὰ πᾶσι τετιμένος, ὥσπερ ἔοικε,
Ταινίαις τε περίστεπτος στέφεσίν τε θαλείης,
Τοῖσιν ἅμ' εὖτ' ἂν ἵκωμαι ἐς ἄστεα τηλεθόωντα
Ἀνδράσιν ἠδὲ γυναιξὶ σεβίζομαι. οἱ δ' ἅμ' ἕπονται
Μύριοι, ἐξερέοντες ὅπη πρὸς κέρδος ἀταρπός.
Οἱ μὲν μαντοσυνέων κεχρημένοι, οἱ δὲ τι νόσων
Παντοίων ἐπυθοντα κλύειν εὐηκέα βάξιν.

Friends, who in ſpacious Agrigentum dwell,
Buſied in noble high deſigns, farewell.
A death-leſs God I am, mortal no more,
Honour'd by all, with Garlands cover'd o'er ;
Which ſoon as e'er I come to any town,
Both men and women pay to me renown.
Thouſands of men enquire the way to wealth ;
Some would divine, others reſtore to health.
Stanley.

There were ſome who aſcribed theſe things to magic (17). Satyrus in his Lives (18) relates, that Gorgias the Leontine, who had been a diſciple of Empedocles, uſed to ſay, that he himſelf had been preſent with him, when he practiſed Magic, ὡς αὐτὸς παρείη τῷ Ἐμπεδοκλεῖ γοητεύοντι : and that Empedocles makes a profeſſion of it in his Poem, where he ſays ;

(16) Apud Laert.

(17) Laert.

(18) Apud Laert.

Φάρμακα δ' ὅσσα γεγᾶσι κακῶν, καὶ γήραος ἄλκαρ
Πεύσῃ· ἐπεὶ μοῦνῳ σοὶ ἐγὼ κρανέω τάδε πάντα.
Παύσεις δ' ἀκαμάτων ἀνέμων μένος, οἵτ' ἐπὶ γαῖαν
Ὀρνύμενοι πνοιῇσι καταφθινύθουσιν ἄρουραν.
Καὶ πάλιν ἢν κ' ἐθέλῃσθα, παλίντιτα πνεύματ' ἐπάξεις
Θήσεις δ' ἐξ ὄμβροιο κελαινῆ καίριον αὐχμὸν
Ἀνθρώποις, θήσεις δ' αὖ καὶ ἐξ αὐχμοῖο θερείου
Ῥεύματα δενδρεόθρεπτα, τὰ δ' ἐν θέρει ἀΐσαντα.
Ἄξεις δ' ἐξ ἀΐδαο καταφθιμένην μένος ἀνδρός.

" Med'cines to ſtrengthen age, and cure diſeaſe,
" Thou ſhalt be taught, for I am ſkill'd in theſe ;
" The wrath of reſtleſs winds thou ſhalt aſſwage,
" Which blaſt the corn in their pernicious rage.
" And when thou call'ſt, they ſhall come back " again :
" Rain thou ſhalt change to drought, and drought
" to rain,
" By whoſe kind moiſture trees may ſprout and thrive,
" And make the dead quit Pluto, and revive."
Stanley.

of his authority [F]. Empedocles afterwards diſſolved the Council of 1000 Senators, and conſtituted the Magiſtracy for three years, ſo that it conſiſted not only of the rich, but alſo of thoſe of the ordinary rank (o). However Timæus in his firſt and ſecond books, (for he often mentioned him) tells us (p), that he ſeemed to be of an opinion contrary to a Democracy [G]. His principal work was that of the nature and principles of things [H]. Ariſtotle (q) affirms, that he was the Inventor of Oratory, as Zeno was of Logic; and in his Book concerning the Poets (r) he obſerves, that the ſtyle of Empedocles was Homerical, and that he was weighty in his expreſſions, uſing metaphors and other poetical figures; and that having written among other poems the paſſage of Xerxes over the Helleſpont, and a Proem or Hymn to Apollo (s), they were both burnt by a ſiſter, or according to Hieronymus (t), a daughter of his; the latter by a miſtake, the former with deſign, becauſe it was imperfect. Ariſtotle adds, that he wrote alſo Tragedies and Politicks; but Heraclides the ſon of Serapion (u) aſcribes the Tragedies to another; and Suidas tells us (w), that there was another of the ſame name, who was his ſiſter's ſon, and wrote twenty four Tragedies. However Hieronymus (x) aſſerts, that he had ſeen forty three Tragedies written by our Empedocles; and Neanthes obſerves, that he wrote Tragedies when he was young, and that he had had a ſight of them. Beſides his Poem on the nature of things, he wrote another concerning Luſtrations (y); and a Diſcourſe on Phyſic containing 600 verſes. His Luſtrations were collected by Cleomenes the Rhapſodiſt, and ſung at the Olympic Games, as Phavorinus relates in his Commentaries (z). We ſhall give an account of his opinions in the Note [I]. His death is variouſly reported.

(o) Laertius, ubi ſupra.

(p) Apud eundem.

(q) In his Σοφίσης apud Laert.

(r) Apud eundem.

(s) Προοίμιον. Vide Menag. in Laertium.

(t) Apud Laertium.

(u) Apud eundem.

(w) In Voce Ἐμπεδοκλῆς.

(x) Apud Laert.

(y) Οἱ Καθαρμοί.

(z) Apud Laert.

[F] This was the beginning of his authority.] This is a tranſlation of theſe words of Laertius; ἀρχὴ μὲν οὖν αὕτη τῆς πολιτείας ἦδε; which is thus rendered in the Latin Verſion (19): Iſtud igitur reipublicæ tractandæ initium fuit. But Mr. Stanley (20) appears to have miſtaken the ſenſe of them, when he renders them thus: Of ſo great authority was he in the Commonwealth.

(19) In the edition of Laertius printed at Amſterdam in 4to 1692, vol. 1. pag. 533.

[G] Timæus tells us . . . . that he ſeemed to be of an opinion contrary to a Democracy.] That Hiſtorian infers this from Empedocles's aſſuming ſo haughty an air in his Poetry, even ſtiling himſelf a God (21). However Laertius obſerves, that when Acron the Phyſician petitioned for a place to build a monument for his father, Empedocles ſtood up and oppoſed it, and diſcourſed very largely of a parity, and withal aſked, what Epitaph ſhould be inſcribed on the tomb? Whether this?

(20) Hiſtory of Philoſophy, vol. 3. Part 1. pag. 148. edit. London 1660.

(21) See note [E].

Ἄκρον ἰητρὸν Ἀκρων Ἀκραγαντῖνον πατρὸς ἄκρᾳ,
Κρύπτει κρημνὸς ἄκρος πατρίδος ἀκροτάτης.

Others read the ſecond verſe thus:

Ἀκροτάτης κορυφῆς τύμβος ἄκρος κατέχει.

This Epitaph is full of puns upon the name of Acron. Some aſcribe it to Simonides (22).

(22) Laert.

[H] His principal Work was that of the Nature and Principles of Things.] Suidas ſtiles it περὶ φύσεως τῶν ὄντων, and tells us, that it contained two thouſand Verſes. Lucretius, whoſe buſineſs it was to confute our Author, yet gives us a Panegyric on his Poetry, when he condemns his Philoſophy, and in a rapture makes him almoſt a God, that is almoſt as great as his maſter Epicurus.

Quorum Acragantinus cum primis Empedocles eſt,
Inſula quem Triquetris terrarum geſſit in oris:
Quam fluitans circum magnis anfractibus æquor.
Ionium glaucis aſpergit Virus ab undis;
Anguſtoque fretu rapidum mare dividit undis
Italiæ terrai oras a finibus ejus:
Hic eſt vaſta Charibdis, & hic Ætnæa minantur
Murmura; flammarum rurſum ſe conligere iras,
Faucibus eruptos iterum ut vis evomat ignis;
Ad cælumque ferat flammai fulgura rurſum.
Quæ cum magna modis multis miranda videtur
Gentibus humanis regio, viſendaque fertur,
Rebus opima bonis, multâ munita virûm vi;
Nil tamen hoc habuiſſe viro præclarius in ſe,
Nec ſanctum magis, & mirum carumque videtur.
Carmina quinetiam divini pectoris ejus
Vociferantur, & exponunt præclara reperta;
Ut vix humanâ videatur ſtirpe creatus (23).

(23) Laert. lib. 1.

" Thus ſung Empedocles;
" In fruitful Sicily, whoſe crooked ſides
" Th' Ionian waſhes with impetuous tides,
" And a ſmall Frith from Italy divides.
" Here Scylla raves, and fierce Charybdis roars,
" Beating with boiſt'rous waves the trembling ſhores:
" Here preſs'd Enceladus with mighty loads
" Vomits revenge in flames againſt the Gods:
" Thro' Ætna's jaws he impudently threats,
" And thund'ring heaven with equal thunder beats.
" This Iſle, who with ſuch wondrous ſights as theſe,
" Doth call forth travellers, and the curious pleaſe,
" Is rich with men and fruit, has rarely ſhown
" A thing more glorious than this ſingle one.
" His Verſe compos'd of nature's Works declare " His wit was ſtrong, and his invention rare,
" His judgment deep and ſound, whence ſome be" gan,
" And juſtly too, to think him more than man."
Creech.

Henry Stephens has collected the fragments of Empedocles's Poem; to which may be added his Verſes quoted by Philoſtratus in his firſt Book of the life of Apollonius, and by Pachymerius upon Ariſtotle. There is ſtill extant a Book concerning the ſtars of the eighth Orb, intitled, Empedocles's Sphere; but not written by him, ſince his Phyſics were written in heroic Verſe, whereas this Book is in Iambics. Voſſius de Poetis Græcis thinks it was written by Demetrius Triclinius, whoſe Scholia upon Sophocles are ſtill extant.

[I] We ſhall give an account of his opinions in the note.] He maintained that there were four elements, fire, air, water, earth; and two principal powers, friendſhip and diſcord, the one unitive, the other diſcretive; for thus he writes,

Τέσσαρα γὰρ πάντων ῥιζώματα πρῶτον ἄκουε,
Ζεὺς ἀργὴς, Ἥρη τε φερέσβιος, ἠδ' Ἀϊδωνεύς·
Νῆστις θ', ἣ δακρύοις τέγγει κρηναίωμα βρότειον (24).

(24) Sextus Empiric. contra Mathematicos, pag. 433.

To the four roots of all attention give;
The Æther Jove; Juno, by whom we live;
Next theſe is Pluto; Neſtis laſt, whoſe eyes
Afford the mortal fountain freſh ſupplies.

He calls the heat and Æther, Jupiter; the air, vital Juno; the earth, Pluto; the water, Neſtis, and the mortal fountain. Laertius cites it thus:

Ζεὺς ἀργὴς, Ἥρη τε φερέσβιος, ἠδ' Ἀϊδωνεὺς,
Νῆστις θ' ἣ δακρύοις ἐπιπικροῖ ἴμερτα βρότειον.

White Jove, and vital Juno, Pluto then,
And Neſtis giving tears to th' eyes of men.
Stanley.

The fire, ſays Laertius, he calls Jupiter; the earth, Juno; the air, Pluto: the water, Neſtis. Theſe are in an inceſſant motion; by which means there is an eternal production of all things; whence he adds;

Ἄλλοτε μὲν φιλότητι συνερχόμεν, εἰς ἓν ἅπαντα,
Ἄλλοτε δ' αὖ δίχ' ἕκαστα φορεύμενα νείκεος ἔχθει (*).

(*) Laert. See likewiſe Simplicius in Ariſt. de Phyſico Auditu, lib. 8.

" Sometimes

(aa) Apud Laert. reported [K]. Hippobatus (aa) affirms, that a ſtatue of him covered, which ſtood firſt at Agrigentum, was afterwards placed before the Senate-Houſe at Rome uncovered, being brought

" Sometimes by friendſhip all are knit in one;
" Sometimes by diſcord ſever'd and undone."
Stanley.

Before the four elements there are certain leaſt fragments (25); as it were elements of elements, of ſimilar parts, and round (26). The world is one; the world is not the Univerſe, but a little part of the Univerſe, the reſt is ſluggiſh matter (27). Nature is nothing but the mixture and ſeparation of the elements (28): for thus he writes in the firſt Book of his Phyſics;

(25) Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſ. 1. 13.
(26) Stob. Eclog. Phyſ. 1. 17.
(27) Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſoph. 1. 5.
(28) Idem, 1. 30.

We otherwiſe; there's no ſuch thing at all,
As that, which Mortals death or nature call.
To mixtion and diſcretion all we owe,
On which the name of nature men beſtow.
Stanley.

He aſſerted, that the world is circumſcribed by the circular motion of the ſun (29); that the right ſide of the world is that, which is towards the ſummer tropic, and the left that which is towards the winter tropic (30). He agreed with all thoſe who maintained the world to be formed of little bodies, in introducing concretions and diſcretions; but denied generation and corruption, affirming that compounds are not only made by quality and alteration, but by quantity and coagmentation (31). He aſſerted that the heaven is ſolid, being made of air condenſed by fire, like chryſtal, and contains a fiery and aerial nature in both hemiſpheres (32; that the ſtars are fiery, conſiſting of that fire which the Æther containing in it ſelf, ſtruck forth at the firſt ſecretion (33); that the fixed ſtars are fixed to the chryſtal of the heavens, but the planets looſe (34); that the ſun is a great maſs of fire larger than the moon (35); that there are two ſuns, one an archetypal fire in the other hemiſphere of the world, filling this hemiſphere which is continually oppoſite to its ſplendor; and with regard to that which is viſible to us, it is the light in that other hemiſphere repleniſhed with air, mixed with heat; and the ſame is occaſioned by refraction from the earth, which is more round, entering into the ſun, which is of a chryſtalline nature, and yet is carried away together with the motion of that fire. Or to ſpeak more plainly and diſtinctly, the ſun is nothing elſe than the reflection of that light which is about the earth (36). He aſcribed the reaſons of the ſolſtice or tropics of the ſun, to the ſphere, which contains him, and hinders him from paſſing further; as alſo to the two tropics (37). He maintained that the moon is in form like a diſh (38); that the moon is twice as far diſtant from the ſun as ſhe is from the earth (39); that winter comes when the air is predominant in thickneſs, and is forced upward; and ſummer, when the fire is in the ſame manner predominant, and driven downward (40); that the ſea is the ſweat of the earth burnt by the ſun, which ſqueezeth that ſweat out of it (41); that the ſoul puts on the ſeveral forms of all living creatures and plants, whence he ſaid of himſelf,

(29) Idem, 2. 1.
(30) Idem, 2. 10.
(31) Idem, 1. 24.
(32) Idem, 2. 11.
(33) Idem, 2. 13.
(34) Idem, ibid.
(35) Laert.
(36) Plutarch. ubi ſupra, 2. 20.
(37) Idem, 2. 23.
(38) Idem, 2. 27. and Laert.
(39) Plutarch. 2. 31.
(40) Idem, 3. 8.
(41) Idem, 3. 16.

(42) Laert. Ἤδη γάρ ποτ' ἐγὼ &c. (42).

" A Boy I was, then did a Maid become;
" A Plant, Bird, Fiſh, and in the vaſt ſea ſwum."

That the particular ſenſes are affected according to the proportion of their pores and paſſages, that is, as the proper object of each ſenſe is well diſpoſed and fitted (43). That reſemblances in a mirrour are occaſioned by certain defluxions collected together upon the ſurface of the mirrour, and by the fire iſſuing from it, which tranſmutes the air before it, into which theſe defluxions are carried (44). He mingled the viſual images and beams together, calling that which is formed from thence, the rays of a compound image (45). He affirmed that hearing is performed by means of a wind within the hollow of the ear, turned in the manner of a ſcrew, fitted and framed on purpoſe within the ear, hanging up, and beaten up as a bell (46). That the Hegemonic is the conſiſtence of the blood (47).

(43) Plut. 4. 9.
(44) Idem, 4. 14.
(45) Idem, 4. 13.
(46) Idem, 4. 16.
(47) Idem, 4. 5.
(48) Apud Laertium.

[K] His death is variouſly reported.] Heraclides (48) having related the ſtory of Empedocles's raiſing the breathleſs woman to life (49), adds, that he appointed a ſacrifice in the field of Piſianax, and invited thither many of his friends, amongſt whom was Pauſanias. After the feaſt was concluded, the company withdrew themſelves to reſt, but he ſtirred not out of the place where he had ſupped. The next morning, when they aroſe, he alone was miſſing; which giving them occaſion to enquire after him of the ſervants, they ſaid that they knew not was become of him; only one of them ſaid, that about midnight he heard a great noiſe, calling Empedocles, upon which riſing up he ſaw a light from heaven, and a prodigious ſplendor of torches, but nothing elſe. They were all amazed at this accident, and Pauſanias going down ſent others to enquire more ſtrictly, but was at laſt perſuaded not to trouble himſelf any further, ſaying, that the thing which had happened deſerved prayer, and that ſacrifices ſhould be offered to Empedocles as a God. Hermippus (50) ſays, that he made the ſacrifice upon the cure which he wrought upon Panthea; and that the perſons who were invited were eighty in number. Hippobatus affirms, that he roſe from his place and went to Ætna, where he leaped into the fire, that he might leave behind him an opinion that he was a God; and that afterwards it was diſcovered by one of his ſandals caſt up by the fire, for his ſandals were of braſs. But this ſtory, ſays Laertius, is contradicted by Pauſanias. Diodorus the Epheſian (51) having ſhewn how he cured the Salinuntians of the plague, adds, that as thoſe people were feaſting by the river, Empedocles appeared to them, and they riſing up, paid him divine honours, and prayed to him as a God; which opinion he being ambitious of continuing, caſt himſelf into the fire. But Timæus (52) contradicts theſe accounts, affirming, that he departed into Peloponneſus, and never returned; by which, the manner of his death is unknown. The ſame Writer likewiſe in his fourth book expreſly confutes the ſtory of Heraclides abovementioned, proving that Piſianax was a Syracuſian, and had not any eſtate or field at Agrigentum; that Pauſanias, who was rich, upon this report erected a little image or altar in memory of his friend, as to a God. " And how, ſays " he, could he caſt himſelf into the flames of Ætna, " of which, being ſo far diſtant, he never makes any " mention? It is certain, that he died in Peloponneſus; " and it is not at all ſurprizing that his tomb is not " known; for it hath happened ſo to many other " perſons." Thus writes Timæus, who adds, that Heraclides was accuſtomed to relate ſurprizing ſtories, as particularly one of a man who fell out of the moon. Strabo (53) has taken pains to confute the report of our Philoſopher's caſting himſelf into Ætna, by ſhewing, that it is impoſſible for any perſon to approach near that burning mountain, where he is ſaid to have diſpoſed of himſelf; or to throw any thing in by reaſon of the violent wind ſtill ruſhing upwards, and beating all before it. Neanthes cited by Laertius informs us, that our Philoſopher going in his chariot to a great ſolemnity at Meſſana, fell and broke his thigh, of which he died being 77 years old: and that his ſepulchre was at Megara. But Ariſtotle differs in the account of his age, affirming, that he died at 60; though others ſay that he lived to 109 years of age (54). Democritus the Trœzenian relates in Homer's words, that

(49) See Remark [E].
(50) Apud Laert.
(51) Apud eundem.
(52) Apud eundem.
(53) Lib. 6. pag. 420, 421. edit. Amſtelod. 1707.
(54) Laert.

About his neck he knit a rope, and fell
From a high Cliff; his ſoul went down to Hell.

Ἀψάμενον βρόχον αἰπὺν ἀφ' ὑψηλοῖο κρεμάσσης
Ἀυχέν' ἀποπρομόσαι, ψυχὴν δ' Ἄϊδός δε κατελθεῖν.

But in the Epiſtle of Telauges, cited by Laertius, it is ſaid, that being extremely old he fell into the ſea and died. Horace mentions the ſtory of his caſting himſelf into Ætna (55).

(55) De Arte Poeticâ.

——— Dicam, Siculique Poetæ
Narrabo interitum: Deus immortalis haberi
Dum cupit Empedocles, ardentem frigidus Ætnam Inſiluit; ſit jus, liceatque perire Poetis.

brought thither by the Romans. And Laertius tells us, that there were ſeveral pictures of it in his time.

" I'll tell my reaſons, and in ſhort relate
" A poor Sicilian Poet's wretched fate :
" Empedocles muſt needs be thought a God,
" And therefore in a melancholy mood,
" Leap'd into Ætna's flames." CREECH.

Lucian likewiſe relates this in his Dialogue of Menippus and Æacus, in his Tract concerning the death of Peregrinus, in his True Hiſtory, and his Icaromenippus. And Tertullian (56) refers to it (56). (56) De Animâ, T. cap. 31.

ENCOLPIUS the Author of an Hiſtory of the Emperor Alexander by whom he was very much beloved (a). I ſhall add two obſervations to what Moreri ſays of him. The firſt is, that this Hiſtory is not extant, and that the Engliſh Writer who boaſted that he had tranſlated it out of Greek, juſtly paſſes for an Impoſtor [A]. The ſecond will only be the clearing up of an action which Encolpius had related, and which Moreri does by no means acquaint us with. I do not pretend that he was obliged to relate it, but I hope the Readers will not be diſpleaſed to find it here [B].

(a) Quo (Encolpio Alexander) familiariſſimo uſus eſt Lamprid. in Alexandro Severo, cap. 27.

[A] The Engliſh Writer who boaſted that he had tranſlated Encolpius's Hiſtory out of Greek, juſtly paſſed for an Impoſtor.] He lived in Henry the VIIIth's reign, and his name was Thomas Elyot. He publiſhed a Book intitled, Image of Governance compiled of the Acts and Sentences notable of Alexander Severus. He boaſted that he had tranſlated this Work from a Greek Manuſcript of Encolpius, which a Gentleman of Naples named Puderic had lent him. But it has been proved (1), that he borrowed his materials from Lampridius and Herodianus, whoſe meaning he miſtook, or miſrepreſented ſeveral things which theſe Hiſtorians relate, and that he invented a great many facts which they do not mention. Selden (2) thought that he tranſlated a Greek Manuſcript compoſed by a modern Writer. But Mr. Wotton does not believe it, and obſerves that Bale dividing Thomas Elyot's Works into two claſſes, the one of his Compoſition, the other of his Tranſlations, places the Work which we ſpeak of among the former, which ſhews that at that time it was not doubted, but the pretended Encolpius's Work was a ſuppoſititious piece (3). I am apt to think, that what encouraged Thomas Elyot to forge this Work was the ſucceſs which Marcus Aurelius de Guevara had. I obſerve in another place (4), that this Spaniard endeavoured to perſuade the world, that he had taken from an ancient Manuſcript the Life of this Emperor, which he gave out as a model of government, and intitled it, A Clock for Princes.

(1) See Mr. Wotton's Roman Hiſtory, printed in Engliſh at London, in the year 1701.

(2) Selden in Euty. pag. 474, 475. See Tillemont, Hiſt. des Emper. tom. 3. pag. m. 372.

(3) Taken from the Acta Erudit. Leipſ. for Nov. 1702, pag. 489. in the Account of Mr. Wotton's Book.

(4) See the Remark [H] in the Article GUEVARA.

[B] I hope the Readers will not be diſpleaſed to find here an account of an action which Encolpius had related.] It is a very remarkable one. " Lampridius relates, " that Ovinius Camillus, a Senator, and of a very ancient family, intended to make himſelf Emperor. " Alexander was acquainted with it, and it was proved " to him unqueſtionably. Upon which he ſent to Camillus, deſiring him to come to the Palace, and " told him that he was very much beholden to him, " for being ſo willing to take upon him the weight of " State-affairs, whereas others would not do it unleſs " they were forced to it. He went afterwards to the " Senate with Camillus, who trembled for fear, being " troubled by a remorſe of conſcience; he made him " his Collegue in the Empire, gave him an apartment " in the Palace, made him eat with him, and gave " him imperial robes more ſtately than his own. There " was at that time a war with the Barbarians, which " required the Emperor's preſence. Alexander offered " to take Camillus with him, unleſs he choſe rather " to go thither alone (5)."

" Alexander who uſed to walk invited Camillus to " do the ſame; but as he was of a weak conſtitution, " he was tired after he had walked two leagues; Alexander obliged him to ride on horſeback; but as he " could not keep pace with him even on horſeback two days, Alexander made him ride in a " coach. At laſt, Camillus begged it as a favour that " he might abdicate, proteſting either ſincerely or out " of fear, that he choſe rather to die than to live as he " did; and Alexander gave him leave to retire upon " his eſtate in the country, and promiſed him that he " ſhould be ſafe: he even recommended him to the " ſoldiers. Camillus lived thus for a long time upon " his own eſtate. But afterwards the Emperor who " then reigned (for it is thought it was not Alexander (6),) cauſed him to be put to death, becauſe he " underſtood war, and was beloved by the ſoldiers. Lampridius adds, that the people aſcribed " this action to Trajan, though none of thoſe who " wrote his Hiſtory mention it; whereas ſeveral Authors relate it of Alexander in their accounts of his " life (7)."

It muſt be added for the ſake of Lampridius's reputation, that he has expreſly obſerved, that an Hiſtorian ought not to follow the opinions of the vulgar, when they do not agree with the account of Writers. Hiſtory, ſays he, is much more to be depended upon than the reports of the vulgar. Since therefore none of Trajan's Hiſtorians aſcribe this action to him, and it is aſcribed to the Emperor Alexander by thoſe who wrote his life, we ought to explode thoſe popular reports which aſcribe it to Trajan. Scio vulgum hanc rem, quam contexui, Trajani putare; ſed neque in vita ejus id Marius Maximus ita expoſuit, neque Fabius Marcellinus, neque Aurelius verus, neque Statius Valens, qui omnem ejus vitam in literas miſerunt. Contra autem & Septimius, & Acholius, & Encolpius vitæ ſcriptores, cæterique de hoc talia prædicaverant: quod ideo addidi, ne quis vulgi magis famam ſequeretur, quam hiſtoriam, quæ rumore utique vulgi verior reperitur. This is a very judicious obſervation of Lampridius. The fact before us is ſo remarkable, that the Writers of Trajan's life would never have omitted it, if it had belonged to him. It appears by innumerable inſtances, that extraordinary actions and notable ſentences are aſcribed by the vulgar ſometimes to one King, and ſometimes to another. Men have done the ſame with regard to Saints; their Votaries have aſſerted of ſome, what had already been aſſerted of others. It were to be wiſhed, that the Writers of Legends had on theſe occaſions followed Lampridius's example.

(5) Lampridius, in Alexandro Severo, cap. 48. I follow Mr. de Tillemont's Tranſlation, Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 3. pag. 344, 345. He thinks, that this happened in the year 228.

(6) This is not in Lampridius, who ſays only poſt juſſu Imperatoris occiſus eſt. i. e. " He was " afterwards " killed by the " Emperor's order." See the Commentators.

(7) Tillemont, Hiſt. des Empereurs, tom. 3. pag. 345.

☞ENNIUS (QUINTUS) an antient Latin Poet, born at Rudiæ, a town in Calabria [A], in [A] Born at Rudiæ, a town of Calabria.] Silius Italicus affirms this (1):

Miſerunt Calabri, Rudiæ genuere vetuſtæ:
Nunc Rudiæ ſolo memorabile nomen alumno.

Pomponius Mela likewiſe aſſerts the ſame (2): Ennio Cive nobiles Rudiæ. Cicero (3) ſtiles him Rudius; and Auſonius (4) Rudinus.

Unde Rudinus ait, Divûm domus altiſonum Cæl.

Ennius alſo himſelf, after he had the Freedom of the City of Rome conferred on him, wrote thus of himſelf,

Nos ſumu' Romanei, qui fuimus ante Rudinei.

Rudiæ is ſaid to have been about two miles diſtant from

(1) De Bello Punico ſecundo, lib. 12.
(2) De Situ Orbis, lib. 2. cap. 4. pag. 79. edit. Lugduni Batav. 1646 in 12mo.
(3) In Oration. pro Archia.
(4) In Monoſyll.

in the year 514 [B]. He came firſt to Rome when M. Porcius Cato was Quæſtor (a), whom he had inſtructed in the Greek Language in Sardinia (b), and by whom he was brought to Rome [C]. He had an houſe in the Aventine Mount (c); and by the beauty of his genius, the agreeableneſs of his converſation, and the integrity of his manners gained the friendſhip of the moſt eminent perſons in the city, particularly Galba, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, by whoſe ſon, who after his father's example was greatly addicted to learning, he was made free of the city, as Cicero obſerves in his Brutus, though the ſame writer in his oration in defence of Archias tells us, that the people of Rome made Ennius free of the city out of regard to his great merit. He attended Fulvius in his war againſt the Ætolians and Ambraciotæ (d), and celebrated his victories over thoſe nations (e). He fought likewiſe under Torquatus in Sardinia [D], and under the elder Scipio [E]; and in all theſe ſervices diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his uncommon valour. He was very intimate with Scipio Naſica [F]. He lived with great ſimplicity and frugality, and had but one maid-ſervant to attend him (f). He bore the infirmities of age and the preſſures of poverty with great patience; and died at the age of 70, between the ſecond and third Punic War (g), under the Conſulſhip of Marcus Philippus for the ſecond time, and of Cn. Servilius Cepio (h). His death was occaſioned by the gout, which he had contracted from the immoderate uſe of wine, which he always drank very freely of, when he applied himſelf to writing [G]. He was interred in the Appian Way within

(a) Euſeb. in Chronico, & Cornelius Nepos in Vitâ Catonis.

(b) Aur. Vict. de Viris Illuſtribus, cap. 47.

(c) Euſeb. ubi ſupra. See likewiſe M. Varro, de Linguâ Latina lib. 4.

(d) Cicero in Bruto & in Oratione pro Archia.

(e) Aur. Vict. de Viris Illuſtribus, cap. 52.

(f) Euſebius, ubi ſupra.

(g) Hieronymus Columna in Vitâ Q. Ennii.

(h) Cicero in Bruto.

from Lupii (5). However the Florentines claim our Poet for their fellow-citizen, as well upon the authority of Euſebius (6), as becauſe about twelve miles from Tarentum there appear the ruins of a town, which they affirm to have been the ancient Rudiæ, and which is now called Ruſcæ. But Euſebius, tho' he ſtiles Ennius a Tarentine, knew well enough, that he was born at Rudiæ, for in the ſame Chronicon obſerving, that ſome Writers had aſſerted, 'that Ennius's bones were removed from the Mount Janiculus to Rudiæ, he ſeems to intimate that our Poet was deſirous of being interred in his own Country. Nor does Euſebius without reaſon conſider him as a Tarentine, ſince the City of Tarentum by its commerce eclipſed all the neighbouring cities. The country, in which Rudiæ ſtood, whether we place it near Tarentum or Lupii, was at firſt called Peucetia from Peucetius, the brother of Oenotrus, and afterwards Japygia, Salentina, Meſſapia; whence Ennius is called by Suidas (7), Ὁ Ποιητὴς ὁ Μεσσάπιος. Servius upon this Verſe of Virgil (8),

At Meſſapus equûm Domitor, Neptunia Proles, tells us, that Ennius uſed to boaſt, that he was deſcended from Meſſapus, the ſon of Neptune, which is likewiſe confirmed by this line in Silius Italicus (9):

Ennius antiquâ Meſſapi ab origine Regis.

This Meſſapus, who, as the Poets feign, was invulnerable, removing from Eubœa into Italy, called the Country, where he ſettled, Meſſapia from his own name. It extended, as Nicander obſerves (10), from Tarentum to Brunduſium, and afterwards was called Calabria (11); whence Ovid tells us (12), that Ennius was born in the Calabrian Mountains; and Horace ſtiles Ennius's Muſe, Calabræ Pierides (13).

[B] In the year of Rome 514.] This is the account of Jerom Columna (14), and Calviſius (15), who both tell us, that he was born under the Conſulſhip of C. Mamillius Turrinus and Q. Valerius Falto. Sir Thomas-Pope Blount (16) agrees with theſe Writers. But Voſſius (17) places his birth in the year of Rome 516.

[C] By whom (Cato) he was brought to Rome.] Cornelius Nepos informs us (18), that Cato, when he was Prætor, obtained the Province of Sardinia, from whence, when he was Queſtor there before, he had brought Ennius to Rome, "which we eſteem, ſays "the Hiſtorian, no leſs than the nobleſt triumph over "Sardinia." Prætor Cato Provinciam obtinuit Sardiniam, ex quâ Quæſtor ſuperiore tempore ex Africâ decedens, Q. Ennium Poetam adduxerat, quod non minoris æſtimamus, quam quemlibet ampliſſimum Sardinienſem triumphum. The Author of the Book de Viris illuſtribus (19), likewiſe tells us, that Cato during his Pretorſhip ſubdued Sardinia, where he had been taught the Greek language by Ennius. In Prætură Sardiniam ſubegit, ubi ab Ennio Græcis Literis inſtitutus. It is ſurprizing therefore, that Cato ſhould reproach M. Nobilior for carrying Ennius with him into Ætolia, when he was Conſul (20), ſince Cato had firſt brought that Poet to Rome.

(5) Hier. Columna in Vita Ennii.

(6) In Chronico.

(7) In Voce Ἔννιος.

(8) Æneid. lib. 7.

(9) Lib. 12.

(10) Lib. 2. Τῶν Ἑτεροιουμένων, apud Columnam, ubi ſupra.

(11) Vide Licinium & Iſidorum, lib. 15. cap. 1. apud Columnam.

(12) De Arte Amandi, lib. 3.

(13) Ode 8. lib. 4.

(14) Ubi ſupra.

(15) Opus Chronologicum, pag. 337. edit. Francofurti 1685.

(16) Cenſur. Celebrior. Authorum, pag. 49. edit. Genev. 1694, in 4to.

(17) De Hiſtoricis Latinis, lib. 1. cap. 2. edit. Francof. 1677.

(18) In Vita M. Porcii Catonis, cap. 1.

(19) Cap. 47.

(20) Cicero, Tuſcul. lib. 1.

[D] He fought likewiſe under Torquatus in Sardinia.] Silius Italicus obſerves (21), that he exerted himſelf in the front of the battle, like Orpheus, who having thrown aſide his lyre, fought very bravely againſt Cizicus.

(21) Lib. 12.

Is prima in pugna, Vates ut Thracius olim
Infeſtam bello quateret cum Cizicus Argon,
Spicula depoſita Rhodopeia pectine torſit:
Spectandum ſeſe non parva ſtrage virorum
Fecerat, & dextræ gliſcebat cædibus ardor.

In this war he commanded an hundred men, as appears from theſe Verſes of the ſame Poet:

Miſcebat primas acies, Latiæque ſuperbum
Vitis adornabat dextra decus.

For the Vitis was the Enſign of authority of a Centurion.

[E] . . . And under the elder Scipio.] This we find mentioned by Claudian (22) in the following Verſes, where he ſpeaks of Scipio:

(22) De Laudib. Stiliconis.

"Non ſine Pieriis exercuit artibus arma;
"Semper erat Vatum maxima cura Duci.
"Gaudet enim Virtus teſtes ſibi jungere Muſas:
"Carmen amat quiſquis carmine digna gerit.
. . . . . .
"Hærebat doctus lateri caſtriſque ſolebat
"Omnibus in medias Ennius ire tubas."

[F] He was very intimate with Scipio Naſica.] This appears from a paſſage of Cicero (23), where he tells us, that Naſica going to viſit our Poet, and the maid-ſervant aſſuring him that Ennius was not at home, Naſica found that ſhe had told him ſo by her Maſter's Orders, and that Ennius was at home. A few days after Ennius coming to Naſica, and enquiring for him at the door, the latter called out to him, that he was not at home. Upon which Ennius anſwering, "What? Do not I know your voice?" Naſica replied, "You have a great deal of aſſurance; "for I believed your maid, when ſhe told me, that "you was not at home; and will not you believe me "myſelf?" Naſica cum ad Poetam Ennium veniſſet; eique ab oſtio quærenti Ennium, ancilla dixiſſet, Domi non eſſe; Naſica ſenſit illam domini juſſu dixiſſe, & illum intus eſſe. Paucis poſt diebus cum ad Naſicam veniſſet Ennius, & eum a Janua quærebat, exclamat Naſica, ſe domi non eſſe: tum Ennius, Homo es impudens: ego, cum te quærerem, ancillæ tuæ credidi, te domi non eſſe; tu mihi non credis ipſi?

(23) De Orator. lib. 2.

[G] He always drank freely of wine, when he applied himſelf to writing.] Horace affirms this (24),

(24) Lib. 1. Epiſt. 19. ver. 7.

Ennius ipſe pater nunquam niſi potus ad arma
Proſiluit dicenda.

That

within a mile of the city, in Scipio's ſepulchre, who had ſo great an eſteem and friendſhip for him, that he ordered him to be buried in his ſepulchre, and a ſtatue to be erected to him upon his monument (i) [H]. He wrote his own epitaph [I]; and left Pacuvius the Tragic Poet, his daughter's (k) or ſiſter's ſon (l), heir to his little fortune. He was a man of great virtue. T. Ælius Scillo (m) was of opinion that Ennius's verſes in the ſeventh book of his Annals, in which he deſcribes the character of a friend of Servilius Geminus [K], were deſigned to repreſent our Poet himſelf. He is ſaid to have been perfectly well ſkilled in the Oſcan [L], Latin, and Greek Languages [M]; upon which account he uſed to ſay, that he had three hearts, alluding perhaps to the fiction of Geryon

(i) Cicero pro Archia; Livius, lib. 38. and Plinius, lib. 7. cap. 31.

(k) Columna, ubi ſupra.

(l) Plinius, lib. 35. cap. 4.

(m) Apud Columnam, ubi ſupra.

That is,

" And Ennius never dared to write of wars
" Till heated well." Creech.

Calliſthenes reproached Æſchylus with writing his Tragedies, after he had drank a large quantity of ſtrong wine; and the ſame thing is related of Alcæus and Ariſtophanes. Cratinus, who followed this example, declared, that no perſon could be a good Poet, without indulging himſelf in wine. Niceratus in an Epigram writes, that wine ſerves the Poets inſtead of Pegaſus, and that nothing valuable can be done by a water-drinker. Serenus Sammonicus ſpeaking of Ennius's gout, obſerves that it was occaſioned by exceſſive drinking:

" Ennius ipſe pater, dum pocula ſiccat iniqua,
" Hoc vitio tales fertur meruiſſe dolores."

And Ennius himſelf uſed to ſay, that he never wrote Poetry, but in a fit of the gout. Nunquam poetor niſi podager (25).

(25) Columna, ubi ſupra.

[H] Scipio ordered him to be buried in his own ſepulchre, and a ſtatue to be erected to him upon his monument.] Valerius Maximus obſerves (26), that Scipio paid theſe honours to our Poet, becauſe he thought that his own actions received luſtre from Ennius's excellent Writings; and was perſuaded that the memory of his exploits would laſt as long as the Roman Empire ſhould flouriſh, and Africa be ſubject to Italy, and the capitol command the world, if they ſhould have the advantage to be recorded in Works of genius. Superior Africanus Ennii Poetæ effigiem in monumentis Corneliæ gentis collocari voluit, quod ingenio ejus opera ſua illuſtrata judicaret; non quidem ignarus, quamdiu Romanum imperium floreret, & Africa Italiæ pedibus eſſet ſubjecta, totiuſque terrarum orbis ſummum culmen arx Capitolina poſſideret, eorum extingui memoriam non poſſe; ſi tamen litterarum quoque lumen illis acceſſiſſet, magni æſtimans.

(26) Lib. 8. cap. 14.

[I] He wrote his own epitaph.] It is as follows:

" Aſpicite, O Ceiveis ſenis, Ennii imagini' formam:
" Heic voſtrûm panxit maxima facta patrum.
" Nemo me lacrumis decoret, nec funera fletu
" Faciſit: quur? volito vivo' per ora virûm."

Horace has given us the ſame thought in the following Verſes (27):

(27) Lib. 2. Od. 20.

Abſint inani funere Neniæ
Luctuſque turpes, & querimoniæ;
Compeſce clamorem, & ſepulchri
Mitte ſupervacuos honores.

" Mourn not, no friendly drops muſt fall,
" No ſighs attend my funeral;
" Thoſe common deaths may crave:
" Let no diſgraceful grief appear,
" Nor damp my glory with a tear;
" And ſpare the uſeleſs honours of a grave.
Creech.

[K] Ennius's Verſes in the VIIth Book of his Annals, in which he deſcribes the character of a friend of Servilius Geminus.] They are as follow (28):

(28) See Aulus Gellius, lib. 12. cap. 4.

Hocce loquutu' vocat, qui cum bene ſæpe libenter
Menſam, ſermoneſque ſuos, rerumque ſuarum
Comiter impartit; magna quom lapſa diei
Parte fuiſſe de parveis ſummeiſque gerendeis
Conſilio, endo foro lato ſanctoque ſenatu.
Quoi res audacter magnas, parvaſque, jocumque
Eloqueret, quæ tincta maleis, & quæ bona dictu
Evomeret, ſi quid vellet, tutoque locaret.
Qui cum multa volup, ac gaudia clamque palamque,
Ingenium quoi nulla malum ſententia ſuadet,
Ut faceret facinus; levis (29) tamen, haud malus; idem
Doctu', fidelis, ſuavis homo, facundu', ſuoq;
Contentus, ſcitu', atq; beatu', ſecunda loquens in Tempore, commodus, & verborum vir paucorum.
Multa tenens antiqua ſepulta, & ſæpe vetuſtas
Quæ facit, & mores vetereſque novoſque tenentem,
Multorum veterum leges, divûmque hominumque
Prudentem, qui multa loquive tacereve poſſet.

(29) Jerom Columna reads lenis, as the ſenſe and metre both require.

[L] The .... Oſcan language.] Jerom Columna obſerves (30), that the Oſci were a people of Campania, who were called ſo from King Oſcus; and that their chief cities were Puteoli, Baiæ, Cumæ, and Naples. Theſe people and the Opici received their name from the word ὄφις, becauſe that country extremely abounded in ſerpents, or, as the Author of the Book pretended to be written by Manetho aſſerts, becauſe the Enſign of their King was a ſerpent; from whence the Italians ſtill call a dangerous kind of ſerpents Oſcorzone. Their language, as Eudoxus teſtifies (31), was mixed with ſeveral other tongues, and when that nation was ſunk, it began to be made uſe of by the Romans in their pieces of humour, as appears from this paſſage of Titinius in his Comedy, intitled, Quinctus,

(30) In Vitâ Ennii.

(31) In lib. 4. περιόδου τῆς Γῆς, apud Columnam, ubi ſupra.

Qui Opſcè & Volſcè fabulantur, nam Latine neſciunt.

Hence ὀπικίζειν began generally to ſignify ſpeaking barbarouſly; and hence the Oſcum Ludicrum, in Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 14.

The peculiar property of that language was to cut off the end of ſome words, as capital, facul, difficul, famul, cæl, gau, for capitalis, facultas, difficultas, famulus, cælum, gaudium. And it was from this language that Pacuvius uſed ungulum for annulum, and Alfius (32) Mamertem for Martem; tho' Varro (33) ſays, that this is a Sabine word. There are ſome few other Oſcan words extant among Authors; as multa for a fine; veia or veha for a waggon, derived from vehere; Meſius for the month of May; Caſnar for an old man; ſollum for ſolidum or the whole; petora for four; Lucetius for Jove; pipit for quicquid.

(32) Lib. 1. Belli Carthagin. apud Columnam.

(33) De Ling. Latin. lib. 4.

[M] Well ſkilled in the .... Greek language.] Suetonius tells us (34), that our Author and Livius Andronicus were half-Greeks, and taught both the Greek and Latin languages at home and abroad; and explained only in Greek, and whatever they wrote in Latin, they read in the Greek Tongue. Antiquiſſimi Doctorum, qui iidem & poetæ & oratores ſemigræci erant (Livium & Ennium dico, quos utrâque linguâ domi foriſque docuiſſe adnotum eſt) nihil amplius quam Græcè interpretabantur; ac ſi quid Latinè ipſi compoſuiſſent, prælegebant. Ennius therefore, beſides his uſing Greek words, as Rumphea, Machæra, Termo, Lychni, Pauſa, Malaca, Sophia, &c. ſometimes gives Latin words a Greek termination; for inſtead of Metii Fufetii in the genitive caſe, he uſes after the Ionic manner, Metieo Fufetieo, and for Populo Romano in the dative caſe, populoi Romanoi, in imitation of the moſt antient of the Greeks, who uſed an ωτα after ω in the dative caſe, inſtead of the point now placed under that letter, as appears from their oldeſt manuſcripts and monuments, in which we find λαῶι for λαῷ, and other inſtances of the ſame kind. He likewiſe in the accuſative caſe makes do for domum long, after the Doric manner; and in the preterperfect tenſe for tuli uſes tetuli with a ſyllabic augment. He frequently Greciſes in the manner of his expreſſion, as in theſe inſtances, bona dictu, inclitu' ſaltu, ſuccincti corda, &c; and in uſing an infinitive mood for a noun, as in the VIIIth Annal, (34) De illuſtribus Grammaticis, cap. 1.

Geryon with three bodies, who is ſuppoſed by moſt Writers to have been a perſon remarkable for his ſkill in the three languages (n). He endeavoured to introduce the treaſures of the Greek Tongue among the Latins, and was the firſt among the Romans who made uſe of heroic verſes. He was a man of an admirable genius, and did prodigious things for the poliſhing of the Latin Poetry; but left a great deal to the improvement of the ſucceeding Ages [N]. He wrote the Annals of Rome, which were ſo highly eſteemed that they were publicly recited with vaſt applauſe at Rome by Q. Vargonteius, who digeſted them into books (o); and they were read at Puteoli in the Theatre by a man of learning, who aſſumed the name of Ennianiſt (p). Of all the ſeveral books of his Annals, that which was corrected by C. Octavius Lampadio, was moſt valued. Fl. Caprus is ſaid to have written an explication of the obſcure paſſages and obſolete expreſſions in theſe Annals (q). He tranſlated ſeveral Tragedies from the Greek, and wrote others [O]. He

(n) Columna, ubi ſupra.

(o) Sueton. de claris Grammaticis, cap. 2.

(p) Aul. Gellius, lib. 18. cap. 5.

(q) Columna, ubi ſupra.

Aſt occaſus ubi, tempuſve audere repreſſit.

He ſometimes imitates the Attic Dialect; as in the Iſt Annal.

Curantes magna cum cura;

and in another place (36, Adgrettus fari for aggreſſus, changing s into t after the Athenian manner. Nor was he ſollicitous of imitating the Greeks only in theſe minute points, but applied his whole care to enrich the poverty of the Latin tongue from the inexhauſtible riches of the Greek. He transferred a great many paſſages of Homer into his Annals, and by following of his ſteps was the firſt who introduced the majeſty of heroic verſe among the Latins; as Lucretius ſays of him (37);

(36) In Libr. incerto.

(37) Lib. 1. ver. 117, &c.

. . . . . Qui primus amæno
Detulit ex Helicone perenni fronde coronam.

And Silius Italicus confirms this (38):

(38) Lib. 12.

Hic canet illuſtri primus bella Itala verſu, Attolletque Duces Cælo.

But becauſe Homer has made uſe of all the ſeveral Dialects of the Greek tongue, Ennius, in order to ſhew his attachment to his great exemplar, has introduced ſeveral foreign words in his Poems; and the deſign of both the Poets ſeems to have been to add a dignity and grace to their Writings by exotic words, in the ſame manner as things brought from diſtant countries do, when properly placed. Ennius therefore uſes the Gallic word Ambactus, the Sabine Cata and Caſcus, the Tuſcan Falæ & ſubolo, the Præneſtine Tongo; for tho' Præneſte was near Rome, yet their language was very different from that of the latter. Whence Plautus tells us (39), that the Præneſtines uſed conia for ciconia:

(39) In Trucu-lento.

Ut Præneſtinis conia eſt ciconia.

In ſhort Virgil did not ſcruple to make uſe of ſeveral foreign words; as the Sabine Word Cupentus, the Perſian Gaza, the Macedonian Phalanx, the Gallic uri, geſa, and the Punic magalia. Ennius was the firſt, who aboliſhed the ancient cuſtom of the Romans, which was never to double any letter; for they undoubtedly uſed ſolum for ſollum, torum for torrum, that is torridum, polet for pollet, &c. But Ennius followed the Greeks, who in writing as well as reading doubled the mutes, liquids, and ſemivowels. Victorinus (40) confirms the opinion, that the antient Romans did not double their letters, but obſerves, that it was uſual with them to place a mark over the letter, which was to be doubled. However notwithſtanding the improvements made by Ennius in the Latin tongue, yet he uſed a great many words, which afterwards grew intirely obſolete, as ſperes for ſpes, mis for mei, ſam for ipſam, ſum for ipſum, ſos for ſuos, horitor for hortator, debilo for debilis, veter for vetus, crebiſurus for vallum, endo for in, ques for quis, lapi for lapide, anuis for anus, viâs for viæ, cette for date, &c. (41).

(40) De Orthographiâ.

(41) See Columna in Vitâ Ennii.

[N] He was a man of admirable genius, and did prodigious things for the poliſhing of the Latin Poetry, but left a great deal to the improvement of the ſucceeding ages.] Lucretius highly applauds him in the paſſage quoted in the preceding note, which we ſhall give here at length:

Ennius ut noſter cecinit, qui primus amæno
Detulit ex Hælicone perenni fronde Coronam;
Per Gentes Italas omnium quæ clara clueret.
Etſi præterea tamen Acheruſia templa
Ennius æternis exponit verſibus edens.

" As our fam'd Ennius ſings, upon whoſe brow
" The firſt and freſheſt crowns of laurel grow,
" That ever learned Italy could ſhew:
" Tho' he in laſting numbers doth expreſs
" The ſtately Acheruſian Palaces." Creech.

Cicero (42) ſtiles him an ingenious Poet, and a very good Author. Ovid tells us (43), that he had a very great genius, but was rude and void of art.

(42) Orat. pro Muræna, cap. 14.

(43) Triſt. lib. 2.

Ennius ingenio maximus, arte rudis.

Macrobius (44) aſſures us, that Virgil was ſo great an admirer of him, that he borrowed many things from him, of which that Critic gives ſome inſtances; tho' it is affirmed by the Author of the Life of Virgil, that this Poet being one day found reading of Ennius, and ſomebody aſking him what he was doing, he anſwered, " that he had been gathering gold out of a dunghill." ſe aurum in ſterquilinio colligere. The Emperor Hadrian was ſo fond of the old Latin Language, that he preferred Ennius to Virgil, Cato to Cicero, and Cælius to Salluſt (45). Amavit præterea genus dicendi vetuſtum .. Ciceroni Catonem, Virgilio Ennium, Salluſtio Cælium (46) prætulit. Jerom Columna, who refers to this paſſage in Spartian, has ſtrangely miſrepreſented it, by making that Hiſtorian ſay, that " Hadrian preferred Ennius to " Cicero, and Cæcilius to Cicero and Salluſt." Contra verò Adrianus Cæſar adeò vetuſtum hujuſmodi dicendi genus amavit, ut, quemadmodum à Spartiano proditum eſt, Ennium Virgilio, & Cæcilium Ciceroni & Salluſtio prætulerit. Lilius Gyraldus (47) obſerves, that Ennius had a lively genius, and a great readineſs in writing; that his ſentiments are ſtrong, but his ſtyle rude and artleſs, becauſe he did not recede from the ordinary language of converſation. Ingenio acri fuit, atque ad ſcribendum promptiſſimo, vehemens in ſententiis, in verbis rudis, ut qui non diſcederet a communi more Verborum. Hadrian Turnebus (48) remarks that our Poet's verſes have ſomething in them that will at once profit and delight the Reader, and even (what one would not expect) improve the ſtyle. Habent Enniani Verſus aliquid quod prodeſſe & delectare poſſit, & orationem etiam, quod minime quis exiſtimaret, excolere. Joſeph Scaliger tells us (49), that Ennius had a noble genius; and wiſhes that we had him entire, tho' we had loſt Lucan, Statius, Silius Italicus, and the Writers of that ſtamp. Ennius Poeta antiquus, magnifico ingenio. Utinam hunc haberemus integrum, & amiſſemus Lucanum, Statium, Silium Italicum, & tous ces garçons la. Monſieur de la Monnoye (50) is of opinion that we ought to read in this paſſage of Scaliger Gaſcons inſtead of Garçons, in order to mark the difference between the natural ſtyle of Ennius, and the turgid ſtyle of Lucan, Statius, and Silius, eſpecially of Lucan and Statius.

(44) Saturnal. lib. 6. cap. 1.

(45) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. 16.

(46) Some editions read Cæcilius.

(47) Dial. IV. de Poetis Antiquis.

(48) In Adverſar.

(49) Scaligerana prima, pag. 78.

(50) See his Note (19) on Baillet's Jugemens des Savans, tom. 3. pag. 157. edit. Amſterdam in 4to 1725.

[O] He tranſlated ſeveral Tragedies from the Greek, and wrote others.] The names of his Tragedies, of which we have Fragments now remaining, are as follow: Medea, Iphigenia, Achilles, Ajax, Telamon, Hectoris Luſtra, Alexander, Andromache, Hecuba, Eumenides, Duloreſtes, Erechtheus, Creſphon, Athamas, Andromeda, Telephus, Thyeſtes, Phœnix, Menalippe, Alcmæon, Creſſæ, Alecſtis, Nemeæ, Ilionæ or Polydorus, Antiopa.

He publiſhed likewiſe ſeveral Comedies [P]; but whether of his own invention or tranſlated by him, is uncertain. He gave a Latin Verſion of Evemerus's Sacred Hiſtory [Q], and Epicharmus's Philoſophy; and wrote Phagetica, Epigrams, Scipio a Poem, Aſotus or Sotadicus, Satyrs, Protreptica, and Præcepta, and very probably ſeveral Works. It appears from his writings, that he had very ſtrong ſentiments of Religion [R]. He is ſaid to have affirmed that Homer's ſoul was tranſmigrated into him [S]. Ludovicus Vives tells us (r), that he had a deſign to have collected all the fragments of our Poet into one body: but this was afterwards executed by the two Stephens; and the fragments of his Tragedies were publiſhed by Martin Delrio and Peter Scriverius. Jerom Columna, a Roman Nobleman, publiſhed his Fragments with a learned Commentary at Naples 1590 in 4to; as Paul Merula likewiſe did at Leyden 1595 in 4to. Columna's Edition was reprinted at Amſterdam 1707 in 4to, with ſeveral additions, by Francis Heſſelius, Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence in the illuſtrious School at Rotterdam.

(r) In Notis ad cap. 21. lib. 2. Auguſtini de Civitate Dei.

ENNODIUS

[P] He publiſhed likewiſe ſeveral Comedies.] The names of thoſe, of which fragments are ſtill extant, are Amphithraſo, Ambracia, and Pancratiaſtes.

[Q] He gave a Latin Verſion of Evemerus's Sacred Hiſtory.] The Country of Euhemerus or Evemerus is uncertain; for Plutarch in his book de Dogmatibus Philoſophorum repreſents him as a native of Tegea, but in his Diſcourſe de Iſide & Oſiride he ſtyles him a Meſſenian; and this is confirmed by Ælian (51), Strabo (52), and Lactantius (53). But Clemens Alexandrinus, and Arnobius (54) aſſert, that he was of Agrigentum. Athenæus (55) calls him a Coan. He was a man of notorious irreligion, for he denied the exiſtence of all the Gods. And Callimachus in his Iambics is thought to refer to him, when he ſays, (51) Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 31.

(52) Lib. 1.
(53) Lib. 1. cap. 11.
(54) Adverſus Gentes, lib. 4.
(55) Deipnoſ. lib. 14.

Εἰς τὸ πρὸ τείχους ἱερὸν ἀλέες θέντε,
Οὔ τ' πάλαι χάλκεον ὁ πλάσας Ζῆνα,
Γέρων ἀ'λαζὼν ἄθλια βίβλια ψύχει.

Upon this account he aſſumed the name of the Atheiſt (56). It appears from the teſtimony of ſeveral writers that he wrote Treatiſes, in which he maintained the cauſe of Atheiſm; and this ſubject he probably treated of in his ἱερὰ Ἀναγραφὴ, tranſlated by Ennius. He gave this book the title of the Sacred Hiſtory, not becauſe he thought the ſubject ſacred; ſince he aſſerted in it that the Gods were originally men, and merely fictitious; but in conformity to the vulgar opinion, or perhaps by way of Irony, or becauſe he collected his whole Hiſtory from inſcriptions in the moſt antient Temples. He flouriſhed in the time of King Caſſander, who had a great eſteem for him; and in his travels over the world he viewed the ſouthern coaſt of the ocean (57).

(56) Sext. Empir. Adverſ. Mathem. lib. 8. and Theodoret. Græc. Affect. lib. 3. apud Columnam in Not. ad Fragmenta Ennii ex Evemero.

(57) Columna, ibid.

[R] It appears from his writings that he had very ſtrong ſentiments of Religion.] In his Tragedy of Telamon indeed we have the following verſes, which have a great air of impiety in them:

Ego Deum genus eſſe ſemper dixi, & dicam cœlitum,
Sed eos non curare opinior, quid agat genus humanum, Nam ſi curent, benè boneis ſit, male maleis, quod nunc abeſt (58).

(58) See Cicero, de Divinat. lib. 1. & de Natur. Deor. lib. 3.

But if we had the Tragedy, from whence theſe verſes are taken, intire, it would undoubtedly appear, that this was ſpoken, not by the Poet, but by Telamon amidſt all the diſorders of his rage. Columna (59) quotes a great many paſſages out of his writings, to ſhew his regard for Religion; and obſerves, that tho' by his tranſlating Evemerus's Sacred Hiſtory, he expoſed himſelf to the imputation of irreligion, yet it is highly probable that Evemerus, as well as our Poet, by exploding the Pagan Deities declared their belief of one ſupreme, unoriginated, and eternal Being, whom Ennius ſtyles

(59) In Vitâ Ennii.

——Pater, Divûmque Hominumque, ——Divûmque hominumque Pater Rex (60)
——Divum pater, atque hominum Rex (61).

(60) In Lib. incert.
(61) Annal. lib. 6.

He paid no great credit to the pretended arts of Divination, as appears from the following verſes of his (62).

(62) See Cicero, de Divin. lib. 1.

Non habeo denique nauci Marſum augurem,
Non vicanos haruſpices, non de circo aſtrologos,
Non Iſiacos conjectores, non interpretes ſomniûm;
Non enim ſunt ii aut ſcientiâ aut arte divinei;
Sed ſuperſtitioſi Vates, impudentesque hariolei,
Aut inertes, aut inſanei, aut quibus egeſtas imperat.
Qui ſibei ſemitam non ſapiunt, alteri monſtrant viam;
Quibus divitias pollicentur, ab iis drachmam ipſei petunt;
De his divitiis ſibi deducant drachmam, reddant cætera;
Qui ſui quæſtûs cauſſa fictas ſuſcitant ſententias.

[S] He is ſaid to have affirmed, that Homer's ſoul was tranſmigrated into him.] In the firſt Book of his Annals we have theſe words:

....Viſus Homerus adeſſe Poeta.

Tum memini fieri me pavum....

Cicero (63) mentions the former of theſe verſes; and Lucretius has expreſſed this dream of Ennius in the following lines:

(63) Acad. Quæſt. lib. 4.

Et ſi præterea tamen eſſe Acheruſia Templa
Ennius æternis exponit verſibus edens;
Quo neque permanent Animæ, neque Corpora noſtra;
Sed quædam ſimulchra modis pallentia miris:
Unde ſibi exortam ſemper florentis Homeri
Commemorat ſpeciem, lacrumas effundere ſalſas
Cœpiſſe, & rerum naturam expandere dictis.

Some are of opinion that Lucretius tranſcribed that verſe Quo neque and the following out of our Poet; but Columna (64) is of opinion, that the whole paſſage was Ennius's, who perhaps wrote thus:

(64) In Notis ad Ennii locum.

..... " Acheruſia templa,
" Quo neq; permanent Animæ, neq; Corpora noſtra,
" Sed quædam ſimulacra modis pallentia miris;
" Inde mihi ſpecies ſemper florentis Homeri
" Exoriens viſa eſt lacrumas effundere ſalſas
" Cœpiſſe, & rerum naturam expandere dictis."

Propertius (65) alludes to this dream of Ennius; as Perſius alſo is thought to do in his Prologue:

(65) Lib. 3. Eleg. 2.

Nec fonte labra prolui Caballino,
Nec in bicipiti ſomniaſſe Parnaſſo
Memini, ut repente ſic Poeta prodirem.

Porphyrio in his explication of theſe verſes of Horace (66):

(66) Ep. 1. lib. 2.

" Ennius & ſapiens & fortis, & alter Homerus,
" Ut Critici dicunt, leviter curare videtur,
" Quo promiſſa cadant, & ſomnia Pythagorea."

tells us, that Ennius in the firſt Book of Annals had affirmed, that Homer had aſſured him in a dream, that, according to the Pythagorean Doctrine, his ſoul was tranſmigrated into Ennius's body. From the words of Ennius above quoted,

Tum memini fieri me pavum, it appears that he introduced Homer declaring, that his ſoul had tranſmigrated into a peacock; and Perſius refers to this, when he ſays (67),

(67) Satyr 6.

Cor jubet hoc Enni, poſtquam deſertuit eſſe Mæonides Quintus (68) pavone ex Pythagoræo.

(68) Some read it, Mæonides, quintus &c.

(*) He is called Ænnodius by Bern. Sacco, Hiſt. Ticin. lib. 8. cap. 1. pag. 77.

☞ENNODIUS (*) (MAGNUS FÆLIX), Biſhop of Pavia in Italy in the ſixth Century, and an eminent Writer, was deſcended from an illuſtrious family in Gaul [A], and born in Italy [B] about the year 473 (a). At ſixteen years having loſt an aunt, who had brought him up, he was reduced to very neceſſitous circumſtances; but by his marriage with a young Lady of great fortune and quality, he retrieved his affairs (b). He enjoyed for ſome time all the pleaſures and advantages, which his wealth could procure him; but afterwards reſolved upon a more ſtrict courſe of life. He entered into holy Orders with the conſent of his Lady, who likewiſe betook herſelf to a religious life (c). He was ordained Deacon by Epiphanius Biſhop of Pavia, with whom he lived in the moſt inviolable friendſhip. His application to Divinity did not divert him from proſecuting at his leiſure hours the ſtudies of Poetry and Oratory, in which he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf from his youth, and his writings gained him a very great reputation [C]. Upon the death of Epiphanius he appears to have been elected one of the Deacons of the Roman Church; and in 503 having preſented to the Synod of Rome an Apology for the Council there, which had abſolved Pope Symmachus the year before, it was ordered to be inſerted among the Acts of the Synod (d). He was advanced to the Biſhopric of Pavia about the year 510 [D], and was appointed to negotiate an union between the Eaſtern and Weſtern Churches, for which purpoſe he took two journies into the Eaſt, the former in 515 with Fortunatus Biſhop of Catana; the latter in 517 with Peregrinus Biſhop of Miſenum. Though he did not ſucceed in theſe negotiations, he ſhewed his prudence and reſolution in the management of them. For the Emperor Anaſtaſius having uſed his utmoſt efforts to deceive or corrupt him in vain, after other inſtances of ill treatment ordered him to be put on board an old ſhip, and forbidding him to land in any part of Greece, expoſed him to manifeſt danger. However he arrived ſafe in Italy, and returning to Padua died there not long after, on the firſt of Auguſt 521 [E], aged forty eight years (e). Du Pin tells us (f), that his ſtyle is obſcure, and his manner of reaſoning far from exact; but that there is a conſiderable warmth and livelineſs of imagination in his writings. Arnolphus Lexovienſis (g) is of opinion, that he ought to be called Innodius inſtead of Ennodius, on account of his intricate and obſcure manner of writing.

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Literaria, pag. 322. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720. and Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. tom. 5. pag. 11. edit. de Mons 1691, in 4to.

(b) Cave, ubi ſupra, and Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(c) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(d) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid. and Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(f) Pag. 14.

(g) Epiſt. pag. 54. apud J. Gott. Olearium in Bibliothec. Scriptor. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 222. edit. Jenæ 1711, in 4to.

[A] Deſcended from an illuſtrious family in Gaul.] He tells us in ſeveral paſſages of his writings, that his relations were Gauls. He was related to ſeveral perſons of the higheſt quality of that age, as Fauſtus, Boetius, Avienus, Olybrius, Senarius, Florianus, &c.

(1) Hiſt. Literar. pag. 322. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(2) Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 5. pag. 11. edit. de Mons 1691 in 4to.

[B] Born in Italy.] Dr. Cave (1) and Monſr. du Pin (2) aſſert this; and it is certain, that Ennodius ſpent the earlieſt years of his life in Italy.

[C] His writings gained him a very great reputation.] They are as follow: I. Epiſtolarum ad diverſos Libri IX. They contain 297 Letters. II. Panegyricus Theodorico Regi Oſtrogothorum dictus. III. Libellus Apologeticus pro Synodo Palmari, publiſh'd in Tom. IV. Concil. p. 1340. IV. Vita B. Epiphanii Epiſcopi Ticinenſis. V. Vita B. Antonii Monachi Lirinenſis. VI. Euchariſticon de Vita ſua ad Elpidium. VII. Paræneſis Didaſcalica ad Ambroſium & Beatum. VIII. Præceptum de Cellulanis Epiſcoporum. IX. Petitorium, quo abſolutus eſt Gerontius. X. Benedictio Cerei Paſchalis I. XI. Benedictio Cerei Paſchalis II. XII. Dictiones ſacræ VI. XIII. Dictiones Scholaſticæ VII. XIV. Controverſiæ X. XV. Dictiones Ethicæ V. XVI. Poemata, ſeu Carminum Liber I. XVII. Epigrammata, ſeu Carminum Liber II. All our Author's works were publiſhed by Andrew Schottus at Tournay 1610 in 8vo; and by James Sirmond at Paris 1611 in 8vo with Notes explaining the names and titles of the perſons mentioned by Ennodius, and containing a great many obſervations very uſeful for illuſtrating the Hiſtory of that Age. Ennodius's works are likewiſe publiſhed in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Tom. IX. p. 312; and the greateſt part of them are printed in the Orthodoxographa at Baſil in 1569.

[D] Advanced to the Biſhopric of Pavia about the year 510.] This is affirmed by Du Pin (3); but Dr. Cave tells us (4), that it was about the year 511, or not long after. Father Labbe (5) is groſly miſtaken in aſſerting, that he was choſen Biſhop of Pavia in 490; for this is impoſſible, ſince he was then but ſeventeen years of age. And it is evident, that he was not a Biſhop in 503, when his Libellus Apologeticus was approved in the Synod of Rome, becauſe he had not the title of Biſhop given him then.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Pag. 323.

(5) Tom. 1.

[E] Died . . . . on the firſt of Auguſt 521.] This is the account of Du Pin; but Dr. Cave tells us, that he died die xvi Cal. Auguſti, i. e. "On the 17th of July. T.

EPHORUS an Orator and Hiſtorian, was of Cumæ in Æolia (a). Iſocrates, whoſe diſciple he was (b), adviſed him to write an Hiſtory. I have obſerved elſewhere (c), that he gave the ſame advice to Theopompus another of his ſcholars, and I have ſhewed in what the genius of thoſe two differed. Ephorus, who would not meddle with the darkneſs and trifles of the fabulous times, began at the return of the Heraclides into Peloponneſus (d), and carried his Hiſtory from that famous Æra, to the 20th year of the Reign of Philip King of Macedon, Alexander the Great's father, which was a term of about 750 years. He divided his Hiſtory into thirty books, to each of which he added a Preface (e). Men differ very much in their opinion of this Author; ſome commend him, others blame him, and charge him with errors both active and paſſive [A]. He compoſed

(a) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 428.

(b) Plut. in Vita Iſocrat. pag. 837.

(c) In the Article THEOPOMPUS, Remark [B].

(d) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 1. cap. 1.

(e) Idem, lib. 16. cap. 77. pag. m. 795.

[A] Some commend him, others blame him and charge him with errors both active and paſſive.] Diodorus Siculus reckons him one of the three Hiſtorians who are moſt eſteemed (1). The two others are Calliſthenes and Theopompus. Diodorus having found fault with ſeveral Hiſtorians, who neglected to treat their ſubject with good order and method, adds that Ephorus was not guilty of that defect, and that his work was not leſs commendable for the elegance of his ſtile than for the diſpoſition of his materials. Ἔφορος τὰς κοινὰς πράξεις ἀναγράφων ὠ μόνον κατὰ τὴν λέξιν, ἀλλὰ κ κατὰ τὴν οἰκονομίαν ἐπιτέτυχε (2). We ſhall ſee below (3), that he has been placed above Theopompus, which is ſaying a great deal. The praiſes which Strabo beſtows upon him are very conſiderable; he conſiders him as a man that deſerves a reputation (4). He quotes him often, and ſays it is becauſe of his great exactneſs in making inquiries, which Polybius a proper judge in theſe matters

(1) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 4. cap. 1.

(2) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 5. init.

(3) In the Remark [C].

(4) Ἀνὴρ ἄξιος μνήμης. Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 428.

composed other Books [B], and there was one wrote against him in which his plagiarisms ters acknowledges, and for which he commends him. Ἔφορος δ' ᾧ τὸ πλεῖστον χρώμεθα διὰ τὴν περὶ ταῦτα ἐπιμέλειαν καθάπερ καὶ Πολύβιος μαρτυρῶν τυγχάνει αἰνὲ ἀξιόλογος (5). Having observed a defect in this Author, he adds, that notwithstanding this, he excelled the other Historians. Τοιοῦτος δ' ὢν Ἔφορος ἑτέρων ὅμως κρείττων ἐστί· καὶ αὐτὸς ὁ ἐσπουδασμένως ἔτως ἐπαινέσας αὐτὸν Πολύβιος καὶ φήσας περὶ τῶν Ἑλληνικῶν καλῶς μὲν Εὔδοξον, κάλλιστα δ' Ἔφορον ἐξηγεῖσθαι περὶ κτίσεων, συγγενειῶν, μεταναστάσεων, ἀρχηγετῶν (6). i. e. "Notwithstanding this, "Ephorus is yet the best of Historians. And even "Polybius commends him in a very particular manner, saying, that Eudoxus wrote well of the affairs of the Greeks, but Ephorus very well, concerning the origin of cities, their alliances, their "colonies, and their leaders." This defect was a very plain contradiction (7), and so much the less excusable, that the Author had taken a great deal of pains to clear up the subject, and to refute them who spoke of it with very little accuracy. He had even boasted of his diligence. Ὁ δ' ὥσπερ κατωρθωκὼς ἐπιλέγει· ὅτι ταῦτα καὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα διακριβοῦν εἰώθαμεν, ὅταν ᾖ τι τῶν πραγμάτων ἢ παντελῶς ἀπερούμενον, ἢ ψευδῆ δόξαν ἔχον (8). i. e. "And yet, as tho' he had admirably well succeeded, he concludes in this manner. These and "such things I use to examine very accurately, wherever there is any uncertainty in the subject before "me, or when men have a false notion of it." This was not the only contradiction which dropped from his pen; he has been sometimes guilty of that fault: Δοκεῖ μοι ταὐναντία ποιεῖν, ἔσθ' ὅτε τῇ προαιρέσει καὶ ταῖς ἐξαρχῆς ὑποσχέσεσι (9). i. e. "He seems to me to perform the "condition of what he designed and promised in the "beginning." These are Strabo's words, who immediately gives an instance of what he asserts, for he says, that Ephorus having condemned those Authors who intermix Fables with History, expatiates upon the praises of truth, and promises to follow it particularly in the account of what relates to the oracle of Delphos; there being nothing more absurd than to lie when one treats of an Oracle so remote from all deceit. Προσίδηται τῷ περὶ τὸ μαντεῖον τοῦτο λόγῳ, σεμνήν τινα ὑπόσχεσιν, ὡς παντα χῇ μὲν ἄριστον νομίζει τ' ἀληθὲς, μάλιστα δ' κατὰ τὴν ὑπόθεσιν ταύτην· ἄτοπον ἦ, εἰ περὶ μὲν τῶν ἄλλων ἀεὶ τὸν τοιοῦτον τρόπον διώκομεν, φησί· περὶ δὲ τὸ μαντεῖον λέγοντες, ὃ πάντων ἐστὶν ἀψευδέστατον, τοῖς οὕτως ἀπίστοις καὶ ψευδέσι χρησόμεθα λόγοις (10). This is very reasonable; such a discourse is very honourable to Ephorus's person and judgment; but what he says afterwards does not answer it; for the account he gives of the Oracle of Delphos, is not much better than the opinion of the vulgar.

The account he gave of Egypt was so full of blunders, that it shewed not only that he never travelled thither, but also that he did not take care to be exactly informed by those who knew that country (11). This is Diodorus Siculus's opinion of him. A little after, having found him guilty of a falsity, he makes the following reflection. Οὐκ ἄν τις παρ' Ἐφόρῳ ζητήσειεν ἐκ παντὸς τρόπου τἀκριβὲς, ὁρῶν αὐτὸν ἐν πολλοῖς ὀλιγωρηκότα τῆς ἀληθείας (12). i. e. "He who observes how little "Ephorus minded truth, will not look for any thing "accurate in his Writings." Seneca gives us still a worse opinion of him, when he despises his testimony with regard to a comet. Let us transcribe all that he says of him, for it will shew how little credit the Historians deserve in the general, when they mention prodigies. Nec magna molitione detrahenda est auctoritas Ephoro: historicus est. Quidam incredibilium relatu commendationem parant, & lectorem aliud acturum, si per quotidiana duceretur, miraculo excitant. Quidam creduli, quidam negligentes sunt: quibusdam mendacium obrepit, quibusdam placet. Illi non evitant, hi appetunt. Et hoc in commune de tota natione: quæ approbare opus suum, & fieri popular non putat posse, nisi illud mendacio asperfit. Ephorus verò non religiosissimæ fidei, sæpe decipitur, sæpe decipit (13). i. e. "It is not a difficult task to sink the authority "of Ephorus, for he is an Historian. Some Historians "endeavour to raise the reputation of their Works by "relating incredible things, and by mentioning prodigies, to make the Reader attentive, who would "not mind what he reads, if he met with nothing but "what happens daily. Some Historians are credulous, "others neglectful: some admit falsities unawares, o-"thers delight in them: the former do not avoid them, "the latter hunt after them. This may be asserted of "the whole tribe in general: they think their work "will not please, nor be suited to the taste of the "multitude, if it be not interspersed with fabulous "stories. As for Ephorus, who is not very scrupu-"lous, he is often imposed upon, and does also often "wilfully impose upon his Readers." You will meet in Vossius (14) with some of Ephorus's impostures; you will also see there how much Duris of Samos, Dion Chrysostom, and Suidas (15) despised his style. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (16), and Diodorus Siculus (17) had quite another opinion of him, and they were very good judges. However it be, I imagine that all the lovers of History regret the loss of Ephorus's Work, for my part I am very sorry for it. Observe, that Vossius has not given a true character of all the errors he charges him with: for he blames him only for imposing upon his Readers when he mentions a Temple of Hercules, without being first deceived himself (18). Decipitur quidem cum . . . tradidit . . . . decipit autem in eo quod de Herculis fano in Hispania fixit, ut est apud Strabonem initio libri III, & fuere id genus apud Ephorum permulta. Unde & Diodorus Siculus Lib. I. ἔκ ἄν τις, &c. (19). i. e. "He was mistaken indeed when . . . . he related . . . . "but he imposes upon us in his fictitious account of "the temple of Hercules in Spain, as Strabo observes "in the beginning of his third Book. And there "were a great many such falsities in Ephorus's Work; "Whence Diodorus Siculus says in his first Book, He "who observes, &c." In the first place it is very probable that Ephorus spoke sincerely on this occasion; for what advantage was it to him to write this against his conscience? He was so little acquainted with the condition of Spain, that he took it only for one city: Whence Josephus infers, that the Greeks knew but late what concerns the Western Nations. Vossius does not condemn this inference; Why then does he assert that Ephorus knew the truth of the matter with regard to that Temple? II. Strabo is not quoted to the purpose; for he does not determine particularly, whether Ephorus wrote according to his knowledge or against it. III. The passage from Diodorus Siculus does not prove that there were in Ephorus's Works several falsities written against the Author's own knowledge. On the contrary he is charged with neglecting to make the necessary enquiries. If we should examine all the writers accurately, we should find almost every where and unde (whence) as little to the purpose as that of Vossius.

[B] He composed other Books.] A Treatise Περὶ τῶν εὑρημάτων, Of things found out. Strabo has mentioned it (20). One Περὶ ἀγαθῶν καὶ κακῶν, Of good and evil, divided into twenty four Books (21). One Περὶ παραδόξων τῶν ἀκουσάντων, Of wonderful things, which happen every where, divided into fifteen Books (22). One Περὶ Θρακίων πολισμάτων, Of the Commonwealths of Thrace. Harpocration has quoted the fourth Book of it (23). One intitled, Ἐπιχωρίου, in which he treated of his native Country (24). Father Hardouin ascribes to him a particular Treatise concerning the first rise of Cities (25), and another concerning the swelling of the Nile. But the Authors he quotes (26) do not assert this: for Polybius meant only, that Ephorus in his history accounted very well for the rise of Cities, their Colonies, &c; and as for the Scholiast on Apollonius he only quoted what Ephorus had said of the Nile in the same History. It is not by particular Treatises of Geography, that he deserves a place amongst Geographers (27), but because he took great care to describe the places which he mentioned in his History (28). We may be certain that he published some Orations, or a Treatise of Rhetoric, since Cicero spoke in the following manner. Omitto Isocratem, discipulosque ejus Ephorum & Naucratem, quamquam orationis faciendæ & ornandæ autores locupletissimi, summi ipsi oratores esse debeant (29). i. e. "I do not mention Isocrates nor "his disciples Ephorus and Naucrates, tho' they must "have been very eminent Orators, since they have "so well thought how to compose and to adorn a "discourse." How can we avoid believing that he wrote upon Rhetorick, since we know, that his Treatise

(5) Strabo, lib. 9. pag. 290.

(6) Idem, lib. 10. pag. 320.

(7) See Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 319.

(8) Idem, ibid. pag. 320.

(9) Idem, lib. 9. pag. 290.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Scriptor hic non solum ipse locorum Ægypti naturam non vidisse, sed nec ab iis, quibus regionis illius ratio cognita est, diligenter percunctatus nobis videtur. Diodor. Sicul. lib. 1. cap. 39. pag. m. 35.

(12) Idem, ibid.

(13) Seneca, Quæst. natural. lib. 7. cap. 16. pag. m. 908.

(14) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 36, 37.

(15) Ἔφορος ἦν τὸ ἦθος ἁπλοῦς, τὴν δὲ ἑρμηνείαν τῆς ἱστορίας ὕπτιος καὶ ναυδρὸς καὶ μανδεμίαν ἔχων ἐπίτασιν. Suidas, apud Vossium, ibid, i. e. "Ephorus had a "plain genius; and with regard to the writing of History, he was careless, lazy, and absolutely wanted sprightliness."

(16) Dionys. Halicarn. de Collocat. Verborum, cap. 81. pag. m. 58.

(17) Diodor. Siculus, lib. 5. init. I have quoted his words above, quotation (2).

(18) Vossius, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 36.

(19) See what follows in quotation (12).

(20) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 428.

(21) Suidas in Ἔφορος.

(22) Idem, ibid.

(23) Harpocrat. Voce Αἶνος.

(24) Plutarc. de Vita Homeri, init. apud Vossium, de Hist. Græcis, pag. 36.

(25) Jonsius, pag. 67. seems also to ascribe it to him.

(26) Harduin. in Indice Authorum Plinii. He quotes Polybius apud Strabonem, lib. 10. pag. 465. for the Treatise de Origine Urbium, and the Scholiast. in Apollonii lib. 4. ver. 268. for the Treatise De Nili incremento.

(27) Strabo, lib. 1. init. places him amongst them.

(28) Ibid. lib. 8. init.

(29) Cicero, in Oratore, cap. 51.

(f) In the Article THEOPOMPUS, Remark [G].

riſms were painted out [C]. All this is loſt. I have mentioned in another place (f) the tiſe Περὶ λέξεως, (Of Elocution, or ſtyle), has been quoted by Theo. Eidem (Theoni) laudatur Ἔφορος ἐν τῷ περὶ λέξεως. Cujus operis penè initio hexametrum effundere ait (30). Thus Voſſius ſpeaks: he is guilty here of a fault of commiſſion, and one of omiſſion: For he aſſerts that there was an hexameter verſe near the beginning of that Treatiſe, but we do not find this in Theon: and Voſſius does not obſerve, that this verſe was in the very ſame paſſage, where Ephorus condemned the cadence and number of Poetry in a diſcourſe in proſe, which circumſtance is related by Theon, and is ſo particular, that it ought not to have been omitted. The paſſage of this Sophiſt quoted at length will make us obſerve another blunder of Voſſius. Συγγνώμης δ' ἄξιον ὅταν εἰς ἐκεῖνά τις ἐμπέσῃ ποτὲ τὰ μέτρα ἅπερ ἔχει ὁμοιότητα πρὸς τὸ πεζόν· οἷόν ἐστι τὸ ἰαμβικόν· διὸ καὶ πάντες οἱ συγγραφεῖς, ἄκοντες ἐμπίπτουσιν εἰς τὸ γένος τοῦτο. ὁ γοῦν Ἔφορος ἐν τῷ περὶ λέξεως, δι' αὐτῆ τῇ ἀπαγορεύσει λόγῳ, μὴ τῇ εὐρύθμῳ χρῆσθαι διαλέκτῳ, εὐθὺς ἐν ἀρχῇ σίχον εἴρηκεν, εἰπών· πάλιν δὲ περὶ τῆς εὐρύθμου διέξειμι (31). Venia tamen dari ſolet iis, qui forte in verſus, qui quam proxime ad ſolutam accedunt orationem, incidunt (32): quales iambici, quod omnibus fere ſcriptoribus invitis evenire ſolet. Ephorus certe in libro de Sermone, eo ipſo loco, ubi nimis numeroſum uſurpare elocutionem vetat, ſtatim initio verſum ipſe extulit, hoc modo.

Poſthac modos orationis inquiram.

Theon had juſt before condemned abſolutely ſuch proſe as contains long and lofty verſes; he afterwards excuſes thoſe verſes which are like proſe, as are the iambick verſes; and he ſays that moſt Writers commit that fault unawares; and he names Ephorus for an inſtance of it, but he does not ſay, as Voſſius pretends, that this verſe of his Ephorus was towards the beginning of his Treatiſe *. Obſerve, that what Ephorus ſaid of Homer (33) was not in a particular Treatiſe upon that Poet, but in the work he compoſed concerning his own Country (34). His Treatiſe περὶ εὑρημάτων was anſwered by Strato the Philoſopher, as we are told by Pliny. Stratone qui contra Ephori εὑρήματα ſcripſit (35). Thus Father Hardouïn has corrected that paſſage, whereas we read contra Ephori Theoremata. Jonſius hints this correction (36). Obſerve that there is one Euphorus † mentioned as the Anthor of a Book περὶ εὑρημάτων, of things found out. Voſſius pretends (37) that Athenæus has cited him (38), and that we muſt not alter Εὔφορος into Ἔφορος, for, ſays he, the Author quoted by Athenæus in that paſſage, is not the ſame with the Hiſtorian. This might be, but I do not believe that it could be proved in the leaſt. Father Hardouïn (39) thought that we muſt read Ἔφορος as in the XIIth Chapter of Athenæus's VIIIth Book, and he underſtands both the paſſages of Ephorus the Hiſtorian. The two paſſages, quoted by Voſſius from Clemens Alexandrinus (40) may very well be applied to the ſame Hiſtorian: ſo that we have reaſon to think, that the Tranſcribers wrote Εὔφορος inſtead of Ἔφορος in theſe paſſages. This they did in the great Etymologicon (41), where Εὔφορος ἐν τῇ Εὐρώπῃ is quoted inſtead of Ἔφορος, for Strabo acquaints us (42), that the fourth Book of Ephorus's Hiſtory was intitled Εὐρώπη (Europe). Voſſius made this obſervation: Why then ſhould we not believe, that the ſame error crept into Diogenes Laertius, as Aldobrandini and Jonſius imagined (43)? Monſieur Menage (44) choſe rather to follow Voſſius's opinion, but he did it merely out of courteſy, for Voſſius has not proved his opinion. The great Scaliger (45) aſſerts, that Εὔφορος has been put twice inſtead of Ἔφορος in Clemens Alexandrinus; and that through a blunder of the ſame kind we read Εὔφορος inſtead of Ἔφορος in Diogenes Laertius's Life of Thales. He is alſo of opinion, that the Euphorbus in Euſebius's Chronicle (46) is no other but our Ephorus, whoſe name was firſt changed into Euphorus, and afterwards into Euphorbus. It is certain that Euſtathius (47) truſting to Stephanus Byzantinus's authority, has quoted one Euphorus, who in this Stephanus's work is called Ephorus (48). I could eaſily admit Scaliger's opinion: for we ought never to multiply Authors any more than any thing elſe without neceſſity.

Here are a great many trifles, will it perhaps be ſaid. Yes, ſhall I anſwer, but they are to be met with in the writings of the moſt learned men of this Age, and it is a fate unavoidable in Criticks: and with their leave, who find fault with this, I muſt make another obſervation of the ſame nature. When the name of the ſame Writer is ſo differently ſpelt in any work, that one is apt to think that ſeveral authors are meant, the fault muſt not always be laid upon the tranſcribers; for it may very well have been in the original. We ought not to doubt, but Athenæus might have written ſometimes Euphorus, and at other times Ephorus, tho' he ſpoke of the ſame Author. It muſt be confeſſed, that there may be ſome Writers at preſent, who having occaſion to mention Father Bouhours often in a long work, would call him ſometimes Bours, ſometimes Bouours, and at ſome times Bohours. I have ſome Letters written by able men, in which ſuch or ſuch a proper name was ſpelt now after this manner, and then after another, ſometimes Bordeaux or Tholoſe, for inſtance, and ſometimes Bourdeaux or Toulouſe. See the Remark [B] in the Article DEMETRIUS, and the Article DURER towards the end.

[C] There was a Book wrote . . . in which his Plagiariſms were pointed out.] Euſebius has preſerved a beautiful paſſage from Porphyry's firſt Book περὶ τῆς φιλολογίας ἀκροάσεως, of learned hearing. We meet there with a controverſy between two learned men, one of whom valued Ephorus more than Theopompus (49). The other ſtiled Ephorus a Plagiary, and accuſed him of tranſcribing three thouſand lines following word for word from Daimachus, Calliſthenes, and Anaximenes. Ἀυταῖς λέξεσιν ἔστιν ὅτε τρισχιλίους ὅλους μετατιθέντος στίχους (50). I do not find, that his adverſary denied the fact; he only returned the accuſation upon others, and ſaid, that Theopompus had been a great plagiary. The reader will find in another place (51), in what reſpect he was ſo. Porphyry aſſerts ſome pages lower, that there were two Books written by one Lyſimachus περὶ τῆς Ἐφόρου κλοπῆς, Of Ephorus's Plagiariſm, and that Alceus a ſatyrical Poet had ridiculed this Hiſtorian's literary thefts.

But here is a little difficulty. Daimachus, one of the Authors, whom Ephorus pirated according to Porphyry, was ſent Embaſſador to the Court of Androcottus's ſon King of India, he muſt therefore have lived after Ephorus, and conſequently Porphyry is miſtaken. This is a chronological argument, which Voſſius (52) employed to refute Caſaubon (53), who thought that the Daimachus pirated by Ephorus is the ſame who was born at Platea, and has been quoted by Plutarch (54) and Athenæus (55). It is certain that he, whom Athenæus quotes, wrote an account of India, and was born at Platea (56). It is therefore certain, that the Author whom Caſaubon mentions, is the ſame with the Daïmachus who was ſent into India (57), under the reign of Allitrochades ſon of Androcottus (58). The queſtion is then to know whether Ephorus could tranſcribe from ſuch a Daïmachus. This is conſiſtent with Chronology, ſay ſome: for Androcottus reigned in India, when Seleucus was laying the foundation of that power at which he arrived afterwards (59). Voſſius thinks this argument very ſtrong. Cave igitur putes, ſays he (60) after having mentioned it, Ephorum pleraque hujus Daimachi in hiſtoriam ſuam totidem verbis tranſcripſiſſe . . . . . nam Ephorum tanto eſſe antiquiorem ſatis ex iis, quæ ſupra diximus, liquet. i. e. "Do not "think therefore, that Ephorus tranſcribed moſt part "of this Daimachus's work word for word into his "hiſtory: for it appears ſufficiently, from what we "have ſaid above, that he was much more ancient." For my part I do not find any ſtrength in this argument. Ephorus ſtudied eloquence under Iſocrates at the ſame time with Theopompus. The latter was but five years old (61) when Alexander had him reſtored to his native Country. He lived till the reign of Ptolomy in Egypt. Why then could not Ephorus have lived till the Monarchy of Seleucus was perfectly ſettled? There are no reaſons why we may not ſuppoſe that Androcottus did not reign long, and that Daimachus was advanced in years when he was ſent into India. He might therefore have publiſhed ſome Hiſtories before he went thither: Ephorus might haave read them,

(30) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 36.

(31) Theo, Progymnaſm. cap. 2. pag. m. 25.

(32) Theſe two words have been omitted in the Tranſlation, which Heinſius reviſed,

* But in the beginning of the paſſage where he condemns verſes in a diſcourſe in proſe.

(33) See Plut. de Homero, & Tatian. Orat. ad Græcos.

(34) See Scaliger, in Euſeb. num. 1101. pag. m. 62.

(35) Plin. lib. 1. in indice, lib. 7.

(36) Jonſius, de Script. Hiſt. Phil. pag. 44.

† Whether there was an Author named Euphorus.

(37) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 367.

(38) Athen. lib. 4. cap. 25. pag. 182.

(39) Harduin. in Indice Autorum Plinii.

(40) The one is in lib. 1. Stromat. pag. 306. the other ibid. pag. 339.

(41) In voce ἐποικομένην, apud Voſſium, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 367.

(42) Strabo, lib. 7.

(43) See Menage, in Diogen. Laert. lib. 1. num. 41. pag. 23.

(44) Ibid.

(45) Scaliger, Anim. in Euſebium, ad ann. 1101. pag. m. 62.

(46) Euſeb. num. 1101.

(47) Euſtathius, in Iliad lib. 2. folio 275. apud Jonſium, de Script. Hiſt. Philoſoph. pag. 44.

(48) Steph. de Urbibus, Voce Ἀλιζῶνες.

(49) Αὐτὸν καὶ Θεοπόμπου προυτίθει. Eum ipſi quoque Theopompo anteponebat. Porphyrius apud Euſebium, Prepar. lib. 10. cap. 3. pag. 464.

(50) Idem, ibid.

(51) In the Article THEOPOMPUS, Remark [M].

(52) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græcis, pag. 76.

(53) Caſaub. in Diogen. Laert. lib. 1. num. 30.

(54) Plut. in Paral. Solon. & Poplic. pag. 111.

(55) Athen. lib. 9. pag. 394.

(56) Harpocrat. Voce Ἐγγυθήκη.

(57) Strabo, lib. 2. pag. 48.

(58) Others call him Sandrocottus.

(59) Sandrocottus ea tempeſtate qua Seleucus futuræ magnitudinis fundamenta jaciebat, Indiam poſſidebat. Juſtin. lib. 15. ſub fin. pag. m. 341.

(60) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. pag. 76.

(61) See his Article.

the opinion men had of the long orations which he inſerted in his Hiſtory. He was ſoundly ridiculed for the manner in which he mentioned his native place [D]. He left a ſon of whom I ſhall ſay ſomething [E]. He might have followed Alexander's Court, for he was very much wiſhed for there, but he refuſed that honour (g). Diodorus Siculus does not approve of (b) his owning that the Barbarians were more antient than the Greeks.

(g) Plutarch. De Repugn. Stoic. pag. 1043, D.

(b) Lib. 1. cap. 9.

EPHREM

them, and be not more ſcrupulous to tranſcribe them, than thoſe of Anaximenes his contemporary. We are not to ſuppoſe that Porphyry thought, that Ephorus printed the Hiſtory of India written by Daimachus: he meant no doubt ſome other Hiſtory, as, for inſtance, that of the Greeks, which Plutarch plainly aſcribes to this Daimachus (62), who alſo wrote a Treatiſe de bellicis machinamentis, (Of Engines uſed in war) (63), and perhaps alſo a Treatiſe of Religion (64). If Monſr. Menage (65) had thoroughly weighed all this, he would not have been of Voſſius's opinion, which has alſo been admitted by the Author of the Collection of Plagiaries (66), who expects that the learned will find out ſome method to clear Porphyry, who has not the leaſt occaſion for it. Eadem reprehenſio in Porphyrium cadit, ad quem provocat Caſaubonus, niſi vel doceant Eruditi alium quendam fuiſſe Daimachum, Ephoro ſupparem aut antiquiorem, vel nomen Daimachi apud Porphyrium fuiſſe corruptum (67). i. e. "The ſame cenſure may be paſſed on Porphyry, "whom Caſaubon quotes; unleſs the learned ſhew, "that there was another Daimachus, contemporary "with or more ancient than Ephorus, or that the "word Daimachus in Porphyry is corrupted." Let us obſerve here, that all the curious ought to be obliged to Euſebius for that beautiful paſſage of Porphyry, which he has preſerved from periſhing. But in my opinion he ought not to have tranſcribed it in a work intitled Præparatio Evangelica. For what avails it for the advantage of the Chriſtian Religion, or for the confutation of falſe Deities, that the Greek Authors have ſtolen from each other? Is not this the cuſtom of all countries and times? Have not the Fathers tranſcribed ſeveral things from each other's Writings? Do not the Roman Catholics and the Proteſtants do the ſame every day with regard to the Authors of their reſpective party? Euſebius was more judicious when he ſhewed, that the Greeks had been plagiaries with regard to the Barbarians (68). This may in ſome manner ſupport the authority of ſacred Hiſtory. Whence we may infer by the by, that it was leſs diſadvantageous to the Greeks, to ſteal from one another, than to ſteal the riches of ſtrangers. This diſadvantage is an exception to the general rules. Marini uſed to ſay, that to ſteal from thoſe of one's own Nation was a robbery, but to rob ſtrangers was a conqueſt, and I believe he was in the right. We ſtudy only in order to learn, and we learn only in order to ſhew, that we have ſtudied. Theſe are Monſieur Scuderi's words (69). If I have borrowed ſomething from the Greeks and from the Latins, continues he, I have borrowed nothing from the Italians nor from the Spaniards, nor from the French; being of opinion that what is learning with regard to the ancients, is a theft with regard to the moderns. La Mothe le Vayer is of the ſame opinion, for he ſpeaks thus in one of his Books. "To borrow from the an- "cients, and to make an advantage of what they "have written, is like pirating beyond the equinoc- "tial line. But to rob thoſe of one's own time "by tranſcribing their thoughts and writings, as "though they were one's own, is like robbing "wool in the ſtreets, or picking of pockets on "the Royal Exchange (70)." I believe that all Authors admit this maxim, that it is better to ſteal from the ancients, than from the moderns, and that amongſt the latter, we muſt ſpare our countrymen rather than ſtrangers. Literary Piracy is not in every thing like that of the Privateers. The latter think themſelves more innocent when they plunder in the new world, than if they did it in Europe. Authors on the contrary go a pirating with more boldneſs in the old world than in the new, and expect to be commended for the prizes they take. "The Commentator on "Taſſo's Jeruſalem thought to raiſe his Author's re- "putation by pointing out two or three thouſand "paſſages in his Poem, which are imitated from ſe- "veral Authors. The Commentators on Petrarch and "Ronſard have done the ſame (71)" All the Plagiaries follow as much as they can the diſtinction which I have mentioned: but it is not from a principle of conſcience, but that they may not be found out. Let a young French Miniſter make uſe of Monſieur Daillé's Sermons, or of thoſe of ſome other French Miniſter, will he be able to hide his Plagiariſm? Will he not have reaſon to fear, that his audience will ſoon know whence he took his materials? He ought therefore prudently to cover his theft by ſtealing the ornaments of his diſcourſe from ſome Engliſh Preacher. Woe to him however, if there be too great a difference between the paſſages which he tranſcribes and thoſe of his own to which he tacks them (72); for it makes underſtanding hearers judge, not only that he is a plagiary, but that he wants ſkill and judgment to hide it. They think that he has ſpoiled an excellent ſubject, and that he ſtole it, ſince he gave ſuch an indifferent dreſs (73). The beſt remedy in this caſe is good for nothing; it would be, to deliver without any alteration what one has borrowed; but this is the higheſt crime of that nature. One may ſteal like bees without wronging any body; but the robbery of the ant, which ſteals whole grains of corn, ought never to be imitated (74). Or if you like better to ſee this thought in Latin read what follows. Multum intereſt apum more circumvolitans agilis Thyma ex variis floribus odorem excerpas, an vero ignavum fucos pecus imitando mel ex alvariis ſuffureris. This is what Feiſchlinus repreſented to his adverſary.

(62) Plut. in Paral. Solon. & Poplic. pag. 111.

(63) Πολιορκητικὰ ὑπομνήματα. See Steph. Byzant. Voce Λακεδαίμων.

(64) See Plutarch. in Vita Lyſandri, pag. 439.

(65) Menage, Not. ad Diogen. Laert. lib. 1. num. 30.

(66) Thomaſius, de Plagio Literario, pag. 180.

(67) Thomaſius, de Plagio Literario, pag. 180.

(68) Euſeb. Præp. Evang. lib. 10. cap. 5.

OBSERVATIONS upon the different methods of pirating.

(69) Scuderi, Preface d'Alaric.

(70) La Mothe le Vayer, Lettre 139. pag. 261. of the 2d volume.

(71) Scuderi, Preface d'Alaric.

(72) Purpureus, latè qui ſplendeat unus & alter Aſſuitur pannus. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 15.

(73) Qui bene vertendo & eaſdem deſcribendo malè, Ex Græcis bonis Latinas fecit non bonas. Terentius, in Prologo Eunuchi, ver. 7.

(74) La Mothe le Vayer, Lettre 134. tom. 12. pag. 260.

[D] He was ſoundly ridiculed for the manner in which he mentioned his native-place.] At that time, ſaid he, the city of Cumæ was at reſt. Σκώπτεται δὲ καὶ ὁ Ἔφορος διότι τῆς πατρίδος οὐκ ἔχων ἐργὰ φράζειν ἐν τῇ διαριθμήσει τῶν ἄλλων πραξέων, οὐ μὴν οὐδ' ἂν ἀμνημόνευτον αὐτὴν εἶναι θέλων, οὕτως ἐπιφωνεῖ. Κατὰ δὲ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν Κυμαῖοι τὰς ἡσυχίας ἦγον (75). i. e. "Ephorus has been well ridiculed, "becauſe when he gave an account of ſeveral hiſtorical "facts, and had nothing to ſay of his own country, yet "he would ſome way or other mention it; ſo that "he made the following exclamation. At that time "the Cumeans were at reſt." Had it not been better to ſay nothing of that nation, than to mention it in a manner ſo little to its honour?

(75) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 128.

[E] He left a ſon, of whom I ſhall ſay ſomething.] His name was Demophilus, and he was a man of letters, for it was thought that he put a finiſhing hand to his father's Hiſtory, that is to ſay, that he compleated towards the end of it what Ephorus had left imperfect. Hence it is that Athenæus (76) quoting the laſt book of that work, ſeems to doubt whether he ought to aſcribe it to Ephorus or Demophilus. Father Hardouin did not well underſtand this, for he ſuppoſes (77) that Athæneus doubted whether the thirty books which this Hiſtory contained, were written by the father or by the ſon. Jonſius's conjecture ſeems to me well grounded. Cauſa quare ita dubitet (Athenæus) ſays he (78), eſt quod Ephorus belli non ita pridem confecti hiſtoriam imperfectam filio pertexendam forte reliquerit. i. e. "The reaſon why Athenæus doubted is, "that Ephorus left perhaps the Hiſtory of the war, "that was lately finiſhed, to be compleated by his "ſon." Five or ſix lines lower he does no longer ſpeak doubtfully; he aſſerts, and does it on the authority of a famous Hiſtorian, Brevi autem poſt . . . . hiſtoriam ſuam Ephorus imperfectam necdum abſolutam Demophilo filio tradidit pertexendam, teſte Diodoro. Ut ita Athenæus hiſtoriam belli Phocici à patre & filio ſimul deſcriptam utrique eorum dubie non immerito tribuat (79). i. e. "Soon after . . . . Ephorus gave his Hiſtory which "was imperfect, to be compleated by his ſon, as Dio- "dorus aſſerts. So that Athenæus had reaſon to doubt "whether he ſhould aſcribe the Hiſtory of the Phocean "war to the father or to the ſon, it having been "written by both." I have not found in Diodorus Siculus that Ephorus ordered his ſon to add to his Hiſtory what it ſtill wanted; and if Jonſius read it in Diodorus Siculus, he ought not to have ſpoken ſometimes in a doubtful manner, fortè, perhaps, and ſometimes poſitively.

(76) Athen. lib. 6. cap. 4. pag. 232.

(77) Harduinus, in Indice Autorum Plinii.

(78) Jonſius, de Scriptor. Hiſt. Phil. pag. 43.

(79) Idem, pag. 44.

☞EPHREM SYRUS (St.) an antient Chriſtian Writer in the fourth Century, was a native of Edeſſa, according to ſome, or of Niſibe in Syria, as others more truly affirm (a); and was born under the Emperor Conſtantine (b). He embraced a Monaſtic Life from his earlieſt years, and in a ſhort time was choſen Superior to a conſiderable number of Monks (c). As he frequently viſited the Church of Edeſſa, he was ordained Deacon there; and going to Cæſarea in Cappadocia, he was received with great affection by St. Baſil, who is ſaid to have taught him Greek, and ordained him Prieſt; but this account is not very certain, ſince the Antients aſſure us, that he died a Deacon (d). Sozomen tells us (e) that being choſen Biſhop of a city, he avoided that office by pretending to be mad [A]. He wrote a great number of Books [B]; which were ſo highly eſteemed in thoſe times, that the greateſt part of them were tranſlated into Greek, and they were read publickly in ſome Churches after the Scriptures (f). Sozomen obſerves (g). that his works were ſo remarkable for the beauty and dignity of the ſtyle, and the ſublimity of the ſentiments, that the peculiar elegance appeared even in the Greek Tranſlations. And St. Jerom aſſures us (h), that in reading the Tranſlation of St. Ephrem's Treatiſe of the Holy Ghoſt, he ſaw plainly the vivacity of the Author's genius. St. Gregory Nyſſen in his Panegyric on him, is very copious with regard to the merit of his writings, and his attachment to the Orthodox Faith. He had an extreme averſion to the Hereſies of Sabellius, Arius, and Apollinarius [C]. St. Gregory tells us, that he confuted the Anomeans and Novatians with great ſtrength; and that he applied himſelf with the utmoſt attention to the ſtudy of the Scriptures, and wrote Explications upon every one of the ſacred Books. He

(a) Cave, Hiſt. Literaria, pag. 149. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(b) Du Pin, Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom 2. pag. 145. edit. Paris 1693, in 4to.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 16.

(f) S. Hieronym. De Viris illuſtr. cap. 115.

(g) Ubi ſupra.

(h) Ubi ſupra.

[A] Sozomen tells us, that being choſen Biſhop of a City, he avoided that office by pretending to be mad.] When the people had choſen him, and ſought him, in order to be ordained to that function, he run into the market place, and ſhewed all the ſigns of a mad-man, upon which thoſe, who came for him, imagining him to be really ſo, left him; and he taking this opportunity fled and concealed himſelf till another perſon was elected Biſhop. Οσον ὁ κινῆς ἐφάτει δόξης, ἐντεῦθεν ἰσέον. ποτὲ ψῆφον ἐπισκοπῆς ἐνενόχασιν ἀυτῷ τινες, ϗ συλλαβεῖν ἐπειρῶντο, ὡς ἐπὶ τὴν χειροτονίαν ἄξοντες· ἀυτίκα δὲ αἰσθόμενος, εἰς τὴν ἀγορὰν ἐξέβαλε, ϗ οἷα παραπαίων ἐθεῖκνυ ἑαυτὸν, ἀτάκτως βαδίζων, ϗ τὴν ἐσθῆτα ἐπισύρων, ϗ δημοσίᾳ ἐσθίων. Ἐπεὶ δὲ ἔξω φρενῶν εἶναι νομίσαντες οἱ συλλαβόμενοι, τῆς ἐπ' ἀυτὸν ὁρμῆς ἀνεκόπησαν, καιρὸν εὑρὼν ἀνέδρασε, ϗ μέχρι ἕτερου ἐχειροτονήθη, διέλαθεν (1).

(1) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 16.

[B] He wrote a great number of Books.] Photius tells us (2), that he wrote above a thouſand Orations, and that himſelf had ſeen xlix of his Sermons, Sozomen obſerves (3), that he compoſed three hundred thouſand Verſes; among which were thoſe, which he wrote in imitation of Ammonius, the ſon of Bardeſanes, who had compoſed ſeveral Hymns, in the Syriac Language, which were ſung with great pleaſure by the Syrians. But St. Ephrem perceiving that Ammonius had introduc'd in theſe Hymns ſome notions of his father and the Greek Philoſophers concerning the Soul, and the origin and deſtruction of the Body, and the Regeneration, περὶ ψυχῆς, γενέσεως τε ϗ φθορᾶς σώματος, ϗ παλιγγενεσίας, he wrote ſeveral pieces agreeable to the doctrine of the Church, particularly Hymns and Panegyrics on the Saints, which were ſo highly admired by the Syrians, that they ſung them to the tunes of Ammonius (4). He wrote all his works in Syriac; but a great part of them is ſaid to have been tranſlated into Latin during his life-time. His Commentaries on the Scriptures, and his controverſial Treatiſes are loſt; but we have a great number of diſcourſes, moral precepts, and hymns, tranſlated into Greek, and publiſhed under his name. Several Critics, who, ſays Du Pin (5), have no reliſh for works relating to a monaſtic life, have aſſerted that all the writings aſcribed to St. Ephrem are ſuppoſititious. Andrew Rivetus in particular maintains (6), that theſe writings do not ſhew that acumen ingenii, diſcovered by St. Jerom even in the Tranſlation of our Author's Book concerning the Holy Ghoſt, nor appear worthy to be read publickly in the Churches after the Scripture, unleſs that paſſage of his Book De variis inferni Tormentis (7) be agreeable to Scripture, where it is ſaid, that the damned in hell ſhall call upon the Saints, Salvete omnes Sancti, ſalvete Apoſtoli, Prophetæ ac Martyres, ſalve Patriarcharum cœtus, ſalve Monachorum agmen, ſalve & tu Domina ſancta Dei Genetrix Virgo, &c. Rivetus then obſerves, that St. Ephrem is almoſt univerſally allowed not to have underſtood the Greek Language; and conſequently, that thoſe Treatiſes are to be exploded, which appear to have been written by an Author, who evidently quotes (8) Greek Writers, and particularly Irenæus contra Hæreſes L. 1. C. 1. and St. Athanaſius's Life of St. Anthony. The Critic afterwards points out ſome inconſiſtencies in theſe writings. Monſr. Du Pin endeavours to anſwer all theſe objections (9). But Caſimir Oudin (10) is of opinion, that he has not ſucceeded in the attempt. However Dr. Cave (11) ſtiles the objections to the works aſcribed to St. Ephrem ſlight, and for the moſt part trifling; and obſerves, that if we meet with any thing in thoſe writings leſs worthy of the holy Father, or not ſo eaſily reconcileable with other paſſages, it is to be imputed to our ignorance of the Syriac manner of ſpeaking, or the defect of the Tranſlations, rather than to the want of judgment in St. Ephrem himſelf; or that if they are really errors, they are to be excuſed in a man of his great zeal, ſimplicity, and piety. Leves plane ſunt ut plurimum exceptiunculæ, quæ ſcriptis ejus intentari ſolent. Si quæ occurrant, quæ ſancto Patre minus dignæ, aut quæ aliis locis non benè convenire videntur, noſtræ potius Syriacè loquendi modorum inſcitiæ, vel verſionibus ex verſione malè factis, quam Ephræmi inelegantiæ & inſcitiæ imputari poſſent; quin ſi revera errores eſſent, ſummo hominis zelo, ſimplicitati, ac pietati condonari debeant. The firſt, who publiſh'd any of our Author's works, was Ambroſius Camaldulenſis, who tranſlated ſome of them into Latin, which were printed at Breſcia in 1490, at Straſbourg in 1509, and at Cologne in 1547. After this Gerard Voſſius or Volkens of Borchloon in Germany, collected all the writings of this Father, and tranſlated them, and publiſhed them in three Tomes; viz. the firſt tome, dedicated to Pope Sixtus V, in 1589; the ſecond, dedicated to Pope Clement VIII, in 1593; and the third in 1598. Theſe three Tomes were reprinted in one Volume at Cologne in 1603, and Antwerp in 1619. Ecchellenſis publiſhed at Rome in 1645, Canticum de Maria & Magis, tranſlated from the Syriac. Monſr. Cotelier has publiſhed the Greek of the Panegyric on St. Baſil written by St. Ephrem, in his laſt Volume of the Monuments of the Greek Church, printed at Paris in 1686 (12). A beautiful Edition of his works was printed at Oxford in fol. in 1708.

(2) Biblioth. Cod. 196.

(3) Ubi ſupra.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Pag. 146.

(6) Critici Sacri cap. 21. pag. 339. & ſeqq.

(7) Tom. 1. n. 56. edit. Voſſian. Romæ 1589.

(8) De Virtute, cap. 8.

(9) Pag. 146, 147, 148.

(10) Commentar. de Scriptorib. & Scriptis Eccleſiaſticis, tom. 1. col. 510. edit. Francofurti 1722.

(11) Hiſt. Liter. pag. 150. edit. Collon. Allobrogum 1721.

(12) Du Pin, pag. 151.

[C] He had an extreme averſion to the Hereſies of Sabellius, Arius, and Apollinarius.] St. Gregory Nyſſen in his Panegyric upon him relates a very remarkable ſtory concerning his treatment of Apollinarius; who having written two Books, in which he had inſerted all the Arguments and paſſages, which he made uſe of in defence of his opinion, and intruſted them with a Lady; St. Ephrem pretended to be of Apollinarius's ſentiments, and borrowed the Books of the Lady; but before he returned them, he glewed all the leaves together. The Lady ſaw the binding of the Books to be the ſame as before, but did not diſcover what had been done with them, and returned them to Apollinarius to be made uſe of in a public conference, which he was to have with a Catholic; but he not being able to open his Books, was forced to go away with diſgrace.

He was a man of the greateſt ſeverity of morals, and ſo ſtrict an obſerver of chaſtity, that he avoided the ſight of Women [D]. In his youth he had been of a very choleric diſpoſition; which he afterwards reſtrained in ſuch a manner, that he was never ſeen to be angry with any man (i). His charity was very exemplary [E]. He died on the 1ſt of February 378 under the Emperor Valens (k). Upon his death-bed he exhorted the Monks who were about him to remember him in their prayers, and forbid them to preſerve his cloaths as relicks (l), and ordered his body to be interred without the leaſt funeral pomp, or any monument erected to him (m).

(i) Sozomen, ubi ſupra.

(k) Du Pin, pag. 151.

(l) Idem, ibid.

(m) Cave, pag. 150.

[D] So ſtrict an obſerver of chaſtity, that he avoided the ſight of women.] Sozomen tells us (13), that a certain woman of diſſolute character, either on purpoſe to tempt him, or elſe being hired to it by others, met him on purpoſe in a narrow paſſage, and earneſtly ſtared him in the face. St. Ephrem ſharply rebuked her for this, and bid her look down upon the ground. But the woman ſaid: Why ſhould I do ſo, ſince I am not made out of the earth, but of thee? It is more reaſonable that thou ſhouldſt look upon the ground, from which thou hadſt thy original; but that I ſhould look upon thee, from whom I was procreated. St. Ephrem wondering at the woman, wrote a Book of theſe paſſages between them, which the moſt learned of the Syrians eſteemed one of the beſt of his performances.

(13) Ubi ſupra.

[E] His charity was very exemplary.] Edeſſa having been long afflicted with a plague, he quitted his cell, and applying himſelf to the rich men, expoſtulated ſeverely with them, for ſuffering the poor to ſtarve, while they in a covetous manner kept their riches by them to the deſtruction of their own ſouls: which he ſhewed them to be of much greater value than all their wealth, or their bodies themſelves. They were ſo extremely affected with what he ſaid, that they did not regard their riches; "but we do not know, ſay they, whom "to intruſt with the diſtribution of them, ſince al-"moſt every man is greedy of gain, and makes a "merchandize and advantage to himſelf upon ſuch oc-"caſions." St. Ephrem anſwered, What do you judge of me? They replyed, that they eſteemed him a man of great integrity, as he was univerſally thought to be. For your ſakes therefore, ſays he, I will undertake this work; and ſo receiving their money, he cauſed three hundred beds to be provided, and laid in the public portico's, and took care of thoſe, who were ſick thro' the famine, as well ſtrangers, and thoſe who had been driven by want out of the country into the city, as the inhabitants of it. And thus he continued, till the famine ceaſing he returned to his cell, where he applied himſelf again to his ſtudies, and died not long after (14).

(14) Sozomen, T. ubi ſupra.

☞ EPICHARMUS, an antient Poet and Philoſopher was born in Sicily, according to Horace (a), and Suidas (b); but Diogenes Laertius tells us (c), that he was born in the Iſland of Coos. But his being carried into Sicily, when he was but three months old, firſt to Megara, and afterwards to Syracuſe, might well juſtify the calling him a Sicilian, tho' born in another country. Now that he was removed from home ſo early, Laertius brings his own word to vouch; and it is probable therefore that he made uſe of the ſame authority in determining his birth-place (d). Laertius tells us, that his father's name was Helothales; but Suidas obſerves, that it was Tityrus or Chimarus, and that his mother was named Sicis. He was a ſcholar of Pythagoras (e). He and Phormus are ſaid to have invented Comedy in Syracuſe (f); tho' many other places have pretended to the glory of that diſcovery (g). He preſented fifty five, or according to others, thirty five plays (h). But his works have been ſo long loſt, that even their character is ſcarce on record. Only Horace has preſerved the memory of one of his excellencies [A]. Beſides his Comedies he wrote a great many Treatiſes in Philoſophy and Medicine; which gave occaſion to Aldobrandini (i) to make two Authors of this name, one a Comic Writer, and the other a Philoſopher [B]. He died aged 90 years, according to Laertius, or 97, as Lucian aſſerts (k). Laertius has preſerved four verſes inſcribed on his ſtatue [C]. Pliny obſerves (l) that Ariſtotle thought that Epicharmus added the letters Θ X to the Greek Alphabet, tho' others aſcribe them to Palamedes.

(a) Lib. 2. Epiſt. 1. ver. 58.

(b) Suidas in Voce Ἐπίχαρμος.

(c) De Vitis &c. Philoſophorum, lib. 8.

(d) Lives and Characters of the Antient Greek Poets. By Baſil Kennet, M. A. Part 2. pag. 56. edit. London 1697, in 8vo.

(e) Laert.

(f) Suidas.

(g) Ariſt. Poet. cap. 3.

(h) Suidas.

(i) In Laert. lib. 3. in Vitâ Platonis.

(k) In Macrobiit.

(l) Hiſt. Nat. lib. 7. cap. 56.

[A] Only Horace has preſerved the memory of one of his excellencies.] He has preſerved it by commending Plautus for copying it, and that is his judicious care of keeping his ſubjects always in view, and following the chace of the intrigue ſo cloſely, as not to give the Reader or Spectator time to trouble themſelves with doubts concerning the diſcovery.

(1) Ep. 1. lib. 2. ver. 58.

Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epicharmi (1).

[B] He wrote a great many Treatiſes in Philoſophy and Medicine; which gave occaſion to Aldobrandini to make two Authors of this name, one a Comic Writer, and the other a Philoſopher.] But we may venture as Mr. Baſil Kennet obſerves (2), to keep them undivided, becauſe Suidas who ſpeaks only of the Comedies, obſerves, that ſome perſons made Coos the birth-place of our Author in the ſame manner as Laertius does, who mentions him chiefly as a Philoſopher. Beſides when Laertius in the Life of Plato has told us, that it was reported that Plato had tranſcribed many things from the writings of Epicharmus the Comedian, he immediately after ſets down an opinion maintained by Plato, and ſubjoins the Phyſical verſes of Epicharmus, whence it may be ſuppoſed to have been borrowed. And even Aldobrandini himſelf when he comes to illuſtrate Laertius's Life of Epicharmus, remarks, that whereas it had been ſaid under the account of Plato, that the Philoſopher was much indebted to our Author, it was meant of his borrowing from the Phyſiological Commentaries, which Laertius places among Epicharmus's works.

(2) Lives and Characters of the Antient Greek Poets, lib. 2. pag. 57.

[C] Laertius has preſerved four verſes inſcribed on his ſtatue.] They are as follow:

Εἰ τι παραλλάσσει φαεσφόρων μείγας ἅλιος ἄφρων,
Καὶ πόντος ποταμῶν μείζων ἔχει δύναμιν·
Φησὶ τοσοῦτον ἐγὼ σοφίᾳ προέχειν Ἐπίχαρμον,
Ὃν πατρὶς ἐξεφάνως ἄνδρ' Συρακοσίων.

The Starry Train, as far as Phœbus drowns,
And antient Ocean his unequal ſons;
Beyond mankind, we'll Epicharmus own,
On whom juſt Syracuſe beſtowed the crown. KENNET.

T.

(a) See Giles Boileau, Vie d'Epictete, & l'Enchiridion, ou l'Abregé de ſa Philoſophie, edit. Paris 1655 in 8vo.

☞ EPICTETUS, a celebrated antient Philoſopher, was probably born near the end of Nero's reign (a), at Hierapolis in Phrygia (b). He was a ſlave to Epaphroditus, (b) Suidas, in voce Ἐπικτήτος.

ditus [A], a freedman of Nero's, and one of that Emperor's Guards (c). At what time, or by what means he obtained his liberty, we have no certain account; but thus much we are assured of, that upon an Edict of Domitian for banishing all Philosophers from Rome and Italy, about the year 94 of the Christian Æra (d) [B] he withdrew to Nicopolis, a city of Epirus (e). And his being included under that prohibition in the quality of a Philosopher, is a manifest proof that he was a Freeman. For indeed it is not to be imagined that a person whose merit had recommended him to the particular favour and esteem of the Emperors of his time, should be suffered to continue in slavery (f). It hath been generally thought, that after this retreat he never returned any more to Rome, but passed the remainder of his life at Nicopolis. And this opinion is grounded upon Arian's taking express notice in several parts of his collections, that those Discourses of which his Book consists, were made and delivered at Nicopolis. But notwithstanding this conjecture is supported by Salmasius, it still seems to want confirmation (g). For we may observe that Spartian (b) tells us, that the Emperor Hadrian was very intimate with Epictetus; which could not possibly be, if the latter had been constantly resident from the time of Domitian's Edict, in a place so remote as Nicopolis. It does not certainly appear whether he was ever married [C]; but it is unquestionable that he lived in great poverty [D]. Suidas tells us, that he lived to the reign of Marcus Aurelius; and Themistius (i) asserts that he was highly esteemed by that Prince as well as his Predecessor. But this account is rejected by some Writers [E]; though it is certain, that Epictetus lived to a very considerable

(c) Idem, ibid. and A. Gellius, lib. 2. cap. 18.

(d) Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. 2. Part 1. Art. 18. pag. 171. edit. Bruxelles 1711.

(e) A. Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 11.

(f) Boileau, ubi supra.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(b) In Vitâ Adriani, cap. 16.

(i) Orat. 3. ad Jovinian. pag. 63. d. edit. Harduini Paris. 1684.

which we owe those excellent thoughts, of which Arrian hath preserved some noble remains. And by all these circumstances we may judge how poor this Philosopher was (6).

[A] He was a slave to Epaphroditus,] Monsr. de Tillemont (1) is of opinion, that this is the same freedman of Nero, to whom Josephus dedicated almost all his works, and who was afterwards banished, and at last put to death by Domitian in the year 95, because he had assisted Nero in killing himself. In the Preface to Berkelius's Edition of Epictetus's Enchiridion, with Wolfius's Notes, printed at Leyden in 1670, this Epaphroditus is mistaken for the person of that name, mentioned in St. Paul's Epistle to the Colos. iv. 18. who brought that Church's charity to St. Paul at Rome. It is true, as Dr. Stanhope observes (2), that Chapter mentions (3) Saints of Cæsar's Houshold. But the character given of Epictetus's master will not incline us to believe him one of them. And tho' it be highly probable, that Epictetus had some knowledge of the Christian Doctrine, (as indeed the Philosophers, who write after the publication of the Gospel, by their way of arguing so much more refined than their Predecessors, seem all to have had,) yet we have little ground to imagine, that a person of such infamous qualities, such insolence, barbarity, and meanness of spirit, as this Epaphroditus, either instructed him in it, or ever imbibed it heartily himself.

(1) Histoire des Empereurs, tom. 2. Part. 1. Art. 19. pag. 176. & Part. 2. Art. 20. pag. 451. edit. 2. Bruxelles 1711.

(2) Note on the Life of Epictetus, prefixed to his Translation of Epictetus's Morals, with Simplicius's Comment, pag. 30. 4th edit. London 1721, in 8vo.

(3) Ver. 23.

[B] Upon an Edict of Domitian for banishing all the Philosophers from Rome and Italy, about the year 94 of the Christian Æra.] In the Chronological Table subjoined to Giles Boileau's life of Epictetus, cited in the text of this article, the banishment of the Philosophers is placed under the year of Rome 840, and of the Christian Æra 90.

[C] It does not certainly appear whether he was ever married.] But as there is not authority sufficient for affirming, so neither is there enough for denying it. For Arrian in several passages takes notice of Epictetus's aversion against the Epicureans, upon this provocation particularly that they spoke in prejudice of marriage. But whether he was a married or a single man, it is highly probable that he had no children; for besides that no Author mentions any such, that repartee of Demonax in Lucian (4) intimates, that he had none; who when Epictetus advised him to marry and leave children, replied, With all my heart, provided you give me one of your own daughters.

(4) Lucian. de Vitâ Demonactis.

[D] It is unquestionable, that he lived in great poverty.] Though Spartian (5) greatly commends Hadrian's generosity and high esteem for the Poets, Orators, Philosophers, Mathematicians, and the masters of any sort of science, (though at the same time no man took more delight in rallying them than he;) yet we have no grounds to believe, that either this Emperor or any of his successors, who professed such veneration for Epictetus, bestowed upon him so much, as might set him above even extreme poverty. The reason of this probably was his obstinate contempt of riches, which would not suffer any favours of that kind to be fastened upon him. And this appeared by his manner of living at Rome, in a little cottage, without so much as a door to it, no attendance but one old woman, and no furniture but an earthen lamp, to the light of

(5) In Vitâ Hadriani, cap. 16.

(6) See Giles Boileau, Vie d'Epictete, & l'Enchiridion, ou l'Abregé de sa Philosophie, edit. Paris 1655 in 8vo.

[E] But this account is rejected by some Writers.] Salmasius (7) is of opinion, that Suidas is mistaken; and produces several reasons for thinking so, which Monsr. Giles Boileau considers (8). The first reason is, that Suidas himself tells us, that Epictetus was a slave to Epaphroditus, one of Nero's guards: Δοῦλος ὢν Ἐπαφρόδιτου τῶν σωματοφυλάκων τοῦ Βασιλέως Νέρωνος. Now from the death of Nero to the beginning of Marcus Aurelius's reign there intervened no less than ninety four years. That which adds more to the improbability of this account, is, that we must suppose Epictetus some years old, before he was capable either of doing Epaphroditus any service, or of removing from Hierapolis to Rome. So that, according to this computation, Epictetus may be presumed to have reached an hundred and fifteen years or thereabouts, which is not very easy to believe. This conjecture carries somewhat of argument in it, tho' it be not absolutely conclusive, because as Lipsius (9) hath observed judiciously enough, it is possible, that he might not be taken into Epaphroditus's family till after Nero's death. But in answer to this solution, it may be replied, that Epaphroditus being distinguished by the title of one of the guards of Nero, it is more credible, that Nero was living at the time when Epictetus belonged to him, and that he served him whilst in that quality. II. The second argument is, that Marcus Aurelius (10) does not reckon this Philosopher among the persons, with whom he had any conversation, but only speaks of reading some discourses of his, which Junius Rusticus had communicated to him. But this argument seems to carry less strength than the former. For besides that Epictetus had retired to Nicopolis long before that time, we may allow his death to have happened much about the beginning of this Emperor's reign. Suidas affirms no more than that he lived till the time of Marcus Aurelius: διατείνας μέχρι Μαρκου Ἀντωνίνου. And he might very well be supposed to live till the beginning of his reign, without implying any necessity of this Emperor's seeing his discourses till after the Author was dead. III. The third reason appears to be of little or no importance. Epictetus's lamp was sold in Lucian's time (11); and from thence it is inferred, that Epictetus was dead, before that sale was made. But this is of no consequence at all. For we have all the reason imaginable to believe, that Lucian out lived Marcus Aurelius. And so this Lamp being sold while Lucian was yet alive, is no bar to Epictetus's being alive in the reign of Marcus. Nay, it might very well happen, that the Lamp might be sold in Epictetus's own life time; and if this be admitted, that circumstance will create us no difficulty at all. IV. The fourth is, that Aulus Gellius (12), who wrote under Antoninus Pius, or at least in the very beginning of Marcus Aurelius, says of Epictetus, that the memory of that Philosopher was still fresh at (7) In Annot. ad Epictet. & Simplicium.

(8) Vie d'Epictete, ubi supra.

(9) Manuductio ad Stoicam Philosoph. lib. 1. edit. Antwerp. 1604.

(10) Lib. 1. cap. 7. edit. London 1643.

(11) See Lucian. in Dialog. πρὸς τὸν ἀπαίδευτον καὶ πολλὰ βιβλία ὠνούμενον.

(12) Lib. 2. cap. 18.

derable age (k). Marcus Aurelius mentions it as one part of his happineſs, not that he had learned any thing of Epictetus himſelf, but that he had read his writings (l). He was a man of great modeſty, which was eminent in his own practice, as well as in his recommendation to others (m). Hence he uſed to ſay (n) that there is no need of adorning a man's houſe with rich hangings or paintings ſince the moſt graceful furniture is temperance and modeſty (o), which are laſting ornaments, and will never be the worſe for wearing. And as no man of his age did ſo much good as he did, ſo no body was more induſtrious to conceal the good which he did [F]. Another inſtance of his freedom from vanity was, that though no perſon whatſoever was better qualified to become an Author, yet

(k) Lucian. in Dialog. πρὸς τὸν ἀπαίδευτον καὶ πολλὰ βιβλία ὠνούμενον.

(l) Marci Aurelii Antonini Opus de ſeipſo, lib. 1. pag. 7. edit. London 1643.

(m) Boileau, ubi ſupra.

(n) Stob. Serm. 38.

(o) Arrian, lib. 4. cap. 8.

Rome. But Salmaſius hath not produced that paſſage intire; for A. Gellius does not ſpeak there of his memory in general; but of every body's remembering that he had been a ſlave; which alters the caſe very much. V. The laſt reaſon alledged by Salmaſius is taken from that expreſſion of A. Gellius (3), I have heard Favorinus ſay; and ſince Favorinus died under Hadrian, Salmaſius concludes it impoſſible for Epictetus not to have died before the reign of Marcus Aurelius. But this reaſon is not convincing, becauſe Favorinus might very well inform A. Gellius what Epictetus had ſaid upon ſome certain occaſions, though Epictetus himſelf was ſtill alive. But ſtill it muſt be confeſſed, that there is ſome ground for urging it. For A. Gellius, who wrote his Book under Antoninus Pius, the Predeceſſor of Marcus Aurelius, when he mentions Epictetus, does it in theſe terms; Epictetus would ſay, That venerable old man uſed to ſay, Such a perſon hath told me, that Epictetus was wont to ſay, and the like. Now this is a manner of ſpeaking very unuſual and odd, when the perſon ſpoken of is yet in being. And indeed Salmaſius's opinion is the more convincing, becauſe it ſeems highly probable, that Epictetus was dead before the compoſing of Arrian's Book, in which he collects his diſcourſes. And if this be the caſe, there appears to be no poſſibility, that Suidas's account of his living down to the time of Marcus Aurelius ſhould ſtand good. For it is evident, that this Book was publiſhed before A. Gellius wrote his Noctes Atticæ; and that is as much as to ſay, that it was well known, and commonly read in the reign of Antoninus Pius. It may indeed be objected, that Arrian might collect and publiſh thoſe Diſſertations before the death of his maſter; but it is not very probable that he did ſo, ſince it is a very extraordinary thing to ſet forth the diſcourſes and memorable actions of a perſon ſurviving the publication. And therefore without ſome authority to warrant ſuch a conjecture, bare preſumption ought not to prevail for its being received. One difficulty more occurs, which Salmaſius takes no notice of, and yet ſeems to be as conſiderable as any of the former. It is the ſpace of time between the death of Nero and the edict of Domitian for baniſhing the Philoſophers. Now this very little, if at all exceeds twenty years (14). For that Edict is placed in the eighth of Domitian (15); and if Lipſius's notion be admitted, that Epictetus did not ſerve Epaphroditus, till after Nero's death, the difficulty grows yet more upon us. For at that rate he could not be above eighteen or nineteen at moſt, when he left Rome, in obedience to the Emperor's prohibition. But this is never to be reconciled with A. Gellius's account, who ſpeaks of him, as a perſon of great repute at that time, and obliged to retire to Nicopolis, in the quality of a Philoſopher concerned in the Edict. We can hardly allow him this character at leſs than thirty years old; and according to that calculation, to bring him down as far as Marcus Aurelius's reign, will require an hundred and eight or nine years. And yet ſo many we cannot afford him neither, when it is remembered, that Lucian, who was his contemporary, makes no mention of him in his dialogue concerning perſons who lived to a great age (16). It muſt be owned, that Euſebius takes notice of a ſecond Edict againſt the Philoſophers, not publiſhed till the fifteenth of Domitian; but beſides that he ſtands ſingle in this point, and is not ſtrengthened by the teſtimony of any other Chronologer or Hiſtorian, Scaliger (17) hath obſerved expreſſly, that the decree meant by A. Gellius (which is plainly that under debate at preſent) was publiſhed in the eighth year of Domitian. This argument is of ſo great weight with Monſr. Boileau (18), that it would quite bear down all that Suidas hath ſaid, were it not for the paſſage of Themiſtius (19), where he poſitively affirms, that the two Antonines ſhewed Epictetus particular marks of their favour and eſteem. But this objection too may be taken off by replying, that Orators in their ſpeeches do not always tie themſelves up to the ſame rules of exactneſs, which are ſtrictly required of a faithful Hiſtorian; or elſe by ſaying, that Marcus Aurelius might expreſs an honour for Epictetus in the time of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, and before he came to be Emperor himſelf; or laſtly, that this veneration was paid to his character and memory after the perſon was dead. And this we plainly find done in the Book which he has left us, where Epictetus is mentioned upon ſeveral occaſions with a more than ordinary reſpect. Upon the whole matter, ſays Monſ. Boileau (20) the difficulties on both ſides of the queſtion are ſuch, that I will not take upon me to determine either way; but ſhall ſatisfy myſelf with thus laying before my Reader what may be ſaid for and againſt this relation of Suidas. And yet, if I may be admitted to interpoſe my own private opinion, this, I confeſs, inclines rather to Salmaſius; and I am apt to think Epictetus was dead before Marcus Aurelius began to reign. For beſides that Suidas is not always in the right, we have an inſtance in the perſon before us, where he is manifeſtly in the wrong; that, I mean, in which he affirms Epictetus himſelf to have been a great writer of books. And he who hath miſtaken in this point, may be preſumed to have miſtaken in the calculation of his age too. Monſr. Menage (21) inſiſts upon the account of Suidas, which he ſuppoſes was taken by that Author from ſome antient Writer, and is confirmed by Themiſtius in the paſſage referred to above; which paſſage Menage tells us he ſhewed to Salmaſius, who obſerved upon it that he thought himſelf obliged to re-examine his former opinion. Menage affirms, that this critic's arguments againſt Suidas are of no manner of force, which he promiſed to prove in ſome other place. Epictetus uſque ad Marci tempora vitam produxit, ut Suidas refert, qui id procul dubio ab aliquo ſcriptore antiquo acceperat. In quo non falli Suidam, ut ad Epicteti Enchiridion eum falli Salmaſius contendit, patet ex Themiſtio, auctore non contemnendo, qui Oratione XII. duos Antoninos Epicteto plurimum tribuiſſe ait; quod niſi de Pio & Marco intelligi non poteſt. Hunc Themiſtii locum cum olim Salmaſio oſtendiſſem, memini illum dicere, de ſuâ ſententiâ amplius cogitandum. Certè illius argumenta, quibus Suidam refellere tentat, nihil evincunt, ut alibi oſtendemus.

[F] As no man of his age did ſo much good as he did, ſo no body was more induſtrious to conceal the good which he did.] This gave occaſion to the rules, which we meet with in his Enchiridion (22): "If you have ſo "far maſter'd your appetite, as to have brought your "body to coarſe fare, and to be well contented with "mere neceſſity, do not glory in your abſtemious "diet. And if you drink nothing but water, pro"claim not your own ſobriety upon every occaſion. "Or if you would inure yourſelf to hardſhip, do it "for your own benefit, not to attract the admiration "of the people. Let vain-glorious fools embrace ſta"tues in the ſtreets, to ſhew the crowd how long they "can endure the cold; but let your trials of yourſelf "be private. And if you would be hardy in good "earneſt, when you are almoſt quite parched with ex"treme thirſt, take cold water in your mouth; then "deny yourſelf the ſatisfaction of drinking, and ſpit "it out again, and tell no body (23)." Ὅταν ἐντελῶς ἠρμοσμένον ᾖς κατὰ τὸ σῶμα, μὴ καλλωπίζου ἐπὶ τούτῳ· μηδ' ἂν ὕδωρ πίνῃς, ἐκ παντὸς ἀφορμῆς λέγε ὅτι ὕδωρ πίνεις. Κἂν ἀσκῆσαί ποτε πρὸς πόνον θέλῃς, σεαυτῷ, καὶ μὴ τοῖς ἔξω, μὴ τοῦ ἀνθρωπάριου περιλάμβανε, ἀλλὰ δίψῶν ποτὲ σφοδρῶς, ἐπίσπασαι ψυχρὸν ὕδωρ, καὶ ἔκπτυσον, καὶ μηδενὶ εἰπῇς.

(21) Obſervat. & Emendation. in Diogenem Laertium, lib. 1. pag. 1. edit. Amſtelodami 1692.

(22) Cap. 70.

(23) Stanhope's Tranſlation.

(13) Lib. 17. cap. 19.

(14) Euſeb. in Chronic.

(15) Boileau, ubi ſupra. Tillemont, tom. 2. Part 1. pag. 171. places it in the 13th or 14th year of that Emperor.

(16) Macrobii.

(17) In Animadverſion. in Euſeb.

(18) Vie d'Epictete, ubi ſupra.

(19) Orat. 3. ad Jovin. edit. Harduini.

(20) Ubi ſupra.

yet he left nothing of his own compoſition behind him [G]. It was his judgment, that a true Philoſopher was obliged to diſtinguiſh himſelf, not ſo much by what he ſpoke, as by what he did [H]. He was a great lover of neatneſs; and ſaid upon occaſions, that he had much rather ſee one of his ſcholars come to him well dreſſed and curled, and had more hopes of ſuch an one's improvement, than of one who was negligent of his habit. He had the misfortune of an ill perſon himſelf, and was lame [I], by means of a defluxion of an humour, which fell into his leg. The meanneſs of his fortune had no influence upon the greatneſs of his ſoul; nor could he be brought to a ſervile flattery of perſons in the moſt exalted ſtations, but dealt with them very plainly, when he ſaw occaſion [K]. His patience was very extraordinary; for while he was a ſlave to Epaphroditus, [G] He left nothing of his own compoſition behind him.] Suidas indeed tells us, that he wrote a great many Books. Ἔγραψε πολλὰ. But this is generally allowed to be a miſtake (24). And Jo. Daniel Snecanus, M. D. in his Notes upon the Enchiridion (25) informs us, that tho' this piece is aſcribed to Epictetus, it was written by Arrian, as appears evidently from Simplicius's Preface to his Commentary on the Enchiridion; in which he remarks, that it is called ſo, becauſe all perſons, who are deſirous to live as they ought, ſhould be perfect in this Book, and have it always at hand: a Book of as conſtant and neceſſary uſe, as the ſword (which commonly went by this name, and from whence the metaphor ſeems to be taken) is to a ſoldier. Simplicius likewiſe informs us, that the deſign of it (if men would but ſuffer themſelves to be wrought upon by it, and would reduce what they read into practice) is, to ſet our ſouls as free, as when their great Father and Creator firſt gave them to us; to diſengage them from all thoſe ſlaviſh fears, and confounding troubles, and other corruptions of human nature, which are wont to ſubdue and tyrannize over them. "The inſtructions "he gives, are built upon human nature; and on the "foundation of them all is man, conſidered as a ra"tional ſoul, making uſe of the body, as an inſtru"ment of operation. Upon this account he allows "all thoſe innocent pleaſures, which nature requires, "and ſuch as are neceſſary to keep up a ſucceſſion of "mankind in the world; and ſo he does likewiſe the "enjoyment of ſuch other things, as the condition of "the preſent life makes deſirable to us. But then it "is conſtantly with this reſerve, that the reaſoning "faculty preſerve its own liberty, ſo as not to be in"ſlaved to the body, or any of its ſenſual inclinati"ons; but be conſtantly raiſing itſelf up above theſe, "and aſpiring to the enjoyment of its own proper "happineſs. So that we may take the advantage of "all the world calls good, which can any ways con"duce to our true happineſs, provided it be done with "due temper and moderation. But as for ſuch as are "wholly inconſiſtent with that true happineſs, we are "abſolutely forbidden the having any thing at all to "do with them (26)." Simplicius remarks, that one remarkable excellency of theſe writings, is, that they render all, who govern themſelves by them, truly happy at preſent, and do not content themſelves with turning men over to a long payment by diſtant promiſes of their virtue's being rewarded in a future ſtate. Not but that there muſt certainly ſhall be ſuch a ſtate, and ſuch rewards; for it is impoſſible, that that Being, which makes uſe of the Body, and of its appetites and affections, as ſo many inſtruments to act by, ſhould not have a diſtinct nature of its own; a nature, which continues entire, after theſe are loſt and deſtroyed; and conſequently, it muſt needs have a perfection of its own too, peculiar and agreeable to its eſſence and nature. Now tho' we ſhould ſuppoſe the ſoul to be mortal, and that it and the body periſh both together; yet he that lives according to theſe directions, will be ſure to find his account in them; for he cannot fail of being a truly happy man, becauſe he attains to the perfection of his nature, and the enjoyment of that good, which is accommodated to a rational ſoul. And thus the body of a man, which is confeſſedly mortal, enjoys its own proper happineſs, and can aſk nothing further, when it attains to all that vigour and perfection, of which the nature of a body is capable. The Diſcourſes themſelves are ſhort and ſententious; much after the manner of thoſe precepts, which the Pythagoreans call their Memorandums or Moral Inſtitutions; tho' among theſe indeed there is ſome ſort of method and connexion, and a mutual relation almoſt all through. . . . . And theſe obſervations and maxims tho' they be put into diſtinct chapters, are all yet upon one ſubject, and belong to the ſame ſubject, viz. that of amending the life of man. They are directed to one and the ſame end, which is to rouſe and invigorate the reaſonable ſoul, that it may maintain its own dignity, and exert all its powers in ſuch operations, as are agreeable to uncorrupt nature (27).

(24) See the latter end of the Note [E].

(25) Pag. 267. edit. Amſtelod. 1670.

(26) Simplic. Comment. in Epictet. Dr. Stanhope's Tranſlation.

(27) Idem, ibid.

[H] It was his judgment, that a true Philoſopher was obliged to diſtinguiſh himſelf, not ſo much by what he ſpoke, as by what he did.] This we are informed of by Arrian (28). One day Epictetus meeting with a certain perſon, who was angry at being pitied, Epictetus repreſented to him how very unjuſt that anger was, ſince his very being out of humour upon ſuch an occaſion was an evident proof, that his caſe was ſo wretched as to call for pity (29). Another time, upon meeting a man of a moſt profligate life and infamous character, who had yet the confidence to ſet up for learning and philoſophy, he accoſted him thus: "O ſenſe"leſs creature, what is it thou wouldeſt be at? Haſt "thou been careful to ſee that thy veſſel be ſweet and "clean, before thou put any liquor into it? For if "that be not ſeaſoned, whatever is poured into it, "will turn ſour as vinegar, rank as urine, or if you "can think of any thing yet more offenſive and cor"rupt than either (30)." Aulus Gellius, who cites the paſſage, gives it this commendation, that nothing could be more weighty, nothing more true; meaning, that when moral principles, or any ſort of uſeful knowledge, are infuſed into a ſoul depreſſed and polluted with vicious habits; this, like a foul Veſſel, gives them ſuch a tincture, that they preſently become good for nothing, and turn all to corruption.

(28) Lib. 2. cap. 19. lib. 3. cap. 12, &c.

(29) Idem, lib. 4. cap. 6.

(30) A. Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 19.

[I] He . . . . was lame.] This he acknowledged very frankly in an Epigram compoſed by himſelf, and quoted by A. Gellius (31);

(31) Lib. 2. cap. 18.

Δοῦλος Ἐπίκτητος γενόμην, καὶ σώματι πήρος,
Καὶ πενίην Ἴρος, καὶ φίλος ἀθανάτοις.

Altho' by birth a ſlave, in body lame,
In fortune poor, yet dear to heaven I am.

Planudes in his Anthologia muſt needs be miſtaken in attributing this Epigram to Leonidas, becauſe, as Salmaſius hath rightly obſerved, he was a Poet of note long before Epictetus's time. But then Salmaſius himſelf will not allow this to be compoſed by Epictetus, imagining that ſome half-witted Pedant firſt made, and then inſerted it into the text of A. Gellius. The only argument alledged for this opinion, is, that this Epigram is not to be found in any ancient manuſcript of A. Gellius. But admitting this to be ſo, if the conjecture be true, we muſt ſay, that the ſame pedant foiſted it into Macrobius too: for he alſo quotes it for Epictetus's own (32). However there is one reaſon, which would incline Monſr. Boileau to ſuſpect his being the Author of it, which is the inconſiſtence, that appears for a man of our Philoſopher's ſingular modeſty and humility, to ſpeak ſo advantageouſly of himſelf. But Caſaubon will by no means admit of this argument, but contends for a very different ſenſe of this diſtich, and thinks it deſigned only to ſhew, that the proſperity or adverſity men meet with in the affairs of the world, ought not to be eſteemed a diſtinguiſhing mark of their being more or leſs favourites of heaven.

(32) Saturnal. lib. 1. cap. 11.

[K] Nor could he be brought to a ſervile flattery of perſons in the moſt exalted ſtations, but dealt with them very plainly, when he ſaw occaſion.] Speaking of Princes and Tyrants, the power, which they boaſt over their inferiors, and the ſubmiſſions, which they expect upon that account, he expreſſes himſelf to this purpoſe, tus, his maſter one day took a frolick to wrench his leg. Epictetus obſerving him delight in ſo barbarous a pleaſure, and that he continued it with greater violence, ſaid with a ſmile, and free from any emotion, "If you go on, you will certainly break my leg." And when it happened ſo, all the return which he made was this, "Did not I tell you, "Sir, that you would break my leg?" Celſus, who relates this ſtory (p), pretends that this conſtancy of our Philoſopher was ſuperior to that of Chriſt. In him the habit of ſuffering was ſo maſterly, that no man ever had learned that art more perfectly [L]; and in the mean time he juſtly diſtinguiſhed between courage and foolhardineſs [M]. In ſhort he made his whole Philoſophy conſiſt in continence and patience; for which reaſon he had always thoſe two words in his mouth, bear and forbear (q). He all along profeſſed the Stoic Philoſophy [N], which was of all others the moſt ſevere and exalted. Fancy and Fortune, the two things by which mankind are governed, were what he waged war againſt during his whole life [O]. He entirely renounced all the Delights which gratify the ſenſes to purpoſe (33): "Theſe great people are much in the "wrong, when they value themſelves upon the de"ference and ſervices paid them by thoſe under their "juriſdiction. Do they think all this court is made "to them for their own ſakes? Nothing leſs. Each "man, that makes it, hath a regard to his particu"lar intereſt; and, when ſuch addreſſes ceaſe to be "the intereſt of their ſubjects, the Prince quickly finds "himſelf neglected and deſpiſed. We take care of "ſuch, as we do of beaſts of burden, as we feed and "rub down our horſes, that they may be capable of "doing us better ſervice. We adore them, as the "men of Rome ſacrifice to diſeaſes; if the fever "have altars, it is from the fear of being hurt by it." And in another place he ſays (34): Why all theſe terrors? What is it that they can do to us, which we ſhould be ſo much afraid of? The worſt their malice can inflict upon us is death. And muſt we not of neceſſity die, ſome time, and ſome way or other? If we cannot avoid going out of the world, what mighty matter is it how we go? Nay is not that the ſhorteſt and eaſieſt way, which violence and rage ſends us out by? Was any Tyrant ever ſo cruel to his bittereſt enemy, as to be killing him ſix months together? And why then is not ſuch a death rather to be choſen, than a hectic fever, which oftentimes is whole years before it has diſpatched us? He takes great freedom with thoſe, who fancy themſelves free, becauſe they were nobly deſcended. "You think, ſays he (35), becauſe you have been "twice Conſul, your father was a Senator, and you "are the Emperor's favourite, that your quality makes "you more free, than others of a meaner birth and "fortune. Alas! you are more a ſlave, than the "deſpiſed man, who was born ſo; and his condition "is more at large than yours. He may be ſome"times ill uſed by a barbarous maſter, but you are "perpetually plagued and haraſſed by as many ma"ſters as you have ungoverned paſſions. The differ"ence is, that he is a ſlave in hemp and hair-cloth, "and you in ſilk and tiſſue."

(p) See Origen. contra Celſum, lib. 7. pag. 368. edit. Cantabrig. 1658.

(q) Ἀνέχου καὶ ἀπέχου.

(33) Arrian, lib. 1. cap. 19.

(34) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 6.

(35) Idem, lib. 4. cap. 1.

[L] In him the habit of ſuffering was ſo maſterly, that no man ever had learned that art more perfectly.] He needed no partakers in his afflictions, to ſoften them; but had all the guard within himſelf. Nay he thought it a ſign of a very corrupt nature for a man to ſolace himſelf from other's ſharing in his miſeries, as if what any one felt were abated or increaſed in proportion as his neighbours felt more or leſs. And he would expoſe the ridiculous folly of thoſe, who aggravated their own misfortunes by the conſideration of their being ſingular. What, ſays he, in caſe you were condemned to be beheaded, muſt all mankind be ſentenced to the ſame puniſhment merely for the ſake of giving you that fantaſtical comfort, that other people ſuffer as well as you (36)?

(36) See Giles Boileau, Vie d'Epictete.

[M] In the mean time he juſtly diſtinguiſhed between courage and foolhardineſs.] He adviſed no man to chooſe a rough way, if he had it in his power to take a ſmooth one; nor to climb rocks and precipices, when Providence allowed him to travel this journey of life upon even ground. He was not like that ſturdy Philoſopher, who would rather ſuffer a carriage to drive over his body, than turn out of the way to avoid it. When his maſter broke his leg, he bore it patiently; but he could have been very well ſatisfied to have found him better natured. He thought it as much a reproach to run into danger, as to run away from it; and tho' honour obliges men to encounter it, when it aſſaults them, yet he acknowledged no ſuch high-flown punctilio as ſhould render it commendable to prefer it before ſafety, and make it their own act and deed. When reaſon leads us on, then he admits of no changing a right courſe, upon the account of any hazards and inconveniences, which may attend our perſevering in it (37). To ſuch occaſions we muſt apply what he ſays of the advantage ſuch tryals are to good men. "Had Hercules ſate at home by the fire"ſide, and paſſed his life in effeminate eaſe and in"dulgence, he had never been Hercules (38). They "were the lyon, the hydra, the boar, and all thoſe "monſters he ſo laborioufly defeated, which exerciſed "his gallantry. What honour had he acquired, if his "virtue had not been thus dangerouſly employed? "What benefit had mankind reap'd from ſo great a "ſoul, if he had declined the occaſions of exerting "it (39)?" This plainly ſhews, that he did not think thoſe monſters deſirable things; but only maintained the combating with and quelling of them, to have been an occaſion of diſcovering what kind of perſon Hercules was, and of perpetuating his glory in the world.

(37) Idem, ibid.

(38) Arrian, lib. 2. cap. 16.

(39) Idem, lib. 1. cap. 6.

[N] He all along profeſſed the Stoic Philoſophy.] No man of all the Antients was more expert at reducing the rigour of their maxims and precepts into practice. For tho' he was one of the laſt, who formally applied himſelf to the rules of this ſect, yet he was one of the greateſt ornaments of it. He conformed himſelf in his diſcourſe and behaviour to the manner of Socrates, Zeno and Diogenes. And upon undertaking any thing of moment, uſed in the firſt place to conſider what one of thoſe worthies would have done upon a like occaſion. Whenever he reproved any perſon for his vices, or inſtructed him in virtue, it was his conſtant cuſtom to quote ſome of theſe Philoſophers for examples. In ſhort he reverenced them, as perſons of an extraordinary character far above the common ſtandard; but above all, he was an admirer of Socrates, and formed his ſtyle upon the model, which he had ſet him. The compariſons which he made uſe of in all his diſcourſes, were ſo familiar, ſo apt, ſo juſt in every circumſtance, that every body was inſenſibly won over by them. He did not affect elegance and politeneſs in ſpeaking; but was content with making himſelf intelligible, and delivering ſound and good ſenſe in perſpicuous and ſignificant terms. In this too he copied after Socrates, as indeed he did throughout, making him his univerſal pattern for all his actions, and all his inſtructions. Though he bore a particular regard to Pyrrho himſelf, yet he was a moſt irreconcileable enemy to the ridiculous ſcepticiſm, which went under his name (40).

(40) Giles Boileau, ubi ſupra.

[O] Fancy and fortune, the two things, by which mankind are governed, were what he waged war againſt during his whole life.] With regard to the former, he obſerved, that all the moſt important events of human life, all the revolutions, which make the greateſt noiſe in ſtory, were at the bottom nothing but fancy and humour. What is the whole Iliad of Homer, but a ſucceſſion of moſt unreaſonable humours? Paris took a fancy to carry off Menelaus's wife, and Helena to go away with him. Now if her huſband had been ſo prudent, as to account the loſs of ſuch a wife, rather a deliverance than an affliction, the whole jeſt had been ſpoiled. We had had neither Iliad nor Odyſſey. But upon his being as extravagantly humourſome as the reſt, followed wars and tumults, the ſlaughter of infinite innocent men, to devote himſelf ſolely to the nobler ſatisfactions of the ſoul [P]. But that which ſeems to be the peculiar glory of Epictetus, is, that of all the antient Philoſophers, he ſeems to have made the neareſt approaches to the Chriſtian Morality, and to have entertained more juſt and becoming notions concerning the nature and providence of God, than any who were unenlightened with the Goſpel. St. Auguſtine (r), notwithſtanding his violent prejudice againſt the generality of the Heathen Sages, ſpeaks of him with great reſpect, and honours him with the character of a wiſe and exceeding good man. Another excellence peculiar to himſelf is, that he admitted of all the ſeverity of the Stoics, without taking in any of their ſourneſs. He hath nothing of that inſolence ſo uſual with that ſect of making their romantick wiſe man in a manner equal to God. He rejected their chimerical and impracticable perfections; ſo that he reformed Stoiciſm, as well as profeſſed it. And beſides his vindicating the immortality of the ſoul as ſtrenuouſly as ever any Stoic did, he declared openly againſt ſelf-murder, the lawfulneſs of which was maintained by the reſt of this ſect [Q]. His reputation was ſo great, that Lucian who calls him a wonderful man, rallies an ignorant fellow for purchaſing Epictetus's earthen lamp at three thouſand drachms, upon a vain imagination, that ſtudying by the light of this lamp would inſpire him with the wiſdom of its former maſter (s). Arrian his Diſciple wrote a large account of his life and death which is now loſt (t). Hadrian Reland publiſhed at Utrecht in 1711 in 4to a beautiful Edition of his Enchiridion.

(r) De Civit. Dei, apud Boileau, ubi ſupra.

(s) Lucian. in Dialog. πρὸς τὸν ἀπαίδευτον καὶ πολλὰ βιβλία ὠνούμενον.

(t) Simplic. in Epictet.

and the utter ſubverſion of ſeveral antient cities. And this, in good truth, is the general way of the world (41). The latter viz. Fortune he uſed to compare to a woman of quality, who proſtituted herſelf to ſervants. "The life "which men lead in dependence upon fortune, he "would reſemble to a torrent foul and rapid, whoſe "ſtream is dangerous to paſs, fierce in its courſe, and "yet runs quickly off. On the other hand, a man "devoted to virtue he compared to a perpetual unex-"hauſted ſpring, whoſe waters are clear and ſmooth, "delightful to the eye and taſte, ſweet and wholſome, "free from all manner of ſtain or corruption (42)."

(41) Arrian, lib. 1. cap. 28.

(42) See Giles Boileau, ubi ſupra.

[P] He entirely renounced all the delights which gratify the ſenſes, to devote himſelf ſolely to the nobler ſatisfactions of the ſoul.] When he was at any time at an entertainment, his care was not ſo much to regale his body as his mind, as being ſenſible, that whatever is beſtowed on the body periſhes quickly, and turns to no account, but whatever is beſtowed on the mind is a laſting advantage, and can never be loſt. This conſideration moved him to prefer inward peace and tranquillity before the greateſt advantages in the world; for as it would be of no comfort to a man to be drowned in a veſſel, tho' ever ſo beautiful, or laden with the richeſt treaſures; ſo that man makes a very ill choice for himſelf, who for the ſake of wealth and magnificence is content to be oppreſſed with cares and diſquiets, and purchaſes any degree of grandeur, or what the miſtaken world calls happineſs, at the expence of his own eaſe and happineſs. To this purpoſe he would ſometimes argue as follows: "A man born in Perſia would "never be uneaſy, that he did not dwell in Greece. "All that nature ſuggeſts upon this occaſion being "only a deſire to live happily in one's own native "country (43). When a man is therefore born in "mean and low circumſtances, why ſhould he tor-"ture himſelf with ambitious thoughts, and ſo ea-"gerly aſpire after greatneſs and abundance? Why "does he not rather employ his care about making "that condition eaſy to him, which providence at "firſt had placed him in? Is it not much more deſir-"able to ſleep in an hard bed, ſhort and narrow, "with good health, than to be ſick in damaſk or vel-"vet, and toſs about in down? And the preference "is manifeſtly due to a mind perfectly compoſed, and "eaſy with a moderate fortune, when compared with "the high elevation of worldly greatneſs, ſoured "by vexation and perpetual anxiety of heart (44)." He would often ſay, that we are infinitely in the wrong to charge our miſery upon poverty; when it is our ambition or diſcontent, that makes us truly miſerable. And had we the whole earth at command, the poſſeſſion even of this could not ſet us at eaſe from our fears and melancholy. That muſt and can be the work of reaſon only: therefore the man who cultivates his mind well, and provides againſt the evil, by ſtocking it with ſound principles, is ſatisfied from himſelf, and never complains of poverty or fortune (45).

(43) Stobæus, Serm. 38.

(44) Arrian, lib. 2. cap. 16.

(45) Stobæus.

[Q] He declared openly againſt ſelf-murder, the lawfulneſs of which was maintained by the reſt of this ſect.] Wolfius indeed thinks him as deep in this notion as the reſt; but this ſeems to be only from a wrong interpretation of that paſſage, "That when a man is "weary of playing his part, he may be comforted "with remembering that the door is open." But the meaning of the door being open is not, that we may go out when we pleaſe; but that our term of life is ſo ſhort, that it cannot be long before we are called out. That this was his true intention is evident from another paſſage, where he expoſes the folly of being full of care for to morrow: If you have any ſuſtenance, you will be ſupported; if not, you will make your exit; the door ſtands always open (46). The phraſe here is the ſame, and let Epictetus be his own Expoſitor, who two or three lines before hath this remarkable ſentence: Let us wait God's leiſure to deliver us from enraged tyrants: when he gives the ſignal, then march out to him. And again: "How ridiculous is it to "ſuppoſe, that a man ought not rather to be cut in "pieces, than deſert the poſt which his General hath "fixed him in, and to imagine ourſelves at liberty to "quit the poſt which God hath ſet us in, whenever "we pleaſe."

(46) Arrian, lib. 1. cap. 7.

H

EPICURUS, one of the greateſt Philoſophers of his age, was born at Gargettium [A]. in

[A] He was born at Gargettium.] For this reaſon Statius calls him Gargettius auctor (1), and Senior Gargettius:

(1) Stat. lib. 2. Silva I. ver. 113.

Deliciæ quas ipſe ſuis digreſſus Athenis
Mallet deſerto ſenior Gargettius horto (2).

(2) Idem, lib. 1. Silva III. ver. 93.

That is,

"Delights which the Gargettian ſage to prove
"Would after quitting Athens, quit his grove."

Cicero had ſhewn him the example. Catius . . . . quæ ille Gargettius, etiam ante Democritus ἴδιωλα, hic ſpectra nominat (3). Ælian (4), and ſeveral others have made uſe of the ſame ſurname, ſpeaking of our Epicurus. I am ſurprized, therefore, that Cruquius ſhould have imagined that Stobæus, when he made uſe of this ſurname, meant another Epicurus. Yet, ſays he, Stobæus frequently mentions a certain Epicurus, whom he alſo ſurnames the Gargettian. We do not ſpeak thus when the great Epicurus is the perſon deſigned, or if we do, we deſerve to be hiſſed, as that honeſt country Gentleman was, who ſaid one Turenne (5). Cruquius muſt take his choice, and let him determine as he pleaſes, he will be found guilty of a blunder. If he ſays the Gargettius Epicurus of Stobæus is the Founder of the Sect of the Epicureans, he muſt allow that he has ſpoken impertinently: for nobody makes uſe of the terms Epicuri cujuſdam in ſpeaking of that Founder (6). If he ſays he did not know that the epithet of Gargettius properly belonged to the great Epicurus, he will acknowledge himſelf ignorant of a very obvious thing. I do not think him guilty of the ruſtical incivility,

(3) Epiſt. 16. lib. 15. ad Familiares.

(4) Lib. 4. cap. 13. Var. Hiſt.

(5) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 39. I had heard him ſay it in his Aſſembly, on occaſion of one of the Company's having related that one Monſ. Coſpeau had done a certain thing.

(6) See above the Remark [F] of the Article ARNAULD (Antony) Doctor of the Sorbonne.

in Attica, the third year of the 109th Olympiad (a) [B]. His father Neocles, and his mother Chæreſtrata [C] were of the number of thoſe inhabitants of Attica whom the Athenians ſent into the Iſle of Samos (b). This was the occaſion of Epicurus's paſſing his childhood in that Iſland, and he did not return to Athens till he was eighteen years old (c). It civility, or impertinence rather, which is found in the expreſſion one Epicurus, applied to him who is the ſubject of this Article. I believe that remembring there were ſeveral perſons of the name of Epicurus (7), he fancied that he to whom Stobæus gave the epithet of Gargettian was one of thoſe who are different from the Founder of the Epicurean Sect. That my Readers may judge whether my conjecture be well grounded, I ſhall ſet down the whole paſſage of Cruquius. I I take it from his Commentary on theſe words of Horace Gallis hanc Philodemus, in the 121ſt verſe of the IId Satyr of the Iſt Book: Fuit hic Philodemus Epicurus (ut Strabo ſcribit) patria Gadaræus, quem Aſconius Pedianus in Oratione Cic. pro Lucio Piſone ſcribit Epicureum fuiſſe ea ætate nobiliſſimum: ſed arbitror apud Aſconium legendum eſſe pro Epicureum, Epicurum dictum, ut habet Strabo, vel hunc ex illo reſtituendum: tamen Epicuri cujuſdam (quem etiam Gargettium nominat) frequens eſt mentio apud Stobæum. This tamen ſhews that our Author had rather the word Epicurus ſhould be inſerted in Aſconius Pedianus, than the word Epicureus in Strabo; and I even do not know whether his deſign was not to inſinuate that the Epicurus Gargettius of Stobæus, and the Epicurus Gadaræus of Strabo, differ only becauſe the Tranſcribers have altered the ſpelling. However, he plainly inſinuates that ſince Stobæus has mentioned a Gargettian Epicurus, it is very probable that Strabo ſpeaks of a Gadaræan Epicurus. Now this, in my opinion, is to diſtinguiſh theſe two Epicurus's from him who was the Founder of the Sect. Cruquius might be criticiſed in ſeveral other particulars. I. The Philodemus of Horace is not the ſame with him mentioned by Aſconius Pedianus: for the maxims of Horace's Philodemus with reſpect to love, are directly oppoſite to thoſe of Pedianus Philodemus (8). II. It is not true that we may read in Strabo (9) Epicurus inſtead of Epicureus. III. Cicero's Oration is not for Piſo, but againſt Piſo, and that in a very violent manner.

(a) Diogenes Laert. in Epicuro, lib. 10. num. 14.
(b) Idem, ibid. num. 1.
(c) Ibid.

(7) Diog. Laertius, lib. 10. num. 26. reckons up 4. Mr. Menage ibid. reckons 3 more, beſides whom Gaſſendi, Præfat. de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, ſpeaks of an Epicurus a maker of Plaiſters, mentioned by Galen.

(8) See Mr. Dacier on the 2d Satyr of the 1ſt Book of Horace, pag. m. 176.

[B] . . . . the third year of the 109*th Olympiad.*] We muſt here take notice of a miſtake of Voſſius. He places the death of Epicurus in the 107th Olympiad, and under the 12th year of the reign of Philip the father of Alexander the Great. At Epicurus eſt mortuus Olymp. CVII. quo tempore Philippus Alexandri M. parens, duodecimum regnabat annum (10). We cannot excuſe him by ſaying that he had written Olymp. CXXVII, which is the true time of that Philoſopher's death (11), but that the Printer forgot two numeral Letters. This Apology would be of no avail here, but would precipitate him into another error as palpable as that from which we ſhould endeavour to clear him; it would charge him with having imagined that the 12th year of Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, belongs to the 127th Olympiad. Let us conclude, therefore, that the fault was in his Manuſcript. Now it is very ſtrange his memory ſhould fail him ſo far that day as to ſuffer him to write that Epicurus left the world before Alexander aſcended the throne.

(9) Lib. 16. pag. 522. Diogenes Laertius, lib. 10. num. 3. calls this Philodemus an Epicurean. See thereon Mr. Menage, who believes, with the old Scholiaſt of Horace, that that Poet ſpoke of the ſame Philodemus.

(10) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Græc. lib. 1. cap. 21. pag. m. 137.

(11) Laert. lib. 10. n. 15.

[C] And his mother Chæreſtrata.] I do not know what foundation Moreri has to ſay that ſhe was deſcended of a very noble family. Laertius and Gaſſendi, whom he cites, ſay nothing of it. He names her Chærecrate in the Article of Epicurus: this is his ſecond fault. He may alſo be reproached with faults of omiſſion; for there were two curious particulars to be taken notice of with regard to this woman.

I. She went with her ſon even into uninhabited houſes, to drive away hobgoblins by prayers. Thus the learned Mr. du Rondel (12) has rendered the following Greek of Diogenes Laertius: Σὺν τῇ μητρὶ περιϊόντα αὐτὸν ἐς τὰ οἰκίδια καθαρμοὺς ἀναγινώσκειν (13). He has explained the matter more fully in his Latin Edition, and always to the advantage of Epicurus. Certum eſt, ſays he (14), Epicurum utpote puſionem & matris aſſeclam hinc hauſiſſe pietatem ſuam ineffabilem, ὁσιότητα ἄλεκτον, ex illoque tempore fuiſſe Divis addictiſſimum, ut patet ex illa portentificâ ſuperſtitione, quâ cum matre Epicurus circumeundo ædiculas carmina luſtralia, καθαρμούς, legeret, vel ad affectus moderandos, vel ad ſpectra abigenda; quaſi Hecates diaconi fuiſſent, in cujus nomine pleraque patrare tum poterant miracula. i. e. "It is certain that Epi- "curus, being the favourite and attendant of his mo- "ther, drew hence his unſpeakable piety, and from "that time became ſtrictly devoted to the Gods, as "appears from that exceſſive ſuperſtition which Epi- "curus ſhewed in going about with his mother from "one houſe to another, and reading expiatory verſes, "either to lull the diſorders of the mind, or to drive "away ſpirits; as if they had been the Miniſters of "Hecate, in whoſe name they could then perform al- "moſt all kinds of miracles." When I ſay he has turned the thing to the advantage of Epicurus, I do not mean to charge him with having ſuppoſed that Chæreſtrata's employment was an honourable one. He has too much underſtanding and learning not to know that the employment of thoſe old women who went to read certain forms of prayer to purify houſes or perſons, was looked upon as vile and mercenary (15). The trade of an Exorciſt did not paſs for a creditable one. The Orator Æſchines, the ſon of a woman who had followed it, had a thouſand ignominious reproaches caſt on him on that account by Demoſthenes. Epicurus and he were in the ſame predicament: they had each of them aſſiſted his mother in that ceremony; Demoſthenes upbraided the one with it, as the Stoics did the other. This is what one of the new Commentators of Laertius (16) has obſerved on the words καθαρμοὺς ἀναγινώσκειν. Eadem exprobrat Æſchini Demoſthenes in Orat. de Coron. (17) Τῇ μητρὶ τελούσῃ τὰς βίβλους ἀναγινώσκειν ἢ τἆλλα συνιστανούσῃ &c. Nempe Epicuri mater dicitur fuiſſe anicula piatrix quæ domos circumibat, & piaculo aliquo contactos ſolvebat aut totam domum expiabat. Epicurus vero matri præibat carmen piaculare: utrumque miniſterium ἄτιμον. Take notice that ſome celebrated Authors have compoſed ſuch forms of expiation (18). I may be told, perhaps, that we do not find that the forms of Chæreſtrata and her ſon Epicurus were exorciſms of hobgoblins: but what does this ſignify? Mr. du Rondel had notwithſtanding a reaſonable foundation for advancing what he has ſaid; for it is indubitable that the Pagans had ceremonies appointed for the chaſing away of ſpirits. Mr. Lomeier has quoted Ovid (19), Valerius Flaccus (20), and Lucian (21). Now let us ſee in what manner the turn which Mr. du Rondel has taken is advantageous to Epicurus. That Philoſopher, believing the Gods did not meddle with human affairs, was ſuſpected of irreligion: this rendered him odious, and expoſed him to infamy. There is nothing more proper, therefore, to preſerve his reputation, than to ſay that from his infancy he went to read prayers in houſes for the ſervice of his neighbours. This was an act of ſuperſtitious piety.

(12) Du Rondel, dans la Vie d'Epicure, pag. 3, 4.

(13) Diog. Laert. in Epicuro, lib. 10. num. 4.

(14) Du Rondel, de Vita & Morib. Epicuri, pag. 3.

(15) Et veniat quæ luſtret anus lectumque, locumque, Præferat & tremula ſulphur & ova manu. i. e. "Let the "lean hag her "eggs and ſul- "phur bring, "And round the "bed-place walk "the magic ring. Ovid. de Arte amandi, lib. 2. ver. 329. See Lomeier, de Luſtrationibus Gentilium, cap. 13. pag. 119.

(16) Joachimus Kuhnius, pag. 554. edit. Laertij Amſtelod. 1692.

(17) See Lomeier, de Luſtrationibus, pag. 119.

(18) Epimenides is one of them. See Voſſius, de Pottis Græcis, pag. 17.

(19) Lib. V Faſtor. apud Lomeierum de Veterum Gentilium Luſtrationibus, pag. 231, 232.

II. The ſecond curious thing which might be ſaid of Chæreſtrata is, that, as her ſon affirmed, ſhe had had in her body the quantity of atoms, the concourſe of which was neceſſary to form a wiſe man. Ἡ δὲ μήτηρ ἀτόμους ἔσχεν ἐν αὐτῇ τοσαύτας, οἵαι συνελθεῖσαι σοφὸν ἂν ἐγέννησαν. Matrem quoque ſuam in ſe tot tantaſque habuiſſe atomos, quarum congreſſu ſapiens ederetur (22). Plutarch alledges this as a proof of Epicurus's vanity. This proof is not ill choſen, for it is a great preſumption to believe that one has been formed of the choiceſt atoms, and that one had a mother in whom nature had joined together full as many ingredients as were neceſſary for the forming a wiſe man. I do not find any Writer has quoted this paſſage of Plutarch faithfully. Every body imagines it was Neocles, the brother of Epicurus, who ſaid this of his mother. Gaſſendi, who underſtood Greek well, would not have committed this miſtake (23), if he had had recourſe to the original; but as he believed the Tranſlations were true, he went no farther. The Latin Verſion, and that of Amiot, are ſuch, that it cannot be maintained they do not contain the ſenſe of the original: nevertheleſs they are defective becauſe they are (20) Argon, lib. 3. ver. 448. apud eund. pag. 309.

(21) In Necyom. apud eund. pag. 313.

(22) Plut. in Tractatu quod non poteſt ſuaviter vivi juxta Epicurum, pag. 1100, A.

(23) De Vita & Morib. Epicuri, lib. 1. cap. 8.

It was not to fix there; for at the age of twenty three he went to his father who dwelt at Colophon, and afterwards resided at divers places before he settled himself at Athens, which he did at the age of about thirty six (d). He set up a school in a fine garden he had bought (e); where he lived with his friends in great tranquillity, and brought up a great number of Disciples. They lived all in common with their master [D], and a better are equally liable to both interpretations. They may as well signify that Neocles said this, as that Epicurus said it. Whence, by the way, we may gather that the Vaugelas's, and the Bouhours's are more in the right than is commonly imagined, to recommend such a placing of words as may exclude even the least ambiguities. Naudé has committed the same fault before Gassendi. Neocles, says he (24), said in praise of Epicurus his brother, that at his generation nature had assembled all the atoms of prudence in his mother's womb. It is plain that this is a very loose paraphrase of Plutarch's Greek, or rather a falsification of it. Father Rapin has wandered yet farther out of the way. Epicurus, says he (25), was naturally wise, since he was a Philosopher even in pleasure: he was a man of such understanding, that his brother Neocles says in Plutarch, that nature had assembled all the atoms of wisdom and knowledge to compose his person, while he himself says that he knows nothing. What is extraordinary here is, to see that alledged as a proof of Epicurus's modesty, which Plutarch had alledged to convict him of pride. It is supposed that he very humbly rejects the encomiums which his brother offers him, and it is he who bestows those encomiums on himself in the Author quoted. So true it is that when we undertake to apply passages taken elsewhere, than from their source, or venture to draw consequences from them before we are certain of the literal and original meaning, we expose our selves to strange mistakes!

(d) See Gassendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 1. cap. 3.

(e) Laert. in Epicuro, lib. 10. num. 10.

(24) Apologie des grans Hommes, chap. 17. pag. m. 502.

(25) Reflexions sur la Philosophie, num. 29. pag. 361. of the Dutch Edition 1686. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, May 1686, Art. IV. pag. 528. where it is only insinuated that this is a bad translation of Plutarch's words.

Mr. Chevreau has followed the error of Gassendi and Father Rapin. See the second page of the first volume of the Chevræana.

[D] His disciples lived all in common with their master.] Laertius (26) testifies that Epicurus had so many friends, that the very cities could not have contained them. People went to him from all the cities of Greece and Asia (27). Egypt itself sent him disciples (28). The city of Lampsacus, where he had professed Philosophy (29), sent him a great many. He would not imitate Pythagoras, who taught that among friends goods ought to be in common: he found such an establishment shewed distrust (30), and he had rather things should be on such a foot that every one might voluntarily contribute to the needs of others when it was necessary. It is certain that this idea approaches nearer to perfection than the community of goods, and that we cannot sufficiently admire the union of Epicurus's disciples, and the kindness with which they assisted one another, every one continuing master of his patrimony. Here is a fine passage of Cicero. De qua (amicitia) Epicurus quidem ita dicit, omnium rerum, quas ad beate vivendum sapientia comparaverit, nihil esse majus amicitia, nihil uberius, nihil jucundius. Neque vero hoc oratione solum, sed multo magis vita, & moribus comprobavit. Quod quam magnum sit, fictæ veterum fabulæ declarant, in quibus tam multis tamque variis ab ultima antiquitate repetitis, tria vix amicorum paria reperiuntur, ut ad Orestem pervenias profectus à Theseo. At vero Epicurus una in domo, & ea quidem angusta, quàm magnos, quantaque amoris conspiratione consentientes tenuit amicorum greges? Quod sit etiam nunc ab Epicureis (31). "Of which (friendship) Epicurus "says, that of all things which wisdom has provided to render life happy, nothing is greater, more "abundant, or more agreeable, than friendship. Nor "did he maintain this by words alone, but much more "by his life and manners. The greatness of which "behaviour is declared by the fabulous stories of the "ancients, in so infinite a number of which and of "such variety, fetched from the most remote antiquity, there are scarce three pair of friends to be "met with from Theseus down to Orestes. But what "large assemblies of friends, and how strictly united "in reciprocal love did Epicurus entertain in one little house? Which harmony is at this day kept up "by the Epicureans." Let any man tell us after this, that people who deny Providence, and lay down their own pleasure for their ultimate end, are by no means capable of living in Society; that they are necessarily perfidious, deceitful, poisoners, thieves, &c. Are not all these fine doctrines confounded by this one passage of Cicero? Does not a true fact, like that which Cicero has just now attested, overthrow a hundred volumes of speculative reasonings? Behold the Sect of Epicurus, whose moral practice with regard to the duties of friendship had not degenerated for some ages: and we shall see immediately that whereas the most devout Sects were full of quarrels and acts of partiality, that of Epicurus enjoyed a profound peace. They followed the doctrine of their Founder without contestations or contradictions (32). Dolet profecto mihi eos (successores Platonis) omnia molitos non esse, ut plenam sibi atque integram in omnibus cum Platone consensionem defenderent. Et ea quidem Plato dignus erat, qui magno illo Pythagora ut melior non fuerit, non fuit tamen fortasse deterior: quem discipuli quod sequuti omnes ac venerati fuerint, id etiam egere potissimum, ut summo apud omnes in pretio habeatur. Hoc ipsum Epicurei, perperam illi quidem, sed tamen cum intelligerent, nulla unquam in re ab Epicuro dissidere visi sunt, sed potius eadem omnino se cum Sapiente suo sentire professi, jure propterea id nominis habuere. Quin etiam, qui longissimo deinceps intervallo consequuti Epicurei sunt, ii nec abs se mutuo, nec ab eodem Epicuro tantillum, quod quidem meminisse attineat, discessere. Imo sceleris apud eos, vel potius impietatis ille damnetur, qui novi quippiam invexerit. Quare nemo prorsus id audeat. Sed eorum dogmata ob constantem illam omnium inter se perpetuamque concordiam, in altissima quadam & tranquillissima pace versantur. Ita hæc Epicuri secta veræ cuidam Reipublicæ perfimilis est, quam ab omni seditione remotissimam, mens quædam una communis, unaque sententia moderetur. Quam illi disciplinam & antea sequuti sunt multi perlibenter, & sequuntur etiamnum, atque adeo, ut simillimum veri est, in posterum sequentur. At Stoicos inter factiones extitere, quæ ab ipsis eorum commissæ Principibus, ad nos usque propagatæ sunt (33). i. e. "Truly I am sorry that the successors of Plato did "not employ their utmost means to maintain a per"fect and absolute agreement with him in all things. "And this Plato deserved, who tho' he was not better "than the great Pythagoras, neither, perhaps, was "he inferior to him; whose disciples, as they all fol"lowed and reverenced their master, made this their "chief aim, that he might be held in the highest "esteem. The Epicureans when they understood this, "tho' they took the matter wrong, have never been "seen to dissent from Epicurus in any one thing, but "rather professing to agree entirely in opinion with "their master, justly deserve that appellation. And "even the Epicureans who have succeeded after a long "interval of time, have neither dissented from one "another, nor from the same Epicurus in the least "particular worthy of notice. Nay, among them "that man would be judged guilty of a crime, or ra"ther of impiety, who should introduce any novelty. "For which reason none dares to do it: but their doc"trines, by reason of that constant and perpetual con"cord which subsists among them all, enjoy a most "profound and undisturbed peace. So that this Sect "of Epicurus resembles some real Republic, which "being most free from all sedition is governed by one "common mind and one will. Which discipline "they have formerly most willingly followed in great "numbers, and yet do follow, so that it is probable "they will continue the same for the future. But "among the Stoics factions have arisen, which being "begun by their Heads, have been continued down "to us." This is what one says who lived in the second Century: the union among the disciples of Epicurus was preserved to that time, and seemed not to be threatened with any reverse. This is what Numenius testifies. His conjecture was not contradicted by the event, that I know of.

(26) Lib. 10. num. 9.

(27) See Gassendi, de Vita & Mor. Epicuri, lib. 1. cap. 7.

(28) Idem, ibid. ex Plutarcho.

(29) For 4 years, according to Suidas.

(30) Laert. lib. 10. num. 11.

(31) Cicero, de Finibus, lib. 1. cap. 20.

(32) Ea quæ Epicuro placuerunt, ut quasdam Solonis aut Lycurgi leges ab Epicureis omnibus servari. Themistius, Orat. IV. apud Gassendum, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 2. cap. 5. Apud istos quicquid dicit Hermachus, quicquid Metrodorus ad unum refertur. Omnia quæ quisquam in illo contubernio loquutus est, unius ductu & auspiciis dicta sunt. Seneca, Epist. 33.

(33) Numenius apud Eusеb. Præpar. Evang. lib. 14. cap. 5. pag. 727.

Let us speak here of a particular which I have promised in the last lines of the article of CARNEADES.

better regulated ſociety had never been ſeen. The reſpect which his followers preſerved for his memory is admirable. His ſchool was never divided; but his doctrine was followed there as an Oracle (f). His birth-day was ſtill kept in Pliny's time, and the month he was born in, was a continued feſtival. They placed his picture every where (g). He wrote

(f) See the Remark [D].

(g) Gaſſendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 2. cap. 4. ex Cicer. lib. 5 de Finibus, init. & ex Plinio, lib. 35. cap. 2.

One of the accuſations brought againſt Epicurus was his having ſpoken ſatyrically of the moſt illuſtrious Philoſophers. Diogenes Laertius (34), deſigning to ſhew that it was a ſenſeleſs calumny, contents himſelf with ſaying that there were ſufficient teſtimonies of the civility and extreme goodneſs of Epicurus towards every body. He alledges the ſtatues of braſs raiſed to that Philoſopher, the great number of his friends, the immoveable attachment of all his diſciples, and the perpetual ſucceſſion of his ſchool. He ſays the leſſons of Epicurus were a Syren's ſong, which captivated all his Auditors, excepting Metrodorus of Stratonice, who left him to follow Carneades: Οὗτε γνήσιοι ἀκόλουθοι, ταῖς δογματικαῖς αὐτοῦ σειρῆσι προκατασχεθέντες, πλὴν Μητροδώρου τοῦ Στρατονικέως πρὸς Καρνεάδην ἀποχωρήσαντος, πάλαι βαρυνθέντος ταῖς ἀνυπερβλήτοις αὐτοῦ χρηστότησιν. That is, according to the Latin verſion printed with the Greek of Diogenes Laertius, Præterea omnes diſcipuli quos illius dogmaticæ ſyrenes occuparunt: præter unum Metrodorum Stratonicenſem, qui ab illo ſe ad Carneadem contulit: cui forte gravis erat viri incomparabilis bonitas. According to this Tranſlation, the extraordinary goodneſs of Epicurus was the cauſe of Metrodorus's leaving him. This ſenſe ſhocks the Readers at firſt ſight; but agrees perfectly well with the deſign of Diogenes Laertius, and on a ſerious attention to the caprices of the heart of man, it will not be found incredible that there ſhould be people who are diſpleaſed, troubled, and fatigued with the exceſſive goodneſs of their benefactor. Wherefore, let it be ſuppoſed Diogenes Laertius meant to ſay that Metrodorus, who of all Epicurus's diſciples was the only one who forſook him, did it, perhaps, for no other reaſon than becauſe Epicurus's too great kindneſs made him uneaſy: we ſhall find a coherent argument, and a very poſſible fact; we ſhall find that the very deſertion of Metrodorus ſerved to prove that incomparable humanity, to aſſure the praiſe and poſſeſſion whereof to Epicurus was the point in view. But as it happens more frequently without compariſon that exceſſive marks of friendſhip attract peoples affection, than that they alienate it, there is an interpretation of Laertius's words a thouſand times more natural than that which has been hitherto followed; that is, that Metrodorus did not ſeparate himſelf from Epicurus to adhere to Carneades for any other reaſon than becauſe he perhaps found himſelf overwhelmed with the favours which Carneades had heaped on him. This interpretation is not ſo favourable to the Author's deſign as the former, and yet it does not thwart it much: for if you ſuppoſe that nothing debauched Metrodorus but the extraordinary friendſhip, and exceſſive careſſes of Carneades, you cannot maintain that his deſertion ſhakes what has been ſaid of the good nature of Epicurus, and which has been proved, among other reaſons, by the faithful attachment of his Diſciples. So that nothing hinders us from taking this new ſenſe of Diogenes Laertius's words to be more natural. Yet perhaps it is not what he meant, for that Author not being much more exact in his reaſonings than in his narrations, we may eaſily be miſtaken in imputing to him thoſe thoughts which ſeem to have the greateſt connection with his phraſes. However it be, I muſt acquaint the public that Mr. de la Monnoie is the Author of the new interpretation which has been ſeen above, and ſhall inſert here an Extract of one of his Letters. "I am perſuaded, with Gaſſendi, that when Diogenes writes that of all the Diſciples of Epicurus Metrodorus is the only one who left him to follow Carneades, we are not to underſtand that Metrodorus was the Auditor of Epicurus, but ſimply that he was the only Epicurean who changed his ſect, and renounced the Philoſophy of Epicurus to embrace that of Carneades. Mr. Menage declares that he ſhould willingly be of the ſame opinion, were it not for theſe words of Diogenes, τάχα βαρυνθέντος ταῖς ἀνυπερβλήτοις αὐτοῦ χρηστότησιν, by which it appears, ſays he, that notwithſtanding the explications of Gaſſendi, this Metrodorus muſt have been the contemporary of Epicurus, ſince it was only to get rid of the fatiguing kindneſs of ſo good a maſter, with which he was overburthened, that he ceaſed to be an Epicurean, and went over from that party to that of Carneades. Neither Mr. Menage nor Gaſſendi have perceived that the true ſenſe of the paſſage of Diogenes is, that if Metrodorus, from an Epicurean as he was before, became a follower of Carneades, it was perhaps for no other reaſon than on account of the unbounded favours which the latter loaded him with. The pronoun αὐτοῦ, which ought to be underſtood of Carneades, has hitherto been wrongly referred to Epicurus; and this has cauſed all the confuſion (35)."

(34) Laert. lib. 10. num. 9.

(35) La Monnoie, Remarque MS.

They who refer the pronoun αὐτοῦ to Epicurus, muſt agree that Diogenes Laertius is guilty of a notorious falſhood; that is, that he imagined Carneades and Epicurus philoſophized at the ſame time. Gaſſendi (36) plainly ſhews it to be a groſs miſtake; and proves that Epicurus died before Carneades was born. He obſerves that Metrodorus did not go over from the ſect of Epicurus to the ſchool of that Carneades, whom Cicero ſpeaks of in the 5th Book de Finibus; for that Carneades was himſelf an Epicurean, Epicuri perfamiliaris. He proves alſo that Metrodorus of Stratonice was not the Auditor of a Carneades contemporary with Epicurus and Arceſilaus, but of the Carneades who was the fourth Succeſſor of Arceſilaus, and founded the third Academy. We may add to theſe proofs what Jonſius (37) obſerves, that Metrodorus of Stratonice could not be the friend of Epicurus, who died before the city of Stratonice was founded. Take notice that Jonſius (38), and Mr. Menage (39) agree in ſaying that Diogenes Laertius has expreſſed himſelf like one who deſigned to tell his Readers that Epicurus and Carneades flouriſhed at the ſame time. This is to reject the explication of Gaſſendi (40); and I am not ſurprized at their rejecting it, for it is forced to the laſt degree. He fancies the Hiſtorian meant only this; that Metrodorus was the only Epicurean who quitted the ſect, and that he quitted it becauſe the tenderneſs of Epicurus, who had been dead a conſiderable time, was ſtill living in his ſect: Quod bonitas verò Epicuri gravis illi (Metrodoro Stratonicco) fuiſſe dicatur, intelligi poteſt de ea quam Epicurus tametſi mortuus ſpiraret adhuc in ſummâ illa conſenſione, charitate, & ſui memoria apud ſectatores (41). There is no occaſion for ſo bad a ſolution, if we explain the paſſage as Mr. de la Monnoie does. I muſt not forget that Mr. Foucher (42) took advantage of theſe words of Diogenes Laertius to maintain his falſe ſuppoſition that Carneades and Epicurus lived at the ſame time. Mr. Lantin anſwered him among other things, that Diogenes Laertius is not an Author to be depended on, and that it is eaſy to obſerve in his Hiſtory ſeveral paſſages which contradict one another, becauſe he has followed Authors of contrary opinions (43). We ſhall meet with one of his contradictions without departing from our ſubject: we have ſeen he aſſerts that Metrodorus of Stratonice was the only one who had abjured, and yet he had ſaid a little before that Timocrates a Diſciple of Epicurus had quitted that ſchool (44), and afterwards publiſhed a great many calumnies againſt his old Maſter (45) I have not read any Author who has taken notice of this fault. If Gaſſendi had perceived it, he would not have made uſe of the argument we are going to ſee: Sane, ſays he (46), ſi Metrodorus à vivente adhuc Epicuro defeciſſet, quæſitum non fuiſſet ex Arceſila (qui duodecim annis Epicuro ſupervixit) (*) cur homines à cæteris ad Epicureos, ab Epicureis verò ad cæteros non commigrarent. i. e. "Indeed, if Metrodorus had forſaken Epicurus while he was living, it would not have been demanded of Arceſilaus, who ſurvived Epicurus twelve years, why men went over from the other ſects to the Epicureans, but not from the Epicureans to the other ſects?" Is it not certain that Timocrates left Epicurus? Since his deſertion therefore did not prevent the queſtion which was put to Arceſilaus, the deſertion of Metrodorus would not have prevented that queſtion, and conſequently Gaſſendi makes uſe of a bad proof. The proverb one ſwallow makes no ſummer is the ſolution of this; for tho' the inconſtancy of one ſingle follower of Epicurus was known, it was nevertheleſs deemed in general that nobody had quitted Epicureiſm.

(36) Gaſſendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 4. cap. 8. pag. m. 205.

(37) Jonſius, de Scriptor. Hiſt. Philoſ. pag. 350.

(38) Idem, ibid. pag. 111.

(39) Menag, in Diogen. Laert. lib. 10. num. 9. pag. 451.

(40) Gaſſendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 4. cap. 8. pag. 205.

(41) Idem, ibid.

(42) See the Journal des Savans of the 6th of Auguſt 1691, pag. m. 511.

(43) Journ. des Savans of the 24th of March 1692, pag. m. 210.

(44) Μαθητὴς δὲ αὐτοῦ τῆς σχολῆς ἐκποιήσατο. Ipſiuſque (Epicuri) diſcipulus ejus relictâ ſchola. Diogen. Laert. lib. 10. num. 6.

(45) See Remark [K].

(46) Gaſſend. de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, pag. 205.

(*) Apud Laert. lib. 4.

wrote a great many Books, and valued himſelf on making no quotations [E]. He raiſed the Atomical Syſtem to an exceeding great reputation. He was not the inventor of [E] He wrote a great many Books, and valued himſelf on making no quotations.] Diogenes Laertius, ſpeaking of the Philoſophers who have written the moſt (47), places Chryſippus in the firſt rank, and Epicurus in the ſecond: thus he diſpoſes of the places in his preface; but in his tenth Book he ſays abſolutely and without reſerve, that of all Authors, Epicurus is the man who has written the moſt (48). His works, continues he, amount to 300 volumes, which contain nothing but what is his own: for he borrows the words of no Author, nor cites any body. But as to Chryſippus, who would not ſuffer himſelf to be ſurpaſſed by Epicurus in the number of compoſitions, he did nothing but heap up quotation on quotation, ſo that if what he cited had been taken away from him, his writings would have been reduced to blank paper. Καὶ Ἀπολλόδωρος δὲ ὁ Ἀθηναῖος ἐν τῇ συναγωγῇ τῶν δογμάτων βυλόμενος παριστάνειν, ὅτι τὰ Ἐπικούρου οἰκεῖα δυνάμει γεγραμμένα, καὶ ἀπαράθετα ὄντα, μυρίῳ πλείω ἐστὶ τῶν Χρυσίππου βιβλίων, φησὶν ἔτως αὐτῇ τῇ λέξει, Εἰ γάρ τις ἀφέλοι τῶν Χρυσίππου βιβλίων ὅσ' ἀλλότρια παρατέθειται, κενὸς αὐτῷ ὁ χάρτης καταλελείψεται. Appollodorus quoque Athenienſis in collectione dogmatum, cùm vellet aſſerere Epicurum viribus ſuis fretum conſcripſiſſe & abſque auctorum teſtimoniis, eſſe ejus incomparabiliter plura quàm Chryſippi opera, ſic ad verbum dixit. Nam ſi quis tollat de Chryſippi libris, quæ aliena ſunt, vacua illi charta relinquetur (49). His emulation was ſuch, that ſo ſoon as he ſaw a new book of Epicurus publiſhed, he compoſed another (50); and that in ſuch haſte, not to be long behind-hand, that he did not read his compoſition over again; which engaged him in repetitions, and made him advance many things very incorrect. Diogenes in another place (51) quotes Apollodorus, who proves by this argument that Epicurus had compoſed more Books than Chryſippus. The latter had only copied what others had ſaid, but Epicurus had taken every thing out of his own ſtock.

(47) Diog. Laert. in Proœmio, num. 16.

(48) Γέγονε δὲ πολυγραφώτατος ὁ Ἐπίκουρος πάντας ὑπερβαλλόμενος πλήθει βίβλων. Scripſit autem Epicurus infinita volumina, adeo ut illorum multitudine CUNCTOS ſuperarit. Idem, lib. 10. num. 26.

(49) Idem, lib. 8. num. 181.

(50) Idem, lib. 10. num. 26.

(51) See the Citation (49).

AN Obſervation on Books full of Quotations.

Since an opportunity offers, let us ſay ſomething of theſe two ways of writing, I mean that of Epicurus, and that of Chryſippus. It would be very unreaſonable to inſiſt, generally ſpeaking, that Epicurus's method is that of great genius's, and the moſt troubleſome; and that Chryſippus's method is that of narrow underſtandings, and the leaſt laborious. Take good notice that by Chryſippus's method I only underſtand the cuſtom of collecting authorities, and not the perſonal negligence of that Philoſopher, and the exceſſes he abandoned himſelf to in compiling. This being premiſed, I maintain that there are as great Authors, and as ſublime genius's in Chryſippus's ſect, as in the oppoſite; and I prove it by the three great names which Gabriel Naudé is going to produce. Methinks, ſays he (52), it belongs only to thoſe who never hope to be quoted, to quote no body: and it is too great a preſumption to perſuade one's ſelf that one has conceptions capable of pleaſing ſo great a variety of Readers, without borrowing any thing from another: for if ever there were any Authors who could eſteem themſelves ſuch, they were, without controverſy, Plutarch, Seneca, and Montagne; who yet have left nothing unborrowed from others, which might ſerve to embelliſh their own writings: witneſs the Greek and Latin verſes, which are to be met with in almoſt every line of their works, and among others that piece of conſolation of ſeven or eight ſheets which the firſt ſent to Apollonius, wherein we may find on computation, above 150 verſes of Homer, and almoſt as many of Heſiod, Pindar, Sophocles, and Euripides. And beſides, I do not think that theſe new Cenſors of the manner of writing are ſo injudicious as to oppoſe to the preceding authorities that of Epicurus, who in 300 volumes which he left behind him, had not inſerted one ſingle quotation; becauſe they would thereby furniſh me with means to confute them, ſince the works of Plutarch, Seneca, and Montagne are every day read, turned over, ſold, and reprinted; whereas we have ſcarce the catalogue of thoſe of Epicurus left remaining in Diogenes Laertius. We might add Cicero to theſe three examples; and we cannot condemn thoſe who add to them Apuleius, ſince he was one of the moſt ingenious men of his age. Count well all the examples that follow. "We "ſee in that beautiful dialogue of the moſt illuſtrious "Orators of Rome, that they did not think their elo- "quence could be corrupted by quotations; the ſpeech "of Aper teaching us it was then expected that Ora- "tions ſhould be adorned with the beauties of the "Poetry of Horace, Virgil, or Lucan; to ſay no- "thing of that of Ennius or Nævius, which fills "whole pages in Cicero's Philoſophical Works (53)... "and we may obſerve from the apology of Apuleius, "one of the moſt eloquent pieces of all antiquity, "notwithſtanding the impurity of ſome expreſſions of "which we have already ſpoken, that in the time of "the Antoninus's, it was not thought that Greek and "Latin paſſages could ſpoil a fine work; ſince that "is full of paſſages taken from Plato and ſeveral other "Philoſophers, with a great number of verſes of Homer, "Catullus, and Virgil (54)." La Mothe le Vayer is here pleading his own cauſe; for he was the greateſt Quoter in the world. People may ſay as long as they pleaſe, that his Books would be better if they were not ſo ſtuffed with foreign thoughts: it will never be denied unleſs by thoſe who want judgment and taſte, but that he had a great deal of genius. People may ſay as long as they pleaſe that Coſtar's writings are too full of authorities, they may call him as long as they pleaſe, the Protector of common-places (55); it will not be the leſs true that he was a great Wit. Mr. Menage, who beſtows this encomium upon him, is himſelf one of thoſe Authors who will do France moſt honour. I meet with but few who diſpute his right to the title of the French Varro (56). In a word, he is a great Author; and yet he ſaid himſelf, Mademoiſelle de Scuderi . . . has written fourſcore volumes all out of her own head, and I have collected here and there all that I have written (57). Let us content our ſelves with theſe examples, without alledging the Tiraqueau's, the Briſſon's, the Servin's, and ſuch other illuſtrious Members of the Parliament of Paris: let us not ſay that they quoted prodigiouſly, and that it was alſo done in thoſe ſtudied ſpeeches which the firſt Preſidents of the King's Counſel recited in that age (58) at the opening of the Courts. Neither let us ſpeak of the excellent and admirable pleadings of MR. le Maitre, the ornament of the ſame Bar in the following age. Who does not know that they are full of quotations (§ α)?

§ (α) Not that they were ſo pronounced: but Mr. le Maitre adorned his pleadings with thoſe quotations, particularly in an Edition which he publiſhed on purpoſe. Every body knows this. REM. CRIT.]

It is therefore an inconteſtable fact, that there are great Genius's, and great Authors to be found in the ſect of Chryſippus, and that it is not the diſtinguiſhing character of Genius's or Authors of that kind, to make few or no citations. Let us now conſider the other queſtion; and examine what method of compoſing is the moſt laborious.

I think Writers who quote much may be reduced to two claſſes: there are ſome who content themſelves with pillaging modern Authors, and collecting into one body the compilations of ſeveral others who have written on the ſame ſubject. Theſe verify nothing, and never have recourſe to the originals: they do not even examine what goes before and what follows in the modern Author which ſerves them for an original; they do not tranſcribe the paſſages, but only refer their Printer to the pages of the printed books from whence thoſe paſſages are to be taken. It cannot be denied but this method of compoſing books is very eaſy, and that without much fatiguing a Writer's brain, it may ſoon help them to fill ten large volumes. There are other Quoters who truſt none but themſelves; they will verify every thing, and always go to the fountain-head; they examine into the deſign of the Author, they do not confine themſelves to the paſſage they have occaſion for, but attentively conſider what goes before, and what follows. They endeavour to make beautiful applications, and to connect their authorities properly; they compare them with one another, and either reconcile them, or ſhew wherein they claſh. Beſides they may be men who are religiouſly ſcrupulous in matters of fact, not to advance any thing without proof. If they ſay ſuch a Greek Philoſopher was of this or that opinion, or ſuch a Roman Senator or General followed ſuch and ſuch maxims, they immediately produce evi-

(52) Naudé, Preface de l'Apologie des grans Hommes.

(53) See the firſt Part of the Proſe chagrine of la Mothe le Vayer, pag. 341. of the 9th Volume, where it is ſaid that Cicero, Seneca, and Plutarch, in their Philoſophical Works, let ſlip no opportunity of quoting what they had learned from the greateſt Poets, Orators, and Philoſophers, who were Ancients with reſpect to themſelves, whoſe Works they endeavoured to imitate, and which they had reduced into common places.

(54) La Mothe le Vayer, Diſcours de l'Eloquence Françoiſe, pag. 84. of the 4th Volume of the Edition in 12mo.

(55) This is the Title Furetiere gives him in the Nouvelle Allegorique.

(56) He even ſurpaſſes Varro, who was learned without being polite. Mr. Menage with a great deal of erudition was maſter of the trifling delicacies of wit.

(57) Menagiana, pag. 290. of the firſt Dutch Edition.

(58) That is, in the 16th Century.

(b) See the Article of LEUCIPPUS.

of it (b); but he made some change in it, which was not always for the better: for instance, he spoiled the System by not retaining Democritus's doctrine concerning the Soul of Atoms [F]. What he taught with respect to the nature of the Gods is most impious [G]. As to his doctrine concerning the supreme good or happiness, it was very liable dence for it; and because in some instances the singularity of the thing requires several testimonies, therefore they collect several. I am not afraid to say of this way of composing, that it is an hundred times more laborious than that of our Epicurus; and that a man might write a Book of a thousand pages according to the last method, in less time than one of four hundred pages according to the first. This will be better comprehended by an example. Suppose an able man is to prove that such a Father of the Church was of such an opinion (59); I am sure it will take him up more days to collect the passages which he will have occasion for, than to argue at random on those passages. Having once found out his authorities and his quotations, which perhaps will not fill six pages, and may have cost him a month's labour, he will have finished in two mornings work twenty pages of arguments, objections, and answers to objections: and consequently what proceeds from our own genius sometimes costs much less time than what is requisite for compiling (60). I am sure Corneille would have wanted more time to defend a Tragedy by a great collection of authorities, than to write it; and I suppose the same number of pages in the Tragedy, and in the Defence. Heinsius, perhaps, bestowed more time in defending his Herodes infanticida (61) against Balzac, than a Spanish Metaphysician bestows on a large Volume of Disputations, where he takes all from his own stock. I believe the Pleadings wherein Mr. le Maître collected a great many authorities, cost him more than the others, and were composed with more labour than those of Mr. Patru, who scarce quoted at all.

(59) I do not mean all sorts of opinions, but certian particular opinions which are only insinuated here and there.

(60) See the Nouvelles Lettres du Critique de M. Maimbourg, at the beginning of the 10th Letter, pag. 298, 299.

(61) This Apology contains 264 pages, in 8vo.

I do not enter into the question, which of the two methods is to be preferred; I shall only say, that the Authors who borrow nothing are for the generality less instructive than those who display their collections. A good thought, from whatever author it proceeds, will always be better than a piece of nonsense of one's own (62), with submission to those who boast of finding every thing at home, and being beholden to no body (63). I add, that there is not less invention in justly applying a thought one finds in a book, than in being the first author of that thought. This appears in the Conversations of Voiture. Cardinal du Perron has been heard to say that the happy application of a verse of Virgil was worth a talent (64). I omit those who compare the first production of a thought to the act of generation, and the art of applying old thoughts to the power of raising the dead: this is declaring ourselves too much prepossessed favour of Collections. However I shall quote the words of the person who has shewn himself thus partial. "As a great many people are guilty of a fault in the "immoderate use of quotations, there are others who "are ridiculous by a silly affectation of never quoting "any body, and of fetching every thing from home; "like that Hippias of Elis who merrily bragged that he "wore nothing but what was made by his own hands. "For I easily ascribe to this vanity the great contempt "some express for authorities of all sorts, to shew that "they produce nothing but what is their own, that "fine thoughts spring out of their head, as Pallas did "from that of Jupiter, and that they procreate as he "did without the help of another. To which nevertheless it may be answered, that generation is performed by so common an action in all kinds of animals, that there is no reason to make so great account of so easy a thing; whereas it is a miracle to "raise the dead by making them speak again; so that "as it has been said with regard to Religion, that "dead bones have wrought more miracles than living "bodies, it may likewise be maintained with regard "to Rhetoric, that those who are not now in being "have much more power to persuade us than the "living (65)."

(62) See Saint Amant's Preface to his Moïse Sauvé.

(63) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 9. pag. 341.

(64) See the Abbot des Maroles, in the Preface to his Abrégé de l'Histoire de France.

(65) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 4. pag. 83, 84.

[F] He spoiled the Atomic System ... by not retaining Democritus's doctrine concerning the Soul of Atoms.] S. Augustine gives us no room to doubt that Democritus believed all Atoms were animated. Democritus, says he (66), hoc distare in naturalibus quæstionibus ab Epicuro dicitur, quod iste sentit inesse concursioni atomorum vim quandam animalem & spiritalem .... Epicurus verò neque aliquid in principiis rerum ponit præter atomos. i. e. "Democritus is said herein to differ from Epicurus in "natural Philosophy; the former supposes the concourse "of Atoms endued with a certain animal or spiritual "vertue ... whereas Epicurus in the principles of things "acknowledged nothing but Atoms." To pretend that a collection of inanimate Atoms may be a soul, and may emit images which produce thoughts in us, is to swallow an Hypothesis more confused than Hesiod's chaos. Yet this was what Epicurus pretended. Quorum corpusculorum concursu fortuito & mundos innumerabiles, & animantia, & ipsas animas fieri dicit, & Deos quos humana forma, non in aliquo mundo, sed extra mundos, constituit, & non vult omnino aliquid, præter corpora, cogitare: quæ tamen ut cogites, imagines dicit ab ipsis rebus, quas atomis formari putat, defluere, atque in animum introire subtiliores, quàm sunt illæ imagines, quæ ad oculos veniunt (67): i. e. "By the for- "tuitous concourse of which Atoms he teaches that "innumerable worlds, and animals, and souls them- "selves were formed, and also Gods, whom he makes "to be of human shape, and places not in any of the "worlds, but without them all; neither will he allow "any thing, except bodies, to think: and in order "to make you comprehend this, he says that images flow from those things which he supposes to be "formed of Atoms, and insinuate themselves into the "mind, as being more subtle than those images are "which present themselves to the eye." But if we once suppose that all Atoms have a soul, we may easily conceive that their different combinations form divers species of animals, divers sorts of sensation, divers combinations of thoughts; and by this means we are sheltered from the terrible objection of Galen: Cum atomus una dolere non possit, quòd alterationis, & sensus incapax sit, si dum caro acu pungitur, atomus una non sentiat, non sensuras duas, nec treis, nec quatuor, nec plureis; perindeque fore, ut si adamantum, aliarumve rerum invulnerabilium acervus fodiatur. Et, ut digiti connexi absque dolore separantur; sic iri atomos diductum, absque ullo doloris sensu, cùm sese mutuò contingant (68). i. e. "Since a single Atom cannot be affected with "pain, because it is incapable of change or of sensa- "tion, if when the flesh is pricked with a needle, one "Atom does not feel, two will not feel; neither will "three, nor four, nor any other number: and it "would be the same thing as if a heap of diamonds "or other impenetrable bodies were dug into. And "as the fingers joined together are separated without "pain, so Atoms which touch each other might be dis- "joined without any sense of pain." Plutarch had before made the same objection to Colotes (69). Let a man turn himself every way imaginable, as Lucretius and Gassendi (70) have done, to solve this difficulty, he will never be able to make the least impression; and the best that can be said is, that all Philosophers who allow the principles of mixed bodies to be destitute of sensation, expose themselves to the same difficulty as much as Epicurus. We must confess the truth; the Hypothesis of the Soul of the world, or that of Automata, is the only way to extricate one's self out of this perplexity; for it would be dangerous to acknowledge an immaterial soul in brutes as we do in man: and as to the distinction of our Peripatetics between matter and the material soul of brutes, it is a vain subterfuge, and no less defeated by the objection of Galen, than the Atoms of Epicurus (71). However it is not more absurd to suppose that Atoms are essentially animated, than to suppose they exist and move of themselves. See the Article of LEUCIPPUS Remark [E].

(66) Augustin. Epist. 56. I have quoted this passage before at length, in Citation (107 of the Article DEMOCRITUS.

(67) Idem, ibid. pag. m. 273.

(68) Galenus dum interpretatur illud Hippocratis, si unum esset homo, non doleret, quia non foret unde doleret. Apud Gassendum, Phys. Sect. 3. lib. 6. cap. 3. Oper. tom. 2. pag. 343. He cites Lib. de const. art. cap. 4. de Elem. 3 & 4.

(69) Plutarch. adv. Colot. pag. 1111.

(70) See Gassendi, ibid.

(71) See the Remarks [C] and [L] of the Article DICÆARCHUS, Aristotle's Scholar.

Those who have a mind to know the other differences between Democritus and Epicurus need only consult Cicero (72).

(72) Lib. 1. de Finibus.

[G] What he taught with respect to the nature of the Gods is most impious.] It would be too great a neglect of liable to be misinterpreted, and some ill effects proceeded thence which discredited his sect: but at the bottom it was very reasonable, and it cannot be denied but that taking the word happiness in the sense he did, the felicity of man consists in pleasure. Mr. Arnauld has criticised this doctrine in vain [H]. The Stoics, who may be called the Pharisees of Paganism, of the sacred laws of equity to accuse Epicurus of having believed that the Gods do not deserve our worship, respect, and homage: for he openly professed the contrary, and published excellent Books concerning the worship which men owe to the Gods (73). I own it was objected to him, that if he acted according to his own principles he could have no Religion; but herein they only disputed concerning the right, they did not deny the fact; for his outward Religion was never questioned We cannot produce a more credible Witness than Seneca; and this is what he says of the matter: Tu denique, Epicure, Deum inermem facis; omnia illi tela, omnem detraxisti potentiam .... hunc non habes quare verearis, nulla illi nec tribuendi nec nocendi materia est ... Atqui hunc vis videri colere, non aliter quam parentem: grato, ut opinor, animo: aut si non vis videri gratus, quia nullum habes illius beneficium, sed te atomi & istæ micæ tuæ forte ac temere conglobaverunt, cur colis? Propter majestatem, inquis, ejus eximiam, singularemque naturam. Ut concedam tibi: nempe hoc facis nulla spe, nullo precio inductus. Est ergo aliquid per se expetendum, cujus te ipsa dignitas ducit: id est honestum (74). i. e. "In "short, Epicurus, you disarm God; you have strip- "ped him of all his thunder, and all his power ..... "such a Deity you have no reason to fear, since he is "unable to reward or to do hurt... Yet you would "seem to revere this Deity, as a parent; out of a "principle of gratitude, as I suppose: or, if you do "not desire to seem grateful, because you are not o- "bliged to him for any benefit, since you was fortui- "tously formed by a blind concourse of Atoms, why "do you worship him? you answer, for the superla- "tive majesty and singular excellence of his nature. "Be it granted, that you are induced to this by no "hope nor expectation of reward. There is something "therefore which is desirable in itself, the dignity "whereof affects you: that is, what is fit and de- "cent." We have here, in few words, the Religion which Epicurus professed; he honoured the Gods on account of the excellence of their nature, though he expected no good from them, nor feared any ill (75). He paid them a worship which was not mercenary; wherein he did not at all regard his own interest, but the pure ideas of reason which require us to respect and to honour whatever is great and perfect. Perhaps they were not mistaken, who accused him of acting in this manner only out of policy (76), and to avoid the punishment which he would infallibly have suffered, if he had overthrown the worship of the Gods: but though this accusation should have been well grounded, it would nevertheless have been rash. Equity requires that we judge of our neighbour by his words and actions, and not by the secret intentions we imagine he has. We must leave the judgment of what passes in the recesses of the heart to God, who is the only searcher of hearts. And after all, why will we not allow Epicurus to have had the idea of a worship which our most orthodox Divines recommend as the most lawful, and the most perfect? they tell us daily, that though there was neither Paradise to hope for, nor Hell to fear, we should notwithstanding be obliged to honour God, and to do all we think may be pleasing to him (77). I shall cite below (78) the testimony which Diogenes Laertius has borne to Epicurus's piety.

Therefore the sole proof of the Text of this Remark is, that Epicurus reduced the Divine Nature to a state of inaction: he deprived it of the Government of the World, and did not acknowledge it to be the cause of this Universe. This is an enormous impiety. Authors are not agreed concerning the question, whether he taught that the Gods were composed of Atoms. If he had taught that, he would have robbed the Divine Nature of its eternity, and indestructibility; a horrid and most blasphemous doctrine! But I do not believe this can be charged upon him; for one of his first principles was, that God being happy and immortal does hurt to nobody, nor concerns himself with any business. In illis selectis ejus brevibusque sententiis quas appellant κυρίας δόξας hæc, ut opinor, prima sententia est, quod beatum & immortale est, id nec habet, nec exhibet cuiquam negotium (79). We see that the first point of Meditation which he gave his Disciples, was the immortality and felicity of God. Πρῶτον μὲν, τὸν Θεὸν, ζῷον ἄφθαρτον καὶ μακάριον νομίζων, ὡς ἡ κοινὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ νόησις ὑπεγράφη· μηδὲν μήτε τῆς ἀφθαρσίας ἀλλότριον, μήτε τῆς μακαριότητος ἀνοίκειον, αὐτῷ πρόσαπτε· πᾶν δὲ τὸ φυλάττειν αὐτοῦ δυνάμενον τὴν μετὰ ἀφθαρσίας μακαριότητα, περὶ αὐτὸν δόξαζε. Primum quidem, Deum esse animal immortale ac beatum, puta, sicut communis de Deo dictat intelligentia; nihil illi aut ab immortalitate alienum, aut à beatitudine, applicans. Cæterùm omne quod illius cum immortalitate beatitudinem servare possit, de eo opinare 80). i. e. "First, consider God as an immortal and happy Be- "ing, such as common sense tells us he must be; "applying nothing to him which may be re- "pugnant to immortality, or felicity. But what- "ever may preserve his happiness together with "his immortality, that think of him." He did not believe, therefore, that the Gods were made like the World, by the fortuitous concourse of Atoms; he was sensible that by that means he would manifestly have subjected them to death. Idem facit in natura Deorum, dum individuorum corporum concretionem fugit nè interitus & dissipatio consequatur, negat esse corpus Deorum, sed tanquam corpus: nec sanguinem, sed tanquam sanguinem (81). i. e. "He proceeds on the same principle, when he "discourses of the nature of the Gods, avoiding a "concretion of Atoms, lest death and dissipation "should follow. He denies the Gods have either "bodies, or blood; but something analogous to each." Nevertheless Tertullian (82), and St. Augustin (83), maintain he taught that the Divine Nature was composed of Atoms; but Lactantius has better represented this Philosopher's opinion. Deos, says he (84), ajunt incorruptos, æternos, beatos esse: solisque dant immunitatem, ne concursu atomorum concreti esse videantur: si enim Deos quoque ex illis constituissent, dissipabiles fierent, seminibus aliquando resolutis, utque in naturam suam revertentibus. i. e. "They affirm the Gods to "be incorruptible, eternal, and happy; and allow "them alone the privilege of not being formed of a "concourse of Atoms. For if they had made them "also to consist of the same principles, they would "be liable to dissolution; the constituent particles at "length disuniting, and returning to their primitive "nature." I end this Remark with censuring the following words of Moreri: The opinions of Epicurus concerning the Soul and the Deity do not seem reasonable to some. Is it possible that a Priest should speak thus of an opinion which overthrows the immortality of the Soul, and the providence of God?

[H] Mr. Arnauld has criticised this doctrine in vain.] To make what I have to say more intelligible, I observe first of all, that almost all the old Philosophers, who have treated of the happiness of man, have stuck to an external notion; and this has produced a great variety of opinions among them (85). Some have placed the happiness of man in riches; others in knowledge; others in honours; others in reputation; others in virtue, &c. It is clear that they fixed the idea of happiness, not to its formal cause, but to its efficient cause; that is, they called that our happiness which they judged capable of producing in us a state of felicity, without defining the state of our soul when she is happy. This state is what I call the formal cause of happiness. Epicurus was not deceived in this point: he considered happiness in itself, and in its formal state, and not according to the relation it has to beings altogether external, as efficient causes are. This way of considering happiness is doubtless the most exact, and the most worthy of a Philosopher. Epicurus, therefore, has done well to pitch upon it; and he has made so good use of it, that it has led him precisely where he ought to go: the only dogm, which could reasonably be established according to this method, was to assert that the happiness of man consisted in his being at ease, and in feeling pleasure, or, generally, in contentment of mind. This does by no means prove that Epicurus placed the happiness of man in good chear, and in the impure commerce of the

(73) De sanctitate, de pietate adversus Deos libros scripsit Epicurus. At quo modo in his loquitur? Ut Coruncanum aut Scævolam Pontifices maximos te audire dicas. i. e. "Epicurus wrote "Books of holi- "ness, and piety "towards the "Gods. But in "what manner "does he there "speak? In "such a manner "that you would "say you heard "the High- "Priests Corun- "canus or Scæ- "vola." Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 1. cap. 41.

(74) Seneca, de Beneficiis, lib. 4. cap. 19.

(75) See what Cicero makes Velleius the Epicurean say in his 1st Book de Natura Deorum, cap. 8, & seq.

(76) See Cicero, ibid. cap. 44, fin.

(77) See Gassendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 4. cap. 3.

(78) In the Remark [P].

(79) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 1. cap. 30. See also cap. 17.

(80) Diog. Laert. lib. 10. num. 123.

(81) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 1. cap. 25, fin.

(82) Tertull. adv. Gentes, cap. 47.

(83) Quorum corpusculorum concursu fortuito & mundos innumerabiles, & animantia, & ipsas animas fieri dicit & Deos. August. Epist. 56. pag. 273.

(84) Lactant. de Ira Dei, cap. 10. pag. m. 538.

(85) Do not believe, however, what so many people tell us, that according to Varro there were 288 different opinions concerning the nature of the supreme Good. It is a Jest of Varro's. See S. August. de Civit. Dei, lib. 19. cap. 1.

Paganiſm, did all they could againſt Epicurus, in order to render him odious, and expoſe him to perſecution. They charged him with ſubverting the worſhip of the Gods, and inciting mankind to debauchery. He did not forget himſelf on this occaſion (i): he publiſhed his opinions to the whole world, he wrote ſome books of devotion, he recommended the veneration of the Gods, ſobriety, chaſtity; and it is certain that he lived in an exemplary manner, and conformably to the rules of philoſophical wiſdom and frugality (k): yet calumnies were ſpread againſt his morals [I], and there was a deſerter of his ſect who ſpoke the different ſexes; for at moſt theſe can be no more than efficient cauſes, which are not here in queſtion: when the efficient cauſes of contentment are conſidered, the beſt ſhall be pointed out; you ſhall be directed, on the one hand, to thoſe objects which are moſt effectual to preſerve the health of your body, and, on the other, to thoſe occupations which are moſt proper to prevent the uneaſineſs of your mind: therefore you will be preſcribed ſobriety, temperance, and the checking of tumultuous and diſorderly paſſions, which deprive the ſoul of her ſtate of happineſs, that is, the ſoft and quiet acquieſcence in her condition. Theſe were the pleaſures wherein Epicurus made the happineſs of man to conſiſt. People exclaimed againſt the word pleaſure: thoſe who were already corrupted made an ill uſe of it; the enemies of his ſect took advantage of it, and ſo the name of an Epicurean became moſt odious. All this is accidental to the doctrine, and hinders not but Epicurus may have philoſophized in a ſolid manner: it being always underſtood, that he committed a great fault, in not acknowledging that God alone can produce in our ſoul the ſtate which renders her happy.

(i) Rondellus, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, pag. 19, 20.

(k) See the Remark [N].

Let us now come to Mr. Arnauld. He cenſured with all his might this doctrine of Father Mallebranche, Every pleaſure is a good, and actually renders him happy who taſtes it (86). The Author * of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, giving an Extract of Mr. Arnauld's Book, declared for Father Mallebranche in this point. There is nothing more innocent, ſays he (87), nor more certain than to ſay, that every pleaſure renders him happy who enjoys it, during the time he enjoys it; and that nevertheleſs we muſt fly thoſe pleaſures which attach us to bodies .... But, ſome will ſay, it is virtue, it is grace, it is the love of God, or rather it is God alone, that is our happineſs. I agree it is, as an inſtrument or efficient cauſe, as Philoſophers ſpeak; but as a formal cauſe, it is pleaſure, it is contentment; that is our ſole felicity. Thereupon Mr. Arnauld attacked the Author of the Republique des Lettres, and addreſſed an Advice (88) to him, wherein he refuted him point by point, and according to all the rules of his method of diſputing, which doubtleſs was that of a very able Logician. The Journaliſt replied (89), and continued to maintain his opinion, and made it his principal buſineſs to remove the equivocations which have been thrown over this ſubject, by the diverſity of tropological phraſes which have been uſed: moſt Writers having given the cauſe the name of the effect, I mean, having called happineſs or unhappineſs, not what effectively is ſuch, but what cauſes it. He even undertook to refute thoſe who imagine that the pleaſures of our ſenſe are not ſpiritual: he maintains, that conſidering them only according to their phyſical entity, they are purely ſpiritual, and cannot be called corporeal but in conſequence of an accidental and arbitrary relation they have to the body; for that relation is founded only on God's having been pleaſed to eſtabliſh for the occaſional cauſe of thoſe pleaſures, the action of certain objects on man's body. Mr. Arnauld would not take the laſt blow: he refuted his Adverſary over again by a learned Diſſertation (90), wherein there is nothing more important, in my opinion, than the latter part. It is entitled, An Examination of a new ſpeculation concerning the ſpirituality and materiality of the pleaſures of ſenſe. He begins it in this manner: "I have nothing more to do now, Sir, than "to ſay one word to you concerning the moſt important point in that Writing. It is a Metaphyſical "thought, ſo ſubtle and abſtracted, that I have a double fear upon me: one, that I have not perfectly "comprehended your meaning; and the other, that I "ſhall not be able to expreſs mine ſo as to be underſtood by every body. You pretend, Sir, that "we muſt diſtinguiſh two things in the pleaſures "of the ſenſes; their Spirituality, which you "look on as eſſential to them; and their materiality, which you will have to be acceſſory and accidental to them; from whence you conclude that "a pleaſure of the ſenſes might remain numerically the ſame *, and have nothing material, becauſe "materiality may be ſeparated from it (91)." He afterwards very clearly unfolds the doctrine of his Adverſary, and oppoſes it in a manner very worthy of his Logic and ability; but yet I am of opinion that he is miſtaken at the bottom, and that he has not ſufficiently obſerved the difference there is between our ſenſations and our ideas. The Relation between our ideas and their object is eſſential; and he is in the right to ſay that God cannot make the idea of a circle be ſeparated from its relation to a circle. But it is not the ſame with regard to our ſenſations. Our ſoul might feel without referring it to a foot, or a hand, juſt as ſhe feels joy at good news, and grief at bad, without referring them to any parts of the body; and if while ſhe is united to a body, ſhe refers to ſome part of that body grief and certain pleaſures, the ſenſation of burning, tickling, &c. it is only by an arbitrary eſtabliſhment of the Author of her union with the body, it is only that ſhe may the better watch over the conſervation of the machine which is united to her. If this reaſon were to ceaſe, it would be no longer neceſſary for her to refer her ſenſations to any thing without herſelf, and yet ſhe would always be ſuſceptible of the modification which is called pain, pleaſure, cold, heat: God might impreſs on her all thoſe modifications, either without regulating himſelf by any occaſional cauſe, or regulating himſelf by an occaſional cauſe which ſhould not be a body, but the thoughts of ſome ſpirit. The Author of the Art of thinking is in the right to ſay, that it is very poſſible for a ſoul ſeparated from the body to be tormented by the fire either of Hell or of Purgatory, and to feel the ſame pain as one feels when one is burned; ſince even while ſhe was in the body, the pain of burning was in her and not in the body, and was nothing elſe but a thought of ſorrow which ſhe felt, on occaſion of what paſſed in the body to which God had united her (92). But he is in the wrong to ſuppoſe that it would be neceſſary that God ſhould diſpoſe a certain portion of matter, with regard to a ſpirit, in ſuch a manner, that the motion of that matter may occaſion afflicting thoughts in that ſpirit. A being perfectly immaterial might perform the office of ſuch an occaſional cauſe, and in that caſe our Soul might feel the ſame pleaſure which we call ſenſual and corporeal; ſhe might, I ſay, feel it without referring it to a mouth, or an ear, as we now do the pleaſure of good chear, and of muſic. From whence it reſults, that pleaſure, of what kind ſoever it may be ſuppoſed, may conſtitute the happineſs of the ſoul in whatever ſtate ſhe be ſuppoſed, whether ſhe be united to matter, or not. This would deſerve a particular Treatiſe. If the Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres had not been ſick, when Mr. Arnauld's Diſſertation appeared, he would have refuted it; but he judged it would be too late to do it, when his health permitted him to take his pen in hand.

(86) See the Reflexions Philoſophiques & Theologiques ſur le Nouveau Syſteme de la Nature & de la Grace, liv. 1. cap. 21. pag. 407, &c.

* Who was Mr. Bayle himſelf.

(87) Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, for Auguſt 1685. Art. 3. pag. 876.

(88) See ibid. for December 1685, Art. 1.

(89) Ibid. for January 1686, pag. 93.

(90) See the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, tom. 6. pag. 379.

* Idem numero.

(91) Arnauld, Diſſertat. ſur le pretendu Bonheur des ſens, pag. 108.

(92) Art de Penſer, 1 Part. chap. 9. pag. m. 86.

(93) See Gaſſendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 8. cap. 5.

[I] Some calumnies were ſpread againſt his morals.] He was repreſented as a glutton, a lewd fellow, and a new Sardanapalus; and becauſe, according to the cuſtom of thoſe ages (93), he admitted ſome women who loved Philoſophy into the number of his diſciples, his ſchool was repreſented as a downright brothel. It was reported that the courtezan Leontium, being grown curious of Philoſophy, and having applied to that Philoſopher, had not diſcontinued her former trade, and that ſhe gratified the whole Society with the enjoyment of her perſon, and Epicurus, in particular, in public (94). They were not contented with ſpreading theſe ſlanders in converſation, but inſerted them in Books; and what was the moſt unjuſt of all, they forged 50 laſcivious Letters, and publiſhed them under the name of that Philoſopher.

(94) Ἡ δὲ οὐχ ὅτε φιλοσοφεῖν ἠρξατο, ἐπαύσατο ἑταιρουσα, πᾶσι τε τοῖς Ἐπικουρείοις συνῆν ἐν τοῖς κήποις. Ἐπικούρῳ δὲ καὶ ἀναφανδὸν. Quæ Philoſophiæ operam navare cum incæpiſſet non ideo ſcortari deſtitit, ſed Epicureis omnibus in hortis ſe proſtituit, & palam quidem Epicuro. Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 588.

ſpoke very ſcandalouſly of him [K]. A very learned man has maintained, within theſe two years (l), that this Philoſopher did not deny a divine providence [L]. Tho' we have none of Epicurus's works remaining, there is no ancient Philoſopher whoſe opinions are better known than his. For this we are obliged to Diogenes Laertius, and yet more to the learned Gaſſendi

(l) This was written in the year 1695.

Philoſopher. Diotimus the Stoic was the Author of this villany. Διότιμος ὁ Στωϊκὸς δυσμενῶς ἔχων πρὸς αὐτὸν πικρόταλα αὐτὸν διαβέβληκεν ἐπιστολὰς φέρων πεντήκοντα ἀσελγεῖς, ὡς Ἐπικούρου, καὶ τὰς εἰς Χρύσιππον ἀναφερομένας ἐπιστόλια, ὡς Ἐπικούρου συνταξας. Diotimus autem Stoicus infeſto adverſus illum animo, acerrimè infectatus eum eſt, quinquaginta circumferens laſciwas, veluti ab Epicuro ſcriptas, epiſtolas, eaſque quæ Chryſippi feruntur, veluti ſub Epicuri nomine componens (95). We have ſtill a Letter extant attributed to Leontium; but it is a ſuppoſititious piece. They feign that Leontium wrote to Lamia and deſcribed the trouble ſhe underwent with Epicurus, an old fellow of fourſcore, and in his ſecond childhood, ſwarming with lice, and ſo croſs that he did nothing but ſcold at his miſtreſs, and teize her with his ſuſpicions. Οὐδὲν δυσαρεστότερον, ὡς ἔοικέν, ἐστι παλιν μειρακιευομένου πρεσβύτου. οἷα με Ἐπίκουρος ἔτος δωδεκατῖ, πάντα λοιδορῶν, πάντα ὑποπτεύων, ἐπιστολὰς ἀδιαλύτους μοι γράφων. ἐκδιώκων ἐκ τῆ κήπου μὰ τὴν Ἀφροδίτην, εἰ Ἄδωνις ἦν, ἤδη ὀγδοήκοντα γεγονὼς ἔτη· ὑφ' ὧν αὐτῆ ἠνεσχόμην, φθειριῶντος, καὶ πολυνοσοῦντος καὶ καταπεπλημένου, εὖ μάλα πόκοις, ἀντὶ πίλων, &c. Nihil eſt, ut mihi videtur, repueraſcente ſene importunius: Quo ſanè modo erga me Epicurus iſte ſe habet, omnia improbans, omnia in ſuſpicionem vertens, literas ad me ambagioſas ſcribens; abacturus ſanè ex Horto ipſam Venerem, tametſi Adonis foret, natus jam, ut eſt, annorum octoginta. Abſit illius amore tenear, qui & ſcatet pediculis, & planè morbidus eſt, contractus præ ſenio, nec injuriâ velera geſtans pro pileis, &c (96). The forgery of this Letter is evident, ſince Leontium died before Epicurus (97), and Epicurus lived not much above ſeventy one years. It is certain that Metrodorus, one of Epicurus's principal friends, lay with this Leontium; perhaps he had married her; at the worſt he kept her as his concubine: but concubinage was not very ſcandalous among the Pagans. Danae, the daughter of Leontium, was not more chaſte than her mother (98). Some pretend that Leontium lay with one Corniades, and that he could tell how many times: for he kept a regiſter of his debauches; and when he had a mind to recall to his remembrance the favours he had received from the ſex, and his days of pleaſure, he conſulted his Journal: Non inepte quis intelligat, they are Gaſſendi's words (99), ex hoc contubernio deſumptum quod Plutarchus ſcribit Corniadem quaſi ex Ephemeride repetere ſolitum quoties cum Hedia & Leontio rem habuiſſet, Thaſium bibiſſet, opipare cœnaſſet. Others pretend that Gaſſendi has ſuffered himſelf to be deceived here by the Latin Tranſlator of Plutarch, and that the Greek imports that modeſt and grave people do not entertain in their minds the images of paſt pleaſures, and are not guilty of what expoſed Corniades to ridicule; they do not repeat, as if they were reading in their Table-Books, or Books of Account, how many times they had to do with Hedia or Leontium, &c. Thoſe who are capable of underſtanding the Greek I quote, may judge of the true ſenſe. I ſhould rather follow that of Gaſſendi. Οὔτε τὰς μετρίους καὶ σώφρονας εἰκὸς ἐνδιατρίβειν τῇ ἐπινοίᾳ τῶν τοιούτων, οὐδὲ ἅπαξ ἐσκῶφθαι τὸν Κορνιάδην περάτιονται, οἷον ἐξ ἐφημεριδῶν ἀναλέγεσθαι, ποσάκις Ἡδείᾳ καὶ Λεοντίῳ συνῆλθον, ἢ πῦ θάσιον ἔπιον, ποίας εἰκάδας ἐδείπνησαν πολυτελέσατα, δεινὴν γὰρ ἐμφαίνει καὶ θηριώδη περὶ τὰ γινόμενα καὶ προσδυκώμενα τῆς ἡδονῆς ἔργα ταραχὴν καὶ λύσσαν ἡ τοσαύτη πρὸς ἀναμνήσεις βάκχευσις αὐτῆς τῆς ψυχῆς καὶ πρόστηξις. Neque probabile eſt, modeſtos ac temperantes homines hujuſmodi cogitationibus immorari, aut ea facere, ob quæ Corniadem ſubſannat ille, tanquam ex ephemeridibus repetentem, quoties cum Hedeia aut Leontio rem habuiſſet, ubi Thaſium vinum bibiſſet, quibus Idibus ſplendidiſſimè cœnaſſet. Atrocem enim ac belluinam in fruendis aut expectandis voluptatibus exagitationem animi ac rabiem deſignat tanta ipſius ad recordandum bacchatio atque adhæſio (100). See in Gaſſendi, in the ſeventh Book of the Life of Epicurus, a ſolid refutation of the calumnies which I have mentioned. See alſo the remark [N]. Obſerve, that inſtead of Κορνιάδην, I think we ſhould read Καρνεάδην in this paſſage of Plutarch; for we know that one of Epicurus's friends was named Carneades. I have quoted a paſſage of Cicero as to this particular in the remark [M] of the article ARCESILAUS.

(95) Diogen. Laert. lib. 10. num. 3.

(96) Ex ſecundo Libro Alciphronis, apud Gaſſend. de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 7. cap. 2.

(97) Metrodorus and Leontium his concubine left a ſon, whom Epicurus takes notice of in his Will, as an Orphan whom he recommended. See Gaſſendi, ibid. cap. 6.

(98) Athenæus, lib. 13. pag. 593. See the Article LEONTIUM, Remark [D].

(99) De Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 7. cap. 1.

(100) Plut. non poſſe vivi ſuaviter juxta Epicur. pag. 1089, C. ex Verſione Xylandri.

[K] A deſerter of his Sect ſpoke very ſcandalouſly of him.] Theſe people generally abuſe the party they quit in an outrageous manner. The deſire of revenging ſome injury, or of making mankind believe that they have not left it out of inconſtancy, prompts them to defame it; and be they ever ſo ſuſpected, they fail not to meet with many credulous enough to believe them. I remember to have read that a Nun, who left the cloyſter of Port-Royal in great diſcontent, ſpread ſeveral little ſtories, which the Jeſuits took advantage of in their writings (101). But let us ſpeak of the deſerter here in queſtion. He was brother to Metrodorus, and was named Timocrates. He gave out that nocturnal aſſemblies were held in Epicurus's garden, which he had a thouſand difficulties to eſcape from (102); and as there were ſome women among Epicurus's diſciples, I leave you to judge what Commentaries were made on theſe words of Timocrates. They went ſo far as to compare thoſe conventicles of Epicurus to the midnight meetings of witches (103); and I doubt not but they reported the ſame of them as were ſaid of the Aſſemblies of the Adamites. Præter commeſſationes & compotationes poſſunt ea intelligi quæ in nocturnis Bonæ Deæ ſacris patrari quondam objecta ſunt (104). "Beſides feaſting and revelling ſuch "actions alſo may be underſtood as were charged to "be committed in the nocturnal ſolemnities of the "Good Goddeſs." Moreover, Timocrates repreſented Epicurus as a glutton and a drunkard, who thro' exceſſes of that kind vomited twice a day (105). Epicurus did not ſpare this deſerter of his Sect: he wrote againſt him, and uſed him very ſeverely. We find in a work of Cicero, that in order to inſult this Philoſopher, they ſuppoſed his quarrels with Timocrates aroſe only on a trifle. Cum Epicurus . . . Metrodori ſodalis ſui fratrem Timocratem quia neſcio quid in philoſophia diſſentiret totis voluminibus conciderit (106). i. e. "When Epicurus . . . cruelly inveighed againſt "Timocrates, the brother of his companion Metro-"dorus, through whole volumes, becauſe he differ-"ed from him in ſome inconſiderable point of Philoſo-"phy." There is no fair dealing in this objection: for if ever a Writer's paſſion is excuſable, it muſt be in ſuch diſputes as Epicurus had with his fugitive diſciple.

(101) See the Letters intitled, Les Imaginaires & les Viſionaires.

(102) Ἑαυτόν τε διηγῆται μόγις ἐκφυγεῖν ἰσχύσαι τὰς νυκτερινὰς ἐκείνας φιλοσοφίας καὶ τὴν μυστικὴν ἐκείνην συναγωγήν. Seque ipſum narrat vix effugere potuiſſe nocturnas illas philoſophandi conſuetudines arcanamque illam conventiunculam. Laert. lib. 10. num. 6.

(103) Cur item illud ſodalitium comparetur gregi ſociorum Ulyſſis, ac jam à noſtrorum pleriſque dictæ Magorum Synagogæ. Gaſſendi de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 7. cap. 1.

(104) Idem, ibid.

(105) Laert. lib. 10. num. 6.

(106) Cicer. de Natur. Deor. lib. 1. cap. 33.

[L] A very learned man has maintained . . . . that Epicurus did not deny a divine Providence.] This learned man's name is Mr. du Rondel. He had been Profeſſor of Eloquence in the Univerſity of Sedan a conſiderable number of years, when that Univerſity was ſuppreſſed in the year 1681. He retired to Holland, where his merit ſoon procured him employment: he was invited to Maeſtricht to be Profeſſor of polite learning there, which chair he fills with great reputation. Before he left his native country, he had preſented the public with an Edition of Muſæus in Greek and Latin, with Notes (107); the Life of Epicurus in French (108); and a Diſſertation de Gloria (109). Since he has been out of France he has publiſhed ſome Reflections on a Chapter of Theophraſtus (110); a Diſſertation on the Chœnix of Pythagoras (111); and a Treatiſe de Vita & moribus Epicuri (112). It is in this laſt Work that he has undertaken to prove that Epicurus did not deny the providence of God. They who are deſirous of knowing the merit of his productions (113), and have them not, will do well to conſult the Journaliſts who have ſpoken of them. They will there find ſome of the praiſes due to his profound erudition, and his penetrating genius. When he ſhall be pleaſed to produce the treaſures of his Cloſet, the public will be convinced that the Journaliſts muſt make uſe of expreſſions full of the greateſt encomiums, if they deſign to do him juſtice. I ſhould expatiate farther on this ſubject, if the friendſhip which is between us had not taught me that I ſhould diſpleaſe him. See the Preface to the Project of this Dictionary, which I have addreſſed to him. It is not poſſible to maintain more learnedly or more artfully than he has done the

(107) Printed at Paris, for Cramoiſi, 1678, in 8vo.

(108) At Paris, for Anthony Cellier, 1679, in 12mo. It has been reprinted in Holland with a captious Title. See the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, for Jan. 1686, pag. 86.

(109) Printed at Leyden, 1680, in 12mo.

(110) At Amſterdam, 1689, in 12mo.

(111) At Amſterdam 1690, in 12mo.

(112) At Amſterdam, 1693, in 12mo.

(113) I do not pretend to have given a complete Liſt of them.

Gaſſendi, who has laboured with extreme diligence to collect whatever could be found concerning the doctrine and perſon of this Philoſopher in the writings of the Ancients, and to reduce the ſame into a complete Syſtem. If ever we have had reaſon to know that time at length does juſtice to oppreſſed innocence, it is with regard to Epicurus: for there have riſen ſo many illuſtrious defenders of his morals [M], both practical and ſpeculative, that at preſent none but obſtinate or ignorant people judge ill of either. He died in great pain of a retention of urine, with ſingular patience and conſtancy, in the ſecond year of the 127th Olympiad (m). He had juſt entred on the ſeventy ſecond year of his age. The purity of his morals cannot be ſufficiently commended, nor his opinions in point of Religion ſufficiently condemned. Infinite numbers of people are orthodox in their belief, but live ill: he, on the contrary, and many of his followers, had very bad tenets, and lived well [N]. Let us not forget

(m) Diogenes Laert. lib. 10. num. 15 & 22.

Paradox of Epicurus's Orthodoxy with regard to Providence. He has not forgotten to take advantage of (114) the VIS ABDITA QUÆDAM of Lucretius. When Mr. Minutoli knew that this Book of Mr. du Rondel's was publiſhed, he wrote me word that in the Collection of John Michael Brutus there was a Letter of Peter Victorius to John della Caſa, Archbiſhop of Benevento, the ſubject whereof is the queſtion whether Lucretius, who in the beginning of his Poem invokes Venus, does not in that particular contradict the doctrine of Epicurus; and whether it be conſiſtent with the inaction which that Philoſopher attributes to the Gods?

(114) Pag. 79.

[M] So many illuſtrious defenders of his Morals have ariſen.] The learned Gaſſendi obſerves that ſo ſoon as polite learning began to revive in the XVth Century, ſeveral able men ſpoke in behalf of Epicurus, who, during ſo many ages of barbarity, had been oppreſſed under a load of prejudices. Cum Epicurus infamis fuiſſet habitus totâ illâ penè ſæculorum ſerie, quâ literæ bonæ ſepultæ jacuerunt; vix tamen libros humaniores, pulvere excuſſo, rediiſſe in manus ante duo ferè ſæcula, quàm omnes penè eruditi ſymbolum pro eo contulerunt (115). He names Philelphus, Alexander ab Alexandro, Cœlius Rhodiginus, Volaterranus, and Joannes Franciſcus Picus (116). He obſerves, on the credit of Trithemius, that Baptiſta Guarinus wrote a Book concerning the Sect of Epicurus. He adds that Marc Antony Bonciarius had compoſed one, to prove that of all the ancient Philoſophers Epicurus is the man who came neareſt the truth (117). Laſtly, beſides Palingenius, from whom he quotes ſeveral Verſes in honour of Epicurus, he obſerves that Andrew Arnaud of Provence has made an Apology for that Philoſopher. Andreas Arnaudus Forcalquerienſis in hac Provincia Proſeneſcallus in libello, cui nomen Joci, Apologiam pro Epicuro inter cætera edidit, brevem illam quidem, & foliolis paucis; ſed in quâ tamen ea delibantur ex Laërtio præſertim, atque Seneca, under convincatur, quod vir ille pereruditus initio propoſuit, fuiſſe Epicurum injuſtius laceſſitum, & laniatum ab obtrectatoribus (118). i. e. "Andrew Arnaud, Deputy-Seneſchal of Forcalquier in this province, in a little Book, intitled Jeſts, has, among other things, publiſhed an Apology for Epicurus; a ſhort one indeed, and contained in a few pages, but which notwithſtanding gives us a taſte of thoſe particulars, chiefly from Laertius and Seneca, which are ſufficient to evince what the learned Author propoſed at the beginning, that Epicurus had been unjuſtly attacked and abuſed by his enemies." The curious will not be diſpleaſed to find here a farther Account of this Apology. I am indebted for it to the obliging and very learned Mr. Minutoli (119). Here is what he wrote to me in November 1693. "The other day I met with a little Book printed at Avignon, intitled Andreæ Arnaudi Joci, Epiſtolæ, Rara, Epigrammata, Tumuli, Apologiæ. This laſt claſs of Pieces contains the Apologies of Bacchus, Epicurus, Phalaris, and Apuleius. . . . In the Collection of Epiſtles there is one of Guirandus Arnaudo, wherein having ſpoken advantageouſly of Raviſius Textor, whole Dialogues he ſent him as a Novelty, he ſays to him, In nono Dialogo mirabéris Textorem, cujus ſcripta tantam doctrinam teſtantur, tam male de Epicuri voluptate teſtari, nec animadvertiſſe Epicurum opinione Sardanapalum re Stoïciſſimum, Bacchanalia ſimulaſſe, & Curios vixiſſe. Epigr. 152.

(115) Gaſſendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 7. cap. 7. pag. m. 224.

(116) I wonder he has omitted Laurence Valla.

(117) See the Words of Gaſſendi above in the Article of BONCIARIUS, Remark [C], Citation (6), where I have found a miſtake.

(118) Gaſſendi, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, lib. 7. cap. 7. pag. 224.

(119) A Miniſter and Profeſſor at Geneva.

"Nam licet illecebris hominem velit eſſe beatum,
"Stoïcus interea moribus ipſe fuit.

"Ita Fruſius, ſed tu fuſius nuper dicebas & docebas, "cum non ſine miratione opinionem quorundam rapiebas "ad paradoxum de Baccho, Epicuro, Phalaride, & "Apuleio. O noſtri ſæculi felicitudo, ſi omnes Epi- "curi eſſent, nulla hypocriſis, ſi Bacchi, nulla Baccha- "nalia, ſi Phalarides, nulla injuſtitia, ſi Apuleji, nulla "ineloquentia." i. e. "In the ninth Dialogue you "will be ſurprized that Textor, whoſe writings de-"monſtrate ſo great learning, ſhould have ſo wrong "a notion of the pleaſure of Epicurus, not conſider-"ing that he was a Sardanapalus in ſpeculation, but "a rigid Stoic in practice, a debauchee in appearance, "but a ſober man in reality.

"For tho' in pleaſure happineſs he plac'd,
"His life was with a Stoic's virtue grac'd.

"Thus Fruſius ſpeaks; but you have lately obliged "us with a more ample information, when in a ſtrange "and irreſiſtible manner you forced ſeveral to a be-"lief of the Paradox concerning Bacchus, Epicurus, "Phalaris, and Apuleius. How happy an age would "ours be, wherein, if all were like Epicurus, there "would be no hypocriſy, if like Bacchus, no revels, "if like Phalaris, no injuſtice, if like Apuleius, no "defect in eloquence!"

I forgot to ſay that Gaſſendi has mentioned Erycius Puteanus among thoſe who have praiſed Epicurus. The famous Don Franciſco de Quevedo publiſhed an Apology for that Philoſopher at Madrid, in the year 1635. His Book is intitled, Epicteto Eſpañol en verſos conſonantes, con el origen de los Eſtoicos y ſu defenſa contra Plutarcho, y defenſa de Epicuro contra la opinion comun (120). I have not ſeen that which Sarrazin has written in the French tongue for the Morals of Epicurus, and which Mr. Colomiés mentions in the 155th page of his Bibliotheque Choiſie: but I have ſeen the Reflections of Mr. de S. Evremond on this Subject *, which are curious and written in a good taſte. They are to be found in the Edition of his Works reprinted in Holland in the year 1693, at the end of the IIId Volume. They had been printed at Amſterdam in the year 1684, with three or four pieces of the ſame Author. The Baron des Coutures publiſhed this Philoſopher's Morals with Reflections in 1685: the Edition of Paris was twice reprinted in Holland the ſame year (121). This Book ſhews Epicurus in a very good light, and is worth a Panegyric. It makes the Chancellor of the Church and Univerſity of Paris (122) appear as an Apologiſt for Epicurus. La Mothe le Vayer (123) and Sorbiere (124) have acted the ſame part; but I do not believe that in any country, or in any age, any thing has been written in defence of that Philoſopher, which can equal the performance of our Gaſſendi. What he has compoſed on that ſubject is a maſter-piece, the moſt curious and judicious Collection that can be ſeen, and diſpoſed in the cleareſt and moſt regular method. Sir William Temple, ſo illuſtrious by his Embaſſies and fine Writings, has lately declared in defence of Epicurus with a very ſingular addreſs (125).

(120) Nic. Antonio, Biblioth. Script. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 354.

[* Theſe Reflections had been falſly aſcribed to S. Evremond. They are Sarrazin's, and have been inſerted in the New Works of that Author printed at Paris in 1674. See the Life of S. Evremond by Mr. des Maizeaux, pag. 135. of the London Edition 1728. ADD. of the Ed. of Amſt.]

(121) See the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, for January 1686, Art. 9. pag. 86.

(122) Mr. Coquelin, in the Approbation of the Book, which contains four pages.

(123) Traité de la Vertu des Païens, in the 5th Volume of his Works, in 12mo.

(124) Letter 33. in 4to.

(125) See his Miſcellanies. They were tranſlated from Engliſh into French, and printed at Utrecht in the year 1694.

[N] He and many of his followers had very bad tenets, and lived well.] Nothing is more capable of extinguiſhing devotion in the heart of man, and to make get that he taught an excellent point of morality with regard to the obedience due to make all worſhip of God to be abſolutely renounced, than the belief that God does neither good nor harm to mankind, that he never chaſtiſes thoſe who offend him, nor rewards thoſe who ſerve him. The moſt devout Chriſtians, if they will be ſincere, muſt acknowledge that the ſtrongeſt tie which unites them to God, is to conſider him under the idea of a beneficent Being; that is, to conſider that he diſtributes infinite rewards to thoſe who obey him, and, on the other hand, eternally puniſhes thoſe who offend him. Here is a man who diſcharged the duties of Religion according to the cuſtom of his country (126), without any motive of intereſt; for he profeſſed his belief to be, that the Gods diſtributed neither rewards nor puniſhments (127). " He was very aſſiduous at the Tem" ples, and the firſt time that Diocles ſaw him, he " could not forbear crying out, What a delight, what

" a ſight is it for me to ſee Epicurus in a Temple (128)!
" all my ſuſpicions vaniſh, piety reſumes its place,
" and I never had a better idea of the grandeur of " Jupiter, than ſince I ſee Epicurus on his knees.
" Ὢ φαιδνγνεις ὀφθαλμῶν, &c." To this I add the following words of Laertius: Τῆς μὲν γὰρ πρὸς Θεὸς ὁσιότητος, καὶ πρὸς πατρίδα φιλίας ἄλεκτος ἡ διάθεσις (129). According to ſome they ſignify, that he had an unſpeakable attachment to piety, and the love of his country (130); but hitherto the Editions of Laertius furniſh us with another interpretation. The Greek words there ſignify that Epicurus never grew remiſs, either in the worſhip of the Gods, or in zeal for the good of his country: Nam quid de cultu in Deos, & de amicitia adverſus patriam dicam quam conſtantiſſimè uſque ad finem tenuit? It ſeems as if the Tranſlator had read, not ἄλεκτος, as it is in the printed copy, but ἄληκτος. However the paſſage be tranſlated, it contains a great encomium on Epicurus's piety.

Fully to refute thoſe who accuſe him of intemperance, it is ſufficient to refer them to the teſtimony which his enemies themſelves have borne to his frugality. Conſult Seneca, who, as a great Stoic, ſhould have cenſured him on all occaſions, if appearances were ever ſo little againſt him: yet he agrees that they made very indifferent chear in the garden of Epicurus. Eo lubentius, ſays he (131), Epicuri egregia dicta commemoro, ut iſtis, qui ad illa confugient, ſpe mala inducti, qui velamentum ſeipſos ſuorum vitiorum habituros exiſtimant, probem, quocunque ierint, honeſte eſſe vivendum. Cum adierint eos hortulos, & inſcriptum hortulis, Hoſpes hic bene manebis, hic ſummum bonum voluptas eſt: paratus erit iſtius domicilii cuſtos, hoſpitalis, humánus, & te polenta excipiet, & aquam quoque large miniſtrabit, & dicet: Ecquid bene acceptus es? Non irritant, inquam, hi hortuli famem, ſed extinguunt: nec majorem ipſis potionibus ſitim faciunt, ſed naturali & gratuito remedio ſedant. i. e. " I men" tion the excellent ſayings of Epicurus the more wil" lingly, that I may prove to thoſe who, led by a " groundleſs hope, may have recourſe thereto, think" ing to find a cover for their vices, that wherever " they go, they muſt live virtuouſly. When they go
" to thoſe gardens, where the inſcription is, Stranger,
" here you ſhall find welcome: here pleaſure is the ſu-
" preme good; the keeper of the place will be ready,
" hoſpitable, and humane, will treat you with parched
" barley, and furniſh you with water in plenty, and " will ſay, Have you not been well entertained? theſe
" gardens, I ſay, do not excite hunger, but allay it,
" nor do they increaſe thirſt by drinking, but quench
" it by a natural and cheap remedy." By Seneca's own confeſſion, Epicurus's gueſts had little better fare than bread and water. You may find ſeveral ſuch authorities in the Book I cite (132). As to venereal pleaſure, not only the maxims and counſels of Epicurus were extremely chaſte (133), but he preached ſo much by his own example that Chryſippus, his perpetual antagoniſt, was obliged to explain that phænomenon by imputing it to the inſenſibility of his temper. Scribit Stobæus quempiam fuiſſe qui & non iri captum amore virum ſapientem dixerit, & ipſius Epicuri exemplo inter cæteros id probarit: Chryſippum autem contradixiſſe, & Epicurum quod attineret, excepiſſe nihil ex ejus exemplo concludi quoniam foret ἀναίσθητος, ſenſu carens (134). i. e. " Stobæus writes that a certain perſon aſſerted a wiſe " man would never be captivated by love, and proved
" it by the example of Epicurus, among others: but
" Chryſippus declared himſelf of a contrary opinion,
" and as to Epicurus, he ſaid nothing could be con" cluded from his example, becauſe he was inſenſible."
I refer the Reader to the fine collections of Gaſſendi (135), but I cannot forbear tranſcribing theſe words of Cicero: Ac mihi quidem, quod & ipſe bonus vir fuit, & MULTI EPICUREI fuerunt, & hodie ſunt, & in amicitiis fideles, & in omni vita conſtantes & graves, nec voluptate, ſed officio conſilia moderantes, hæc videtur major vis honeſtatis, & minor voluptatis. Ita enim vivunt quidam, ut eorum vita refellatur oratio, atque ut cæteri exiſtimantur, dicere melius quàm facere, ſic hi mihi videntur melius facere, quàm dicere (136). i. e. " And in my opinion, indeed, as he himſelf was a " good man, and many Epicureans have been, and
" at this day are, faithful friends, conſtant and exem-
" plary in their lives, and guided not by pleaſure,
" but by duty; here the force of virtue ſeems greater,
" and that of pleaſure leſs. For ſome live in ſuch a " manner, that their doctrines are confuted by their " lives; and as others are thought to ſpeak better
" than they act, ſo theſe ſeem to me to act better
" than they ſpeak." You here ſee Epicurus and ſeveral of his followers honoured with the character of good friends, honeſt men, and grave perſons, who practiſed virtue with great exactneſs. It is only objected to them that they did not live according to their principles: an objection which holds true no leſs againſt the orthodox, and with regard to them is a thouſand times more ſhameful. Cicero aſſerts it as a matter of fact, that no fault could be found with the morals of Epicurus; and that he is only upbraided with not having the wit to reconcile his doctrines with his behaviour. Ratio iſta quam defendis, præcepta quæ didiciſti, quæ probas, funditus evertunt amicitiam, quamvis eam Epicurus, ut facit, in cælum efferat laudibus. At coluit ipſe amicitias: quaſi quis illum neget, & bonum virum, & comem, & humanum fuiſſe. De ingenio ejus in his diſputationibus, non de moribus quæritur (137). i. e. " The reaſon which you maintain, the precepts which " you have learned and do approve, utterly overthrow
" friendſhip, though Epicurus may, as he does, extol
" it to the ſkies. But he, you will ſay, was an ex" cellent friend himſelf. Does any one deny him to " have been a good man, complaiſant, and humane?
" in theſe diſputes the queſtion regards his genius,
" not his morals."

It may be wondred, perhaps, that Epicurus, having practiſed ſuch excellent morals, ſhould have fallen into an infamy which has rendred his ſect and his memory odious for many ages, wherever he has been known. Hereupon I make three ſmall obſervations. I obſerve firſt, that we muſt acknowledge here, as in many other things, the abſolute power of fatality. Some people are happy, and others are unhappy: this is the beſt reaſon that can be given for their different fortune. I ſay in the ſecond place, that Epicurus's competition with the famous Philoſopher who was the founder of the Stoics muſt neceſſarily have produced ill conſequences. The Stoics profeſſed a great ſeverity in their morals: to contend with theſe people was almoſt as dangerous as it is at this day to be at variance with Bigots. They intereſted Religion in their quarrel, they raiſed fears leſt the youth ſhould be perverted, they alarmed all good men, and their accuſations found credit; the people being eaſily perſuaded that true zeal and auſtere maxims always go together: ſo that theſe were the moſt effectual deſtroyers of a man's reputation. Wherefore it muſt not be thought ſtrange if by dint of defamation, pious frauds, and forged letters, they made diſadvantageous impreſſions of Epicurus which have laſted a long time. I ſay, in the third place, that it was eaſy to give an ill ſenſe to the doctrines of that Philoſopher, and to fright honeſt people with the term of pleaſure which he made uſe of. If when they ſpoke of it they had at the ſame time added his explications, no body would have been alarmed; but all the explanations which were favourable to him were carefully removed: and, beſides, there were ſome Epicureans who made an ill uſe of his doctrine. They did not debauch themſelves, indeed, in his ſchool; but they had the cunning to ſhelter their diſorders under the authority

AN enquiry into the cauſes of the ill opinion which has been entertained of Epicurus.

(126) He was perpetually ſeen in the Temples. He made a great many ſacrifices, and offerings, &c. Du Rondel, Vie d'Epicure, pag. 29. See the whole ſequel of the paſſage; and in the Latin Edition, ſee pag. 60.

(127) Ibid. pag. 34. of the French Edition.

(128) See an Application of this in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for December 1684, in the Catalogue of new Books, num. 2.

(129) Laert. lib. 10. num. 10.

(130) Gaſſendi has tranſlated them, nam ſanctitatis quidem in Deos & charitatis in patriam fuit in eo affectus ineffabilis.

(131) Seneca, Epiſt. 21.

(132) Gaſſendi, de Vita & Morib. Epicuri, lib. 6. cap. 3, 4.

(133) See Laertius, lib. 10. num. 118.

(134) Gaſſend. de Vita & Morib. Epicuri, lib. 7. cap. 4: he cites Stobæus, Serm. de ven. & am.

(135) Ibid. & cap. 5, 6, 7.

(136) Cicero, de Finib. lib. 2. cap. 25.

(137) Idem, ibid. c. C.

to Magiſtrates [O]. He became much more famous after his death than he had been during his life [P], as Seneca has obſerved, and Metrodorus had foretold.

It will not be uſeleſs to produce here an example of the malice and diſingenuity of thoſe who cenſured Epicurus. He wrote a work intitled the Banquet, wherein he treated the queſtion what time is the moſt proper to careſs a woman? his Cenſurers, ſeeking a pretence to ſlander him, repreſented his proceedure unfaithfully, and changed the circumſtances of it. He muſt needs have been innocent, ſince Plutarch has been ſo equitable as to ſhew there was nothing in it unworthy of a Philoſopher [Q]. The ſame Plutarch has written a Treatiſe on purpoſe to prove that a man cannot live pleaſantly according to the (138) Seneca, de Vita beata, cap. 12. pag. m. 625. See the Penſées ſur les Cometes, pag. 535.

(139) He owned the Morals of Epicurus were very ſtrict. Iamb. 18. See Gaſſendi, lib. 7. cap. 4.

(140) Origenes contra Celſum, lib. 7. pag. 375.

(141) Remark [N] Citation (129).

(142) Plutarch. in Demetrio, pag. 905, A.

(143) Semper vota fecit pro Reipublicæ proſperitate ac vetere regimine, acquievit vero tempori præſenti ac Dominis ſorte datis. Donec iracundos habuit magiſtratus, patiens fuit ac docilis, quum verò bonos ac mites, gratus fuit ac obſequioſus. i. e. "He always "prayed for the "proſperity of "the Common-"wealth, and "the old form of "government, "but acquieſced "in the preſent "ſtate of affairs, "and ſubmitted "to thoſe whom "fortune ſet over "him. While the "Magiſtrates "were ſevere, he "was patient and "dutiful, but "when they "were mild and "indulgent, he "was grateful "and obſequi-"ous." Rondellus, de Vita & Moribus Epicuri, pag. 126.

(144) Balzac, Letter 24 of the 14th Book, pag. 613. of the folio Edition.

(145) Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 8.

(146) Alexander Severus, apud Herodian. lib. 6. cap. 3. pag. 262.

(147) Seneca, Epiſt. 79. pag. m. 325.

ty of ſo great a name. Non ab Epicuro impulſi luxuriantur, ſed vitiis dediti, luxuriam ſuam in Philoſophiæ ſinu abſcondunt: & eo concurrunt, ubi audiunt laudari voluptatem. Nec æſtimatur voluptas illa Epicuri (ita enim mehercules ſentio) quam ſobria & ſicca ſit: ſed ad nomen ipſum advolant, quærentes libidinibus ſuis patrocinium aliquod ac velamentum (138). i. e. "They "are not inſtigated to riot by Epicurus, but being ad-"dicted to vice, they hide their debaucheries in the "boſom of Philoſophy; and run to thoſe lectures "where they hear pleaſure is recommended. Nor do "they conſider how temperate and abſtemious (for "ſuch indeed I take it to be) the pleaſure of Epicurus "is; but fly to the bare name, ſeeking ſome pro-"tection and cover for their luſts." Conſult Gaſſendi, who unfolds this in an admirable manner, and ſhews how ſeveral great men, hurried away with the torrent, have from age to age followed the eſtabliſhed prejudices, without examining things to the bottom. Several of the Fathers are in this predicament: but Gregory Nazianzen did not ſuffer himſelf to be impoſed on (139); and I remember to have read in Origen (140), that the Followers of Epicurus abſtained from adultery as much as the Stoics, though they did ſo from a different motive.

[O] He taught an excellent point of Morality with regard to the obedience due to Magiſtrates.] We have ſeen above (141) how he is commended for having never abated his zeal for the good of his country. He did not abandon it in times of difficulty; but reſolved to bear his ſhare of the miſeries of his countrymen. He lived upon beans, and maintained his Scholars with them, while Demetrius beſieged Athens; and he divided the beans equally with them, counting them one by one: Κυάμους πρὸς ἀριθμὸν μετ' αὐτῶν διανεμόμενον. Fabas cum ipſis ad numerum partitum (142). He wiſhed for good Sovereigns, and ſubmitted to thoſe who governed ill (143). This is a maxim very neceſſary for the public good, and the foundation of the ſecurity of all States. I am a witneſs, ſaid a modern Wiſeman (144), and not a judge of the life of Princes; and tho' I ſhould not approve their conduct, I ſhould ſtick firmly to that old Oracle, Bona tempora voto expetere, qualiacunque tolerare. This is taken from Tacitus (145), and is alſo to be found in a Speech which an Emperor made to his ſoldiers. Χρὴ δ' ἄνδρας γενναίους τε καὶ σώφρονας εὐχεσθαι μὲν ὑπάρχειν τὰ βέλτιστα, φέρειν δὲ τὰ προσπίπτοντα. Decet autem viros fortes atque moderatos optima quidem optare, ſed ferre quæcunque incidant (146). i. e. "It becomes brave and prudent men to pray for "the beſt, but to bear with whatever happens."

[G] He became much more famous after his death, than he had been during his life.] Seneca, ſpeaking of ſeveral great men who had not juſtice done them in their own age, forgets not Epicurus. Quam multorum profectus, ſays he (147), in notitiam evaſere poſt ipſos? quam multos fama non excepit ſed eruit? Vides Epicurum, quantopere non tantum eruditiores, ſed hæc quoque imperitorum turba miretur. Hic ignotus ipſis Athenis fuit, circa quas delituerat. Multis itaque jam annis Metrodoro ſuo ſuperſtes, in quadam epiſtola, cum amicitiam ſuam & Metrodori, grata commemoratione cecinisſet, hoc noviſſime adjecit, nihil ſibi & Metrodoro inter bona tanta nocuiſſe, quod ipſos illa nobilis Græcia non ignotos ſolum habuiſſet, ſed pene inauditos. Numquid ergo non poſtea, quam eſſe deſierat, inventus eſt? numquid non opinio ejus emicuit? Hoc Metrodorus quoque in quadam epiſtola confitetur, ſe & Epicurum non ſatis eminuiſſe: ſed poſt, ſe & Epicurum, magnum paratumque nomen habituros, apud eos qui voluiſſent per eadem ire veſtigia. i. e. "How many have there been whoſe merits were "not publickly known till themſelves were no more? "How many have there been to whom Fame gave "not a favourable reception, but afterwards drew them "forth from obſcurity? You ſee how much Epicurus "is admired, not only by the more learned, but even "by the ignorant multitude. This man was un-"known at Athens, in whoſe neighbourhood he had "concealed himſelf. Having outlived his friend Me-"trodorus many years, he gratefully commemorated "the friendſhip which had been between them in an "Epiſtle, and concluded with ſaying, that it had been "no diſadvantage to himſelf and Metrodorus, amidſt "ſo much good fortune, that they had been not only "unknown, but almoſt unheard of in Greece. Was "he not therefore found out after he had ceaſed to be? "Did not his doctrine ſhine forth? Metrodorus like-"wiſe in a certain Epiſtle makes the ſame confeſſion, "that he and Epicurus had not appeared in due luſtre, "but that both of them ſhould one day be highly "and freely honoured by thoſe who ſhould tread in "the ſame footſteps." Obſerve that in the time of Seneca, not only the learned, but even the unlearned admired Epicurus. A Father of the Church will bear witneſs that Metrodorus did not feed himſelf with illuſory notions, or vain hopes, when he imagined that the Sect of his good friend Epicurus would make more noiſe in future ages, than it did during their lives. For Lactantius declares that that Sect was always more flouriſhing than the reſt (148).

(148) Epicuri diſciplina celebrior ſemper fuit quam cæterorum. Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. 3. cap. 17.

[Q] Plutarch has been ſo equitable as to ſhew there was nothing in . . . his Banquet unworthy of a Philoſopher.] His prejudices againſt Epicurus are well known, and therefore we may be aſſured that he ſhews him no favour, and that if he clears him, it is becauſe he thinks he is unjuſtly cenſured. He begins with ſaying that they inveighed againſt Epicurus for introducing, in his Banquet, an impertinent and unſeemly diſcourſe, about what time it was beſt to have to do with a woman. For an old man, at ſupper, in the company of youths, to talk of ſuch a ſubject, and diſpute whether before or after ſupper was the moſt convenient time, argued him to be a very looſe and debauched man (149). He ſays a little after that Zopyrus, the Phyſician, who was very converſant with the writings of that Philoſopher, repreſented to thoſe Critics: "that they had not duly "weighed that piece; for he did not propoſe that "queſtion at firſt, and as the beginning of the diſ-"courſe on purpoſe: but after ſupper he deſired the "young men to take a walk, and then diſcourſe and "diſpute upon it, abate their deſires, and reſtrain "their appetites; ſhewing them it was very hurtful "at all times, but eſpecially after they had been eat-"ing and making merry. But ſuppoſe he had pro-"poſed this as the chief Topic for diſcourſe, does it "not become a Philoſopher to enquire which is the "proper and convenient time? Ought we not to time "it well, and direct our embraces by reaſon? Or "may ſuch diſcourſes be otherwiſe allowed, and muſt "they be thought unſeemly Problems to be propoſed "at table? Indeed I am of another mind. It is true, "I ſhould blame a Philoſopher, that in the middle of "the day, in the Schools, before all ſorts of men "ſhould diſcourſe of ſuch a ſubject; but over a glaſs "of wine, between friends and acquaintance, when it "is neceſſary to propoſe ſomething beſides dull ſerious "diſcourſe, why ſhould it be a fault to hear or ſpeak "any thing that may inform our judgments, or di-"rect our practice in ſuch matters? And I proteſt I "had rather that Zeno had inſerted his looſe Topics "of Poſtures in ſome merry diſcourſes, and agreeable "Table-talk, than in ſuch a grave and ſerious piece as "his Politics (150)." Here then is Epicurus juſtified by a Writer who was not greatly his friend; he is juſtified, I ſay, both with regard to the main point, and to the circumſtances, againſt a pack of ſlanderers, the principles of Epicurus. He ſhews, among other things, that the doctrine which rejects God's providence and the immortality of the ſoul, deprives a man of an infinite number of conſolations in this life, and drives him to deſpair when he comes to die [R]. I am not at all ſorry that this Author has omitted to examine whether thoſe who denied a providence argued more conſiſtently than thoſe who acknowledged one; I mean, whether ſuppoſing, as all the Philoſophers did, that matter owed its exiſtence to itſelf alone, it was not a more ſolid way of reaſoning to maintain that the Gods did not act upon matter, than to maintain that they diſpoſed of it at their pleaſure. Once more, I am not ſorry that Plutarch has not entred into the examination of this queſtion; for he was too much prejudiced againſt Epicureiſm, and too far engaged in certain Hypotheſes, not to perplex and embroil this weighty ſubject; but I am ſorry I have read no Book wherein the point is in any manner diſcuſſed. Methinks, among ſo many Apologiſts for Epicurus, ſome of them, at the ſame time that they condemned his impiety, ſhould have endeavoured to ſhew that it flowed neceſſarily and philoſophically from the error common to all the Pagans concerning the eternal exiſtence of matter [S]. I ſhall make ſome obſervations thereon, who were in the wrong as to the main point, and related the circumſtances unfaithfully. But here is another ſort of juſtification. Plutarch imitates him; he handles the ſame queſtion at table, he turns it every way, and reaſons like a great maſter: and yet he is one of the graveſt Authors among the Pagans, and the man who declared the moſt conſtantly in favour of good morals. This ought to teach our falſe zealots, and ſqueamiſh critics, that they are raſhly offended at the liberty taken in this Dictionary, of bringing in what they call ſmutty paſſages. Do not our Chriſtian Phyſicians, I ſpeak even of thoſe who carefully preſerve the character of gravity, and ſhew great zeal for the purity of manners, treat the ſame queſtion which Epicurus was blamed for having treated? Let their ſtyle be ever ſo chaſte, can they examine it without ſtirring of ordures, and preſenting to the mind a great many obſcene images? But would it not be ridiculous to pretend, under this pretext, that they ought not to diſcuſs it, how uſeful ſoever the regulations, cautions, and obſervations may be, which they lay before us? Note that Amiot, Biſhop of Auxerre, and Great Almoner of France, has made no ſcruple of publiſhing in French the chapter out of which I have quoted ſome paſſages: and yet it is full of ſmutty things, which he has expreſſed plainly enough. It muſt be confeſſed likewiſe that Plutarch's Moral therein is excellent: for out of a principle of Religion he would have us take the night: For all men, ſays he (151), have not the command of that happy eaſe and tranquillity which Epicurus's Philoſophy procured him; for many great incumbrances ſeize almoſt upon every one every day, or at leaſt ſome diſquiets; and it is not ſafe to truſt the body with any of theſe, when it is in ſuch a condition and diſturbance preſently after the fury and heat of the embrace is over. Let, according to his opinion, the happy and immortal Deity ſit at eaſe, and never mind us; but if we regard the Laws of our Country, we muſt not dare to enter into the Temple and offer ſacrifice, if but a little before we have done any ſuch thing. It is fit, therefore, to let ſleep and night intervene, and after there is a ſufficient ſpace of time paſſed between, riſe as it were pure and new, and, as Democritus was wont to ſay, with new thoughts upon the new day.

(149) Plutarch, in the 3d Book of his Table-talk, chap. 6.

(150) It is in the Greek; Νὴ τὸν κύνα, καὶ τοῦ Ζήνωνος ἂν ἐβουλόμην διαμαρισμούς ἐν συμποσίοις τινὶ καὶ παιδιὰ μᾶλλον ἢ σπουδῆς τοσαύτης ἐχομένους συγγράμματι τῷ πολιτείᾳ κατατεταχθαι. Per canem adjuro, optare me ſuos illos diamerismos obſcœnos Zenonem in convivio aliquo aut joco quam in tam ſerio de republica opere poſuiſſe. Plut. in Sympoſ. lib. 3. cap. 6. pag. 653.

(151) Plutarch. ibid. pag. 655.

[R] The doctrine which rejects the Providence of God, and the immortality of the ſoul, deprives man of a great many conſolations, &c.] Plutarch proves this in ſo ſolid a manner, that after having read his argument, we cannot ſufficiently wonder at the powerful influence which the firſt impreſſions of certain objects have on our mind. The firſt idea which preſents itſelf to thoſe who ſet themſelves to examine the ſtate of irreligion, is the idea of a liberty moſt happy according to worldly notions, in which a man gratifies all his deſires without any fear, or any remorſe. This idea roots itſelf ſo deeply in the mind, and ſo entirely takes it up, that if any one comes and tells us that the condition of a pious man is not comparable, in point of temporal advantages, to that of an Epicurean, we reject this aſſertion as a moſt abſurd falſhood. And yet this ſuppoſed falſhood has on its ſide a multitude of very ſtrong reaſons, as Plutarch has ſhewn. The fair dealing of that Author, in this part of his diſpute, ſeems to me very conſiderable, in caſe he perceived how far his reaſons might ſerve to juſtify Epicureiſm: for if it be certain that by denying the Providence of God, and the immortality of the ſoul, a man deprives himſelf of a thouſand inward ſatisfactions and comforts, it was not from motives of intereſt, out of ſelf-love, or voluptuouſneſs, that Epicurus choſe the philoſophical Hypotheſis he taught. He would rather have pitched upon the other, if he had been determined by ſuch motives. There are a great many things to be ſaid on this ſubject: it will be better, however, to refer them to another Book (152), wherein I ſhall likewiſe examine an objection which Mr. le Fevre has propoſed againſt Plutarch. He accuſes him of having contradicted himſelf, and to prove it he alledges what Plutarch, diſputing againſt Epicurus, has obſerved concerning the advantages, and the temporal happineſs of Religion, and what the ſame Plutarch has maintained in another place, that ſuperſtition is worſe than Atheiſm (153).

(152) In the Continuation of the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes.

(153) Tanaquil le Fevre, Preface to his Tranſlation of Plutarch's Treatiſe concerning Superſtition. Conſult him alſo at the end of his Remarks on that Treatiſe.

[S] Some Apologiſts of Epicurus ſhould have endeavoured to ſhew that his impiety flowed naturally . . . . from the eternal exiſtence of matter.] There was among the Natural Philoſophers of Paganiſm a great variety of opinions as to the Origin of the World, and the nature of the element, or elements, of which they pretended particular bodies were formed. Some maintained that water was the principle of all things, others aſcribed that quality to the air, others to fire, others to homogeneous parts, &c. but they all agreed in this point, that the matter of the World was unproduced. There was no diſpute among them as to the queſtion whether any thing had been made out of nothing, they all agreed that to be impoſſible, and conſequently the independent eternity, which Epicurus attributed to atoms, was not an opinion which the other Sects could condemn with regard to that neceſſary and uncreated exiſtence; for every one of them attributed the ſame nature to the principles which they admitted. Now I ſay, that this impious propoſition being once laid down, viz. that God is not the Creator of matter, it is leſs abſurd to maintain, as the Epicureans did, that God was not the Author of the World, and that he did not concern himſelf with the direction of it, than to maintain, as ſeveral other Philoſophers did, that he had formed it, preſerved it, and was the Director of it. What they ſaid was true; but notwithſtanding they ſpoke inconſiſtently, and it was a truth intruded, which entred not thro' the door, but thro' the window; they found themſelves in the right way, becauſe they ſtrayed from the road which they had taken at firſt. If they had known how to guide themſelves therein, they would not have been orthodox; ſo that their orthodoxy was a ſpurious and monſtrous production, which reſulted accidentally from their ignorance, and for which they were beholden to their incapacity of reaſoning juſtly. This reproach was yet much ſtronger with regard to the Philoſophers who preceded Anaxagoras, ſince they explained the generation of the world without the intervention of the finger of God (154). If they admitted a Divine Providence after that, they reaſoned much worſe than thoſe who did not admit it, till they had ſuppoſed that the Divine Intelligence preſided over the reduction of the Chaos into order, and the firſt formation of the parts of this world.

If I ſhould ſay no more, the greater part of my Readers would imagine that I advance a paradox as impious as the very doctrine of Epicurus. Wherefore I muſt explain thereon, which will ſhew, among other things, I, That when a man does not follow the ſyſtem plain all this in the cleareſt manner I can. For that end, I muſt firſt lay down this foundation, that according to the Syſtem of all the Heathen Philoſophers who believed a God, there was an eternal and uncreated Being diſtinct from God; that is, matter. This Being owed its exiſtence to its own nature only; and had no dependance on any other cauſe, either as to its eſſence, or exiſtence, or as to its attributes and properties. Therefore it could not be ſaid without contradicting the laws and notions of Order, which are the rule of our judgments and reaſonings, that another Being has exerciſed ſo great an empire over matter, as to change it entirely; and conſequently, thoſe who have aſſerted that matter having eternally exiſted of itſelf without being a world, began to be a world when God ſet himſelf to move it a hundred different ways, to condenſe it in one place, and rarefy it in another, &c. have advanced a doctrine which ſhocks the moſt exact notions to which thoſe who philoſophize are bound to conform. If Epicurus had aſked a Platonic Philoſopher theſe queſtions, tell me, pray, by what right God has deprived matter of the ſtate wherein it had ſubſiſted from eternity? what is his title? whence does he derive his commiſſion to make this reformation? What anſwer could he have returned him? would he have founded the title on the ſuperior power with which God was indued? but in that caſe would he not have made God act according to the law of the ſtrongeſt, and after the manner of thoſe conquering uſurpers, whoſe conduct is manifeſtly oppoſite to right, and which reaſon and the notions of order oblige us to condemn? would he have ſaid that God being more perfect than matter, it was juſt that he ſhould ſubject it to his dominion? but even this is not conformable to the notions of reaſon. The moſt excellent perſon in a city has not a right to make himſelf maſter of it, and he cannot lawfully rule there, unleſs that authority be conferred upon him. In a word, we know no other lawful title of dominion than that which the quality of cauſe, or the quality of benefactor, or that of purchaſer, or a voluntary ſubmiſſion, &c. may confer. Now nothing of all this can have place between an uncreated matter, and the divine nature: wherefore we muſt conclude, that without violating the laws of Order, God could not make himſelf maſter of that matter, to diſpoſe of it at his pleaſure. If you alledge what paſſes between man and other animals, the dominion he exerciſes over beaſts, without having either produced or fed them (155), I anſwer (156), that his wants or his paſſions being the baſis of that dominion, this cannot ſerve to make us comprehend how God could aſſume the command over matter; he, who wants nothing, who finds in himſelf the whole ſtock of his infinite felicity, who is capable of no paſſion, and who cannot do any action which is not perfectly conformable to the moſt exact juſtice.

(155) I ſpeak thus, becauſe I conſider Men and Beaſts in general, and not a man in particular, who buys, feeds, &c. ſuch or ſuch a Beaſt.

Omnis enim per ſe divum natura neceſſe eſt
Immortali ævo ſumma cum pace fruatur....
Ipſa ſuis pollens opibus, nihil indiga noſtri (157).

" For whatſoe'er's Divine muſt live in peace,
" In undiſturb'd and everlaſting eaſe,
" From all dependance on our nature free,
" Sufficient to its own felicity." Creech.

(156) I ſuppoſe it is Epicurus who makes this anſwer, and not a man who has read in Geneſis what is the lawful Origin of the Authority which we exerciſe over Animals.

(157) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 57.

A Platoniſt, who ſhould be thus preſſed, would be conſtrained to ſay that God exerciſed his power over matter only from a principle of goodneſs. God, would he ſay (158), perfectly knew theſe two things: the one, that he would do nothing againſt the inclination of matter, by ſubjecting it to his empire; for as it was inſenſible, it was not capable of being grieved at the loſs of its independance: the other, that it was in a ſtate of confuſion, and imperfection, a rude heap of materials, of which an excellent edifice might be made, and ſome of which might be converted into living bodies, and thinking ſubſtances; his deſign therefore was to communicate to matter a more beautiful and noble ſtate than that which it was at firſt in. Is there any thing in this unworthy of a Being who is ſupremely juſt, and ſupremely good? This, methinks, is the moſt rational anſwer a Platonic could make; but I am of opinion, at the ſame time, that Epicurus would deſire no better than to ſee the controverſy brought to that iſſue. He would have a great many difficulties to urge.

(158) Note, that this Platoniſt, preſſed by Epicurus's Objections, muſt be forced to abandon the Opinion which Plutarch attributes to Plato concerning the ſoul of matter. See the Remark [U] towards the end.

I. He would aſk in the firſt place, whether there can be a ſtate more agreeable to a thing, than that wherein it has always been, and in which its own nature, and the neceſſity of its exiſtence has eternally placed it: is not ſuch a condition the moſt natural that can be imagined? can that need any reformation, which has been regulated and determined by the nature of things, and the neceſſity to which whatſoever exiſts of itſelf owes its exiſtence? muſt it not neceſſarily laſt an eternity? and is it not a proof that all reformation would come too late, and would conſequently be incompatible with the wiſdom of the Reformer?

II. But let us ſuppoſe the maxim, Better late than never, Præſtat ſerò quàm nunquam: how will this Reformer do to change the ſtate and condition of matter? will it not be neceſſary for him to produce motion in it? and to do this muſt he not touch and puſh it? if he can touch and puſh it, he is not diſtinct from matter; and if he be not diſtinct from matter, you are in the wrong to admit two uncreated Beings, one which you call matter; and the other which you call God; there is in effect nothing but matter in the univerſe, and our diſpute is at an end; that Author of the world, that Director, that Divine Providence in queſtion vaniſhes into ſmoke. If he be diſtinct from matter, he has no extenſion; tell me then how he will be able to apply himſelf to bodies to drive them out of their place? The Platonic would anſwer, that matter was always in motion, and therefore it was only neceſſary to direct that motion: but it would be replied, that to direct the motion of certain bodies, it is neceſſary to move others. This appears in the working of ſhips, and in all machines: wherefore the Divine Nature, if it was not corporeal, could with no more eaſe give a new determination to a motion already exiſting, than produce motion originally. Take notice that Ariſtotle has allowed the ſuppoſition of the eternal motion of matter to be abſurd. He effectually refutes Plato, who ſays that before the formation of the world there was an irregular agitation in the elements (159): he proves him guilty of a contradiction, and obſerves in general againſt all thoſe who taught that the motion anterior to the exiſtence of the world was irregular, that they advanced an abſurdity, ſince the motion which agrees to moſt things, and for the longeſt time, muſt be accounted natural; from whence it follows that the production of the world would rather be an overturning of the ſtate of nature, than an introduction of a true natural ſtate: Ἔτι, τὸ ἀτάκτως, ἀδύνατον ἐστιν ἕτερον, ἢ τὸ παρὰ φύσιν, ἡ γὰρ τάξις ἡ οἰκεία, τῶν αἰσθητῶν φύσις ἐστίν. ἀλλὰ μὴν καὶ τοῦτο ἄτοπον καὶ ἀδύνατον, τὸ, τὸ ἄπειρον ἄτακτον ἔχειν κίνησιν· ἐπὶ γὰρ ἡ φύσις ἐκείνη τῶν πραγμάτων, οἵαν ἔχει τὰ πλείω, καὶ τὸ πλείω χρόνον. συμβαίνειν δ' ἂν αὐτοῖς τἐναντίον, τὴν μὲν ἀταξίαν εἶναι κατὰ φύσιν, τὴν δὲ τάξιν καὶ τὸ κόσμον παρὰ φύσιν. καὶ τοι δοξειεν ὡς ἔτυχε γίγνεται τῶν κατὰ φύσιν: Præterea inordinate quippiam fieri nil aliud eſt, quàm fieri præter naturam: ordo enim proprius ſenſibilium naturarum eſt. At verò & hoc abſurdum eſt ac impoſſibile, infinitum inquam inordinatum motum habere. Eſt enim ea natura rerum quam plures & majori tempore habent. Contrarium igitur ipſis accidit, inordinationem quidem eſſe ſecundùm naturam, ordinem verò mundumve præter naturam: & tamen nihil eorum, quæ ſunt ſecundùm naturam, fit fortè fortuna (160). Wherefore he obſerved that Anaxagoras, who ſuppoſed the parts of matter were at reſt when the world began to be produced, took the thing perfectly right (161). But to return to Epicurus.

(159) Πρὶν γενέσθαι τὸν κόσμον ἐκινεῖτο τὰ στοιχεῖα ἀτάκτως. Elementa inordinate movebantur antea quam mundus eſſet. Plato in Timæo, apud Ariſtotelem de Cælo, lib. 3. cap. 2. pag. m. 370. G.

(160) Ariſtotel. de Cælo, lib. 3. cap. 2. pag. 371, B.

III. Let us, if you pleaſe, reckon all my reaſons à priori for nothing, would he ſay in the third place to the Platonic. I give up even this Objection, that goodneſs in order to be commendable ought to be accompanied with judgment. Now we do not ſee that judicious perſons, tho' ever ſo good-natured, intermeddle of their own head with the domeſtic diſorders of their neighbour: they content themſelves with eſtabliſhing a right order at home (162). A wiſe Prince remedies the abuſes of his own State; but he does not concern himſelf with reforming the neighbouring Monarchies: he leaves the care of that to thoſe to whom they

(161) Ἔοικε δὲ τοῦτό γε αὐτὸ καλῶς Ἀναξαγόρας ὑπολαβεῖν· ἐξ ἀκινήτων γὰρ ἄρχεται κοσμοποιεῖν. Videtur autem Anaxagoras hoc ipſum bene accepiſſe: ex immobilibus enim incipit conficere mundum. Idem, ibid. C.

(162) See Eraſmus on the Proverb Ædibus in noſtris quæ prava aut recta gerunt*ur*, which is the LXXXV of the 6th Century of the 1ſt Chiliad, pag. m. 222.

ſyſtem of the Scripture with regard to the Creation, the more conſequently he argues, the more he miſleads himſelf: II, That this ſyſtem is the only one which has the advantage of they belong. We might preſuppoſe, on this idea of wiſdom, that God could not undertake to remedy the imperfections of matter. He was not reſponſible for them, ſince he had no ſhare in the production of bodies. This was the work of nature, and it belonged to her to diſpoſe of them. I give up this inſtance, would Epicurus ſay, and I allow you to make uſe of the example of thoſe Heroes who have been placed among the Gods for the great ſervices they have rendred to mankind.

Romulus, & Liber pater, & cum Caſtore Pollux,
Poſt ingentia facta, Deorum in templa recepti,
Dum terras hominumque colunt genus, aſpera bella
Componunt, agros aſſignant, oppida condunt (163).

(163) Horat. Ep. 1. lib. 2. ver. 5.

" Bacchus, Quirinus, and the Sons of Jove,
" Whoſe Virtues rais'd them to the Gods above
" Whilſt here they liv'd, check'd war's deſtructive
" rage,
" Built towns, made Laws, and civiliz'd the age."
Creech.

Let us conſider, in another light, whether thoſe motives of goodneſs which you ſpeak of ought not to have yielded to reaſons of wiſdom.

IV. A Wiſe Agent does not undertake to employ a great heap of materials without having well examined their qualities, and without being aſſured that they are ſuſceptible of the form which he has a mind to give them. And if the diſcuſſion of their qualities informs him that they have incorrigible defects, which would render their new condition worſe than the former, he is far from meddling with them; he abandons them to their ſtate, and judges he ſhall act more wiſely, and with more goodneſs, in leaving things as they are, without giving them another form which would become pernicious. Now you Platonics agree (164), that there was in matter a real defect, which was an obſtacle to God's deſign, an obſtacle, I ſay, which did not permit God to make a World exempt from the diſorders we ſee in it; and it is certain, on the other hand, that theſe diſorders render the condition of matter infinitely more unhappy than that eternal, neceſſary, and independent State in which it had been before the generation of the World. All was inſenſible in that State: grief, pain, crime, all phyſical and moral evil, were there unknown. It is true, there was no pleaſure felt; but that privation of good was not an evil; for it cannot be an evil any otherwiſe than as it is felt and cauſes affliction. You ſee, therefore, that it was not the part of a good and wiſe Being to change the condition of matter, to transform it into ſuch a World as this is. It contained in its boſom the ſeeds of all the crimes and all the miſeries which we behold; but they were barren ſeeds, and in that ſtate they did no more harm than if they had not exiſted: nor did they become pernicious and fatal, till after the animals were hatched out of them by the formation of the World. Thus matter was a Camarina which ſhould not have been ſtirred (165). It ſhould have been left in its eternal reſt; remembring that the more one ſtirs a fœtid matter, the more one ſpreads its infection around. There is no doubt but the Divine Nature acted conformably to this idea. Therefore it was not ſhe who made the World.

V. It could not be anſwered to Epicurus that God did not foreſee the malignity of the Souls which ſhould be hatched out of thoſe ſeeds of matter; for he would immediately reply, 1, that thereby an ignorance would be attributed to God, which would have fatal conſequences: 2, that at leaſt God would have reſtored things to their former ſtate, after he had ſeen the ill effects of his Work; and ſo the World would not have laſted till the time when he, Epicurus, diſputed about the doctrine of Providence with a Platonic.

VI. His laſt Objection would be the ſtrongeſt of all. He would repreſent to his Adverſary, that the moſt intimate, general, and infallible notion we have of God is, that God enjoys perfect felicity (166). Now this is incompatible with the ſuppoſition of Providence: for if he governs the World, he created it; if he created it, he either foreſaw all the diſorders which are in it, or he did not foreſee them. If he did foreſee them, it cannot be ſaid that he made the World out of a principle of goodneſs; which overthrows the beſt anſwer of the Platonic. If he did not foreſee them, it is impoſſible but on ſeeing the ill ſucceſs of his Work, he muſt have been exceedingly grieved. He would have been convinced that he was either ignorant of the qualities of the materials, or wanted the power to overcome their reſiſtance, as he doubtleſs hoped to have done. There is no Workman who can without grief ſee his hopes deſtroyed, that he could not attain his end, and that deſigning to work for the publick good he made a pernicious machine, &c. We have ideas ſufficient to know that this can never be God's caſe; but not to know that if by an impoſſibility it were his caſe, he would not be to be pitied and very unhappy.

VII. If you ſuppoſe afterwards, that inſtead of deſtroying ſuch a Work, he obſtinately reſolves to preſerve it, and to work perpetually and without ceaſing in repairing its faults, or preventing them from increaſing, you give us an idea of the moſt unhappy nature that can be conceived. He deſigned to build a magnificent palace, wherein he might conveniently lodge the animated creatures which were to proceed from the ſhapeleſs womb of matter, and load them with favours; and it happened that thoſe creatures did nothing but devour one another, being incapable of continuing alive, unleſs the fleſh of ſome ſerved the others for food. It happened that the moſt perfect of theſe animals did not ſpare even the fleſh of thoſe of his own ſpecies; there were Men-eaters among them, and they who were not guilty of that brutality, forbore not to perſecute one another, and to become the prey of envy, jealouſy, fraud, avarice, cruelty, diſeaſes, cold, heat, hunger, &c. Their Author continually ſtruggling with the malignity of the matter productive of theſe diſorders (167), and obliged to have always the thunderbolt in his hand (168), and to pour down on the earth peſtilence, war, and famine, which, with the wheels and gibbets the highways abound with, do not hinder evil from maintaining its ground, can he be looked on as a happy Being? Can one be happy, when at the end of four thouſand years labour, he is not a whit more forward in the work he has undertaken, and which he paſſionately deſires to finiſh, than he was the firſt day he began it? Is not this image of infelicity as expreſſive as the wheel of Ixion, the ſtone of Siſyphus, or the tub of the Danaides?

I ſay nothing but what is very probable when I ſuppoſe Epicurus perſuaded himſelf that the Gods would ſoon have repented of having made the world, and that the trouble of governing ſo intractable and refractory an animal as man, would diſturb their felicity. Do we not ſee in the Scripture that the true God, accommodating himſelf to our capacity, has revealed himſelf as a Being who having known the malice of man, repented, and was grieved that he had created him (169), and as a Being who is provoked, and complains of the ſmall ſucceſs of his labour (170)? He ſays to Iſrael, All the day long I have ſtretched forth my hands unto a diſobedient and gainſaying people (171). I know well enough that the ſame Book which teaches us theſe things, teaches us alſo to rectify the idea which they preſent at firſt ſight; but Epicurus, who was deſtitute of the light of Revelation, could not correct his Philoſophy; and was neceſſarily obliged to follow the path which ſuch a guide ſhewed him. Now

(166) See the Verſes of Lucretius quoted above, Citation (157), and the Remark [N] of the Article SPINOZA, Num. v.

(167) Utrum ... Deus quod vult efficiat, an in multis rebus illum tractanda deſtituant, & à magno artifice prave formentur multa, non quia ceſſat ars, ſed quia id in quo exercetur ſæpe inobſequens arti eſt. Seneca, in Præf. lib. 1. Quæſt. Natur.

(168) ... neque Per noſtrum patimur ſcelus Iracunda Jovem ponere fulmina. i. e. " But ſtill " averſe to " Jove's command, " We won't permit his lifted " hand " To lay his " angry thunder " down." Horat. Od. 3. lib. 1. ver. 38.

(169) Geneſ. vi. 5, 6.

(170) Iſaiah, chap. 5. & paſſim alibi in the Prophets and Pſalms.

(171) Rom. x. 21.

(164) Nota, Materiam inobſequentem & ab eâ Prava eſſe. Plato ſæpè hæc tangit, & huc tranſit: ut cum dicit Materiam, aut in ea Ψυχὴν, ἄτακτον, καὶ κακοποιὸν, Animam, incompoſitam & mali auctorem, ſive maleficam; iterumque, ἐναντίαν καὶ ἀντίπαλον τῷ ἀγαθουργῷ φύσει: adverſariam & rebellem beneficæ Naturæ, id eſt Deo. Animam ſive Vim in Materia dicit: neque enim ipſam per ſe vult malam, ſed latens in ea aliquid, quod in generatione ſe exſerit & promit. Imò duas Mundi animas ab eo ſtatui, natu jam grandiore, in Libris de Legibus; & cum diu fluctuaſſet, Beneficam ac Maleficam; Plutarchus eſt auctor. i. e. " Note, Matter is diſobedient, which is the cauſe " of evil. Plato often touches on this, and has frequent recourſe to it: as when " he ſays that Matter, or the Soul which is in it, is inordinate, and maleficent, " and again, ſtubborn and rebellious to the Beneficent Nature, that is, God. He " ſays there is a ſoul or power in matter; for he does not make it to be bad in " itſelf, but ſome latent quality therein, which exerts itſelf in generation. Nay, " when he grew older, in his Books of Laws he aſſerted two Souls of the World; " and after he had wavered a long time, he concluded one of them to be Benefi- " cent, and the other Maleficent, as Plutarch tells us." Lipſius, Phyſ. Stoicor. lib. 1. Diſſert. 14. pag. m. 867. He quotes Plutarch. de Iſide & Oſiride. He ſhould likewiſe have quoted him de Animæ Procreat. ex Timæo. See alſo Maximus Tyr. Serm. 25.

(165) See Eraſmus on the Proverb Movere Camarinam. It is the 64*th of the* 1*ſt Century of the* 1*ſt Chiliad. He cites this Greek Verſe,* Μὴ κινεῖν κάμαρίναν· ἀκίνητος γὰρ ἀμείνων. Ne moveas camarinam, etenim non tangere præſtat.

following

of fixing a ſolid foundation of the providence and perfections of God [T]. There is nothing following this guide faithfully, and ſupported by theſe two principles; the one, that matter was ſelf-exiſtent, and did not ſuffer itſelf to be managed according to God's deſire; the other, that the felicity of God can never be diſturbed the leaſt in the world; he ought to find his haven in this concluſion, viz. that there is no Divine Providence. We ſhall draw from hence ſome conſequences to the advantage of the truths of the Chriſtian Religion. See the following Remark. Note, that if, inſtead of engaging Epicurus with a Platonic, I had made him diſpute with an Athenian Prieſt, he would have won the victory with more eaſe. See the following Remark.

[T] The Syſtem of the Scripture is the only one which has the advantage of eſtabliſhing a ſolid foundation of the Providence and perfections of God.] The objections of Epicurus, which have been produced in the preceding Remark, and which were ſufficient to gravel the Heathen Philoſophers, diſappear and vaniſh like ſmoke with reſpect to thoſe whom Revelation has taught that God is the Creator of the World, with regard as well to the matter, as to the form. This truth is of the utmoſt importance; for from thence, as from an abundant ſource, we draw the moſt ſublime and moſt fundamental doctrines, and we cannot lay down the contrary Hypotheſis without deſtroying ſeveral great principles of reaſon. From God's being the Creator of matter, it reſults, 1, That he diſpoſes of the Univerſe as he thinks fit, with the moſt lawful authority that can be. 2, That he needs only a ſingle act of his will to do whatever he pleaſes. 3, That nothing happens but what he has inſerted in the plan of his work. It follows from thence that the direction of the world is not an employment that can either fatigue or trouble God, and that no events, let them be what they will, can diſturb his felicity. If ſome things happen which he has forbidden, and which he puniſhes, they do not happen, however, contrary to his Decrees, and they ſerve the adorable ends which he has propoſed to himſelf from all eternity, and which conſtitute the greateſt myſteries of the Goſpel. But the better to know the importance of the doctrine of the Creation, we muſt alſo caſt our eyes on the inexplicable difficulties in which they engage themſelves who deny it. Conſider, therefore, what Epicurus might object to the Platonics, as we have ſeen above, and what may be ſaid at this day againſt the Socinians. They have rejected the evangelical myſteries, becauſe they could not reconcile them with the light of reaſon. They would not have been conſiſtent with themſelves, if they had agreed that God created matter; for this philoſophical principle, Ex nihilo nihil fit, Nothing is made out of nothing, is full as evident as the principles in conſequence of which they have denied the Trinity and the Hypoſtatic Union. They have therefore denied the creation: but what have they got by it? Why, in avoiding one abyſs, they have fallen into another (172): they have been obliged to allow the independent exiſtence of matter, and at the ſame time to ſubmit it to the authority of another Being. They have been forced to own that neceſſary exiſtence may belong to a ſubſtance which is likewiſe full of defects and imperfections; and this deſtroys a moſt evident notion, to wit, that what exiſts eternally without depending on any other being, ought to be infinite in perfection; for who could have ſet bounds to the power and attributes of ſuch a Being? In a word, they muſt anſwer moſt of the difficulties which I have ſuppoſed Epicurus might propoſe to the Philoſophers who admitted the eternity of matter (173). From whence it may be inferred, by the by, that it is of great uſe to the true Religion, to ſhew that the eternity of matter draws after it the deſtruction of divine Providence. By this means we ſhew the neceſſity, truth, and certainty of the Creation.

I am ſure one of the greateſt Philoſophers of this Age, and at the ſame time one of the moſt zealous Writers for the dogms of the Goſpel, will agree that by making an Apology for Epicurus, ſuch as you have it ex hypotheſi in the preceding Remark, conſiderable ſervice is done to the true faith. He teaches not only that there would be no Providence if God had not created matter; but even that God would not know there was matter, if it was uncreated. I ſhall ſet down his words a little at large: in which the Socinians will find their condemnation. "How ſtupid and "ridiculous Philoſophers are! They imagine the "Creation to be impoſſible, becauſe they do not con- "ceive the power of God to be ſo great as to "make ſomething out of nothing. But do they "clearly conceive that the power of God is able to "move a ſtraw? If they conſider it well, they do "not conceive the one more clearly than the other; "ſince they have no clear idea of efficacy or power. "So that if they follow their falſe principle, they ought "to affirm that God has not even the power to commu- "nicate motion to matter. But this falſe concluſion "would involve them in ſuch impertinent and impi- "ous opinions that they would ſoon become the ob- "jects of the contempt and indignation even of per- "ſons of the leaſt underſtanding. For they would "ſoon find themſelves reduced to maintain, that there "is no motion or change in the world, or that all "theſe changes have no cauſe which produces them, "or wiſdom which regulates them .... (174). If "matter were uncreated, God could neither move it, nor "form any thing out of it. For God cannot move mat- "ter, nor diſpoſe it wiſely, without knowing it. Now "God cannot know it, if he does not give it being. "For God cannot gain his knowledge any otherwiſe "than from himſelf. Nothing can act in him, or "inlighten him. If God therefore did not ſee in "himſelf, and by the knowledge he has of his will, "the exiſtence of matter, it would be eternally un- "known to him. He could not therefore put it in "order, or form any work out of it. Now Philo- "ſophers agree, as well as you, that God can move "bodies. So, tho' they have no clear idea of power "or efficacy, tho' they ſee no connection between the "will of God and the production of creatures, they "ought to acknowledge that God created matter, un- "leſs they will make him impotent and ignorant, "which is to corrupt the idea we have of him, and "to deny his exiſtence (175)."

Let us not conclude without making this Obſervation. I have made Epicurus diſpute againſt a Platonic Philoſopher. This was not making the moſt of his advantages; for he would have gotten the better of moſt of the other Sects more eaſily than of Plato's. But his greateſt advantage would have been to diſpute with a Prieſt. Let us give a ſpecimen of it: let us ſuppoſe that Epicurus ſaid to him, You call me impious, becauſe I teach that the Gods do not concern themſelves with the government of the world; and I charge you with not knowing how to reaſon, and, beſides, with doing the Gods a very great injury. Is it agreeable to the light of reaſon to believe that Jupiter has an almighty power over the machine of the world; he, who is the ſon of Saturn, and the grandſon of Heaven? It is very fit for ſuch an upſtart Deity as he to direct matter, which is an eternal and independent Being. Know that whatever had a beginning is but of yeſterday and to day in compariſon of eternity. Do not therefore overturn all order, by ſubjecting the matter of the Univerſe to ſo young a God. Let us come to the other point; anſwer me, if you pleaſe: are the Gods pleaſed with their adminiſtration, or are they diſpleaſed at it? Mind my Dilemma well: if they are pleaſed with what happens under their Providence, they take delight in evil; if they are diſpleaſed, they are unhappy: now it contradicts common notions that they ſhould delight in evil, or that they ſhould not be happy. They do not delight in evil, would the Prieſt anſwer; for they look upon it as an offence which they puniſh ſeverely: and thence proceed plagues, wars, famines, ſhipwrecks, inundations, &c. I conclude from your anſwer, would Epicurus reply, that they are unhappy: for there is no life more unhappy than to be continually expoſed to offences, and continually obliged to revenge them. Sin never ceaſes among men; therefore there is not one moment in the day, wherein the Gods do not receive affronts: plagues, wars, and the other evils you have mentioned, never ceaſe on earth; for if they

(174) Father Mallebranche, Meditations Chretiens, Meditation 9. num. 3. pag. m. 140.

(175) Idem, ibid. num. 5. pag. 141, 142.

A FEIGNED diſpute between Epicurus and a Pagan Prieſt.

(172) Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim. See Eraſmus, Chiliad. I, Cent. V. num. 4.

(173) Note, It is aſſerted that ſome Socinians have become Spinoziſts, by reaſon of the difficulties they found in the Hypotheſis of a material principle exiſting by it ſelf and diſtinct from God.

nothing more wretched than the method Epicurus took to explain the liberty [U] of human actions.

EPIMENIDES,

end from time to time in one country, they never end with reſpect to all nations; and ſo the Gods have no ſooner done taking revenge on one nation, but they muſt begin to puniſh another. Their work is never finiſhed. What a life is this? What greater torment could a man wiſh to his mortal enemy (176)? I had much rather attribute to them a quiet condition and free from care. But, would the Prieſt ſay, do you ſuppoſe then that they ſee the diſorders of mankind unconcerned, and without applying any remedy to them? Is this indifference any credit to them? Have they not come ſince the Heaven was formed? would Epicurus reply; do you not ſay that the moſt ancient of the Gods who reign at preſent reckons the Heaven for his grandfather? They did not make the world therefore, and it is none of their buſineſs to concern themſelves with what paſſes on earth, or elſewhere. They know that matter exiſts from all eternity, and that the fatal neceſſity of ſelf-exiſtent Beings cannot be changed: therefore they let the torrent paſs, and do not undertake to reform an immutable order. Neither ought we to wonder that their perfections are limited, ſince you own that thoſe of matter, which exiſts eternally, are very ſmall. Your Jupiter, and his aſſiſtants in the celeſtial Council, go about to puniſh lewdneſs with a very ill grace, who are ſo unfaithful to their wives, and have raviſhed ſo many virgins. You cannot deny however, would the Prieſt anſwer, but the doctrine of Providence is of great uſe in keeping the people in their duty. This is not the thing in queſtion, would Epicurus reply: do not change the ſubject of the diſpute. We are ſeeking, not what may have been eſtabliſhed as an uſeful invention, but what truly flows from the light of reaſon.

(176) Hoſtibus eveniant talia dona meis.

[U] Nothing is more wretched than his method . . . of explaining liberty.] There is no Syſtem from which the fatal neceſſity of all things more inevitably follows, than from what Epicurus borrowed from Leucippus and Democritus; for what they ſaid, that the world was formed by chance, or by the fortuitous concourſe of atoms, only excluded the direction of an intelligent cauſe, and did not ſignify that the production of the world was not the conſequence of the eternal and neceſſary Laws of the motion of corporeal principles. And, in effect, it is certain that Democritus attributed all things to a neceſſitating deſtiny. Quum duæ ſententiæ fuiſſent veterum Philoſophorum; una eorum qui cenſerent, omnia ita fato fieri, ut id fatum vim neceſſitatis afferret, in qua ſententia DEMOCRITUS, Heraclitus, Empedocles, Ariſtoteles fuit: altera eorum, quibus viderentur ſine ullo fato eſſe animorum motus voluntarii: Chryſippus tanquam honorarius arbiter &c. (177). i. e. "There being two opinions among the "ancient Philoſophers; one of thoſe who thought all "things were ſo dependent on fate, as to imply an "abſolute neceſſity, which was the opinion of Democritus, Heraclitus, Empedocles, and Ariſtotle; the "other of thoſe who thought the actions of the mind "were voluntary, and not ſubject to the influence of fate: "Chryſippus, as judge of the diſpute, &c." Epicurus, not willing to take up with an opinion which ſeemed to overthrow all morality, and to reduce the human ſoul to the condition of a machine, abandoned the Syſtem of Atoms in that particular, and ſided with thoſe who admitted freedom in the will of man. He declared againſt fatal neceſſity, and even took uſeleſs precautions; for leſt it ſhould be inferred that if every propoſition is either true or falſe, all things happen by fatality, he denied that every propoſition is either true or falſe (178). However, he might have granted that without any body's being able juſtly to conclude from thence the neceſſity of Fatum. Conſider well in what manner Cicero ſhews him the truth of what I have now ſaid: Licet enim Epicuro concedenti, omne enunciatum aut verum aut falſum eſſe, non vereri ne omnia fato fieri ſit neceſſe. Non enim æternis cauſſis naturæ neceſſitate manantibus, verum eſt id quod ita enunciatur, Deſcendit in Academiam Carneades, nec tamen ſine cauſſis. Sed intereſt inter cauſſas fortuitò antegreſſas, & inter cauſſas cohibentes in ſe efficientiam naturalem. Ita & ſemper verum fuit, Morietur Epicurus, quum duo & ſeptuaginta annos vixerit, Archonte Pitharato: neque tamen erant cauſſæ fatales cur ita accideret: ſed quod ita cecidiſſet, certè caſurum ſicut cecidit fuit (179). i. e. "Though Epicurus had granted that every "propoſition was either true or falſe, there would "have been no reaſon to fear leſt all things ſhould "be neceſſarily determined by fate. For the truth of this "propoſition, Carneades entred the ſchool, depends not "on eternal cauſes flowing from the neceſſity of nature, and yet it depends on ſome cauſe. But there "is a difference between accidental cauſes, and cauſes "which include in themſelves a natural efficacy. Thus "it was always true, Epicurus will die at the age of ſeventy two, in the Archonſhip of Pitharatus: and yet there "were no neceſſary cauſes why it ſhould ſo happen: "but ſince it did ſo happen, it certainly was to happen "as it did." This doctrine of Cicero has been fully explained in the courſes of the Philoſophy of the Jeſuits, than whom no Philoſophers are more ardent in maintaining that duarum propoſitionum contradictoriarum de futuro contingenti, altera eſt determinate vera, altera falſa. i. e. "Of two contradictory propoſitions con"cerning a future contingent, the one is determinately "true, the other falſe." And yet we ſee few people who are greater ſticklers than they for the doctrine of the liberty of indifference. Let us conclude from hence that there are means to reconcile the free-will of man with the Hypotheſis that every propoſition is either true or falſe. But as Epicurus was not well aſſured of the matter, he was afraid of intangling himſelf if he did not deny that doctrine: he did not know all the conſequences of it; and ſo to play the ſurer game, he choſe to intrench himſelf in the negative. Chryſippus had not much clearer notions of it; for he believed that unleſs he proved every propoſition to be either true or falſe, he could never prove that all things happen by deſtiny. Contendit omnes nervos Chryſippus, ut perſuadeat omne ἀξίωμα aut verum eſſe aut falſum. Ut enim Epicurus veretur, ne, ſi hoc conceſſerit, concedendum ſit fato fieri quæcunque fiant (ſi enim alterutrum ex æternitate verum ſit, eſſe id etiam certum: & ſi certum, etiam neceſſarium: ita & neceſſitatem & fatum confirmari putat) ſic Chryſippus metuit, ne, ſi non obtinuerit, omne quod enuncietur, aut verum eſſe aut falſum, omnia fato fieri poſſint ex cauſſis æternis rerum futurarum (180). Neither the one nor the other of theſe two great Philoſophers comprehended that the truth of this maxim, every propoſition is either true or falſe, is independent on that which they called Fatum; and therefore it could not ſerve for a proof of the exiſtence of Fatum as Chryſippus pretended, and Epicurus feared. Chryſippus could not have granted, without doing himſelf a prejudice, that there are propoſitions which are neither true nor falſe; but he got nothing by eſtabliſhing the contrary: for whether there be free cauſes or no, it is equally true that this propoſition, the great Mogul will go a hunting to morrow, or he will not go, is either true or falſe. This ſpeech of Tireſias (181) has been juſtly accounted ridiculous; whatever I ſhall ſay will either happen or not; for the great Apollo beſtows on me the faculty of prophecying (182). If it were poſſible there was no God, it would yet be certain that whatever the greateſt madman in the world ſhould foretel, would either happen or not happen. This neither Chryſippus nor Epicurus conſidered.

(177) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 17. See below Citation (183).

(178) See Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. 1. cap. 19, & ſeq. & Quæſt. Acad. lib. 4. cap. 13.

(179) Idem, de Fato, cap. 9.

(180) Idem, ibid. chap. 10.

(181) Quid hoc refert vaticinio illo ridiculo Tireſiæ? Quidquid dicam aut erit aut non. Boetius, de Conſol. Philoſoph. lib. 5. Proſa 3. pag. m. 124.

(182) O Laertiade, quicquid dicam aut erit aut non. Divinare etenim magnus mihi donat Apollo. Horat. Sat. 5. lib. 2. ver. 59.

But let us ſee what Epicurus invented to extricate himſelf from the perplexities of fate. He gave his Atoms a motion of Declination, and therein he eſtabliſhed the ſeat, ſource, and principle of free actions; he pretended that by this means there were certain Events which withdrew themſelves from the dominion of fatal neceſſity. Before him, no other motion was admitted in Atoms but that of weight, and that of reflection. The former was always performed in perpendicular lines, and never changed in the vacuum; nor did it receive any change but when one Atom ſtruck againſt another. Epicurus ſuppoſed that even in the midſt of the vacuum, the Atoms declined a little from the direct line; and from thence ſaid he, proceeded Liberty. Sed Epicurus declinatione atomi vitari fati neceſſitatem putat: itaque tertius quidam motus oritur extra pondus & plagam, quum declinat atomus intervallo minimo, id appellat ἐλάχιστον: quam declinationem ſine cauſſa fieri, ſi minus verbis, re cogitur confiteri. . . . Hanc Epicurus rationem induxit ob eam rem, quòd veritus eſt, ne, ſi ſemper atomus gravitate ferretur naturali ac neceſſaria, nihil liberum nobis eſſet, quum ita moveretur animus, ut atomorum motu cogeretur. Hinc Democritus auctor atomorum accipere maluit neceſſitate omnia fieri, quàm à corporibus individuis naturales motus avellere (183). Let us obſerve, by the way, that this was not the only motive which induced him to invent this motion of declination: he made uſe of it alſo to explain the concourſe of the Atoms; for he plainly ſaw that ſuppoſing them all to move with equal ſwiftneſs in direct lines which tended all downwards, he ſhould never be able to explain how they could have met, and ſo the production of the World would have been impoſſible. He was obliged, therefore, to ſuppoſe that they declined from the direct line (184). Lucretius deſcribes this double uſe of the motion of Declination.

☞EPIMENIDES, an antient Poet and Philoſopher, is univerſally acknowledged to have been a Cretan, though contrary to the cuſtom of his country he always wore his hair

(183) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 10.

(184) See Cicero, lib. 1. de Finibus, cap. 6.

Illud in his quoque Te rebus cognoſcere avemus:
Corpora cum deorſum rectum per Inane feruntur,
Ponderibus propriis incerto tempore ferme,
Incertiſque locis ſpatio decedere paullùm:
Tantùm quod Momen mutatum dicere poſſis.
Quod niſi Declinare ſolerent, omnia deorſum,
Imbris uti guttæ, caderent per Inane profundum:
Nec foret Offenſus natus, nec Plaga creata
Principiis: ita nil unquam Natura creaſſet (185).
\- - - - - - - -
\- - - - - - - -
Denique ſi ſemper motus connectitur omnis,
Et vetere exoritur ſemper novus ordine certo,
Nec Declinando faciunt Primordia motus
Principium quoddam, quod Fati fœdera rumpat,
Ex infinito ne cauſam cauſa ſequatur:
Libera per terras unde hæc animantibus extat,
Unde eſt hæc (inquam) fatis avolſa Voluntas,
Per quam progredimur, quo ducit quemque voluptas (186)?
\- - - - - - - -
\- - - - - - - -
Quare in Seminibus quoque idem fateare neceſſe eſt,
Eſſe aliam præter Plagas, & Pondera cauſam
Motibus, unde hæc eſt nobis innata poteſtas:
De nihilo quoniam fieri Nil poſſe videmus.
Pondus enim prohibet, ne Plagis omnia fiant,
Externa quaſi vi, ſed ne Mens ipſa neceſſum
Inteſtinum habeat cunctis in rebus agendis;
Et devicta quaſi cogatur ferre, patique:
Id facit exiguum CLINAMEN Principiorum
Nec regione loci certa, nec tempore certo (187).

(185) Lucret. lib. 2. ver. 216.

(186) Idem, ibid. ver. 251.

(187) Idem, ibid. ver. 284.

That is,

" Uncertain when, or where,
" But ſeeds in downward motion muſt decline
" A very little from th' exacteſt line:
" For did they ſtill move ſtrait, they needs muſt fall,
" Like Drops of Rain, diſſolv'd and ſcatter'd all;
" For ever tumbling thro' the mighty ſpace,
" And never join to make one ſingle maſs.
\- - - - - - - -
" Beſides, did all things move in a ſtrait line,
" Did ſtill one Motion to another join
" In certain Order, and no Seeds decline,
" And make a Motion fit to diſſipate
" The well-wrought chain of Cauſes and ſtrong Fate;
" Whence comes this perfect Freedom of the mind?
" Whence comes the Will ſo free and unconfin'd
" Above the power of Fate, by which we go
" Where'er we pleaſe, and what we will we do?
\- - - - - - - -
" Therefore we muſt confeſs, as theſe things prove,
" There is another Cauſe by which ſeeds move,
" Beſides dull Weight and Stroke, from whence is wrought
" This power: for nothing can ariſe from nought.
" For Weight forbids that things be only join'd
" By ſtroke and outward force; and leſt the Mind
" Should be by ſtrong neceſſity confin'd,
" And, overcome, endure Fate's rigid Laws,
" This little DECLINATION is the Cauſe.

Creech.

If it was my buſineſs to expoſe the Abſurdities of this Doctrine, I could ſhew ſeveral: for in the Iſt place, what can there be more unworthy of a Philoſopher than to ſuppoſe an up and a down in an infinite Space? Yet this is what Epicurus ſuppoſed; for he pretended that all Atoms moved downwards. If he had ſuppoſed them to move in all manner of right lines, he would have aſſigned a good reaſon of their concourſe, without being obliged to fly to the pretended motion of Declination. In the IId place, that motion engaged him in a contradiction. He taught that nothing was made of nothing, and yet the declination of the Atoms, according to him, did not depend on any cauſe, but proceeded from nothing. This conſequence is ſo much the ſtronger, as we have ſeen (188) Lucretius acknowledge that the free actions of our Soul would proceed from nothing, if the Atoms had not the motion of declination. He pretends that they do not depend either on the Motion of Weight, or on the Motion of the Repercuſſion of Atoms; for in that caſe he would be obliged to acknowledge that they are contained in the concatenation of eternal and neceſſary cauſes, and conſequently that they are ſubject to the fatal neceſſity from which he would exempt them. And the reaſon, in his opinion, why they are not produced of nothing, though they no ways depend either on the weight or the repercuſſion of Atoms, is becauſe the Atoms have a motion of declination. From hence I conclude, that this motion is produced by nothing, or, which is the ſame thing, that it has no cauſe (189), and ſo I precipitate Epicurus into the abyſs he has endeavoured to avoid. If he anſwers, that it is as much the nature of Atoms to decline, as to move downwards, and to ſtrike againſt one another whenever they meet, I reply that their declination is of no ſervice to human Liberty, and does not hinder fatality: and I maintain againſt him, ad hominem, that all the fatality of the Stoics is preſerved; for he confeſſes that the motion of gravitation, and that of repercuſſion, neceſſarily introduce fatal neceſſity. In the IIId place, it is abſurd to ſuppoſe that a being, which has neither reaſon, nor ſenſation, nor will, ſhould deviate from the right line in a void ſpace, and that it ſhould not deviate always, but at certain times, and in certain points of ſpace which are undetermined (190). For a IVth Abſurdity I alledge the diſproportion which is manifeſtly found between the nature of liberty, and the motion, whatever it may be, of an Atom which knows neither what it does, nor where it is, nor that it exiſts. What conſequence is there between theſe two propoſitions: the Soul of man is compoſed of Atoms, which moving neceſſarily in right lines decline a little from the ſtrait way; therefore the Soul of man is a free agent? Cicero made a very right judgment of this Hypotheſis of Epicurus, when he ſaid that it would be much leſs ſhame to own one cannot anſwer one's Adverſary, than to have recourſe to ſuch Anſwers as theſe. Hoc perſæpe facitis, ut cùm aliquid non veriſimile dicatis, & effugere reprehenſionem velitis, afferatis aliquid, quod omnino ne fieri quidem poſſit: ut ſatius fuerit illud ipſum de quo ambigebatur, concedere, quàm tam impudenter reſiſtere: velut Epicurus cùm videret, ſi atomi ferrentur in locum inferiorem ſuopte pondere, nihil fore in noſtra poteſtate, quod eſſet earum motus certus & neceſſarius, invenit quo modo neceſſitatem effugeret, quod videlicet Democritum fugerat: ait Atomum, cùm pondere, & gravitate directò deorſum feratur, declinare paululùm. Hoc dicere turpius eſt, quàm illud quod vult, non poſſe defendere (191). i. e. " This is your frequent practice, that when you aſſert any " improbable thing, and would avoid reprehenſion, " you alledge ſomething which is abſolutely impoſſible; ſo that it would be better to give up the point " in diſpute, than to defend it ſo ſhameleſsly: as " Epicurus, when he ſaw that if the Atoms were carried downwards by their own gravity, nothing would " be in our power, becauſe their motion would be determined and neceſſary, found out an expedient to " avoid fatality, which had eſcaped Democritus. He " ſays that an Atom, tho' it be carried directly downward by its own weight, declines a little; which " evaſion is more ſhameful than his inability to de- " fend (188) Above, Citation (187).

(189) The Ancients objected this to Epicurus. Ἐπικούρῳ μὲν γὰρ οὐδὲ ἀκαρὲς ἐγκλίναι τὴν ἄτομον συγχωροῦσιν, ὡς ἀναιτίου ἐπεισάγοντι κίνησιν ἐκ τοῦ μὴ ὄντος. Sanè Epicuro ne momentaneam quidem atomi inclinationem concedunt, quod eum dicant motum abſque cauſa ex non ente introducere. Plutarch. de Animæ procreat. ex Timæo, pag. 1015.

(190) Id facit exiguum clinamen principiorum Nec regione loci certa, nec tempore certo. Lucret. lib. 2. ver. 292.

(191) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib. 1. cap. 25.

(u) Diogenes Laertius, de Vitâ, Dogmatibus, & Apotbegmatibus Philoſophorum, lib. 1.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Lib. 8. cap. 13.

(d) Lib. 10.

(e) See Laert.

(f) Suidas in Voce Ἐπιμενίδης.

(g) Ibid.

(h) In Vita Solonis.

(i) Diog. Laert.

(k) Hiſt. Commentitiæ, cap. 1.

(l) Laert. and Plin. lib. 7. cap. 52.

hair long (a). Laertius (b) and Valerius Maximus (c) aſſert, that he was born at Gnoſſus; but Strabo is of opinion (d) that it was at Phœſtus. There is no leſs difference about the names of his parents; ſome call his father Phœſtius, or Phœſtus, others Doſiades (e), others Ageſiarcus (f); Suidas calls his mother Blaſta (g), and Plutarch (h) Balta, a ſuppoſed nymph. It is reported, that when he was a boy, being ſent by his father into the country to fetch a ſheep, he went out of the road at noon (i), or, as Apollonius ſays (k), at night, into a Cave, where he ſlept, fifty ſeven (l), fifty (m), forty (n), or ſix (o) years [A], according to the different accounts. At laſt waking, he fancied, that he had taken but a ſhort nap, and began to look about for his ſheep; but not finding it he proceeded to his father's country-eſtate, and finding the face of things ſtrangely altered, and the lands poſſeſſed by a new maſter, he ran back with amazement into the City. Here endeavouring to get into his father's houſe, his younger brother, now grown a grave old man, with much ſcruple admitted him, and informed him of all that had paſſed, and how long he had ſlept. Plutarch obſerves (p), that he waked an old man; but Pliny (q) and Laertius (r) tell us that he grew old in as many days as he had ſlept years. Some Authors have diſcountenanced this ſtory of his long dream; and inform us, that he wandered all that time, in order to improve himſelf in Natural Philoſophy by the knowledge of ſimples [B] (s). But perhaps this ſleep might be only a politic fiction of his to gain authority to his art; ſince we are aſſured, that he uſed commonly to put a much greater fallacy on the people, pretending, as often as the fit took him, to die and revive again at his pleaſure (t). However the report of this accident ſpreading about Greece, he was immediately eſteemed a peculiar favourite of the Gods;

(m) Varro, de Lingua Lat. lib. 8. and Plutarch, Num ſeni gerenda ſit Reſpublica.

(n) Pauſan. in Attic.

(o) Suidas.

(p) Ubi ſupra.

(q) Ubi ſupra.

(r) Ubi ſupra.

(s) Laert.

(t) Idem, and Suidas, ubi ſupra.

" ſend what he aſſerts." He has very happily deſcribed the perplexity wherein that Philoſopher found himſelf. Nec quum hæc ita ſint, eſt cauſa cur Epicurus fatum extimeſcat, & ab atomis petat præſidium, eaſque de via deducat, & uno tempore ſuſcipiat res duas inenodabiles: unam, ut ſine cauſſa fiat aliquid, ex quo exiſtet, ut de nihilo quippiam fiat: quod nec ipſi, nec cuiquam Phyſico placet: alteram, ut quum duo individua per inanitatem ferantur, alterum è regione moveatur, alterum declinet (192). i. e. " Neither, ſince theſe " things are ſo, is there any reaſon why Epicurus " ſhould dread fatality, and fly to Atoms for refuge, " leading them out of their way, and plunging himſelf at once into two inextricable difficulties; the " one, that an effect may be produced without a cauſe, " whence it would follow, that ſomething may proceed from nothing, which neither he nor any other " Philoſopher will admit; the other, that when two " Atoms are carried thro' the void ſpace, one ſhould " move directly, and the other obliquely." It was eaſy, in my mind, to perplex him: how can you imagine, might one have ſaid to him, that the Liberty of man is founded on a motion of Atoms which is performed without any liberty? Can the cauſe give that which it has not? can a hundred Atoms which decline without knowing what they do, form a judgment by which the Soul knowingly determines itſelf to the choice of one of the alternatives which preſent themſelves? Epicurus might thereby have known of what importance it was to him to attribute to every atom an animated and ſenſitive nature, as it ſeems Democritus had done (193), and as Plato had ſuppoſed that matter had a Soul even before God had framed the world: Ἀκοσμία μὲν ἦν τὰ πρὸ τῆς τοῦ κόσμου γενέσεως. ἀκοσμία δ', ἢν ἀσώματος, οὐδὲ ἀκίνητος, οὐδὲ ἄψυχος. . . . Ὁ μὲν Θεὸς οὔτε σῶμα τὸ ἀσώματον, οὔτε ψυχὴν τὸ ἄψυχον ἐποίησεν. Fuit nimirum antequam mundus naſceretur, materies, non corporis eò, non motus, non animæ expers. . . . Etenim Deus neque corpus de incorporeo, neque animam de inanimo redigit (194). i. e. " For there was unformed " matter before the production of the world, but not " incorporeal therefore, or void of motion, or of ſoul. . " For God did not make body from that which was " incorporeal, nor ſoul from that which was inanimate."

We muſt not forget what Cicero tells us, that Carneades invented a ſolution far more ſubtle than all the Epicureans had imagined; which was to aſſert that the Soul had a voluntary motion, of which ſhe was the cauſe. Acutius Carneades, qui docebat poſſe Epicureos ſuam cauſſam ſine hac commentitia declinatione defendere. Nam quum doceret eſſe poſſe quendam animi motum voluntarium, id fuit defendi melius, quam introducere declinationem, cujus præſertim cauſſam reperire non poſſunt: quo defenſo, facile Chryſippo poſſent reſiſtere . . . . (195). De ipſa atomo dici poteſt, quum per inane moveatur gravitate & pondere, ſine cauſſa moveri, quia nulla cauſſa accedat extrinſecus. Rurſus autem, ne omnes à phyſicis irrideamur, ſi dicamus quicquam fieri ſine cauſſa, diſtinguendum eſt, & ita dicendum, ipſius individui hanc eſſe naturam, ut pondere & gravitate moveatur, eamque ipſam eſſe cauſſam cur ita feratur. Similiter ad animorum motus voluntarios non eſt requirenda externa cauſſa: motus enim voluntarius eam naturam in ſe ipſe continet, ut ſit in noſtra poteſtate, nobiſque pareat, nec id ſine cauſſa. Ejus enim rei cauſſa, ipſa natura eſt (196). i. e. " Carneades argued more acutely, who taught that " the Epicureans might defend their cauſe without this " imaginary declination. For when he taught that " there might be a certain voluntary motion of the " Soul, it was better to defend that, than to introduce " a declination, eſpecially one of which no cauſe could " be aſſigned; and this ſuppoſition being made good, " they might eaſily withſtand Chryſippus. . . . . Of " the Atom itſelf it may be ſaid, that when it is " moved thro' the vacuum by gravity, it is moved " without a cauſe, becauſe there is no acceſſion of any " external cauſe. But again, leſt we ſhould all be " made a jeſt of by the Philoſophers, if we ſay any " thing is produced without a cauſe, we muſt make " a diſtinction, and ſay that the nature of the Atom " is ſuch, as to be moved by its own weight, and that " itſelf is the cauſe of its own motion. In like manner, no external cauſe is required for the voluntary " motion of the Soul; for ſuch voluntary motion con- " tains in itſelf this nature, that it is in our power, " and obedient to us, and that not without a cauſe: " for its cauſe is its own nature." It is certain Carneades here furniſhed them with an Anſwer not only much more ſolid than that which they made uſe of, but alſo the moſt ingenious and the ſtrongeſt that human wit can produce. I allow one might have aſked him, Do theſe voluntary motions of the Soul, which depend not on any external cauſe, depend on the nature of the Soul, as the motion of gravity depends on the nature of Atoms according to Epicurus? In that caſe you do not take away the fatality of the Stoics; for you admit no effect which is not produced by a neceſſary cauſe. Neither Carneades, nor any other Pagan Philoſopher, was able to return a ſolid anſwer to that queſtion.

(192) Idem, de Fato, cap. 9.

(193) See the Remark [F].

(194) Plutarch. de Animæ procreat. ex Timæo, pag. 1014, B.

(195) Cicero, de Fato, cap. 11.

(196) Ibid.

[A] Or ſix years.] This is the account of Suidas (1); but Menage (2) is of opinion, that the paſſage in that Author is corrupt, and that inſtead of ἓξ it ought to be read ἑξήκοντα, agreeably to Wolfius's Emendation. Mr. Stanley (3) likewiſe thinks, that the common reading in Suidas is corrupt.

(1) In voce Ἐπιμενίδης.

(2) Obſervat. in Laert. lib. 1. Segm. 109. edit. Amſtelod. 1692, in 4to.

[B] That he wandered at that time, in order to improve himſelf in Natural Philoſophy by the knowledge of ſimples.] In the ſame manner Endymion is reported to have always ſlept; becauſe, as Olympiodorus (4) obſerves, he conſtantly lived in a deſart, in order to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of Aſtronomy; upon which account he was alſo ſaid to be beloved by the moon. Olympiodorus adds, that the ſame thing was ſaid of Claudius Ptolemy, who lived forty years in the Ptera Canobi, intent on the ſtudy of Aſtronomy; and wrote his Demonſtrations and Concluſions in that Science upon the pillars there.

(3) Hiſtory of Philoſophy, vol. 1. Part 1. pag. 114. edit. London 1655. in fol.

(4) In Comment. in Phædonem Platonis.

Gods [C]; upon which account the Athenians being afflicted with a plague, and commanded by the Oracle to make a ſolemn luſtration of the city, they ſent Nicias, the ſon of Niceratus with a ſhip to Crete, to deſire Epimenides to come to them. He accepted of their invitation, and accompanying the meſſengers to Athens in the 46th Olympiad [D] performed the luſtration of the City [E]. Here he contracted an acquaintance with Solon, whom he privately inſtructed in the proper methods for the regulation of the Athenian Commonwealth [F]. His ſaying with regard to the Haven Munychia eſtabliſhed his character of a Prophet [G], which he had among the Antients [H]. Having finiſhed his buſineſs at Athens, the Citizens offered him many valuable gifts and high honours, and appointed a ſhip to carry him back to Crete; but he returned their preſents, and would not accept of any thing but a little branch of the ſacred olive preſerved in the Cittadel, and deſired the Athenian people to enter into an alliance with the Gnoſſians (u). Having obtained this, he returned to Crete, where he died ſoon after, aged a hundred and fifty ſeven years (w), or according to others a hundred and fifty (x), though the Cretans ſay, that he was two hundred and ninety nine years old (y). Laertius gives us an Epiſtle of his to Solon [I]. He was a great Poet (z); and wrote many things in verſe.

(u) Plutarch. in Vitâ Solonis.

(w) Phaſgo or Phlegon, apud Laert. and Plin. ubi ſupra.

(x) Suidas, and Apollon. Hiſt. Comment. citing Phlegon.

(y) Laert.

(z) Suidas.

[C] Eſteemed a peculiar favourite of the Gods.] Laertius's words are, Θεοφιλέστατος εἶναι ὑπελήφθη. Plutarch (5) has made uſe of the ſame word in ſpeaking of our Author: ἐδόκει δέ τις εἶναι Θεοφιλὴς καὶ σοφὸς περὶ τὰ θεῖα, &c.

(5) In Vitâ Solonis.

[D] In the XLVIth Olympiad.] This is the account of Laertius; and Aldobrandini (6) informs us, that it was in the firſt year of that Olympiad, the year before the Commonwealth of Athens was committed to the regulation of Solon. Plato (7) tells us, that Epimenides came to that city ten years πρὸ τῶν Περσικῶν, that is, according to Aldobrandini, before the Perſians came into Lydia. This agrees with Laertius's account; for Cyrus King of Perſia entered Sardis as Conqueror ten years after Epimenides came to Athens. Euſebius places the Luſtration of Athens by Epimenides in the ſecond year of the 47th Olympiad; which is a miſtake, ſince Solon's Archonſhip, which was certainly poſterior to this, was in the third year of the 46th Olympiad. Suidas places it in the 44th. But Mr. Stanley (*) thinks, that Laertius's account agrees beſt with the circumſtances of the ſtory.

(6) In Laert.

(7) De Legibus, lib. 1.

(*) Vol. 1. Part 1. pag. 35.

[E] Performed the Luſtration of the city.] He did it in this manner. He brought a number of ſheep, ſome black and ſome white, all together to the Areopagus; and there let them all looſe to take which way they pleaſed. Perſons were ordered to follow them all, and wherever any one of them laid down, to ſacrifice it preſently to the Guardian Deity of that particular place (8). By this means the plague ceaſed. And hence it is, ſays Lucretius, that at this day are to be ſeen in many Athenian villages altars without any name inſcribed, erected in memory of that expiation. Ὅθεν ἔτι καὶ νῦν ἔστιν ἰδεῖν κατὰ τοὺς δήμους τῶν Ἀθηναίων βωμοὺς ἀνωνύμους ὑπόμνημα τῆς τότε γενομένης ἐξιλάσεως. Brodæus (9) and Beza (10) are of opinion that St. Paul referred to theſe altars in his ſermon to the men of Athens (11). We have a more ample account of them in Pauſanias (12) and Lucian, or whoever elſe was the Author of the Dialogue intitled Φιλόπατρις. Laertius obſerves, that ſome imputed the plague at Athens to the Cylonian impiety; and that it was aſſwaged by putting to death two young men, Cratinus and Cteſibius. Cylon was an Athenian citizen, and by the impulſe of a certain Oracle, and confiding in the power of his father-in-law Theagenes, the Tyrant of Megara, ſeized the caſtle of Athens, and kept it for a long time in his hands; but being beſieged by the Athenians who abhorred a tyranny, he eſcaped with his brother; and the reſt who remained, flying to the altars τῶν σεμνῶν θεῶν, were partly forced from thence and killed, and partly ſlain at the very altars (13).

(8) Τῷ προσήκοντι θεῷ. Laertius, ubi ſupra.

(9) Miſcellan. lib. 2. cap. 2.

(10) Not. in Act. Apoſt. xvii. 23.

(11) Acts xvii. 23.

(12) In Atticis.

(13) Thucydid. lib. 1. cap. 24. See likewiſe Plutarch. in Vitâ Solonis; Cicero de Legibus, cap. 175. and Pauſan. in Attic. cap. 20.

[F] He privately inſtructed Solon in the proper methods for the regulation of the Athenian Commonwealth.] He particularly directed Solon to make the people decent in their worſhip, and to retrench a great many things in their odd manner of mourning, by ordering ſome ſettled kind of ſacrifices after the funeral, and by taking off thoſe ſevere and barbarous ceremonies, which the women then uſed to practiſe on ſuch occaſions (14).

(14) Plutarch. in Vitâ Solonis.

[G] His ſaying with regard to the Haven Munychia eſtabliſhed his character of a Prophet.] Standing one day to look on that Haven, he ſaid to thoſe who were about him, how blind is man in future things? for if the Athenians did but foreſee what a miſchief this will be to their city, they would demoliſh it with their very teeth, rather than let it ſtand (15). There paſſed ſixty four Olympiads before Antipater made good his judgment by placing a garriſon of Macedonians in theſe invincible works. "And we muſt have owned, ſays "Mr. Kennet Baſil (16), the wiſe Obſerver to have "had a large foreſight, if it were not eaſy for a man "to gueſs, without the imputation of magic, that a "tyrant would ſome time or other make uſe of ſuch a "place to lodge a Guard for a bridle to the city."

(15) Laert. lib. 1.

(16) Lives and Characters of the antient Greek Poets, lib. 2. pag. 41.

[H] The character of a Prophet, which he had among the Antients.] Laertius tells us (17), that he was reported to be extremely well ſkilled in Divination: Φασὶ γὰρ καὶ γνωστικώτατον γεγονέναι. Plato (18) ſtiles him ἀνὴρ θεῖος; and in Cicero (19) he is repreſented as a very able Diviner. St. Paul likewiſe (20) calls him a Prophet. Ariſtotle indeed obſerves (21), that he was eſteemed a Prophet, not becauſe he foretold things to come, περὶ τῶν ἐσομένων, but becauſe he foretold things which were paſt, and which nobody knew beſides, περὶ τῶν γεγονότων μὲν, ἀδήλων δέ. But Iſaac Caſaubon (22) is extremely ſurprized at this judgment of Ariſtotle, ſince we find in Plato and other Writers ſeveral of his predictions relating to things at ſome diſtance. Plutarch tells us (23), that the Athenians being afraid of the Perſian Navy, he aſſured them that it would not invade them for many years; and that when it did, the Perſians ſhould not effect the leaſt of their hopes, but depart home with greater loſs to themſelves than they had given their enemies; which was fulfilled at the battles at Marathon and Salamis. He foretold to the Lacedæmonians the overthrow which they ſhould receive from the Arcadians (24), which happened when Eurycrates and Archidamus reigned in Lacedæmon (25).

(17) Lib. 1.

(18) De Legibus, lib. 1.

(19) De Divinat. lib. 1.

(20) Epiſt. to Titus, cap. 1. ver. 12.

(21) Rhetor. lib. 3. cap. 17.

(22) In Laert.

(23) In Vitâ Solon.

(24) Laert.

(25) Aldobrand. in Laert.

[I] Laertius gives us an Epiſtle of his to Solon.] That Author obſerves that there was extant in his time an Epiſtle of Epimenides to Solon concerning the orders of government given by Minos to the Cretans; but that Demetrius the Magneſian (26) conceived it to have been of later date, not being written in the Cretan, but Athenian Language. But Laertius tells us, that he had met with another Epiſtle to this effect. "EPIMENIDES "to SOLON. Be of good comfort my friend; for if "Piſiſtratus were ruler of Athenians inured to ſervi"tude, and void of diſcipline, his government per"haps might be perpetual. But now he does not "ſubject to his command men of baſe minds, but "ſuch, who being mindful of Solon's inſtructions are "aſhamed of their bondage, and will not long bear his "tyranny. But though Piſiſtratus ſhould make him"ſelf maſter of the city, yet I hope it will not de"volve to his children; for it is hard for free perſons "brought up under excellent laws, to ſuffer bondage. "As for you, do not wander about, but haſten to "Crete to me, where no Tyrant will be troubleſome "to you. If in travelling up and down, you ſhould "light upon ſome of his friends, I fear you may ſuffer "ſome miſchief." This ſeems to be in anſwer to the following Epiſtle of Solon to Epimenides (27). "SO"LON to EPIMENIDES. Neither are my laws like"ly to be of any ſervice to the Athenians, nor have "you advantaged the city by Luſtration. For Divine "Right and Law-givers cannot alone benefit cities; it

(26) In his Book περὶ ὁμωνύμων ποιητῶν τε καὶ συγγραφέων.

(27) Laert. in Vitâ Solonis.

verſe [K]. St. Paul quotes a line out of his book of Oracles and Reſponſes [L]. His body was kept by the Lacedemonians upon advice of the Oracle. It was taken up many years after, marked all over with characters; whence aroſe the Proverb concerning abſtruſe things, The ſkin of Epimenides (aa) [M]. He called himſelf Æacus; and was named by the Cretans Cures (bb). Plutarch ſays (cc), that he was eſteemed the ſeventh wiſe man by thoſe, who would not admit Periander into the number. There were two other perſons of this name, one a Genealogiſt, the other wrote in the Doric Dialect concerning Rhodes (dd).

(aa) Ἐπιμενίδου δέρμα.

(bb) Laert.

(cc) In Vitâ Solonis.

(dd) Laert.

" is of great conſequence of what mind they are, who " lead the common people. Divine Rights and Laws, " if they direct them well, are profitable; if they di- " rect them ill, are of no ſervice. Neither are thoſe " Laws, which I gave, in any better condition; thoſe " perſons, who had the care of the Commonwealth " not preventing Piſiſtratus from uſurping of the tyran- " ny, and thereby doing the greateſt injury to it; " which when I foretold them, they would not believe " me. The Athenians would rather believe his flat- " teries, than my truth. Laying down my arms " therefore before the magazin, I declared that I was " wiſer than thoſe, who did not ſee that Piſiſtratus " aimed at the tyranny, and more reſolute than thoſe, " who dared not aſſert the liberty of the Common- " wealth. But they imagined Solon to be mad. At " laſt I left my country with this proteſtation, O Coun- " try! behold Solon ready to aſſiſt you in word and action; " I ſeem mad to theſe. I am therefore obliged to aban- " don you, being the only enemy to Piſiſtratus. But let " them be his Guards, if they pleaſe. For you know " my friend, by what artifice he obtained the govern- " ment. He began with flattering the common peo- " ple, and afterwards wounding himſelf, he came in- " to Elicæa, crying out, that he had received thoſe " wounds from his enemies, and deſired a Guard of " four hundred young men, which they, paying no " regard to my remonſtrances, granted. Theſe were " armed with halberds. After this he diſſolved the " popular government. I endeavoured in vain to reſ- " cue the poorer ſort from mercenary ſlavery, when " they all now ſerve Piſiſtratus alone."

[K] Wrote many things in verſe.] He wrote The Generation of the Curetes and Corybantes, and of the Gods, containing five thouſand verſes; The building of the Ship Argos, and Jaſon's Expedition to Colchos, in ſix thouſand five hundred verſes; and four thouſand verſes concerning Minos and Rhadamanthus (28), and Initiations and Luſtrations, and other obſcure matters in verſe (29). He wrote alſo in proſe concerning Sacrifices, and the Commonwealth of Crete (30). St. Jerom (31) likewiſe mentions his Book of Oracles and Reſponſes.

(28) Laert. in Vitâ Epimen.

(29) Suidas.

(30) Laert. ubi ſupra.

(31) In Epiſt. ad Titum. cap. 1. ver. 12.

[L] St. Paul quotes a line out of his Book of Oracles and Reſponſes.] The line quoted by St. Paul (32), is as follows:

Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί.

The Cretans are always Lyars, evil Beaſts, ſlow Bellies.

(32) Epiſt. to Titus, cap. 1. ver. 12.

St. Chryſoſtom, Theodoret, and ſome others, have aſcribed this verſe to Callimachus, who has the following paſſage:

Κρῆτες, ἀεὶ ψεῦσται. καὶ γὰρ τάφον, ὦ ἄνα, σεῖο
Κρῆτες ἐτεκτήναντο, σὺ δ' οὐ θάνες, ἐσσὶ γὰρ ἀεί.

i. e. " The Cretans are always Lyars; for they have " erected a monument to you, O King Jupiter, who " never died, but are immortal." The tomb of Jupiter was ſhewn in the Iſle of Crete, where he had reigned and died. Callimachus alluding to the firſt words of the verſe of Epimenides cited by St. Paul charges the Cretans with lying and impoſture for pretending that Jupiter was born, reigned, and died in their Iſland. Epimenides was of Crete, but Callimachus of Cyrene, and quotes only the firſt words of the verſe, whereas Epimenides wrote the whole verſe as it is cited by St. Paul; and therefore it is undoubtedly true that St. Paul intended to cite Epimenides only. The Antients agree in the character which St. Paul after our Poet gives the Cretans, whoſe name became a proverb to expreſs a Lyar and Impoſtor (33).

(33) Vide Eraſmi Adag. Chiliad. 1. Centur. 2. pag. 70. edit. Baſil. 1526. in fol.

[M] His body was taken up many years after, marked all over with characters, whence aroſe the Proverb concerning abſtruſe things, The Skin of Epimenides.] This we are informed of by Suidas: τελευτήσαντος δὲ αὐτοῦ, πόρρω χρόνων τὸ δέρμα ἐυρεθῆναι γράμμασι κατάστικτον . . . ἡ παροιμία τὸ Ἐπιμενίδου δέρμα ἐπὶ τῶν ἀποθετῶν. T.

☞ EPIPHANIUS (St.) an antient Chriſtian Writer, was born about the year 332 (a) at Beſanducan (b), a village in Paleſtine near Eleutheropolis (c). His parents are ſaid to have been Jews (d) [A]. While he was a youth, he went into Egypt (e), where he fell into the converſation of the Gnoſtics, who had almoſt engaged him in their party; but he ſoon withdrew himſelf from theſe Heretics (f); and having ſeen the manner of life among the Aſcetics in that Nation, in the twentieth year of his age returned to his own country, and put himſelf for ſome time under the diſcipline of Hilarion, the father of the Monks of Paleſtine. He afterwards founded the Monaſtery called Vetus Ad, near the village where he was born, and preſided over it (g). About the year 368, according to Dr. Cave (h), or 366, according to Du Pin (i), he was elected Biſhop of Salamis, afterwards called Conſtantia, the Metropolis of the Iſle of Cyprus, where he raiſed himſelf a great reputation by his writings [B], and piety. In 382 he was ſent for to Rome by the Imperial

(a) Du Pin, Bibliotheq. des Auteur. Eccleſ. tom. 2. pag. 295. edit. de Paris 1693, in 4to.

(b) Sozomen, lib. 6. cap. 32. and Cave, Hiſt. Liter. pag. 147. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(c) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(d) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Idem, ibid. and Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(g) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(h) Ibid.

(i) Ubi ſupra.

[A] His parents are ſaid to have been Jews.] This is affirmed by Dr. Cave (1), who ſeems in this particular to have followed the ſuppoſititious accounts of the Life of Epiphanius, ſaid to be written by John and Polybius his diſciples, but rejected by the beſt Critics (2). And Oudin (3) is of opinion that there is no ground for this ſtory, ſince Sozomen ſays (4), that from his earlieſt youth he was educated under the moſt excellent Monks, upon which account he continued a very conſiderable time in Egypt. Ἐκ νέου ὑπὸ Μοναχοῖς ἀρίστοις παιδευθεὶς, καὶ τούτου χάριν ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ πλεῖστον διατρίψας χρόνον.

(1) Hiſt. Liter. pag. 147. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(2) Caſimiri, Oudini Comment. de Scriptoribus & Scriptis Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. col. 527, 528. edit. Francof. 1722.

(3) Ibid. col. 528.

(4) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 32.

(5) Cave, pag. 147.

[B] Raiſed himſelf a great reputation by his writings.] His genuine works are as follow. I. Ancoratus, or a Diſcourſe on the Faith. This was written about the year 373, at the deſire of the Preſbyters of Suedra, a city of Pamphylia, and Palladius the Preſident (5). In this work he explains the doctrine of the Church relating to the Trinity, and proves the Reſurrection, and confutes the Pagans, Manicheans, Sabellians, and Arians. II. Πανάριον, ſive adverſus Hæreſes. It is divided into three parts. The firſt contains the Heſies before the time of Chriſt, of which he reckons forty ſix; the ſecond contains twenty three; and the third contains eleven; ſo that this work contains the Hiſtory of eighty Sects or Hereſies. It was begun in the year 374, and in the 11th of Valens and Valentinian, at the requeſt of Acacius and Paulus Archimandrites, whoſe Epiſtle for that purpoſe is ſtill extant, being prefixed to the Panarium, together with Epiphanius's Anſwer. It was finiſhed in 376 (6). In this work he firſt proves the Unity of God againſt the Pagans, Valentinians, Marcionites, and Manicheans; and evinces his Immenſity, Omnipotence, Spirituality, and other Attributes,

(6) Cave, pag. 148. and Du Pin, pag. 296.

Imperial Letters in order to determine the cauſe of Paulinus concerning the See of Antioch (k). In 391 a conteſt aroſe between him and John Biſhop of Jeruſalem. Epiphanius accuſed the former of maintaining the errors of Origen; and going to Paleſtine ordained Paulinian, brother of St. Jerom, Deacon and Prieſt, in a monaſtery, which did not belong to his juriſdiction. John Biſhop of Jeruſalem immediately complained of this action of Epiphanius, which was contrary to the Canons and Diſcipline of the Church. Epiphanius defended what he had done in a letter to the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, mentioned by (k) Cave, ubi ſupra.

tributes, by confuting the other Heretics, who maintain the contrary. He maintains the doctrine of the Trinity, the Divinity of the Son, and that of the Holy Ghoſt, in various places, but eſpecially in Hæreſ. 62, 69, 71, and 74. In Hæreſ. 23 and 65. he ſhews that God created the World and the Angels. In Hæreſ. 70, he endeavours to explain in what ſenſe man was created in the image of God. In Hæreſ. 24 and 36 he aſſerts, that ſin is not a ſubſtance, and that God is not the Author of it. He explains the Myſtery of the Incarnation in Hæreſ. 77, 30, 69; and ſhews, that Chriſt is one Perſon conſiſting of a divine and human Nature. In Hæreſ. 77, he ſhews that the two Natures were not confounded after their union, but have ſtill preſerved their ſeveral properties. He proves the Reſurrection in Hæreſ. 42 and 64. He affirms in Hæreſ. 24 and 46, that Chriſt deſcended to Hell, to ſave thoſe, who had led a good life, and believed in God. In Hæreſ. 75 he maintains, that the ſoul is ſpiritual and immortal, and enjoys happineſs after death. He ſhews in Hæreſ. 8, that the Sacraments of the New Law are more excellent and efficacious than thoſe of the Old. In Hæreſ. 16 he acknowledges Free-Will; but he admits of the Grace of God. In Hæreſ. 30 he ſpeaks of the wonderful effects of the Sign of the Croſs. He ſhews the neceſſity of eccleſiaſtical Traditions in many places, but eſpecially in Hæreſ. 69, 51, and 57; and treats of the Neceſſity and Advantage of Faſting in Hæreſ. 33, 75, and 80. He obſerves there, that the Chriſtians faſted in Lent, and all Wedneſdays and Fridays throughout the year, except from Eaſter to Whitſuntide. He ſuppoſes that theſe faſts are of Apoſtolical Tradition, and obligatory in practice. In Hæreſ. 75 he maintains the Diſtinction between Biſhops and Prieſts. In Hæreſ. 74, and at the end of Hæreſ. 80 he remarks, that the people aſſembled at Church for the moſt part on Wedneſdays, Fridays, and Sundays, and in ſome places on Saturdays. In Hæreſ. 59 he aſſerts, that an huſband, who after being divorced from his wife on account of adultery, ſhall marry another, is free from all crime according to Scripture. III. Anacephalæoſis, ſeu Panarii Epitome. This is an Abridgment of his Panarium. IV. De Menſuris & Ponderibus liber. In this Treatiſe he gives us an account of the Weights, Meaſures, and Coins of the Jews and other Nations; and a Catalogue of the Canonical Books of the Old Teſtament, agreeable to the Canon of the Jews; which includes the Books of Ruth and Eſther. He gives us likewiſe an Hiſtory of the Greek Verſions of the Text of the Old Teſtament: and aſſerts that the Septuagint tranſlated all the Books of the Old Teſtament, being ſhut up in different cells, and all inſpired by God to tranſlate in the ſame manner. V. Epiſtola ad Joannem Hieroſolymitanum. This Epiſtle is tranſlated by St. Jerom, and contains two Parts. The firſt is upon the conteſt, which Epiphanius had with the Biſhop of Jeruſalem concerning the Ordination of Paulinian, and Origeniſm. The ſecond relates to a particular ſtory, which Epiphanius mentions in theſe words. Entering into a Church in a village of Paleſtine, called Anabletha, and ſeeing a veil hanging at the door, which was painted, and had on it the picture, either of Chriſt, or ſome Saint, I cannot tell whether; but ſeeing that contrary to the Authority of the holy Scriptures there was in the Church of Chriſt the picture of a man, I tore it, and ordered thoſe who had the care of the Church to bury a dead body with the veil. But they murmuring and alledging, that if this veil was torn, another ought to be given them, I promiſed to give them one, and immediately performed my promiſe. The firſt part of this Letter is univerſally acknowledged to be genuine; but Baronius, Bellarmin, and ſome others pretend that the ſecond part is ſuppoſititious. They urge ſeveral conjectures for that purpoſe; but Monſr. Du Pin (6) is of opinion, that there are but three, which have any force. The firſt is, that this Epiſtle ſeems to be finiſhed before the narration of this ſtory. The ſecond is, that Epiphanius condemns here the uſe of images, as a thing contrary to Scripture and the practice of his time. The third is, that St. Jerom giving an Extract of this Letter in his Epiſtle to Pammachius, takes no notice of this ſtory. However, theſe reaſons, ſays Du Pin, do not appear ſtrong enough to make me abſolutely reject this Letter. For in the firſt place, tho' what relates to the principal ſubject of it, was concluded before this ſecond part, yet it cannot be proved, that the Letter was entirely finiſhed. And Epiphanius having occaſion to write of this particular fact, could not do it till after he had done ſpeaking of the principal ſubject, of which he wrote. Beſides we cannot ſay, that this Letter is finiſhed before theſe words at the end; I pray, that God would preſerve you under his protection. In the ſecond place, it is poſſible, that the uſe of images, which was very rare during the three firſt Ages of the Church, was not then eſtabliſhed in Paleſtine and the Iſle of Cyprus; and that Epiphanius, who was a man of great ſimplicity and zeal, thought it dangerous to introduce it, and even ſpoke in a violent manner againſt it. Laſtly, tho' St. Jerom tranſlated this Letter entirely, he cites in his Epiſtle to Pammachius only thoſe paſſages, which were pertinent to his ſubject. He does not even cite the firſt part entire; and we are not to be ſurprized, that he ſays nothing of the ſecond, ſince it had no relation to the diſpute between Epiphanius and John Biſhop of Jeruſalem. To conclude, the ſecond part is written in the ſame ſtyle with the firſt: it agrees very well with what Epiphanius ſays in his Panarium, Hæreſ. 27; it is cited by the Author of the Libri Carolini L. IV. C. 25. and it is ſaid in the Seventh Council, Art. IV. Tom. V. that the Iconoclaſts alledged, that Epiphanius was for removing of images; which can only relate to the ſecond part of this Letter. So that tho' it be true, continues Mr. Du Pin, as appears from the teſtimony of St. Gregory Nyſſen in his Panegyric on Theodorus, and his Treatiſe of the Divinity of the Son and the Holy Ghoſt, that there were at that time in ſome churches pictures repreſenting the Hiſtories of Scripture, the Actions of Saints and Martyrs; yet it cannot be ſaid that the uſe of them was general; and it muſt be owned, that Epiphanius diſapproves of it. VI. Epiſtola brevis ad Hieronymum. This Epiſtle is publiſhed in the ſecond volume of St. Jerom's Works (7). Theſe are all genuine works aſcribed to our Author by Dr. Cave, who repreſents the following as ſuppoſititious: viz. 1. Phyſiologus. 2. De Vitâ & Interitu Prophetarum, which, according to Du Pin (8), is a Collection of an infinite number of Fables and Stories, which cannot be aſcribed to Epiphanius, without ſuppoſing him a Viſionary. 3. De duodecim Gemmis in Veſte Aaronis. Geſner publiſhed an Abridgment of this Treatiſe at Zurich 1565 in 8vo. Dr. Cave obſerves, that there are ſome, who aſſert this to be a genuine work of our Author, and that there are grounds for this opinion, ſince it is cited by St. Jerom (9), and Facundus (10), who gives us an entire Letter of Epiphanius to Diodorus of Tarſus, which is as it were a Preface to the Treatiſe De Duodecim Gemmis in Veſte Aaronis. 4. Orationes VIII, viz. in Feſtum Palmarum; In Chriſti Sepulturam; In Chriſti Reſurrectionem; In Chriſti Aſſumptionem; De Laudibus B. Mariæ Virginis; In Feſto Palmarum; De Numerorum Myſteriis; De Chriſti Reſurrectione. Theſe according to Dr. Cave, were written by ſome later Epiphanius, there being ſeveral of that name, who were Biſhops in Cyprus. Lambecius tells us (11), that in the Emperor's Library at Vienna there are ſeveral Greek Manuſcripts under our

(6) Pag. 297.

(7) Cave, pag. 143.

(8) Pag. 297.

(9) Epiſt. 228 ad Fabiolan.

(10) Lib. 4. cap. 3.

(11) Comment. Biblioth. Vindob. lib. 3. pag. 163, & ſeq.

by St. Jerom. This diſpute irritated their minds ſtill more, which were already greatly incenſed upon the ſubject of Origen. Both of them endeavoured to engage Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria in their party. That Biſhop, who ſeemed at firſt to favour the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, declared at laſt againſt Origen, condemned his books in a Council held in 399, and perſecuted all the Monks, who were ſuſpected of regarding his memory. Theſe Monks retiring to Conſtantinople were received there very kindly by St. John Chryſoſtom; which highly exaſperated Theophilus, who from that time conceived a violent hatred to St. Chryſoſtom. In the mean time Theophilus informed Epiphanius of what he had done againſt Origen, and exhorted him to do the ſame. Upon this Epiphanius called a Council in 401 in the Iſle of Cyprus, in which he procured a prohibition of the reading of Origen's writings, and wrote to St. Chryſoſtom to do the ſame. But the latter not approving of this propoſition, Epiphanius went to Conſtantinople at the perſuaſion of Theophilus, in order to get the decree of the Council of Cyprus executed (l). Socrates (m) informs us, that he ordained a Deacon in the Church belonging to the juriſdiction of Conſtantinople; but Cardinal Baronius (n) affirms, that this Hiſtorian is miſtaken, and that the Ordination of Paulinian by Epiphanius in Paleſtine in a place depending on the juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Jeruſalem occaſioned him to think, that Epiphanius had ordained a Deacon within the Dioceſe of St. Chryſoſtom. However that be, Epiphanius, when he came to Conſtantinople, would not have any converſation with St. Chryſoſtom, but uſed his utmoſt efforts to engage the Biſhops, who were then in that City, to approve of the judgment of the Council of Cyprus againſt Origen. But not ſucceeding in this, he reſolved to go the next day to the Church of the Apoſtles, and condemn there publicly all the Books of Origen, and thoſe who defended them. But as he was in the Church, St. Chryſoſtom informed him by his Deacon Serapion, that he was going to do a thing contrary to the Laws of the Church, and which would expoſe him to danger, ſince it was to be feared, that the people would raiſe ſome ſedition, which he could not complain of, if he was the occaſion of it after he had been warned. This conſideration ſtopped Epiphanius, who was ſo inflamed againſt Origen, that the Empreſs Eudoxia having recommended to his prayer the young Theodoſius, who was dangerouſly ſick, he anſwered, that the Prince her ſon would not die, if ſhe would but avoid the converſation of Dioſcoridus, and other defenders of Origen. The Empreſs being ſurprized at this unexpected anſwer ſent him word, that if God ſhould think proper to take away her ſon, ſhe would ſubmit to his will; that he might take him away, as he had given him; but that it was not in the power of Epiphanius to raiſe him from the dead, ſince he had lately ſuffered his Archdeacon (o) to die. Epiphanius's heat was a little abated, when he had diſcourſed with Ammonius and his companions, whom Theophilus had baniſhed for adhering to Origen's opinions: for theſe Monks made him underſtand, that they did not maintain an heretical doctrine, and that he had condemned them in too precipitate a manner. At laſt he reſolved to return to Cyprus, and for a farewel to St. Chryſoſtom, he ſaid, I hope you will not die a Biſhop; to which the latter replied, I hope, you will never return to your own country (p). Both theſe things came to paſs; for St. Chryſoſtom was depoſed from his Biſhopric, and Epiphanius died at ſea (q), in the year 402 or 403 (r), being well advanced in years [C]. Photius tells us (s), that his ſtyle is very mean and negligent. Scaliger and Daillé do not give him any very advantageous character [D]; and Du Pin obſerves (t), that his ſtyle has neither beauty nor elevation, but

(l) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(m) Lib. 6. cap. 12.

(n) Vide Valeſii Notas in Socratem, lib. 6. cap. 12.

(o) Criſpio.

(p) Sozomen. lib. 8. cap. 15.

(q) Cave, ubi ſupra.

(r) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(s) Biblioth. Cod. 122.

(t) Pag. 301.

our Author's name, as Explicatio in illud, Spiritus omnia ſcrutatur, etiam profunda Dei: In illud, De die illâ & horâ nemo ſcit; Recenſio XXII. Operum Hexaemeri, &c. Several of his works are loſt; particularly his Treatiſe De Lapidibus; Encomium S. Hilarionis, mentioned by S. Jerom (12); Epiſtles; and an Oration concerning the Holy Ghoſt, mentioned by Andreas Cæſarienſis (3); but it may be doubted, whether this be not the ſame with that part of the Ancoratus inſerted in the Panarium, Hæreſ. 74 (14). The works of our Author were printed in Greek at Baſil 1544 in fol. A Latin Tranſlation of them by Cornarius was printed there in 1533, 1540, and 1545; at Paris in 1564; at Baſil 1560 and 1578, and at Paris 1612, with ſome Corrections by the Abbé de Billy. The Phyſiologus was publiſhed by Gonſoles Ponce de Leon at Rome in 1585, and at Antwerp in 1588. The Book de Vitâ & Interitu Prophetarum was publiſhed in Greek and Latin at Baſil 1529, and with the Notes of Zehenner, at Scheuling in 1612. The Oration de Sepulturâ Chriſti was printed in 1614. At laſt Petavius undertook a new Edition of our Author's Works, and finding Cornarius's Tranſlation defective, made a new one, which he publiſhed at Paris 1622 with the Greek Text reviſed and corrected by two manuſcripts. This Edition is in two volumes in folio; the firſt contains the Panarium; the ſecond the Ancoratus, the Anacephalæoſis, the Book de Menſuris & Ponderibus, the Phyſiologus, the Treatiſe De duodecim Gemmis in Veſte Aaronis; the Homilies, the Letter to John Biſhop of Jeruſalem, the Life of Epiphanius by Metaphraſtes, and the Animadverſions of Petavius, which are rather Diſſertations upon ſeveral points of Criticiſm and Chronology, than Notes to explain the text of our Author. This Edition was reprinted at Cologne 1682 in two Vol. in fol.

(12) In Libro de Vitâ Hilarionis.

(13) Comment. in Apoc. non longe ab initio.

(14) Cave, pag. 148.

[C] Being well advanced in years.] Dr. Cave tells us (15), that he died almoſt at an hundred years of age, and in the thirty ſixth year of his Biſhopric; and that if we believe Polybius, his diſciple and companion, Epiphanius aſſured Arcadius the Emperor, when he left Conſtantinople, that he was an hundred and fifteen years and three months old. Diem ſupremum obiit anno CCCCII, ſaltem ineunte proximo, extremâ quidem ſenectute, utpote ætatis anno prope centeſimo, Epiſcopatus triceſimo ſexto. Quin ſi Polybio diſcipulo & itineris comiti credendum ſit, ipſe Epiphanius Conſtantinopoli cedens Arcadio Imperatori dixit ſe annos CXV. menſes III. natum eſſe.

(15) Pag. 147.

[D] Scaliger and Daillé do not give him any very advantageous character.] The former tells us (16), that "he has a great many falſities; and that he was an "ignorant man; and was ſollicitous to collect every "thing in his Book, in which are great falſities. . . . "He has good things, but he was an ignorant man, "without any judgment. He has collected a great "deal; but knew nothing of Greek or Hebrew . . . "We have a treaſure of antiquities in him; for he "had good Books, which he ſometimes tranſcribes to very but is low, rough, and unconnected; and that our Author himſelf had a great extent of reading and erudition, but no judgment and juſtneſs of thought: that he often uſes falſe reaſons to confute heretics; that he was very credulous and inaccurate, and frequently miſtaken in important points of Hiſtory, and pays regard too eaſily to ſpurious memoirs, or uncertain reports: in ſhort, that he had great zeal and piety, but little conduct or policy.

(16) Scaligeriana, ſive Excerpta ex Ore Joſephi Scaligeri. Per F. F. P. P. pag. 101, 102. edit. Genevæ 1666.

" very good purpoſe; but when he advances any " thing of his own, it is perform'd wretchedly." Monſ. Daillé (17) ſtiles our Author a good and holy Man, but obſerves, that he was very little converſant in the Arts either of Rhetoric or Grammar, as appeareth ſufficiently out of his Writings, where you ſhall often find him failing not only in the clearneſs of his expreſſions, and the courſe and fit contrivance of his periods, but alſo even in the order and method, which is the true light of all diſcourſe; which defects muſt neceſſarily be the cauſe of much obſcurity in very many places, as indeed is much complained of by the interpreters of this Father. And the ſame Writer afterwards obſerves (18), that " Epipha- " nius, as he was of a very good, honeſt, and plain " nature, and a little too credulous, and withal very " eager and fierce in maintaining whatſoever he " thought was right and true; ſo hath he the more " eaſily been induced both to deliver and to receive " things for ſolid, which yet are not ſo; and to ſtand " ſtiffly in the defending of them, after he had once " embraced the ſame." He then tells us, that it would take up too much time and paper to give a liſt of all his errors: but that the reader may have an account of a good number of them in the Notes of Petavius upon him; who particularly accuſes (19) him of obſcurity and falſhood likewiſe in the opinion which he held concerning the Year and Day of Chriſt's Nativity, affirming that ſome of his expreſſions touching this point are more obſcure and dark than the Riddles of Sphinx. And truly, ſays Monſr. Daillé (20), he hath reaſon enough to ſay ſo of what he hath delivered touching the Year of our Saviour's Nativity. But as for the Day of that Year, whether it were the ſixth of January, as Epiphanius (21) held with the Church of Egypt; or elſe whether it were the twenty fifth of December, which is the general opinion at this day; I think it very great raſhneſs for any man to affirm either the one or the other; neither of theſe opinions having any better ground, the one than the other. Petavius (22) likewiſe expreſly contradicts Epiphanius with regard to the aſſertion of the latter, that in the beginning of the Church the Apoſtles had ordained, that the Chriſtians ſhould celebrate the Paſſover, at the ſame time, and in the ſame manner, that thoſe of the Circumciſion did; and that thoſe, who were then made Biſhops at Jeruſalem being of the Circumciſion, it was neceſſary, that all the world ſhould follow them, and ſhould likewiſe keep the Paſſover, as they did. Monſr. Daillé alſo obſerves (23), that he does not ſee what grounds there were for that fancy of our Author, which he propoſes as a certain truth (24), viz. " That the Devil, " before the coming of Chriſt, was in hopes of grace " and pardon; and that out of this perſuaſion of his " he never all that while ſhewed himſelf refractory " towards God; but that having underſtood by the " manifeſtation of our Saviour, that there was left " him no hopes of ſalvation, he from thenceforth had " grown exceedingly enraged, doing as much miſ- " chief as poſſibly he could againſt Chriſt and his " Church." Ἦκουε γὰρ ἀεὶ τῶν προφητῶν καταγγελλόντων τὴν Χριστοῦ παρουσίαν λύτρωσιν ἐσομένην τῶν ἁμαρτησάντων, καὶ διὰ Χριστοῦ μετανοοῦσιν ἐνόμιζέ τε τέυξεσθαι τινὰ ἐλέους. Ὅτι δὲ εἶδεν ὁ τάλας τὸν Χριστὸν μὴ δεξάμενον αὐτοῦ τὴν περὶ σωτηρίας ἐπιστροφήν &c. T.

(17) Treatiſe concerning the right uſe of the Fathers in the Deciſion of the Controverſies, that are at this day in Religion. Engliſh Tranſlation, B. 1. cap. 5. pag. 85. edit. London 1651.

(18) Ibid. lib. 2. cap. 4. pag. 85.

(19) Petav. in Epiphan. pag. 127, 132.

(20) Ubi ſupra, pag. 86.

(21) Hæreſ. LI. quæ eſt Alog.

(22) Ad Hareſ. LXX. num. 10.

(23) Ubi ſupra.

(24) Epiphan. Hæreſ. 39.

EPISCOPIUS (SIMON) one of the moſt learned men of the ſeventeenth Century, and the chief ſupport of the Arminian Sect, was born at Amſterdam in the year 1583, and having gone through the Latin Schools there, he went to ſtudy at Leyden in the year 1600. He was admitted Maſter of Arts in the year 1606. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, and made ſo great a progreſs in it, that in a little time he was found worthy of the holy Miniſtry: the Magiſtrates of Amſterdam wiſhed that he might be promoted to it; but he met with ſeveral difficulties in his way, becauſe during the controverſy between Gomarus and Arminius he declared for the latter; ſo that he grew weary of the Univerſity of Leyden, and went to Franeker in the year 1609; but he did not continue there long; for he found that by diſputing too vehemently he had exaſperated Profeſſor Sibrandus Lubertus a zealous Gomariſt. He left Franeker and returned into Holland, where he was ordained in the year 1610, and made Miniſter of a village (a) in the dependency of Rotterdam. He was one of the Deputies in the Conference which was held at the Hague in the year 1611 before the States of Holland between ſix Anti-Remonſtrants and ſix Remonſtrant Miniſters; his great wit and learning appeared to great advantage in that Conference. The next year he was choſen Divinity Profeſſor at Leyden in the room of Gomarus, who had voluntarily reſigned, and he lived in peace with Polyander his Collegue, though they held contrary opinions concerning Predeſtination. The functions of his poſt, and his private ſtudies were a light burthen to him if compared with the injuries and ſlanders to which he was expoſed during the troubles occaſioned by the Arminian controverſy [A]; for the animoſity and hatred which theſe

(a) It is called Bleyſwyck.

[A] His ſtudies were a light burthen to him, if compared with the injuries and ſlanders to which he was expoſed during the troubles occaſioned by the Arminian controverſy.] The controverſy concerning Predeſtination began in the Univerſities, and was ſoon after carried into the Pulpits, and ſpread into private families; this did even ſoon kindle the fire amongſt thoſe at the helm (1). All was in an uproar and confuſion, and during this conteſt none were more expoſed to the curſes of the populace than the moſt eminent men of the Arminian party, becauſe they were looked upon as the firſt cauſe of theſe diſturbances (2). Judge then, whether Epiſcopius was ſpared, whoſe learning was very well known. The ſecond year of his Profeſſorſhip at Leiden he was abuſed at Amſterdam at Church and in the ſtreet, becauſe being once preſent at the chriſtening of one of his nieces, he had anſwered ſomething to the Miniſter who officiated, and who had aſked him whether the doctrine of his Church was not the true and perfect doctrine of Salvation: Epiſcopius inſtead of anſwering this queſtion only by a bow as a ſign of approbation, began to ſay ſomething in order to ſhew that he admitted it only with ſome limitations. Whereupon the Miniſter flew into a paſſion, and called him a preſumptuous young man: the people * took fire, and Epiſcopius, who was loaded with injuries both in the Church and in the ſtreet, narrowly eſcaped being beaten and ſtoned to death. If it be aſked, why Epiſcopius required ſome explanation, I ſhall anſwer, it was becauſe Uytembogard having anſwered only yes in the ſame caſe, he found ſoon after that they publickly reproached him in the ſtreets, that he had forſaken

(1) Ab Academiæ cathedris in Eccleſiarum primum ambones & poſtea in vulgus dimanaſſet, imo etiam Reipublicæ proceres quorum erat tanto malo remedium afferre in ſtudia contraria ſcidiſſet. Steph. Curcellæus, Præfat. in Opera Epiſcopii.

(2) Maximi tempeſtatum fluctus celeberrimos quoſque doctrina inter Remonſtrantes ferebant, quibus veri ignara plebs & affectu potius quam judicio duci ſolita omnem turbarum culpam imputabat. Idem, ibid.

* Children are always baptized publickly at Church in Holland; and in the caſe before us Epiſcopius ſtood godfather. ADD. REM.

theſe diviſions created, ſoon ſeized the minds of the people. The States of Holland having invited Epiſcopius to come to the Synod of Dort, that he might take his place in that Aſſembly as well as the other Profeſſors of the ſeven United Provinces, he was one of the firſt that went thither, and was accompanied by ſome Remonſtrant Miniſters, but the Synod would not ſuffer that any of them ſhould ſit in that Aſſembly as a Judge, and would not admit them but as perſons ſummoned to appear. They were obliged to ſubmit, and appeared before the Synod. Epiſcopius made a ſpeech, in which he declared that they were all ready to enter into a conference with the Synod. But they were anſwered, that the Synod did not meet to confer, but to judge. They excepted againſt the Synod, and refuſed to ſubmit to the order which that Aſſembly made, and which was, that the Remonſtrants ſhould neither explain nor maintain their opinions, but as far as the Synod ſhould judge it neceſſary. Upon their refuſing to ſubmit to this order, they were expelled the Synod, and that Aſſembly took meaſures to judge them by their writings (b). They defended their cauſe with the pen, and it was Epiſcopius that compoſed moſt of the pieces which they preſented on this occaſion, and which were publiſhed ſome time after. The Synod depoſed them from their functions, and becauſe they refuſed to ſubſcribe a writing, which contained a promiſe, not to perform privately any of the functions of the holy Miniſtry, neither directly nor indirectly, they were baniſhed out of the territories of the Commonwealth. Epiſcopius continued in the Spaniſh Low-Countries as long as the truce laſted [B], and was not ſo much taken up with the affairs of his own party, but he found time to write againſt the Church of Rome in defence of thoſe truths which all the Proteſtants in general maintain [C]. When the war between the Spaniards and the Dutch began again, he went into France, and by his writings he laboured as much as lay in his power to ſtrengthen and comfort his brethren [D]. Laſtly the times being become more favourable, he returned into Holland in the year 1626 and was made a Miniſter of the Church of the Remonſtrants at Rotterdam, where he married the next year [E], and in 1634 he removed to Amſterdam, being choſen Rector of the College, which thoſe of his Sect had founded there. He enjoyed that poſt till his death, which happened April the 4th 1643 of a retention of urine; he had loſt his ſight ſome weeks before (c). He compoſed ſeveral books after his return into Holland, and did not always write with that moderation, which his principles of toleration, and his duty as a Chriſtian required of him ſaken the doctrine of the Remonſtrants. This firſt danger which Epiſcopius eſcaped was ſoon followed by another, a Farrier ſeeing him go by once, went out of his forge with an iron bar in his hand, and ran after him crying, ſtop the Arminian, the diſturber of the Church: Epiſcopius would certainly have been knocked down by this brute, had he not made his eſcape, and had not other people come to his aſſiſtance. The Author, to whom I refer (3), relates, that on the 19th of February 1617 the houſe of Epiſcopius's eldeſt brother was plundered by the mob at Amſterdam, under this falſe pretence that a great many Arminians uſed to meet there to hear Sermons. Theſe are the unavoidable conſequences of theological controverſies, when a principle of moderation does not keep them within the walls of the Auditories in the Univerſities, and when the mob is frightened and provoked. Which ought to teach us a maxim which will never be obſerved, namely, that men muſt never come to this unleſs in a caſe of the utmoſt neceſſity it ought to be the Ancora Sacra, the ſacred anchor of the Ancients (4), which they never uſed but in the moſt imminent danger.

(b) Cum Synodut libertatem illam limitibus iſtis circumſcribere vellet, quantum ipſa ſatis eſſe poſſe & debere judicaret; ipſi vero tam iniquis conditionibus quibus cauſam ſuam proderent, per conſcientiam acquieſcere non poſſent, tandem à Synodo ſunt ejecti, tanquam indigni cum quibus ipſa ulterius quicquam ageret. Synoduſque ſe ad eos ex ſcriptis ipſorum judicandos accinxit. Stephanus Curcellæus, Præf. Oper. Epiſcopii.

(c) Taken from the Preface prefixed to his Works, and written by Stephanus Curcellæus. N. B. I do not pretend to anſwer for the facts which I have borrowed from thence, either in the Text or in the Remarks of this Article.

(3) Steph. Curcellæus, Præfat. in Opera Epiſcopii.

(4) See in Eraſmus the proverb Sacram ancoram ſolvere. It is the 24th of the firſt Century of the 1ſt Chiliad.

[B] He continued in the Spaniſh Low-Countries as long as the truce laſted.] Henry the IVth had mediated a truce for twelve years between Spain and the United Provinces in the year 1609. As ſoon as it was expired the war began again in 1621. Epiſcopius and his brethren were baniſhed in 1618, and from that time till the beginning of the new war they continued at Antwerp. The reaſon they gave for it, and which is very probable, is, that thus they were beſt ſituated to take care of their Churches, and of their families. But ſome of their enemies were wicked enough to ſay, that they choſe this city for their reſidence only with a deſign to join in a conſpiracy with Spain againſt the Proteſtant Religion, and the liberty of their own country. It is a great pleaſure and a great conveniency for a man to be of that party, which is uppermoſt, but then it is, generally ſpeaking, an encouragement for ſlandering the oppoſite party. For as the victory which one has gained, is attended with a great many outrages committed againſt the party oppreſſed, the latter muſt be charged with the blackeſt crimes, in order to juſtify thoſe outrages, and to prevent pious and well diſpoſed perſons from pitying the perſecuted. I will not make any application of this to the Arminians, I DECLARE IT EXPRESSLY AND IN CAPITAL LETTERS TO THE READERS; but here follow the words of one of them. Antverpiæ durantibus inter Hiſpaniarum Regem, & ordines induciis domicilium eligunt, non ut cum patriæ hoſtibus conſilia agitarent, aut adverſus Religionem reformatam quicquam molirentur, quemadmodum malevoli quidem miſeriæ illorum inſultantes dictitabant; ſed quia propinquus erat ille locus, ut ex quo Eccleſiis ſuis dilectis & familiis commodius quam ex remotiore proſpicere poterant (5).

(5) Steph. Curcellæus, Præf. in Op. Epiſcopii.

[C] He wrote againſt the Church of Rome, in defence of thoſe truths which all the Proteſtants in general maintain.] He not only compoſed in common with his brethren a confeſſion of faith; he not only publiſhed ſoon after his Antidotum adverſus Synodi Dordracenæ Canones (Antidote againſt the Canons of the Synod of Dort), but he alſo diſputed with great ſtrength of argument againſt Peter Wadingus, a Jeſuit (6), who treated him very kindly, and taking an advantage of the diſcontent under which he ſaw him labour, endeavoured to perſuade him to enter into the Pale of his Church. He diſplayed the moſt captious arguments of the controverſial Writers of his party, nor was he diſcouraged by the anſwers that were made him, but left off diſputing by word of mouth to do it in writing. He compoſed two letters, the one upon the rule of faith, the other concerning the worſhip of images, and ſent them to the baniſhed Profeſſor, who did not fail to anſwer them immediately in the ſtrongeſt manner (7). It was not printed till after his death. It was publiſhed in 1644, and has been ſince inſerted into the folio Edition of all his Works.

(6) He was an Iriſhman. See Alegambe.

(7) See the Preface to this work of Epiſcopius.

[D] By his Writings he laboured . . . . to ſtrengthen and comfort his brethren.] I do not mean this only of ſome private letters which he conveyed to them in Holland, but alſo of the Works he wrote for the public during his ſtay in France; ſuch are his obſervations upon ſome Chapters of St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Romans, his Bodekerus ineptiens, (Bodeker out of his wits) his Examen Theſium Jacobi Capelli, (Examination of Capellus's Theſes) and his Reply to Cameron, &c (8).

(8) Ex Præfatione Steph. Curcellæi.

[E] Where he married the next year.] He married the widow (9) of Henry de Nielles Miniſter of Rotterdam, and brother of that Charles de Nielles, whom the Remonſtrants looked upon as one of their chief Confeſſors, (9) Her name was Mary Peſſen.

him in a moſt particular manner. His friends endeavour to excuſe him in this reſpect [F]. It is ſaid that his works have been very much liked in England by the Church-men, but that there are now ſome Authors, who cry them down as though they were very dangerous. It cannot be denied, but that the diſtinction he makes uſe of, when he ſays, that ſome articles which have always been thought to be fundamental, are true indeed, but that it is not abſolutely neceſſary to believe them in order to be ſaved, may be liable to very bad conſequences. The learned Father Mabillon has lately been cenſured on account of Epiſcopiùs's works [G]. In the year 1690 the Arminians took a bold ſtep, which ſhews how much they take this Miniſter's reputation to heart: for it is known, that they Confeſſors. He had been long in priſon, and there are ſeveral of his letters, amongſt thoſe which the Remonſtrants have publiſhed. He was at leſt ſet at liberty, and was Miniſter at Amſterdam (10). Epiſcopius loſt his wife towards the end of the year 1641; he never had any children by her (11).

(10) Ex Curcellæo, Præf. in Op. Epiſcopii.

(11) Ibid.

[F] His friends endeavour to excuſe the bitterneſs of his ſtyle.] Curcellæus, who could not but own, that Epiſcopius might have written ſome things with more moderation (12), obſerves that ſeveral other cauſes concurred to make him write in that ſtyle. In the firſt place, ſays he, Epiſcopius never was the aggreſſor, he never provoked any man living, he only returned the reproaches of others. II. The Writings which he confuted were ſometimes very abuſive: as an inſtance of which Curcellæus quotes the Book, which the Profeſſors of Leyden publiſhed with this title, Confeſſionis Remonſtrantium Cenſura (Critical Remarks upon the Confeſſion of faith of the Remonſtrants) and it is pretended that the Profeſſors had very ſtrong reaſons to make uſe of that abuſive language. The publick was to be made ſenſible, that the Anti-Remonſtrant Doctors had juſtly condemned the Arminians in the Synod of Dort, and had juſtly perſuaded the Magiſtrates to uſe them very ſeverely. This Synodical condemnation, and that fiery zeal to exaſperate the Magiſtrates, were two things, which would entirely diſgrace thoſe Gentlemen, if it were found that after all, the party condemned was guilty only of inconſiderable errors; it was therefore neceſſary for the reputation of the judges to repreſent that party in the moſt odious light. And becauſe the public began to obſerve that the five famous articles were not a ſufficient reaſon for perſecuting, it muſt be aſſerted, that the confeſſion of the Remonſtrants abounded with abominable hereſies, that it was erroneous from the beginning to the end, that even the title itſelf was heretical; all this was to be attended with anger and paſſion. Quam (Confeſſionis Remonſtrantium Cenſuram) acerbiſſimam eſſe, nemo qui vel obiter inſpexerit negare poteſt. Nempe exiſtimationis ſuæ intereſſe putabant, ne injuſte primum Remonſtrantes in Synodo Dordracena condemnaviſſe, & poſtea Magiſtratus ad eos perſequendos inſtigaſſe crederentur. Jam enim vulgo dictitabatur non ſatis eſſe cauſæ in quinque illis decantatis de Prædeſtinatione Articulis, cur ita in eos ſæviretur, cum in iis totum Chriſtianum orbem, exceptâ duntaxat Calvini ſchola, Remonſtrantes ſecum conſpirantes haberent. Ideo perſuaſum omnibus voluerunt Profeſſoris iſti Confeſſionem illorum horrendis hæreſibus ſcatere, nihil in ea a capite ad calcem, imo ne in titulo quidem, ſani eſſe (13). This Author hints then, that the Profeſſors of Leyden wrote ſo abuſively only out of policy, and that their anger was only a feigned paſſion deſigned to remove the offence which the public might take, and the blemiſh of their own reputation. III. Laſtly he ſays, that Epiſcopius's patience was tired, when he found that theſe Gentlemen pretended to dive into men's hidden intentions, and into the ſecret receſſes of their hearts, when they met with nothing that they could blame, in that confeſſion of faith which they were cenſuring. This is an infallible method to find one's adverſary guilty of hereſy; for let him never ſo much ſpeak like an orthodox, he will be told that he hid the venom of his hereſy in the bottom of his heart (14). Imo quod omnes modeſtiæ limites excedit, cum in confeſſionis verbis & phraſibus nihil occurrebat, quod cum ſpecie aliqua admordere poſſent, in Dei ἀυτοῦσιος jura temerario auſu involarunt, ſuſpicionem lectoribus ingerere ſtuduerunt, an ita ex animo ſentirent Remonſtrantes, prout oratione ſua profitebantur. Nihil ergo mirum ſi adeo barbara & Chriſtianis plane indigna agendi ratio D. Epiſcopium mo-

(12) Quia etſi fortè quædam lenius dici potuerint, quam ab eo factum fuerit, graviſſimas tamen ita ſcribendi cauſas habuerit. Curcellæus, Præf. in Op. Epiſcopii.

(13) Ibid.

(14) Concerning the conduct of theſe perſons, ſee ſeveral paſſages in the Phantome du Janſeniſme, and the Preface of the Janua Cælorum reſerata.

verit ut duro nodo durum cuneum adhiberet, & ſordida illa cenſuræ ulcera acriori apologiæ ſale & aceto aliquando perfricaret: quod etiam adverſus unum aut alterum cenſoribus illis ſimilem uſurpavit (15). i. e. "Nay, "what goes beyond all the bounds of modeſty, is, "that when they could not find any thing in the "words and phraſes of the Confeſſion, which they "could condemn with the leaſt ſhew of reaſon, they "boldly invaded the right of God, who alone knows "the hearts of men, and endeavoured to raiſe ſuſpi"cions in the minds of the Readers, whether the Re"monſtrants did really believe from their hearts, as "they profeſſed to do. It is therefore no wonder that "ſuch a cruel behaviour, and ſo unworthy of Chriſ"tians, ſhould have engaged Epiſcopius to cleave ſuch "knotted wood with a hard wedge, and to rub the foul "ulcers of this cenſure, with the ſharp ſalt and ſour "vinegar of his vindication. He uſed the ſame me"thod againſt two or three adverſaries who were like "theſe cenſurers." Tho' theſe excuſes were ſtill better than they are, it is nevertheleſs very certain, that they who want them are much leſs commendable, than they who have no occaſion for them.

(14) Curcellæus, Præf. in Opera Epiſcopii.

[G] Father Mabillon has been cenſured on account of Epiſcopius's works.] A Letter was printed in the year 1691 with this title Avis important à Mr. Arnaud ſur le Projet d'une nouvelle Bibliotheque d'Auteurs Janſeniſtes, that is; "An important Advice to Monſieur Arnauld "concerning the deſign of a new Bibliotheque of Jan"ſeniſt Authors." This Letter contains the following paſſage (16). "Father Mabillon in his Treatiſe of "ſtudies proper for them that live in Monaſteries, has "commended in a very ſtrong manner Epiſcopius's "Theological Inſtitutions, in which Socinianiſm is "juſtified. As ſoon as Monſieur Nicole heard of "this fine encomium, he ſtrongly deſired that "the Author ſhould be adviſed to ſuppreſs it: "but this was impoſſible, for the book was pub"liſhed. Several young Abbots had already ear"neſtly deſired ſome Bookſellers to ſend them Epiſ"copius's Works, the reading of which was ſo much "recommended by Father Mabillon. It is a great "happineſs that the Bookſellers have not one copy "of them, for no Divine oppoſes the doctrine of St. "Auguſtin, and even that of the whole Church ſo "much as Epiſcopius does, who has even introduced "into his ſect the toleration of all Religions. Here "follows, Sir, a paſſage from that Father's Work. I "cannot forbear obſerving in this place, that if ſome "paſſages had been left out of Epiſcopius's Theological In"ſtitutions, which Grotius eſteemed ſo much, that he "carried them with him wherever he went, they "might be very uſeful in the ſtudy of Divinity. This "work is divided into four Books, the method of which "is quite different from that which is generally followed. "His ſtyle is beautiful, and his manner of treating his "ſubject anſwers his ſtyle perfectly well; nor would the "time ſpent in reading of it be loſt, if it had been cor"rected with regard to ſome paſſages, in which the Au"thor ſpeaks againſt the Roman Catholicks, and in favour "of his Sect. But pray, what correction can one make "in an Author, who calls the Myſteries of the Trinity "and of the Incarnation into queſtion, thinking that "the belief of them is not neceſſary to ſalvation, be"cauſe they are not according to him clearly proved "in the holy Scripture? He is of the ſame opinion "with regard to our other Myſteries, whence he con"cludes that there are no reaſons for excluding the "Socinians from Communion with the Chriſtians. "Father Mabillon would be more excuſable, had he "not read Epiſcopius's Book: but he owns himſelf "that he had borrowed it from the Archbiſhop of "Rheims's

(15) Curcellæus, Præf. in Opera Epiſcopii.

(16) Pag. 16.

they engaged one of their Professors, publickly to accuse Mr. Jurieu of calumny [H], because he spoke evil of Episcopius. I forgot to observe, that Francis Limburg son-in-law of Robert Episcopius, who was our Simon's brother (d), furnished Curcellæus with this learned Arminian's posthumous works; and that the Preface, from which I have borrowed this Article, does not mention a journey of Episcopius into France in the year 1615, (d) Steph. Curcellæus, Præf. in Op. Episcopii.

" Rheims's Library-keeper (17), and kept it above two " months." The Author of the Advice, speaks two pages lower of a regular Canon, who confessed to his friends that the reading of Grotius began to open his eyes. " He is not the only person of his order who " speaks thus. Several of them begin to dogmatize, " and there are some, who read privately Curcellæus's " works, which contain an abridgment of Arminius's " Divinity, and a great part of that of the Socinians. " It is much to be feared that Father Mabillon's exor- " bitant praises of Episcopius's Theologcal Institutions " will raise an inclination in some Benedictines to pro- " cure them, or to have Curcellæus's Body of Divinity."

(17) Judge by this how scarce Episcopius's works are in France; since the Benedictins are obliged to borrow them from a Prelate, who collected with a great deal of care those books which it is most difficult to find. See the Catalogue of his Library, printed at Paris in the year 1693, in folio.

PART of a Letter of Mr. Le Clerc.

[H] The Arminians.... engaged one of their Professors publickly to accuse Mr. Jurieu of Calumny.] Monsieur Le Clerc, Professor in the College of the Arminians at Amsterdam, and one of the most learned men of this age, was ordered, they say, by his Superiors, to publish a Letter directed to Monsr. Jurieu in which he observes, that they who have dipped into Episcopius's Works, and are acquainted with the Society of the Remonstrants, have no occasion to see them vindicated. And as for those, who have not read that Author, and never conversed with any of the Remonstrants, if they were so unjust as to judge only by Monsieur Jurieu's accusations, they would not deserve that one should take the least trouble to undeceive them, for it would shew, that they had not the least notion of common equity, and were too stupid to hearken to any vindication: but then we are persuaded, adds he, that there is not any one reasonable person either in the United Provinces, or any where else, that is disposed to believe this accuser upon his bare word. It is not therefore with a design to undeceive the publick that Mr. Le Clerc directs this Letter to Mr. Jurieu, but to endeavour to reclaim him, if that is possible, and to persuade him to beg pardon of God for the sin he has committed by slandering his neighbours in so odious a manner: one thing may give some hopes, that he will glorify God after reading this Letter, and that is, that there seems to be in what he has said much more inconsiderate zeal, and infatuation, than artifice and premeditated malice: for after all, to charge without the least argument a celebrated Author whose works are in the hands of all the world, with maintaining opinions, which he expressly explodes, and which have no necessary connection with his principles, is not a proper method to convince any of his Readers.

After this Preamble Monsieur Le Clerc enters upon the matter in hand. You charge Episcopius with two crimes, says he, the first is his being a Socinian, the second his being an enemy to the Christian Religion. The latter Article is but a consequence of the former, according to your way of reasoning; so that if the former be proved to be a notorious calumny, you must of course be convicted, according to your own principles, of having without the least argument charged a man who always openly professed that he believed in JESUS CHRIST, and who gave signal proofs of his faith, with the most abominable hypocrisy that can be conceived. The more odious the accusation is, the more clear the proofs of it ought to be; and yet you do not alledge one single argument that has the least shew of probability in it. Monsieur Le Clerc makes it appear afterwards, that with regard to the Trinity, and the Sacrifice of JESUS CHRIST, Episcopius was very far from admitting the opinions of the Socinians. He refers to several of his Works, in which he has very plainly declared his opinion, and refuted the Socinians upon these two capital articles. He also shews, that Monsieur Jurieu has unfairly quoted two passages from Episcopius, the one concerning the Mystery of the Trinity, the other concerning the eternity of Hell-Torments. After he has thus confuted the first accusation, it is not a difficult task for him to answer the second, both because it is but a consequence of the first, and because Episcopius's life and writings evidently shew, that he was a virtuous and conscientious man, and very zealous for the Christian Religion. Monsieur Le Clerc refers us to a passage in Episcopius's Institutions (18), in which the truth of the Christian Religion is proved in such a clear and strong manner, that we might hope there would not remain any Infidels in the world, if they would all duly weigh and consider his arguments. And yet you stile him, Sir, an enemy of Christianity: (thus Monsr. Le Clerc speaks to Monsieur Jurieu,) tho' it does not in the least appear that you have either read his works or examined his life. There is, indeed, nothing but the disorder of your mind, occasioned by your blind zeal, and which has been long ago observed in you, that can make me say, O Lord forgive him, for in reality you do not know what you do. You could not choose a better method to pass in the world for a man little acquainted with the duties of Christianity, and even of civil society, than by writing as you have done. None but a few silly women laden with sins, who go to hear sermons without understanding a word of them, no more than they do of the Gospel, will suffer themselves to be imposed upon by your artifices.

(18) It is book the VIth, Sect. 1. chap. 2 & 3.

SOME Reflections upon this letter, and its consequences.

This remarkable step of the Remonstrants is a manifest sign that Episcopius had been calumniated: for it is not at all probable, that Monsieur de Clerc would have ventured to put his name to the Letter I have mentioned, if he had thought it possible for Monsieur Jurieu to prove his accusations: but what was only a sign, or if you will, a strong presumption of Episcopius's innocency, is become a demonstration by the accuser's silence. It is notorious to all the world, that he values his reputation infinitely; nothing therefore but the absolute impossibility of maintaining his charge would oblige him to be silent, and patiently to submit to the public infamy, with which Monsr. le Clerc's Letter loads him. Let people say after this, that Monsieur Jurieu is of such a revengeful temper, that he never in his life was an example of patience. The most good-natur'd man in the world would not have suffered, as he has done, without the least complaint, the outrageous injury of the Arminian Professor; an injury, which yet is but an act of justice, if Episcopius be supposed innocent. Men will wonder perhaps, that the accuser's Superiors were not concerned for his reputation as much as the whole Arminian party was for Episcopius's glory. No sooner was the latter accused, but his whole party laboured to clear him before the public: but no person in the world obliged the accuser to defend himself, and to blot out the note of infamy, with which Monsieur le Clerc had stigmatized him. But this different conduct ought not to surprize us. Episcopius's reputation is of greater consequence to his whole party, than Mr. Jurieu's fame is to the Walloon Churches: and farther, though right reason requires that he that calumniates another be loaded with all the infamy which the accused person would deserve, if he were justly accused, yet men do not think so in matters of Cannon Law (19). The finding of heresies in a Book, tho' there be none, often passes for an effect of zeal; the only punishment a man receives is an admonition not to be so rash for the future, and even sometimes he does not receive that admonition. It is therefore much more necessary to run to the assistance of a Doctor unjustly accused, than of a false informer of heresy.

(19) Understand this only with regard to what is often practised; for after all the Canon-Law submits a slanderer to the Lex Talion is as much as the Civil Law does.

Two strong reasons obliged me to make this Remark: the first is, that nothing belongs more properly to this Dictionary, than falsities in matters of fact: so that I could not omit mentioning the calumny published against Simon Episcopius, without a visible affectation, and a respect of persons, which would very justly have been condemned. The second reason is, that I met with a fair opportunity for representing Monsieur Jurieu to the best advantage; I ought not to have neglected this opportunity; it would not have been good husbandry. It is very glorious for him to have thus by his silence made amends for the injury he had done to that learned man's memory. He might have invented a thousand cavils, a thousand shifts, a thousand equivocations to support his charge, and he might be persuaded that an infinite number of persons would have believed upon his bare word, all that he should have 1615, on account of which, his adverſaries ſpread ſeveral falſe reports of him abroad [I]. But inſtead of ſpeaking of this real journey, they mention an imaginary one under the year 1610.

(20) Utinam Deus hoc illis non imputet! imprimis chorago ipſorum Plancio, qui eo impudentiæ devenit, ut qua clam qua palam affirmare non dubitaverit, ſecreta me & arcana conſilia agitaſſe cum Patre Jeſuitarum Cotone, in perniciem Reip. & Eccleſiæ noſtræ; cum ego eum non niſi ſemel redeuntem à Rege & currum ſuum adſcendentem, idque obiter & in tranſcurſu, viderim. Epiſcopius, Epiſt. ad Jaſonem Bylandium. It is the 241ſt in the folio edition of the Epiſt. Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, pag. 414. It is dated Oct. 1, 1615.

have thought fit to ſay againſt the Arminian Miniſter. Monſr. le Clerc had engaged his word with the public, that he would not make any reply: Who then can deny, that Monſieur Jurieu deſerves very much to be commended, for chooſing rather to be ſilent, and to reſrain his reſentment, than to make an advantage of his inventive genius, and of the favourable diſpoſitions of the Public towards him, and of Monſr. le Clerc's promiſe? I own that he would have been much more praiſe-worthy, if inſtead of being only ſilent, he had publickly confeſſed, that he was in the wrong. But men do not arrive at once at an heroical virtue; they attain it only by degrees; and it is a very good beginning not to reply to the defence of the perſon one has calumniated.

[I] He took a journey into France, on account of which his adverſaries ſpread ſeveral falſe reports of him abroad.] They publiſhed that he had ſecret conferences with Father Coton, in order to contrive with him the ruin of the Proteſtant Church and of the United Provinces. They aſſerted that he affected not to converſe with Monſ. Du Moulin Miniſter at Paris, and never thought of paying a viſit to him. He ſolemnly declares that theſe are all impoſtures; and that he ſaw Father Cotton but once, and that by mere chance, when this Jeſuit returning from the King's palace was ſtepping into his coach (20). He calls the perſon to whom he writes to witneſs, that nothing is more falſe, than the affectation with which he is charged with regard to Du Moulin, and he obſerves that Plancius one of the Miniſters of Amſterdam was the perſon who loaded him with all theſe calumnies. Laſtly, he ſays, that the world began to acknowledge, that the ſecond imputation was entirely groundleſs. Neque hoc ſolum, ſed & quod colloquium cum D. Molinæo ſtudio declinaverim, neque unquam de compellando eo cogitaverim: Quam rem falſam & vanam eſſe, tu, ſi ita videbitur, teſtimonio tuo confirmare potes, & quicquid ea in re à te & me factum eſt, verbulo ſignificare, etiamſi forte opus non ſit futurum. Manifeſtum hujuſmodi mendacium vanitate ſua propria diffluit tandem, & ſponte ſuâ extinguitur atque evaneſcit (21). Without pretending to make any application of what follows to the ſubject before us, I obſerve, that generally ſpeaking the Heads of parties in literary or religious controverſies do not ſpend money enough in ſpies. It is not for want of a great curioſity to know all that their adverſaries do and ſay; but they believe all reports too raſhly, and are too forward to ſupport them by the weight of their own teſtimony. Zeal is ſometimes the cauſe why men think that an heretick will not ſcruple to contrive the moſt abominable plots; from this perſuaſion men eaſily paſs to another, which is, that they imagine he really contrives all the plots which he is thought to be capable of. When men have put this into their heads, they practiſe what the Scripture ſays, out of the abundance of the heart the mouth ſpeaketh (22): they change their ſuſpicions and perſuaſions into public diſcourſes and direct accuſations.

(21) Epiſt. Eccleſiaſt. & Theolog. pag. 414.

(22) Matth. xii. 34.

EPPENDORF (HENRY of) a Gentleman of Germany [A] would be at this time very little known in the Republic of Letters, had he not been engaged in a great controverſy with Eraſmus. He maintained this quarrel out very vigorouſly, and the great Eraſmus did perhaps never meet with an adverſary who reduced him to ſuch diſagreeable terms of agreement. The articles of this pacification not having been well obſerved, Eppendorf raiſed a great clamour, and publiſhed a work which contains an account of this controverſy [B]. He tells us there, that he left his native country in order to improve himſelf

[A] A Gentleman of Germany.] Here follows what we read concerning this in a work, which he intitled, Ad D. Eraſmi Roterodami libellum, cui titulus, Adverſus mendacium & obtrectationem utilis Admonitio, juſta Querela. That is, "A juſt complaint againſt "the ſmall Book of Eraſmus of Rotterdam, intitled, "An uſeful admonition againſt lying and ſlandering," which is publiſhed at Haguenau (1) in Alſatia, in the year 1531. Natus ſum in agro cui gens mea nomen dedit, non longè a Friburgo Urbe Miſniæ celebri, avos, atavos, parentes item (quibus & claris & optimis progreſſus ſum) tam ſoleo jactare, quam aliis ſuas ſordes exprobro. Quid enim mea refert, qua lena, quove aut Sacerdote, aut Monacho, quibuſque e ſterquiliniis quis prorepſerit, modo ingenii dotibus damna, quæ non ſua culpa accidunt, rependat, ſuperetque? i. e. "I was born "in a village, which takes its name from our family "not far from Friburg a famous city in Miſnia. I do "not uſe to boaſt of my anceſtors (who yet were perſons of merit and diſtinction) no more than I do "reproach others with their obſcure and ſordid extraction. For what is it to me, of what proſtitute, of "what Prieſt or Monk a man be born, or from what "dunghil he ſprung up, if the good qualities of his "mind make amends for thoſe diſadvantages, which "happened not by his fault?" I think I obſerve in theſe words an imputation of baſtardy, indirectly laid upon Eraſmus. Take notice that Eppendorf was charged with boaſting of his noble extraction, though he was but the ſon of a Plebeian (2).

(1) Apud Joannem Sercerium.

(2) Dux (Saxoniæ) non admiſit hominem, negans ſe velle eum agnoſcere, qui non agnoſceret patrem ſuum. Jactavit enim ſe nobilem quum ſit plebeius. Eraſmus, Epiſt. 53, lib. 30. pag. 1940.

[B] He publiſhed a work, which contains an account of his controverſy with Eraſmus.] You have ſeen the title of it, and the date of its impreſſion in the foregoing remark. I have not ſeen the book, but I have received conſiderable extracts of it (3), which have acquainted me with the ſtate of this controverſy as well as if I had made uſe of my own eyes. Eppendorf was plaintif in this cauſe; he brought an action againſt Eraſmus before the Magiſtrates of Baſil, who promiſed to do him juſtice: it was concerning an abuſive Letter, which he pretended that Eraſmus had written. He required three things beſides the retractation of the Letter. 1. That Eraſmus ſhould dedicate a Book to him. 2. That he ſhould write in his favour to the Duke of Saxony. 3. That in order to make amends for the injury he had done him, he ſhould be obliged to give three hundred ducats to the poor (4). Eraſmus anſwered, that he diſowned the Letter (5), and that if he perceived that Eppendorf had any friendſhip for him, he would not ſcruple to dedicate a Book to him. He promiſed to write to the Duke of Saxony, but he would not make any promiſe with regard to the laſt article. Here follows his anſwer at length in Latin. Ad quam poſtulationem ſic reſpondit (Eraſmus). Epiſtolam quam perlegit non agnoſco, nec arbitror me ſcripſiſſe talia, nec exemplar in meis ſchedis reperio, & Epiſtola Ducis ſi proferatur, teſtabitur me talia non ſcripſiſſe; tantum admonui Ducem, ut illum ad honeſtam functionem ab ocio revocaret, aut certè quietem mihi ab illo impetraret: de inſcriptione libelli, ſi videro animum illius factum amicum, non gravabor, majora facturus amicitiæ nomine: Quam ſit illi Princeps iratus neſcio; aut quas irarum cauſas habeat mihi non conſtat: habebat Eppendorphius Emſerum hoſtem capitalem apud Principem, ſi ex mea querela Princeps factus eſt alienior, non gravabor hoc meis literis civiliter ſcriptis mitigare quatenus licet cum tantis Principibus agere. De eleemoſynis ipſe curabo, cum mihi Deus in mentem miſerit, nec mea refert quomodo hic aut Friburgi vixerit, quo ſanctius vixit hoc magis gaudeo: de aureis quos poſtulat ſibi dari præſtat ſilere, ne videatur ob hanc cauſam intendiſſe litem; agat amicè, & deſinat populum in me concitare, uberius illi prodeſſe poſſum quam ſi dem 200 aureos. i. e. "To which demand Eraſmus made the following "anſwer. I do not own the Letter which he read, "nor do I remember that I ever wrote ſuch things; "and I cannot find the copy of ſuch a Letter amongſt "my papers: if the Duke's Letter be produced, it "will teſtify that I did not write ſuch things; I only "adviſed the Duke to call him back from his idleneſs "to

(4) An hundred for thoſe of Baſil, and two hundred for thoſe of Straſburg.

(5) Cum tamen, ſays Eppendorf, vix ovum ovo tam ſimile eſſet, ſic per omnia referebat Eraſmum. i. e. "Yet it "was thro' the "whole ſo like "Eraſmus's "writing, that "one egg is not "more like an- "other.

(3) Monſ. Bachelier des Mareſts, a native of Rheims, who lives at Paris, and has a very fine Library, has been ſo good as to make thoſe extracts, and to ſend them to me in the moſt obliging manner by Monſieur Janniçon.

himſelf in the Sciences, that he ſtudied under the celebrated Raſius Profeſſor of Law, that he continued long at Straſburg, and that he ſtood neuter amongſt the violent factions, which " to ſome honeſt employment, or at leaſt to prevail " with him to let me alone. As to dedicating a Book " to him, I will not ſcruple to do it, if I find that he " is become my friend, and I am ready to do more " ſtill for the ſake of friendſhip. How much the " Prince may be exaſperated againſt him, or what " may be the cauſe of his anger, I do not know: " There was with the Prince one Emſerus a capital " enemy of Eppendorf. If our controverſy has alie- " nated the Prince from him; I do not refuſe to miti- " gate his anger by civil Letters, as much as we are " permitted to treat with ſuch great Princes. With " regard to the alms, I ſhall take care of them myſelf, " when God ſhall give me a mind to it. Nor is it any " thing to me how he has lived here or at Friburg; " the more holy a life he led, the more pleaſure it is " to me. As to the Ducats he requires to be given " him, it is better not to mention them, leſt he ſhould " ſeem to have picked this quarrel with me only for " the ſake of money. Let him act with me in a friendly " manner, and not exaſperate people any more a- " gainſt me, and I can be more uſeful to him by my " kind ſervices, than if I were to give him two hun- " dred Ducats." Beatus Rhenanus, who acted as mediator in this quarrel gave Eraſmus's anſwer to Eppendorf, who thought himſelf wronged with regard to the ſecond article, ſince it required of him that he ſhould firſt of all promiſe his friendſhip to a man, who had abuſed him; Eraſmus was therefore obliged to promiſe without any condition that he would dedicate a Book to him according to the following form. Eraſmus Roteradamus Henrico Eppendorphio S. D. Divites divitibus mittunt equos, aulæa, gemmas & aurum, muta nimirum munera nec duratura, poſtremo quæ nec meliorem nec ornatiorem reddunt eum cui mittuntur, & pauperiorem illum a quo proficiſcuntur: inter eos vero quos literarum communis amor fœderavit aliud donorum genus commeare decet, quæ nec exhauriunt largientem, & fructum ſimul & decus afferunt accipienti. Proinde libellum mitto, tuo dicatum nomini, literariæ ſocietatis olim inter nos initæ monumentum, quam ego perpetuam eſſe vehementer cupio, nec tantum permittemus malis linguis ut noſtram amicitiam Muſarum auſpiciis conciliatam dirimant, utcunque moliti ſunt nos inter nos committere: ſed te non remorabor amplius, quo tibi vacet audire quid loquatur libellus. i. e. " Eraſmus of Rotterdam to Henry Ep- " pendorf Greeting. Rich perſons ſend one another " preſents of horſes, tapeſtries, jewels, and gold; " dumb preſents, which cannot laſt long, and which " laſtly do not render him to whom they are ſent " better nor more accompliſhed, and render him who " ſends them more poor: but they, who are united " together by their love for Literature ought to " ſend each other preſents of another kind, which do " not exhauſt him who beſtows them, and are uſeful " and honourable to him that receives them: I ſend " you therefore a Book dedicated to you, as a memo- " rial of that literary union, which was formerly be- " tween us, and which I earneſtly deſire would laſt " for ever: let us not ſuffer that malicious perſons " ſhould have power enough to deſtroy that friend- " ſhip, in which we engaged together under the Auſ- " pices of the Muſes, how much ſoever they have en- " deavoured to ſet us at variance. But I will not de- " tain you any longer, that you may have leiſure to " ſee what my little Book affords you." Eppendorf was ſatisfied with regard to the two firſt articles, but not with regard to the third. He found that there was a great deal of artifice in Eraſmus's manner of mentioning the money, which his adverſary would have him pay, as tho' he did not underſtand to what uſe it was deſigned (6). He complained of the imputation laid upon him as though he had exaſperated the mob againſt Eraſmus. Three days were ſpent in debating upon theſe complaints. Laſtly they both ſubmitted to the determination of two arbiters, who were Bonifacius Amerbach, and Rhenanus: they paſſed the following ſentence in the preſence of Lewis Berus and Henry Glarean. Quoniam ex conſenſu utriuſque nobis jus feciſtis diſſidii inter vos amice componendi, viſum eſt nobis, ut D. Eraſmus ad evitandam moleſtiam & alendam Chriſtianam concordiam præſtet duos articulos ſicut ſcripſit: pro tertio eodem animo non gravabitur in ſubſidium pauperum dare florenos circiter viginti, noſtro arbitrio diſpenſandos, & hæc facienda cenſemus citra notam alterutrius, tantum ut utrinque offenſis, querelis & ſuſpicionibus abolitis, de integro certamen inter vos ſit benevolentiæ, cum oblivione præteritorum omnium perinde quaſi nihil eſſet aut dictum aut factum. D. Henricus Eppendorfius premat, ſi quid ſcripſit: & utrique liberum relinquimus, an viciſſim aliquo benevolentiæ ſymbolo, an potius mutuo animo contenti eſſe velint. Actum Baſileæ poſtridie purificationis, anno M. D. XXVIII. i. e. " Since by " common conſent you have both given us full power " to make up the difference between you in an ami- " cable manner, we are of opinion, that in order to " avoid all difficulties, and to promote chriſtian con- " cord, Eraſmus ought to perform the two articles, " as they have been ſent to him in writing: and as " to the third conſidering his peaceable diſpoſition he " will not ſcruple to give about twenty florins for the " uſe of the poor, to be diſtributed according to our " direction. This we think ought to be done without " any diſgrace to either of you, only that all offences, " quarrels, and ſuſpicions being aboliſhed, you begin " again to ſtrive who ſhall ſhew the other more kind- " neſs, forgetting all that is paſſed, as though no- " thing had ever been ſaid or done. And if Henry " Eppendorf has writ any thing, let him ſuppreſs it. " We leave it to the choice of both, either to give " each other ſome token of good will, or to be ſatiſ- " fied with each other's kind diſpoſition. Done at Baſil " the day after the purification of the Virgin Mary *, in " the year 1528." The parties ſubmitted to this ſentence, and embraced each other for a token of their reconciliation. The next day they dined together; but the war was very near breaking out again: for after dinner Eppendorf having put Eraſmus in mind of the letter he was to write to the Duke of Saxony, deſired him to keep it ready; the latter anſwered that he would write only to the Chancellor; whereupon there aroſe a high conteſt between them, and they ſeparated very little pleaſed with each other. The next day Eraſmus wrote to the Prince, and ſent his letter open to Eppendorf, who was ſatisfied with it. Soon after a rumour was ſpread to Eraſmus's diſadvantage, as though he had conſented to an agreement which entirely diſgraced him. You will ſee how he complained of his adverſary's bragging. The paſſage is pretty long, but I was willing to tranſcribe all that relates to the agreement according to Eraſmus's account of it; the Reader may if he pleaſes compare together the accounts of each party. Opinor Dilfum tibi narraſſe de reatu meo. Ego hac in re obſecundavi conſilio Beati Rhenani & Ludovici Beri. Alioqui ſciebam illum nihil acturum. Fumos hominis jam olim novi. Sed Beati ingenio ſemper abuſus eſt ad hujuſmodi drammata. Turbam amoliti ſumus qualibuſcunque conditionibus, pacem iniquam æquo bello præferentes. Nihil omiſſum eſt, compromiſſum eſt. Adhibiti duo teſtes. Arbitri datis dextris ſtipulati ſunt obſequium. Pronunciatum eſt de ſcripto arbitrium. Aſſenſimus utrique. Subſcripſimus manu utrique. Deinde bibimus ex eodem poculo, fracto inter nos pane, datæ dextræ. Ominatus ſum amicitiam fore perpetuam. Annuit ille & comprobavit. Exhibitum eſt omnibus convivium φιλον. In abitu petiit Epiſtolam ad ducem. Id præter pacta præſtiti, ne quam darem occaſionem. Petiit præfationem in librum ipſi dicendum. Id, quamquam abſurdum & ineptum, tamen autore Bonifacio feci. Quid conſecutum eſt? Mox dicitur miſiſſe famulum proprium, qui ſub nundinas vulgaret atrocem rumorem, Eraſmum eſſe damnatum Baſileæ, conditionibus graviſſimis, ut ſcriberet librum & Epiſtolam contra ſe ipſum, deinde daret pecuniam. Et hic ante abitum jactavit ſe adegiſſe Eraſmum ad conditiones, ad quas ipſe nollet deſcendere pro tribus millibus aureorum. Hic rumor mirum quantum exhilaravit Pſeudo-Evangelicos. Qui triumphi? Quæ exaltatio de nihilo? Hæc ego Juſticabar futura, ſed neque Beato, neque Bero potui perſuadere qualis eſſet artifex (7). i. e. " I imagine that Dilfus has given you " an account of my caſe. I have followed in this " the advice of Beatus Rhenanus and Lewis Berus. " But yet I knew, that he would not perform any " thing; for he has always made an ill uſe of Be- " atus's

* i. e. March the 3d.

(6) Cum Articuli mei habeant propter impetitam & innocentiam & ſimplicitatem meam pauperibus eſſe elargiendam pecuniam. i. e. " Whereas it is " expreſsly ſaid " in my Arti- " cles, that the " money is to be " paid to the " poor, becauſe " he had attack- " ed my inno- " cence and my " ſincerity.

(7) Eraſm. Epiſt. 46. lib. 30. pag. 1933; it is dated from Baſil, April 1528.

which Luther's Reformation raiſed in Germany [C]. It muſt be confeſſed, that in order to have juſtice done him for an abuſive pamphlet, which had been publiſhed againſt him,

" atus's eaſy temper to play thoſe pranks. I have de" livered myſelf of thoſe troubles on any terms,
" chooſing rather an unfavourable peace, than a juſt
" war. Nothing has been omitted, the affair was com-
" promiſed. Two witneſſes have been called. The " Arbiters having made us join hands, have required
" us to ſubmit to their determination; and they have " delivered their opinion concerning the writing, to " which we both ſubmitted, and we have both ſigned
" it with our own hands. We drank afterwards out " of the ſame cup, and breaking a piece of bread be" tween us, we took each other by the hand. I ſaid
" that our friendſhip ſhould be perpetual, which he " approved and conſented to it. Then we were all " invited to a friendly dinner; after which when I " was going away Eppendorf aſked me for a letter to " the Duke. This was beyond our conditions, yet I " granted it to avoid all occaſions of a new quarrel.
" He alſo aſked for the Preface of the Book I was to " dedicate to him: tho' this was ſilly and abſurd, yet † Amerbach. " I granted it alſo by Bonifacius's * advice. What " has been the conſequence of all this? Why, it is
" ſaid, that he ſent immediately one of his own ſer-
" vants, to ſpread abroad during the fair a very odious
" report, namely, that Eraſmus had been condemned
" at Baſil, under a very heavy penalty, to write a " book and a letter againſt himſelf, and afterwards
" to pay a ſum of money. And Eppendorf himſelf
" boaſted before he went away, that he had obliged
" Eraſmus to ſubmit to ſuch terms, as he would not " have ſubmitted to for three thouſand Ducats. This " report has wonderfully rejoiced the pretended Evan-
" gelicks. What triumphs! What exultations for no" thing! I ſuſpected that this would happen. Nor " could I make Beatus nor Berus underſtand what a
" cunning fox this man was."

The conditions of this peace were very indifferently kept. Acts of hoſtility in words and manuſcripts were almoſt continual, and at laſt the war was carried on in printed Books. Eraſmus publiſhed one in which Eppendorf was very much abuſed. It is that which Eppendorf confuted in the work printed at Haguenau in 1531: I have given the title of it above. Let us obſerve that theſe literary wars are very much like thoſe which are carried on between Princes. Each party boaſts to have religiouſly obſerved the treaty of peace, and charges the other with a thouſand infringements. Eppendorf declares that ſince his reconciliation with Eraſmus, he had received notice that the latter continued to defame him (8), and that he would act prudently if he were to defend himſelf. He would not believe it till Eraſmus's letters were ſhewed him. Reſpondi me nihil horum expectare ab Eraſmo, nec putare eum bonorum & præclarorum virorum arbitrium violaturum: quid dicam, litteras mittunt hujus animi teſtes, quæror apud amiculos, alterum item ex judicibus coram appello: quid mihi poſt pactum accidat, injurias tam atroces diu ſuſtinere non poſſe. Et tamen interim expectat Dominus Eraſmus a me multas ſalutes, honorificam mentionem, literas amicas: nec ſaltem has efflagitat, verum etiam urgere me vult ut in omnibus in conviviis eum per ora hominum veham. In Utopia forſitan offenduntur qui pro tam inſignibus maleficiis bonas gratias referunt. Officii ducat, quod par pari non retulerim: poſt initam concordiam non ſcripſi unam literam in Eraſmum, & quæ ante concordiam ad tuendum nomen meum adornaram, concordia ſic jubente ſuppreſſi. i. e. " I anſwered, that " I did not expect any thing like it from Eraſmus, " and could not believe that he would break through " the deciſion of good and eminent men: What ſhall " I ſay, they ſend me his letters, which ſhew the man's " temper: I complain to my friends; I call one " of our judges to be a witneſs to what happened " to me after our reconciliation, how could I long " ſuffer ſuch grievous injuries? And yet Eraſmus " expects a great many compliments from me, and " that I ſhould ſpeak honourably of him, and " ſend him friendly letters. Nor does he only ear-" neſtly deſire them from me, but he even pretends to " force me to commend him publickly in all compa-" nies. We might perhaps meet in Utopia with ſome " men, who would return favours for ſuch great inju-" ries; but let him take it as a favour if I do not re-" turn him like for like. I have not written one " word againſt him ſince our reconciliation, and what " I had prepared before it in my own defence, I have " ſuppreſſed for peace ſake." If we conſult Eraſmus he will tell us, that his adverſary violated the treaty of peace even before he left the place where it had been ſigned, and that he was a notorious lyar, who went to the Dyet of Auſburg in the year 1530, only with a deſign to ſpread his falſe reports there (9). Scripſit ad me Dux, ut Julii literis fidem haberem. Julius ſcripſit amantiſſimè doctiſſimèque multa, quorum hæc erat ſumma, ut præfationi adderem libellum Epphendorpio dicatum, veluti ex fœdere, quoniam ille multis modis violârit fœdus, priuſquam exiret Baſileam, nec poſt deſiterat de me hoſtiliter & ſcribere & loqui, ſubinde recitans furioſum librum, quem in me ſcripſit. Nec in aliud quærebat librum, niſi ut iterum gloriaretur, ad quas conditiones adegiſſet Eraſmum. Sperabat ex arbitrorum ſententia nonnihil prædæ, id quoniam ſefellit, factus eſt ex inimico inimicitior; & quum nemo neſciret, illum omnia feciſſe contra pacta, tamen perinde petit ſuum jus, quaſi omnia præſtiterit, nec pudet quicquam. Decreveram omnia perpeti potiùs, quam leviſſimi hominis nomine meas chartas contaminare, ſed poſteaquam ille nullum facit mentiendi finem, cauſæ ſummam perſtrinxi excuſo libello, nè toties fatigem amanuenſes meos (10). i. e. " The " Duke wrote to me to give credit to Julius's Letter. " Julius wrote to me at length in a very loving and " learned manner, the ſubſtance of which was, that I " muſt add to the Preface a Dedication to Eppendorf, " as though it were a condition of our agreement, " ſince he had violated it a great many ways before he " left Baſil, and afterwards never ceaſed ſpeaking nor " writing of me as an enemy. Nor did he deſire that " a Book ſhould be dedicated to him for any other rea-" ſon but that he might boaſt again, to what terms he " forced Eraſmus to ſubmit. He expected ſome pro-" fit from the ſentence of the Arbiters, and being diſ-" appointed in his expectation, he is become from an " enemy a greater enemy: and though all the world " knew, that he broke through every condition of our " agreement, yet he inſiſted upon his right, as though " on his part he had performed all that he was obliged " to; but he is aſhamed of nothing. I was reſolved " to ſuffer any thing rather than ſtain my paper with " that vile man's name: but when I found that he " never ceaſed from ſpreading his lies, I thought it " fit to draw up a ſhort account of my caſe, and to " print it in a ſmall pamphlet, that I might not ſo " often fatigue my Tranſcribers." In order to underſtand the beginning of this paſſage, it muſt be obſerved that as Eppendorf could not be admitted to ſpeak with the Duke of Saxony, and refuſed to tell his reaſons to Simon Piſtorius, to whom the Duke had referred him, he was permitted to open his caſe to Julius Pflug. Tandem improbitate ſua perfecit, ut Dux cauſam delegaret Julio Pflug, cujus aures Epphendorpius noſter explevit innumeris mendaciis, quod erat illi bonum atque commodum, quod Julius nec Epphendorpium noſcet nec cauſam (11). i. e. " Finally by his wicked arts he pre-" vailed with the Duke to refer the cauſe to Julius " Pflug, to whom Eppendorf told a thouſand lies, " which he could eaſily do to an advantage, for Julius " knew nothing either of Eppendorf, or of our quar-" rel." He repreſented his caſe to him in the moſt favourable light by a thouſand lies; Eraſmus aſſerts it; after which the Duke of Saxony wrote to Eraſmus, to give credit to Julius Pflug's Letter.

(8) Nomen meum ignominioſe in libellos ſuos transfundere.

(9) Qui videtur hac potiſſimum de cauſa veniſſe Auguſtam, ut in ea celebritate hominum ſeminaret ſua mendacia quæ non aliter ex ſe gignit quam aranea filum. Eraſmus, Epiſt. 53. lib. 30. pag. 1940.

(10) Idem, ibid.

(11) Idem, ibid.

[C] He ſtood neuter amongſt the Factions, which the ... Reformation raiſed in Germany.] He was probably one of thoſe, who believed that the Religion of Rome wanted to be reformed, and that the Proteſtants did not reform it well, ſo that he was diſliked by both. He went ſo far as to charge him with being a Penſioner of the Papiſts and Lutherans at the ſame time. He repreſents himſelf as a man, who did not well know yet on which ſide the truth was, and who waited till time ſhould give him a fuller knowledge of the whole matter. Here follows his own words. Oblatæ ſunt nuper him, he made uſe of a method very proper to refrain the moſt ſlanderous Authors [D].

nuper literæ ſcriptæ ad principem quendam virum, ubi nephandiſſimus ſcurra ſcripſerat me quingentos aureos habere à Lutheranis totidemque à Pontificiis ut vocant, utroſque à me emungi auro atque haberi ludibrio, me enim neque novum neque vetus Evangelium curare, quid facerem? Riſi impudentiam nebulonis: nec ita multo poſt in colloquium accerſitus rogatuſque ab eo qui Romanæ Sedi plurimum favet quidnam mihi de præſenti rerum ſtatu videretur? Prodidi libere quæ tum in animo haberem: Rurſum Evangelicis aperui quæ mihi pro meo pluſquam juvenili captu, temere aut exigi aut novari viderentur, non admodum bonam gratiam apud utroſque iniens. Volui in hunc uſque diem ab negotio illo quod Evangelicum vocant eſſe integer, precans ſaltem ut in fatali nunc illa & memorabili rerum immutatione nobis miſeris mortalibus eveniat quod fauſtum fœlix bonumque ſit. Nec nomen alicui ſectæ daturus niſi novus aliquis Solon huc me perpulerit, tum ſcias me ſaniori ſubſcripturum parti etiam ſi vita impendenda ſit. i. e. " I have ſeen lately ſome Letters, written " to a very conſiderable perſon, in which the moſt " wicked wretch who wrote them aſſerts, that I re- " ceived five hundred Ducats from the Lutherans, and " as many from the Papiſts, and that I cheat them " out of their money, and laugh at both; for that I " care neither for the new nor the old Religion. What " ſhould I do? I laugh at the wretch's impudence. Be- " ing lately invited to a converſation with a man who is " very zealous for the Church of Rome, he aſked me " what I thought of the preſent ſtate of affairs? I " told him my mind very freely. On the other hand, " I declared with the ſame freedom to the Evangeliſts " what (according to my opinion who am but a very " young man) was without ſufficient reaſons either ex- " ploded or innovated; and thus I have made myſelf " but little acceptable to both. I have continued deter- " mined to this very day, not to meddle with that " Evangelical buſineſs, as they call it, praying, that " in this fatal and memorable innovation nothing but " what is happy and good may befall us miſerable " men. Nor ſhall I follow any Sect, unleſs ſome " new Solon engage me to it: but in that caſe, I will " have you know, that I will adhere to the ſoundeſt " doctrine, though it ſhould coſt me my life." If we judge of things only by the principles of natural reaſon, Eppendorf's choice will appear very rational. He would expect the iſſue of that affair before he adhered either to thoſe who maintained the abuſes, or to thoſe who oppoſed them. He thought them both too violent, and ſaid like Tully, quem fugiam habeo, quem ſequar non habeo (12). i. e. " I know whom to avoid, " but not whom to follow." He was too great a lover of peace to engage in that religious war. But in vain did he hope to be on the ſhore a quiet Spectator of that boiſterous ſea. He was more expoſed to the ſtorm than if he had been in either fleet. This is the unavoidable fate of thoſe, who pretend to be neuter, during a civil war either in the State, or about Religion. They lye open to the injuries of both parties at once; they make themſelves enemies without getting any friends. Whereas if they engaged with zeal for one party, they would have both friends and enemies. Thus lamentable is the condition of man, and manifeſtly vain our Philoſophical reaſon: it teaches us, that the tranquillity of mind, and the calmneſs of our paſſions ought to be the end of all our labours, and the fruit of our moſt difficult moderations; and yet experience ſhews, that there is no condition more ungrateful, than that of friends; who will not give themſelves up to all the fury of a faction; nor a more agreeable ſituation than that thoſe, who howl with the wolves, and always follow the tide of the moſt impetuous paſſions. Amongſt the advantages they enjoy is this, that they do not know they are in the wrong. For no men in the world are leſs capable of perceiving the defects of their faction and the good qualities, which the oppoſite faction may enjoy, than they that are tranſported with an ardent zeal, and a violent anger, and that labour under a ſtrong prepoſſeſſion. Beati pacifici, ſays the Scripture (13), bleſſed are the peaceable. This is very true with regard to the other world; but with regard to this they are very unhappy. They will not be the Hammer, and for that reaſon they are continually the Anvil which is beaten from every ſide.

(12) Cicero, ad Atticum, Epiſt. 7. lib. 8.

(13) Matth. v. 9.

THE inconveniencies of a ſtate of neutrality and moderation.

[D] He made uſe of a method very proper to refrain the moſt ſlanderous Authors.] He brought his action before the Magiſtrates, and required amongſt other ſatisfactions for the injuries he received, that the aggreſſor ſhould be condemned to pay a fine to the poor. This is a very effectual remedy for the paſſionate temper of a great many Writers. They are more quarrelſome than the Gentlemen of the ſword, and it is more difficult to bring the former to a new reconciliation than the latter. The reaſon of it, ſay ſome, is becauſe ſoldiers end their quarrels ſword in hand, ſo that they expoſe their life by being too quarrelſome; whereas Authors who quarrel are not expoſed to ſpill their blood, it coſts them only paper and ink. They would be more peaceable if they were to expoſe themſelves to the point of a ſword as well as to the point of a pen. We may alſo aſſert that if their purſe was expoſed to ſome danger for every injurious expreſſion, their ſtile would be more moderate and civil: whence it follows, that our Eppendorf had his recourſe to a very good method. Authors muſt have liberty to criticize upon one another with regard to learning, or falſe reaſonings: the Civil Magiſtrates have nothing to do with this; but it were to be wiſhed that they would exert their authority, at leaſt by fines, againſt ſuch Authors who attack their neighbours upon other ſubjects, and load them with injuries. This would baniſh an infinite number of abuſive phraſes from all Books, and would introduce moderation into all the controverſies of Parnaſſus, where it is very little known.

ERASMUS (DESIDERIUS) was born at Rotterdam the 28th of October 1467 [A]. It

VARIOUS ſentiments concerning the date of the birth and death of Eraſmus.

(1) Joli, Voiage de Munſter, pag. 144.

(2) He is in an error, for the Epitaph ſays, jam ſeptuagenarius (already 70) which ſuits a man who is above 69 years of age. The objection is nevertheleſs well grounded, becauſe the inſcription of the epitaph cannot be made, to coincide with Eraſmus's birth, viz. the 28th of October 1467, expreſſed in the inſcription of the ſtatue.

[A] He was born . . . . the 28th of October 1467.] Tho' I fix upon this year, yet I am not ignorant, that ſeveral Authors place Eraſmus's birth in 1465; but 'tis in order that I may agree with the Inſcription engraved on his ſtatue at Rotterdam, where it is not probable that 1467 was put inſtead of 1465, without its being choſen after a ſtrict enquiry, as that which ſeemed the moſt juſt. Mr. Joly has made the ſame reflection: It is not probable, ſays he (1), that Eraſmus was born in 1465, as ſome Authors are of opinion, grounded on the following reaſon viz. that in his Epitaph at Baſil, it is ſaid, that he died at upwards of ſeventy years of age (2) the 12*th of July* 1536, which could not be, if he was born 1467; for the Inſcription of Rotterdam may be depended on more than any other; it being probable, that the time of his birth was better known at the laſt mentioned city where he was born, than at Baſil where he was a ſtranger; and eſpecially ſince one can hardly form any certain judgment with regard to this affair from his writings, nor even from his Letters; becauſe it appears that he himſelf was not well informed in this particular; and that ſeveral miſtakes have been made in the dates of his Letters by thoſe who copied and printed them. The latter part of this paſſage is of uſe to the former; for had Eraſmus known exactly the year of his birth, it might as eaſily have been expreſſed juſtly at Baſil on his tomb, as at Rotterdam on his ſtatue. I am of opinion, that he himſelf did not know exactly, and in the manner that he imagined he knew the day of his birth. Accordingly, he only ſets down, in the beginning of his life, that he was born the eve of St. Simon and St. Jude, in Vigilia Simonis & Judæ (3). But on the other ſide, I do not doubt but that he fixed his birth before the year 1467. Hence it was, that Boniface Amerbach his heir, Jerom Frobenius and Nicholas Epiſcopius, his Executors, inſerted in his epitaph the two random words jam ſeptuagenarius, which ſuit better with a man who died the 12th of July 1536, when it is taken for granted, that he was born before the 28th of October 1467; than when it is ſuppoſed, that he came into the world on that day. Beatus Rhenanus hints plainly enough, that Eraſmus

(3) That is to ſay, the 27th of Oct. and nevertheleſs moſt Authors ſet down, agreeable to the inſcription of Rotterdam, the 28th of October, as the day of his birth.

It cannot be denied but that he was a Baſtard [B]: and 'twas an ill grounded ſcruple in could not give his friends any certain information of this. He hints, I ſay, at this plainly enough, but not without aſcribing to David what Moſes ſays of the duration of man's life. Vixit ad ſeptuageſimum annum quem communem humanæ vitæ terminum regius Propheta David ſtatuit, aut certè non multum eſt ſupergreſſus, nam de anno quo natus eſt apud Batavos nobis non conſtat: de die conſtat qui fuit ad quintum Kalend. Novembr. Apoſtolis Simoni & Judæ ſacer (4). i. e. "He lived "to ſeventy years of age, which the royal Prophet "David fixes as the common boundary of human "life, or certainly did not much exceed that age. "The Dutch do not know the year in which he was "born; but, with regard to the day, that is exactly known, it being the fifth of the Kalends of "November (the twenty eighth of October) which is "the feaſt of St. Simon and Jude." The following paſſage is a ſecond proof of this; I extract it from a Letter which Eraſmus wrote to a Profeſſor (5) who ſlandered him in a very grievous manner. Eraſmus declares, that ſhould he attack him publickly, he'll ſhew him that he has not yet loſt his teeth and claws, tho' he be ſeventy years of age. Quod ſi cognovero, quod equidem non ſpero, te vel tantillum contra me publicare, experieris (ni fallor) Eraſmum jam 70 annos natum neque edentulum eſſe omnino neque exunguem. This Letter is dated the 9th of January 1535, is the LXVIII of Book XXX of the London Edition. It will be objected, that this January was (6) in 1536. Taking this for granted, it will nevertheleſs be certain, from this paſſage, that Eraſmus thought he was born before the year 1467. I confeſs that he did not always think ſo; for in the XIX Letter of Book II, dated in February 1516, he ſays, that he is but in his forty ninth year. Annum ago, non plus quam undequinquageſimum. The Letter (7) which he wrote to James de Horn, the 17th of April 1519, declares, that he was in his fifty third year; which ſhews that he was born in 1466.

But Eraſmus's birth is fixed, not only to 1465 and 1467, it is carried a little farther, by the errors of Printers, and perhaps ſometimes by thoſe of Authors. Chytræus (8) fixes it to 1466. Magirus (9) to 1417. See Bucholcerus's Ind. Chronology at the year 1465. Father Theophilus Raynaud has placed it in 1469 (10). The variations with regard to the death of Eraſmus are not leſs numerous. Konig (11) fixes it to 1526. The Author of the Remarks on Priolo, to 1546. Moreri to 1516, July XI. Du Verdier Vau Privas (12) and Hofman commit this laſt error. Melchior Adamus places it the VI of the Ides of July (the Xth). It is ſaid, under the copper plate of Eraſmus's head, prefixed to his Epiſtles printed at London, that he died the 30th of July. To the Edition of his Life printed in 12mo ſome pieces are prefixed; and among the reſt a pretended relation of moneys being returned him of which he had been diſpoſſeſſed at Dover (13), at the cloſe whereof it is ſaid, that he died on the Ides of July (the 15th). We muſt no longer truſt to inſcriptions engraved on marble and braſs, ſince that on Eraſmus's Tomb is ſo erroneous; the Inſcription in large characters being this, viz. the IV of the Ides of July, (the 12th of July). It alſo declares, that Boniface Amerbach was Eraſmus's Heir; and that Jerom Frobenius and Nicholas Epiſcopius were his Executors. So that Melchior Adamus (14), Swert (15), Magirus (16), Bullart (17) do not give us a juſt account of the Epitaph: calling them all three heirs. Freherus does the ſame in his Theatrum, page 844, and Catherinot in the art of printing, page 6. It is a ſhocking circumſtance, that the alterations of Copyiſts ſhould extend even to ſepulchral Inſcriptions; for in other matters, this might give riſe to diſputes which it would be very difficult to determine. Some Writers, ſuch as the perſon who wrote Les Delices de la Hollande (the Delights of Holland) (18) miſtake with regard to the place of Eraſmus's death. They declare that he died at Friburg in Alſatia.

[B] It cannot be denied but that he was a baſtard.] He himſelf owns, that his father and mother were never married. He ſays indeed, that his mother did not indulge the laſt favour to his father, but from the hopes of being married to him; and that ſome even pretend, that he had promiſed to marry her. Clam habuit rem cum dicta Margareta, ſpe conjugii, & ſunt qui dicant interceſſiſſe verba (19). Be this as it will, he was born a baſtard, and was never legitimated per ſubſequens matrimonium. Eraſmus will therefore be juſtly ranked, ſo long as the world ſtands, in the liſt of illuſtrious baſtards. Pontus Heuterus has not omitted him in the long catalogue he gives of this kind of baſtards (20); and thus far we cannot object to this Author, that he gave way to the paſſion which appears in his writings: but he ſhould have expreſſed himſelf a little more accurately than he has done with regard to the profeſſion of Eraſmus's father. He calls him a Prieſt; now this is true in a certain ſenſe, in like manner as a perſon who becomes a Monarch, communicates the title of King's ſons to the children he had before he was raiſed to the regal dignity; nevertheleſs, ſince according to the maxim of Civilians, we muſt extend ſuch particulars as are favourable, and contract what are not ſo; a perſon ought never to be called ſimply and abſolutely a Prieſt's ſon, unleſs he was begotten by one who was actually a Prieſt at that very time; for it is more diſhonourable to be born the baſtard of a man who is actually a Prieſt. Eraſmus is in this laſt caſe. He even pretends that his father was prompted to take Prieſt's Orders, on no other motive, than the vexation which the falſe information he received at Rome, viz. of his miſtreſs's being dead gave him; and that having diſcovered the impoſition at his return home, he behaved in a very modeſt manner towards that young woman; who, on her ſide, employed her utmoſt endeavours to give their common ſon a good education, without deſiring to enter into the nuptial ſtate.

Theſe are the particulars we find in a life of Eraſmus, written, as it is pretended by himſelf; and publiſhed by Merula in 1607, from the original which Eraſmus had left with Conrad Goclenius, Profeſſor of the Latin Tongue at Louvain. This life is writ in the moſt careleſs and inaccurate manner: The utmoſt ſimplicity is ſeen in every part of it; and very few particulars are mentioned in detail. All the account we therein have of Eraſmus's mother is, that her name was Elizabeth; that ſhe was born at Sevenberghen (21), and daughter of a Phyſician called Peter, filia Medici cujuſdam Petri. With regard to Eraſmus's father, we do not there perceive what countryman he was, nor where he lived. So that the Reader muſt have recourſe to a letter of Baudius (22), in which we find, I. That Eraſmus's father was a citizen and an inhabitant of Tergou; that he was well deſcended, and a tolerable ſcholar for that age; was of a merry diſpoſition, and a great joker, whence he got the ſirname of Praet, or facetious (23): IIdly, that the time of the mother's delivery drawing near, it was thought proper to ſend her to Rotterdam, in order to conceal the better her misfortune; and that the father gave his own name, which was Gerard, to the child. IIIdly, That if we except this crime, Eraſmus's mother was blameleſs, and could boaſt of her ſelf as Dido did,

Huic uni forſan potui ſuccumbere culpæ.
That is,
"My life is by this error, only, ſtain'd.

It is certain that her crime, which by the way was very different from that of a proſtitute, has given us ſo great a man, that had ſhe lived long enough to be an eye witneſs of the extraordinary merit of her ſon, ſhe would have had more reaſon than the mother of Peter Lombard, of Gratian, and of Comeſtor (24), to make the anſwer which is aſcribed to her, for twenty ſuch Authors as thoſe, are not worth half ſo much as Eraſmus. But ſhe died of the plague, when her ſon was in his thirteenth year.

In the manner that Baudius ſpeaks of this, Gerard took care of his ſon's chriſtening. Nevertheleſs it is related in Eraſmus's life, that Gerard not having been able to alter the reſolution of his father, his mother and brothers, who would compel him to enter into the Church; ſtole away and ſent them word, that they ſhould never ſee him more; and hereupon went to Rome, leaving the young woman with child whom he

(4) Beatus Rhenanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Origen.

(5) Peter Curtius, Profeſſor of Rhetoric at Rome.

(6) The year did not always begin in January; but ſince the laſt will of Eraſmus is dated the 12th of February 1536, he muſt have dated after our manner, otherwiſe his will muſt be referred to 1537.

(7) It is the 32d of book 5.

(8) Chron. Saxon.

(9) Eponymol. pag. 317.

(10) See Remark [D].

(11) Bibl. Vet. & Nova, pag. 277.

(12) Proſopographia, tom. 3. pag. 2428.

(13) See Remark [BB].

(14) In Vita Eraſmi.

(15) Athen. Belg. pag. 207.

(16) Eponymolog. pag. 319.

(17) Académie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 162.

(18) Pag. 156. edit. of 1685. See alſo il Ceremoniale Politico, tom. 5. pag. 763.

CIRCUMSTANCES with regard to Eraſmus's father and mother.

(19) Eraſmus, in Vita ſua, à Merula anno 1607, & Scriverio anno 1615, vulgata.

(20) In Tractatu de libera hominis Nativitate, ſeu de Liberis Naturalibus.

(21) A city of Brabant three leagues from Breda.

(22) This Letter is dated the 18th of Oct. 1606, and by an error of the preſs, the 27th is ſet down, inſtead of the 28th of the 2d Century, in the 12mo edition of 1650.

(23) Baudius employs the word Eutrapelus, which implies the ſame thing, as appears from the following paſſage of Mr. Le Camus Biſhop of Bellai, in his Writings againſt Mr. Drelincourt. Verily this phraſe of blancs-ſignez (Carte blanche) beſtowed on the Virgin Mary, is ſo facetious, that one would imagine in gathering theſe precious gems you deſigned to exerciſe your ſelf in the virtue of Eutrapelia.

(24) A falſe ſtory is told viz. that theſe Authors were all baſtards, and born of one mother, who thought ſhe had no reaſon to repent of her crime, becauſe they had done ſo much ſervice to the Church.

in a Writer, to be afraid of publiſhing this in the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century [C], that particular being but too well known: but ſome odious circumſtances may be denied, which the enemies of Eraſmus publiſhed concerning his birth [D]. At nine years of age he had intended to marry. Valerius Andreas Deſſelius (25) has copied very exactly what Baudius ſays in commendation of Eraſmus's father; but Boxhornius (26) makes a remarkable alteration in it, ſince he declares, that the Prieſt in queſtion was ſirnamed Praet on account of the eloquence of his ſermons. To alter the paſſage of Baudius conſequentially, he ſhould have given to the ſermons of Eraſmus's father, the character of Menot, Maillard, Barlette, and le petit Pere André &c. for the word facundia employed by Boxhornius, does not anſwer to Eutrapelia. I ſhould be glad to know, where it was that he found that Gerard was of Sevenberghen. In Eraſmus's life this is ſpoken barely of the mother; and Baudius ſays only, that Eraſmus's father was a citizen and an inhabitant of Tergou. Valerius Andreas joins together what is aſſerted by them ſeparately, Patrem habuit, ſays he, Gerardum Septimontanum, civem & incolam urbis Gaudanæ. Seckendorf is in an error, when he relates (27) that a young man of Rotterdam was Eraſmus's father.

(25) Valer. And. Bibliot. Belg. pag. 175.

(26) Theatr. Urbium Holl. pag. 284.

(27) Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. 1. pag. 140.

[C] . . . . It was an ill-grounded ſcruple in a writer, in being afraid, to publiſh this in the beginning of the XVIIth Century.] The above cited letter of Baudius ſhews, that Merula had great ſcruples to ſtruggle with before he could fully reſolve to publiſh the piece which had been left in truſt with Goclenius. He was a long time afraid, leſt this ſhould do injury to Eraſmus's memory, and he thereby drew upon himſelf the anger of the admirers of this great man. Baudius repreſented to him, by very ſolid arguments, that it was beſt to print Eraſmus's Piece. Nec eſt quod in eo pertimeſcas offenſam cujuſquam probi, quaſi ſcilicet invidioſa proditione detexeris quædam arcana digna ſacro ſilentio . . . . nec ipſe alio animo ſeriem vitæ ſuæ penes principem amicorum depoſuit, quàm ut ſe rebus humanis exempto poſteritas hujus horribilis ſecreti particeps eſſet (28). i. e. "You have no cauſe to fear that any good man will "be offended at this, as though by a malicious diſ-"covery, you had revealed things which ought to have "been veiled in eternal ſecrecy. Nor did he intruſt "the hiſtory of his life with his moſt eſteemed friend, "with any other view, but that after his death, poſte-"rity might be made acquainted with this abomina-"ble ſecret." But ſince he omits the reaſon which I ſhall now give, he conſequently did not know, that Eraſmus had already been reproached with being a Prieſt's ſon. This reaſon is, that it would be no advantage to ſuppreſs this life of Eraſmus; but on the contrary, that the publication of it might extenuate, in ſome meaſure, the vulgar report with regard to his father's and mother's crime, which had already been publiſhed with ſuch falſe additional circumſtances as made it ſtill more odious. Baudius would certainly have employed this reaſon, had he peruſed Looſeus's catalogue printed in 1581, and Pontus Heuterus's Book printed in 1600. I do not hint at what Deſſelius cites from Paul Jovius; and I am not in the leaſt ſurprized, that Baudius was ignorant of the contents of Julius Cæſar Scaliger's letters, for the following reaſon, viz. Baudius was not obliged to know a Book of Deſſelius which was not yet printed. I am even of opinion, that he is very excuſable, for not believing that Paulus Jovius mentions Eraſmus as being a baſtard; for a man of very great learning has aſſured me. 1. That this particular is not inſerted in the works of Paulus Jovius; ſo that Deſſelius cites him without reaſon. 2. That the perſon who firſt divulged in print, the ſecret of Eraſmus's birth, is the Author who conceals himſelf under the name of Philalethes (29). "John Herold, in his Philopſeudes, or Apologetical "Anſwer to a Dialogue publiſhed under the name of "Philalethes againſt Eraſmus's memory, about five "years after his death, is very much puzzled at the "objection made with regard to Eraſmus's birth; and "not being able to extricate himſelf, ſeems at firſt to "agree to it, by declaring; Ut donemus te verum di-"cere, per Chriſtum dic, rogo, an parum videatur tibi "homo ille optimus à te toties laceſſitus, niſi hanc quo-"que notam addas. i. e. "In caſe we ſhould take it "for granted that what you ſay is true, for God's "ſake, do you imagine that this excellent man would "not be enough abuſed by you, unleſs you ſhould alſo "brand him with this mark." "His adverſary, "without calling Eraſmus abſolutely a Prieſt's ſon, had "ſaid that he was ex condemnato concubitu natus. He-"rold exclaims againſt this enormous reproach; and "declares, that tho' ſo many had writ againſt Eraſmus, "ſtill no one had yet taken it into his head, to caſt "ſuch a reproach upon him. He was in the right (30).

(28) Baudius, Epiſt. 28. Cent. 2.

(29) Which, in his opinion, is Hortenſio Lando. See the Article LANDO, Remark [A].

(30) Theſe words are extracted from a writing of Mr. de la Monnoie. I ſhall cite him once more in the Remark [L].

[D] Some odious circumſtances may be denied concerning his birth.] The enemies of Eraſmus have publiſhed many more diſhonourable circumſtances, with regard to his birth, than are really true. Several Roman Catholics acknowledge this; and among others Valerius Andreas, who after ſaying that Gerard entred into the Church at his return from Rome, infers from thence, that Paulus Jovius was very much in the wrong to affirm, that Eraſmus's father was a Pariſh Prieſt near Tergou (31). Father Theophilus Raynaud aſſerts the ſame falſhood, on the authority of a catalogue of the celebrated Writers of Germany (32). Eraſmum ſi jocari de joculari homine in ſcelere licet, non fuiſſe filium Regis, licet is, qui eum genuit, fuerit coronatus, ut de alio quodam dixit Petrus Bleſ. Epiſt. 21, fuiſſe inquam, Eraſmum patre Gondani (read Goudani) in Batavia oppidi prope Roterodamum, Parocho genitum, ex famula, catalogus illuſtrium Germaniæ Scriptorum prodit, &c (33). i. e. "If it is allowed in a criminal matter, to joke "with a facetious man; we may ſay of Eraſmus, that "altho' he was not a King's ſon, his father was ne-"vertheleſs a crown'd head, viz. a Prieſt of Tergou, "a city of Holland near Rotterdam; who finding that "his maid was with child by him, and being deſirous "to conceal the crime, ſent her to Rotterdam, where "ſhe was delivered of Eraſmus in 1469. The Reader "will find below, that Scaliger ſpeaks ſtill worſe of "Eraſmus's father.

(31) Reverſus (Roma) ſacris initiatus eſt: unde parente parocho, Gaudanæ civitatis vicino, natum fuiſſe, præpoſtere Jovius ſcripſit. Valer. And. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 175. Obſerve, that Eraſmus declares in his Life, that his father took Prieſt's Orders before his return home. Bullart, Academie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 160. relates the ſame particulars as Valerius Andreas.

(32) I am of opinion, it is that which was drawn up by a Prieſt born in Tergou, called Cornelius Looſeus, printed at Mentz in 1581.

(33) Th. Rayn. Erotem de Libris, pag. 25.

REFLECTIONS on the alterations made by Copyiſts. Errors of St. Romuald, a Friar of the Order of St. Bernard.

To give an inſtance of the alterations made in facts, by Copyiſts and Compilers, I will ſhew the Reader in what manner Peter de St. Romuald has tranſcribed the paſſage of this Jeſuit. Eraſmus, ſays he, was not a King's ſon, though the perſon who begot him was a crowned head; for the pariſh Prieſt of the place of his birth, was his father, who had got him on his maid-ſervant, if Father Theophilus Raynaut (34) may be credited. His name was at firſt Gherardus Gherardi, but he afterwards would be called Deſiderius Eraſmus, he taking a pleaſure in changing his name, to which he was invited by ſeveral others, and particularly by Capnio, who before he changed his was called Reuchlin, (which ſignifies ſmoak;) by Peter Martyr who before was called Vermilius; by Martin Bucer, who diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Aretius Felinus &c. (35). This Bernardine Friar does not even know the name of the Jeſuit whom he copies; beſides, it is an error in him to aſſert, that he declared Eraſmus was born in his father's pariſh. The examples which he gives, with regard to perſons who changed their names, contain ſeveral miſtakes; and in caſe, as it is very probable, that the word invited was ſubſtituted by the Printers, inſtead of imitated; the Author cites Reuchlin very improperly, he living before and not after Eraſmus. If this be an not error of the preſs, Peter Martyr and Martin Bucer are improperly cited as examples, ſince Eraſmus lived before them. Add to this, that Peter Martyr did not change the name Vermilius, for that of Martyr. He was all his life time called Petrus Martyr Vermilius, the two firſt names being thoſe which he received at baptiſm, and the laſt his ſirname. It is true, that either for brevity ſake, or ſome other reaſon, he has been more frequently cited by the name of Martyr, than that of Vermilius. With regard to Bucer he aſſumed the name of Aretius Felinus only in the title of ſome Books; there is therefore no compariſon or affinity between what he has done, and our Eraſmus's changing his name.

(34) He ſhould have ſaid Raynaud.

(35) Abregé du Threſor Chronol. tom. 3. at the year 1536. pag. 289, 290. edit. of 1660.

PATIN cited and cenſured.

Theophilus Raynaud's words diſpleaſed his great admirer Guy Patin. I am ſurprized, ſays he (36), that ſo learned a man as Father Theophilus Raynaud, ſhould have vented ſuch ſlanders. Eraſmus indeed was a baſtard, and the ſon of a Prieſt; as appears from his life written by himſelf. Nevertheleſs the Monks were not age he was ſent to Deventer, where he made a very great progreſs in his ſtudies; for what many perſons aſſert, viz. that Eraſmus had a tardy genius is not true [E]. At fourteen years of age he had loſt both his father and mother, and was committed to the care of certain guardians, from whom he met with very unkind treatment. They would force him to be an eccleſiaſtic, which he refuſed for a long time; however, he at laſt was obliged to aſſume the religious habit among the Canons Regular in the Monaſtery of Stein near Tergou. Some time after he lived with the Archbiſhop of Cambray, by the permiſſion of his ſuperiors, he ſtill wearing the habit of his Order; but finding he could not depend on him as a Protector, he prevailed ſo far as to be ſent to Paris. Having ſtudied in Montague College in that famous city, he went into England. He there met with many people who did juſtice to his merit; and he was exceedingly pleaſed with and he deſpaired of ever attaining to the knowledge of it (43). Taking it therefore for granted, that what ſo many perſons aſſert of Eraſmus ſhould be true, we yet ſhould have no reaſon to be ſurprized at it; but the queſtion is, whether it is not a fiction. I take it to be one; and that from a paſſage I have read in an Oration of David Chytræus (44), and from the teſtimony of ſome other Authors.

(36) Letter 277. tom. 2.

(43) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 136.

(44) De Laudibus Weſtphaliæ.

Chytræus relates, that Rodolphus Agricola having read the Exerciſes of the Scholars of his friend Hegius, who had greatly raiſed the reputation of the School of Deventer, thought that of Eraſmus excelled them all; and deſired to ſee this young Scholar, who was then but fourteen years of age (45). Eraſmus was ordered to come out of his form to ſalute Agricola; who taking him by the back part of the head, and viewing him attentively, ſaid to him, You will one day be a great man. Had not Eraſmus given ſome indications of a forward genius and a ſtrong judgment, Agricola would not have been ſo deſirous to ſee him. There muſt therefore have been in this exerciſe of Eraſmus ſome turn, or ſome ſtroke that was very happy and expreſſive (46) to pleaſe ſo great a judge in thoſe matters as Agricola. Now can we ſay, that a Scholar has a dull and tardy genius, who, at twelve or fourteen years of age, gives ſuch proofs of his capacity? And it alſo muſt be remembred, that children in that Age were not brought on ſo faſt in their ſtudies as at this time; and that the method of teaching then uſed in ſchools was very barbarous.

(45) Other Authors, ſuch as Melchior Adamus, in Vita Eraſmi, declare that he was but 12 years of age.

What I am going to cite from Beatus Rhenanus, will perhaps refute ſtill better a Tradition I am now combatting. This Author relates, that John Sintheimus, one of the ableſt Maſters in the School of Deventer, was ſo well pleaſed with Eraſmus's progreſs, that he one day took him in his arms, and kiſſing him, ſaid; Cheer up; you'll one day attain to the higheſt pitch in learning (47). Eraſmus was not then fourteen. His mother put him to Deventer School at nine years of age, after having taken him from Utrecht, in the Cathedral of which he had been a ſinging Boy. He ſoon gave the moſt ſhining proofs of his underſtanding. He comprehended in an inſtant whatever was taught him; he retained it well, and ſurpaſſed all his School-fellows. He could repeat any part of Terence and Horace by heart; ſo happy was his memory, and ſo acute his genius. Ingenium Eraſmi mox eluxit, quum ſtatim quæ dicebantur perciperet & fideliter retineret, æquales ſuos omnes ſuperans. . . . . Fuit memoriâ feliciſſimâ, nam puer totum Terentium & Horatium memoriter complexus eſt (48). Terentii comœdias puer non ſecus tenebat ac digitos ſuos, memoria namque fuit tenaciſſima, ingenio perſpicaciſſimo (49). Rhenanus informs us of theſe particulars; and he doubtleſs is more worthy of being credited, than a vulgar report, which appears to me built on no other foundation than the following words in Eraſmus's Life; His father ſent him to ſchool at four years of age, where he made no progreſs during the firſt years in thoſe unpleaſant ſtudies, for which he was not born. At nine years of age he was ſent to Deventer. It is difficult to underſtand this paſſage, the meaning of it not being ſufficiently explained; for what unpleaſant ſtudies, and for which he was not born, could he be put upon at five or ſix years of age? Was he not born to learn to read and write, to decline and conjugate in Latin? He muſt mean ſomething elſe; Muſic, perhaps, or ſome other exerciſe of ſinging boys. But even ſuppoſing that he could make no progreſs in this, it would not hint what is aſſerted; and the tradition which I refute would ſtill be falſe.

(46) Bucholcer, Ind. Chron. pag. m. 420. ſays, that Agricola preferred this Piece before the others, Propter inventionis acumen, orationis puritatem, & figuras apte ceu floſculos interſperſos. Val. And. Bibl. Belg. pag. 175. employs the ſame words, and Melchior Adamus alſo, in Vita Hegii.

(47) Complexus aliquando puerum, mactæ ingenio Eraſme, inquit, tu ad ſummum eruditionis faſtigium olim pervenies, ſimulque oſculum dedit & dimiſit. Beat. Rhenan. Epiſt. præfixa Operibus Eraſmi, ed. 1540.

(48) Idem, ibid.

(49) Idem, Epiſt. Dedicat. Operib. Origenis præfixa.

not the firſt who reproached him with the ignominy of his birth: it was the elder Scaliger in his Ciceronianus; and afterwards the whole body of Friars. This Author had but juſt before declared, that Eraſmus had never aſſumed a religious habit, but was only a novice in a College of Canons regular of St. Auſtin, where his guardian had placed him, at fourteen years of age, with the deſign of making him ſettle there, in order that he might poſſeſs his eſtate; but the ſly blade, ſays he, could by no means be prevailed upon to embrace this way of life, tho' ſome Authors declare that he had aſſumed a religious habit.

I ſhall refute ſome particulars in this relation: Iſt. It did not become a perſon who undertook Eraſmus's defence ſo zealouſly as this Phyſician did, to own, without the explication abovementioned, that this great man was a Prieſt's ſon. II. It is true indeed, that Julius Cæſar Scaliger has reproached him with this, but not in his Ciceronianus, or rather in the two Orations (37), which he wrote againſt Eraſmus's Ciceronianus. III. Laſtly, it is an undoubted fact, that Eraſmus aſſumed a religious habit among the Canons regular of St. Auſtin. I own indeed, that he had a great mind to leave them before he had finiſhed his Noviciate: and that his entering into vows was rather the effect of his natural baſhfulneſs, than an act of his own will, which prevented his good ſenſe and natural diſpoſition from triumphing over all the different engines that were employed to perplex and confound his mind: but at laſt he bowed his neck to the yoke, as he himſelf owns in his life (38), and in a very long letter wrote by him to Lambert Grunnius (39). And when providence had raiſed him a deliverer who freed him from the Cloiſter, I mean a Biſhop of Cambray who wanted Eraſmus to accompany him to Rome, he not only aſked his Biſhop leave, but alſo that of his Prior (40), and wore the habit of his Order for ſeveral years. Nec horum quicquam factum eſt, ſays he (41), in ſpeaking of himſelf to Grunnius, niſi permiſſu atque adeo juſſu epiſcopi ordinarii, permiſſu Præpoſiti, tum domeſtici tum generalis, denique cum pace totius ſodalitatis. Quamquam autem eſſet libera conſcientia, ſciretque ſe voto adacto non teneri, illud tamen interim dedit . . . . ne veſtem mutaret.

(37) Which are intitled as follows, the firſt pro M. Tullio Cicerone contra Deſid. Eraſmum Roterodamum, Orat. 1. the ſecond, contra Deſider. Eraſmum Roterodamum, Orat. 2.

(38) Parantem abire ante profeſſionem partim pudor humanus, partim neceſſitas coërcuit.

(39) In ſumma, vicerunt improbitate. Adoleſcens & animo abhorrens & verbis reluctans coactus eſt capiſtrum accipere, non aliter quam bello capti vinciendos manus victori præbent, ut diutinis victi tormentis faciunt, non quod volunt, ſed quod collubuit potentiori. Eraſm. Epiſt. 5. lib. 4. pag. 1291.

(40) Adjunxit auctoritatem Prioris & Generalis, Idem, in Vita ſua.

(41) Idem, Ep. 5. lib. 4. pag. 1291.

[E] What many perſons aſſert, viz. that Eraſmus was a tardy genius is not true.] A report (which to me appears ill-grounded) prevailed in Holland, that Eraſmus in his younger years had ſo tardy and heavy a genius, that it was ſeveral years before he could be taught any thing. He is even quoted as an example, to conſole parents, whoſe children do not make the leaſt progreſs in learning. This puts me in mind of Moliere's Comedy entitled, le Malade Imaginaire (the Imaginary ſick Man,) where Mr. Diafoirus ſays of his ſon Thomas, That when a child, he had never been briſk and ſprightly, but was always meek, peaceable and ſilent: that he never uttered a word, and never played at any of the ſports uſed by children; that it was with the utmoſt difficulty he was taught to read; and that he did not know his letters at nine years of age. Well well, ſaid his father to himſelf, backward trees yield the beſt fruit: it is much more difficult to engrave on marble than to write on ſand; but inſcriptions cut in the former laſt infinitely longer; and this dulneſs of apprehenſion, this ſlowneſs of imagination, denotes a future good judgment (42). It is related of Thomas Aquinas, whoſe underſtanding was ſo ſagacious and extenſive, that he was looked upon as a dunce when at ſchool; and that his ſchool-fellows uſed to call him mute Ox. Suarez, one of the moſt ſubtle ſchoolmen of the XVIIth Century, ſtudied Philoſophy with ſo little ſucceſs, that and profited by the Erudition and other advantages of that country [F]; but not finding he had reaſon to expect the things he had been flattered with the hopes of obtaining, he went into Italy. He lived above a year in Bologna, from thence he went to Venice, where he publiſhed his Adagia: afterwards to Padua, and at laſt to Rome, where he had a very flouriſhing reputation. He might have ſettled to very great advantage in that city, if the mighty promiſes made him by his friends in England, had not prevailed with him to return to that country at the beginning of Henry VIIIth's reign. He would have continued in it his whole life-time, had his friends made good their promiſes; but being diſappointed in this particular, he went into Flanders, and was there appointed Councellor to Charles (b) of Auſtria (c). I did not obſerve that he took his degree of Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Turin. He lived many years in Baſil, and publiſhed a great number of books in that city. He left it when the maſs was aboliſhed here, and retired to Friburg in Briſgau, which his ill ſtate of health obliged him to leave ſome years after; and he returned to Baſil [G], and died there the 12th of July 1536. He was buried very honourably in that City, where his memory is ſtill had in great veneration [H]. We ſhall ſee in another place (d) what honour is paid to it in his own

(42) See the Remark [N] of the Article XENOCRATES.

(b) After the Emperor Charles V.

(c) Extracted from his Life written by himſelf.

(d) In the Article ROTTERDAM.

[F] He was exceedingly pleaſed with . . . the erudition and other advantages of England.] He conſider'd England as his country by adoption, and reſolved to devote his ſervices to it, the ſame as if it had been his native country. Neque tamen defeci, nec unquam defecturus ſum ab eximio Mecænate meo Archiepiſcopo Cantuarienſi. Verum in confinio conſtitutus confido futurum ut utrique ſatisfaciam patriæ, tum ei in qua natus ſum, tum ei in quam ſum cooptatus (50). i. e. "Neither "have I been forgetful, or ever will, of my excellent "protector the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And as I "am ſituated on the confines, I truſt that I ſhall diſ"charge my duty to both countries, as well to that in "which I was born, as to the other in which I was "adopted." He declares in ſeveral places, that he was charmed with this country, where he had met with ſeveral illuſtrious Mecænas's; and ſeen the ſciences in triumph. Apud Anglos triumphant bonæ literæ (51), recta ſtudia (52). He confeſſes ingenuouſly (53), that the flouriſhing ſtate of polite Literature, for which he had congratulated England, began to make him a little jealous of it. He even pretends, that the learned men in all arts and ſciences, with which it abounded, might juſtly raiſe the envy of the Italians (54). He obſerves (55), that the Engliſh had been long in poſſeſſion of this glory; and that their Noblemen were eminently diſtinguiſhed by their aſſiduous application to learning; a circumſtance for which the Engliſh Nobility, to this day, excell all other Nations. It is pleaſant to read the difference which he tells us there was between the feaſts and entertainments of Clergymen and thoſe of the Nobles. In the former nothing was ſeen and heard but carouſing and roaring, intermixed with a multitude of low, coarſe jeſts and ſurious ſlanders; but at the latter, the gueſts uſed to diſcourſe on the Sciences and Religion. O miras rerum humanarum viciſſitudines! Olim literarum ardor penes religionis profeſſores erat: nunc illis magna ex parte ventri, luxui, pecuniæque vacantibus, amor eruditionis ad principes profanos ac proceres aulicos demigrat. Nam quæ Schola, quod Monaſterium uſquam tam multos habet inſigni probitate doctrinaque præditos quam veſtra habet aula? An non optimo jure nos noſtri pudeat? Sacerdotum ac Theologorum convivia madent vinolentia, ſcurrilibus opplentur jocis, tumultu parum ſobrio perſtrepunt, virulentis obtrectationibus ſcatent: & ad principum menſas modeſte diſputatur de iis quæ ad eruditionem ac pietatem faciunt (56). As he expatiated ſo much in favour of England, when he wrote in a ſerious ſtrain, he gave as advantageous a deſcription of it when he ſpeaks of it in a facetious ſtyle. Here follows what he wrote to Andrelin, to invite him into that country. Si Britanniæ dotes ſatis pernoſſes, Fauſte, næ tu alatis pedibus huc occurreres; & ſi podagra tua non fineret, Dædalum te fieri optares. Nam ut è plurimis unum quiddam attingam; ſunt hic nymphæ divinis vultibus, blandæ, faciles, & quas tu tuis camœnis facile anteponas. Et præterea mos nunquam ſatis laudatus. Sive quò venias, omnium oſculis excipieris; ſive diſcedas aliquò, oſculis dimitteris: redis, redduntur ſuavia; diſceditur abs te, dividuntur baſia; occurritur alicubi, baſiatur affatim; denique quocunque te moveas, ſuaviorum plena ſunt omnia. Quæ ſi tu, Fauſte, guſtâſſes ſemel quàm ſint mollicula, quam fragrantia, profectò cuperes non decennium ſolum, ut Solon fecit, ſed ad mortem uſque in Anglia peregrinari (57). i. e. "My Fauſtus, were you but ſufficiently informed of "the delights which England boaſts, you would haſte "hither with wings at your feet; or, in caſe your "gout would not ſuffer you to do this, would wiſh it "were poſſible for you to be a Dedalus. To take "notice but of one pleaſure among a great number; "here are Nymphs lovely as Goddeſſes, good natured, "eaſy, and whom you would immediately prefer to "your Muſes. Beſides this there is a cuſtom which can "never be enough commended. Whitherſoever you "come, they all receive you with kiſſes; and when"ever you go away, you are diſmiſſed in the ſame "manner: If you return, you are received with the "ſame delicious welcome; and if they take their "leave, kiſſes are interchanged. Do you meet "with them any where, you feaſt upon kiſſes: to "conclude, go where you will, nothing but kiſſing "is ſeen; and (dear Fauſtus) did you but once taſte "how very ſoft, how fragrant they are, you certainly "would not deſire, as Solon, to ſpend only ten years, "but to paſs your whole life in England." By this paſſage it appears, that Eraſmus was as well pleaſed with the Engliſh women as with the men.

(50) Eraſm. Ep. 19, lib. 2.

(51) Idem, lib. 16. Epiſt. 19.

(52) Ibid. Epiſt. 20.

(53) Ibid. Epiſt. 27.

(54) Ibid. Epiſt. 12.

(55) Ibid. Epiſt. 27.

(56) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 26. lib. 6.

(57) Idem, Epiſt. 10. lib. 5. pag. 315.

[G] His ill ſtate of health obliged him to leave Friburg . . . . and he returned to Baſil] Mary Queen of Hungary, Governeſs of the Low Countries, invited him to Brabant, for which purpoſe he removed to Baſil, as well to get his Eccleſiaſtes printed, which then was not quite finiſh'd, as to ſhake off the remains of a long fit of ſickneſs. He lodg'd with his old friend Jerom Frobenius; his deſign being to go by water (on the Rhine) into the Low-Countries, as ſoon as he ſhould have quite recovered his health, and finiſhed the impreſſion of the Book he was then compoſing. During this interval, he was afflicted with a deadly diſtemper. Rhenanus informs us of theſe particulars in one of his Letters (58); but Eraſmus declares ſomewhere in his writings, that he deſigned, when he ſhould leave Baſil, to retire to Beſancon. And a remarkable circumſtance is, his declaring, that altho' he was with very ſincere friends at Baſil, he yet choſe rather to die in another place; and the reaſon he gives, is, that the inhabitants of it were of a different perſuaſion from him. Si mea bene noviſſes, debebas illi reſpondere, me neceſſario valetudinis causâ reliquiſſe Friburgum, hoc animo, ut Eccleſiaſta abſoluto Beſontium peterem, nè non eſſem in ditione Cæſaris, ſed hic ingraveſcens valetudo cogit hybernare. Hic enim, quanquam ſum apud amicos ſinceriſſimos, quales Friburgi non habebam, tamen ob dogmatum diſſenſionem malim alibi finire vitam. Utinam Brabantia eſſet vicinior (59). i. e. "Had you well known the ſtate of my affairs, you "then ought to have anſwered him, that I was ob"liged, for my health's ſake, to quit Friburg; and "in this view, to proceed to Beſancon when I "ſhould have compleated my Eccleſiaſtes, that I might "be in the Emperor's dominions; however, as my "indiſpoſition encreaſes, I am forced to winter here. "But I meet with very ſincere friends in this city, and "ſuch as I could not boaſt of in Friburg, yet, as I differ "in opinion with them in religious matters, I had ra"ther go and end my life elſewhere. I could wiſh "that Brabant were not ſo far off."

(58) This is the Epiſtle Dedicatory to Eraſmus's Origin. It is prefixed to Eraſmus's Letters, London edit. 1642.

(59) Eraſmus, Epiſt. lib. 30. pag. 1961.

[H] His memory is ſtill had in great veneration at Baſil.] Travellers ſpeak as advantageouſly of Eraſmus, own country; and whether the glory of having given birth to Eraſmus can be conteſted with Rotterdam. 'Twould be needleſs to remark, that he was one of the greateſt men that ever appeared in the Republic of Letters. This is a truth that is very little conteſted. He had a great number of enemies, and among the reſt, Julius Cæſar Scaliger, who employed the moſt injurious expreſſions in writing againſt him, but yet did not call him a Baſtard [I]. The cauſe of this quarrel has not been juſtly related in the Scaligerana.

mus, when they mention Baſil, as when they give an account of Rotterdam; ſo that it may be affirmed, that he made the city were he died as famous as that of his birth. And indeed it is certain, that he had made a longer abode in the former of thoſe two cities than in any other place; an abode, I ſay, not ſo conſiderable, perhaps, for its continuance, as for the importance of his occupations. He was very much delighted with Baſil (60). He uſed to leave it at intervals; but then he always returned back to it; hic illius arma, hic currus fuit (61). The revolution which happened there in 1529, with regard to Religion, was the only reaſon of his not ſettling in it for good and all. Obſcurum eſſe non poteſt mihi non omnia probari quæ iſti (Evangelici) faciunt, quæ ſi probaſſem non tanto meo tum periculo tum diſpendio reliquiſſem civitatem, cui tot annis aſſueram, ſed jam pridem ipſorum ſodalitio totus adhererem. i. e. "It cannot but be "known, that I do not approve all that thoſe Evan"gelicks do; for had I done this, I ſhould not, with "ſo much danger and expence, have forſaken a city "in which I had reſided ſo many years; but ſhould "a long time ſince have devoted myſelf to their par"ty." Be this as it will, travellers who go to Baſil are ſhewn the houſe where he died (63), and the place in which the Profeſſors of Divinity read their Lectures in winter, and where the Academical Aſſemblies are ſometimes held, is call'd Eraſmus's College. Eraſmus's ſtudy is ſhewn as one of the moſt conſiderable rarities of this city: his ring, ſeal, ſword, knife, bodkin; his laſt Will written by himſelf; and his picture, drawn by Holben, which is a maſter-piece &c. are there ſeen. The Magiſtrates bought this ſtudy in 1661, and paid nine thouſand crowns for it to the deſcendants of Boniface Amerbach, Eraſmus's heir (64). They made a preſent of it to the Academy, if Patin may be credited (65). But another Hiſtorian ſays, that the Academy paid down a thouſand crowns on that occaſion. See Le Voiage de Suiſſe des Sieurs Reboulet & Labrune.

(60) See his 10th Epiſt. of Book 24.

(61) This is what Virgil. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 16. ſaid of Carthage, with regard to Juno.

(62) Eraſm. Ep. ad Fratres German. inferioris.

(63) Relat. Hiſt. de Charles Patin, pag. 130.

(64) Patin calls him only Legator.

(65) Relations Hiſtoriques, pag. 223.

[I] Julius Cæſar Scaliger, employed the moſt injurious expreſſions in writing againſt him, but did not call him Baſtard.] Some perſons will naturally imagine that this modern Julius Cæſar had not heard of Eraſmus's illegitimate birth; for will theſe ſay, had he known any thing about it, he doubtleſs would have called him ſon of a whore, in the two injurious pieces he wrote againſt him; where he employs the moſt injurious expreſſions that could poſſibly have been muſtered together by the moſt furious declaimer. 'Tis not that Eraſmus had done him the leaſt injury; he having only blamed the extreme prepoſſeſſion of thoſe who at that time were called Ciceronians, and who were of opinion, that no Latin was good, but that of Cicero (66); and at the ſame time he had taken notice of ſome ſpots in this Sun of the Roman Eloquence. Upon this Scaliger began to exclaim in a very violent and outrageous manner. He vented the moſt ſcandalous expreſſions againſt Eraſmus, and called him Drunkard an hundred times. He affirmed that Eraſmus, when Corrector of the preſs to Aldus Manutius, uſed to leave a great number of typographical errors, occaſioned by his being ſo much intoxicated with liquor. Non tu in Aldi Officina quæſtum feciſti corrigendis exemplaribus? Nonne errores eos qui tum illis in libris legebantur haud tam erant librariorum atramento quam tuo confecti vino? Haud tam illorum ſomnum olebant, quàm tuam exhalabant crapulam (67)? In ſhort, his exclamations and invectives were as ſtrong as thoſe employed by Cicero, at the diſcovery of a horrid conſpiracy againſt the State.

Sacrilegum ſtrucret cum Catilina nefas,
Cum gener atque ſocer diris concurreret armis,
Mæſtaque civili cæde maderet humus (68).

"When the dread ſtorm curſt Catiline prepar'd;
"When Kinſmen, on each other, drew their ſwords,
"And every ſtreet with human blood poured down.

(66) Vaugelas had for ſome time been prepoſſeſſed with the like opinion for the Roman Hiſtory of Coeffeteau: he uſed to ſay, that there was no ſalvation out of the Roman Hiſtory, any more than out of the Church of Rome.

(67) Julius Cæſar Scaliger, Orat. 2.

(68) Mart. lib. 9. Epig. 72.

A Reader would naturally conclude, in hearing the mighty buſtle which Scaliger makes, that Eraſmus was ſome villain that deſerved to be broke on the wheel;

- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - Utrum
Minxerit in patrios cineres, an triſte bidental
Moverit inceſtus (69)?

"Whether he ming'd upon his Parent's aſhes,
"Or plunder'd ſacrilegiouſly a Shrine.

(69) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 470.

or ſome Viſigoth or Oſtrogoth Captain, who had formed a reſolution to deſtroy all arts and ſciences, and to burn all libraries. Judge therefore, if a perſon can forbear laughing, when he finds that the only cauſe of Scaliger's paſſion in theſe two Declamations (which deſerve more juſtly the title of Steliteutics than thoſe of St. Gregory Nazianzen againſt Julian the Apoſtate) is, that Eraſmus oppoſed a dangerous ſuperſtition which began to inſinuate it ſelf into the Republic of Letters, and was going to ſhackle the ſtudy of eloquence. But to wave this ſubject, which has been ſo nobly and agreeably treated in Balzac's twelfth Dialogue; ſhall we conclude that had Scaliger heard that his Adverſary was a Baſtard, he would have made a ſtrange uproar about it? I cannot admit this concluſion, and that for the following reaſon.

Among ſuch of Julius Cæſar Scaliger's Letters as his ſon ſuppreſſed, is a very long one (70), in which he attempts to juſtify his firſt fury, by riſing, perhaps, to a much greater. 'Tis where he calls Eraſmus ſon of a whore, and declares, that if he had not done it before, 'twas not that he had not heard of this circumſtance; but only becauſe he was not then ſure of it; and did not care to hazard the credit of his real accuſations, by intermixing them into uncertain facts. If it be ſaid that this is a little doubtful; and that Scaliger ſeems in too great a paſſion in his two invectives, for his Readers not to believe that a little uncertainty in a report of that nature, would not have prevented his employing it againſt Eraſmus; and that he had no more to do but to ſecure himſelf a retreat, by apologizing that common fame ſaid ſo, in imitation of the ſharpeſt Satyriſts; and that it does not appear, with regard to other reports altogether as improbable as this, that Scaliger affected to be ſo ſcrupulous; that therefore what he ſays on this occaſion may probably be an artifice, which is but too often employed by ſlanderous writers; for if theſe hear any diſadvantageous particular of an adverſary, after the publication of their firſt Satyrs, they make it an honour to themſelves for not having mentioned it; and turn into a deſigned ſilence, one that was altogether inluntary. I have nothing to anſwer to theſe conjectures, except that Scaliger writ the Letter above cited, not long after he had ſent his 2d Oration to the preſs (71). But to come to the Letter itſelf. The Author therein aggravates highly the crime which Eraſmus's father and mother committed. He declares the latter to be a Proſtitute; and the former a fornicating Prieſt, who at laſt was baniſhed, after the canonical puniſhments had been ſeveral times inflicted upon him to no purpoſe for his crimes. Ego verò mentiri? quod te putidum atque nocturnum caput, ſpurium in illa Oratione appellare auſus non ſim? Neque enim incerti quidquam à me adferri debuit. Verum hoc erat tamen. At non conſtabat. Eras tunc atque etiam nunc ſpurius es, Eraſme: hoc multi mihi è commilitonibus retulerunt noſtris. Verum ei rumori fidem non habui neque objeci tibi, ne vera compertaque cætera dicenti mihi omnia fides non haberetur. Nunc populares tui, aliquot etiam vicini viri boni nobiles ex inceſto natum concubitu, ſordidis parentibus, altero ſacrificulo, alterâ proſtitutâ; qui pater tuus ſemel atque iterum à Pontifice caſtigatus, cùm ex illius præceptionibus ad vetera ſcelera nova propenſione fieret irritatior exilior mulctatus vertit ſolum (72). i. e. "What do I lie, becauſe I "did not dare in that Oration to call thee Baſtard, "thou groveling wretch? It did not become me to "publiſh

(70) It is the 15th in the Touloufe edition. He wrote it to Arnoul Ferron, who did not approve of his publiſhing ſo many invectives againſt Eraſmus.

(71) See his Letters, pag. 35.

(72) Jul. Cæſ. Scalig. Epiſt. 15. pag. 45.

ligerana [K]. This is a little ſurprizing, for what perſon ought to know better the truth of this affair than the ſon of the aggreſſor? Eraſmus ſeemed greatly diſguſted at theſe invectives,

" publiſh any falſhood; and although this was true, I " yet was not ſure of its being ſo. Eraſmus, thou " waſt at that time, and art ſtill a Baſtard. This ma- " ny of my fellow-ſoldiers told me; but I did not be- " lieve them, nor reproached thee with it, leſt the reſt " of the particulars (all which were true) ſhould not " be credited. But now thy Countrymen, and ſome " of thy neighbours who are men of integrity and " diſtinction, have declared to me, that thou art of in- " ceſtuous birth, and of groveling parents; thy father " being a beggarly Prieſt, and thy mother a Proſti- " tute. And thy father, after having been puniſhed " ſeveral times by the Pope for his crimes, and found " incorrigible, was at laſt baniſhed his country."

[K] The cauſe of this quarrel has not been juſtly related in the Scaligerana.] The Reader has been told in how furious a manner Eraſmus was inveighed againſt; let us now ſee what Joſeph Scaliger ſays of this quarrel. My father, ſays he, drew up an oration againſt Eraſmus, who ſince wrote that my father was not Author of that Piece, quia miles erat, i. e. " becauſe " he was a ſoldier." My father wrote another, in which he fell into a very violent paſſion. Eraſmus knowing that he intended to print it, got his friends to buy up all the copies they could meet with, in order to ſuppreſs them; by which means thoſe Pieces are entirely ſuppreſt. My father afterwards perceived the over-ſight he had committed in writing againſt Eraſmus. . . . . He had written many Epiſtles againſt Eraſmus which were printed; but I got them ſuppreſſed; and have the copies by me, for which I paid ſeventy two gold crowns, thirty ſix double piſtoles. I have ordered Jonas to burn them after my death. My father attacked Eraſmus in a ſoldier-like way; but after having applied himſelf to ſtudy, he perceived that Eraſmus was a very conſiderable man. Perhaps my father had not read, or did not underſtand Eraſmus. . . . Pœnituit patrem adverſus illum ſcripſiſſe, (he ſaw his error) ſed fuerat irritatus cùm vocaretur ab Eraſmo miles quaſi per contemptum, ut Amphitheatrum (73) vocat Dominos Pleſſæum & Launoium, milites per contemptum . . . Duas Epiſtolas ſcripſerat (Eraſmus) ad amicos quas ipſius amici ad patrem miſerunt: unam illarum curavit pater excudi in qua mirabatur ſuo libro militem reſpondiſſe, ut Vataſenſis Pleſſæum tractavit tanquam miratus militem poſſe ſacra tractare. i. e. " My " father was ſorry he had taken up the pen againſt " him. He perceived his error; but he was exaſpe- " rated at being called ſoldier, out of contempt by " Eraſmus; as Du Pleſſis and Launoi are ſo called, in " the Amphitheatre, by way of ſneer. Eraſmus wrote " two letters to ſome friends, which they ſent to my " father. He got one of them to be publiſhed, in " which it was ſaid, that he was aſtoniſhed that a " ſoldier had anſwered his Book, as Vataſenſis treated " du Pleſſis, as though he had been ſurprized that a " ſoldier ſhould be able to write upon religious mat- " ters." The Reader will eaſily prove, by the frequent repetition of the ſame thing, that this is extracted from the Scaligerana, which gives an account of Scaliger's domeſtic converſations. The article of Eraſmus there, includes ſeveral other honourable particulars, and much truer than ſome of thoſe which have been related above.

(73) He hints at a book of Scribonius the Jeſuit, intitled, Amphitheatrum Honoris.

For Iſt, is it not true that the anger of Julius Cæſar Scaliger aroſe from any contemptuous expreſſion which Eraſmus had employed againſt him; ſince his firſt oration againſt the Ciceronianus, filled with injurious and fiery expreſſions, was writ before Eraſmus had ſpoke or done any thing againſt him; and even perhaps before he had heard his name mentioned (74). Scaliger therefore could not have been angry on account of ſome injurious expreſſions which Eraſmus might have employed againſt him, except with reſpect to the ſecond Piece at moſt. II. We do not find by this Piece, either that Eraſmus called Julius Cæſar Scaliger a ſoldier, or that the latter looked upon this as an affront. This would not have vexed our Prince of Verona, he valuing himſelf upon his having ſerved in the army; and nothing could be more honourable to him, than to paſs at one and the ſame time for a Soldier and an Author. He himſelf had boaſted, and this in an inſulting manner, that tho' he was ſo young, and at the ſame time a ſoldier (75), he yet had given his adverſary inſtructions with reſpect to an Aphoriſm of Hippocrates. But whatever might be his opinion on this head, it is at leaſt very certain, that no proof can be given, of Eraſmus's having exaſperated him by calling him ſoldier.

(74) It appears from Scaliger's 2d ſpeech, pag. m. 32. that Eraſmus deſired a Fleming to enquire, and to ſend him word who Scaliger was.

I have two good reaſons for this: firſt we do not find in Scaliger's ſecond Oration, any complaint or anſwer, that is any way relative to this reproach: but on the contrary, we find it in ſome paſſages (76), wherein the Author obviates the objections, which he imagines this confeſſion, of having heard among military men, certain incidents which he had publiſhed to blacken the memory of Eraſmus, would furniſh his opponent with. The Reader will underſtand this better, if he calls to mind, that Eraſmus had publickly aſſerted that Scaliger was not the Author of the Oration publiſhed under his name. Scaliger who was highly offended at it, refuted this pretence of Eraſmus; and fearing he had ſtrengthened it, by his owning, that he had carried arms, (as tho' a man who had not ſpent his whole life time in ſtudy, was not capable of being an Orator) he therefore obviated this objection; which is a manifeſt proof that Eraſmus had not employed it. My ſecond proof is founded on Eraſmus's own letter, which Scaliger prefixed to his ſecond Oration. His ſon ſpeaks of this, as was ſeen above. Eraſmus's two friends to whom he had writ the letter in queſtion, communicated it to Scaliger, without adding any compliment, or advice on that occaſion. Eraſmus declares in this letter, that he was informed by very good hands, that Scaliger was not the Author of the Oration which he publiſhed againſt him (77); but he does not ſay any thing of what Joſeph Scaliger aſcribes to him, viz. that he was ſurprized that a ſoldier had anſwered his Book.

(75) Hem, Eraſme, quanto pudore tuo, quanto gloriæ tuæ periculo ab juvene homine, à rudi Oratore, à non Oratore, à MILITE . . . doceaberis! Orat. 1. i. e. " O Eraſmus! What a " ſhame, what a " blot was it to " thy reputation " for thee to be " taught by a " youth, by an " undiſciplined " Orator, by a " Soldier!"

(76) Pag. 16, 17, 42. edit. Tholoſ. 1620, in 4to.

(77) Julius Scaliger Lutetiæ edidit in me Orationem impudentiſſimis mendaciis ac furioſis convitiis diſſertam, cujus tamen ipſum non eſſe autorem multis ac certis argumentis compertum habeo. Sed hoc calciamentum ab alio mihi non ignoto conſutum ille inquit. Obſerve that induit muſt be read inſtead of inquit.

After this will any one depend on what learned men publiſh calmly from their cloſets; ſince one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed among them not only affirms, but repeats on all occaſions, two or three falſities relating to his own father, which are evidently refuted by public and original Pieces? He declares, that Eraſmus would not allow Scaliger to be the Author of the Oration; that he would not allow it, I ſay, becauſe Scaliger was a ſoldier; and that Eraſmus, for this reaſon, highly exaſperated Scaliger: he alſo affirms, that Eraſmus was ſurprized how it could be poſſible for a ſoldier to anſwer him: Laſtly, he declares that this ſurprize is ſeen in a letter which his father publiſhed; and nevertheleſs all this is falſe: and on his bare aſſertion, all Authors relate the ſame untruths, as Sir Thomas Pope Blount in his laborious and moſt uſeful Work entitled, Cenſura celebriorum Authorum (78), and Magirus in his Eponymologium (79), &c. The Apologies made by Joſeph Scaliger, for his father's having attacked Eraſmus in a ſoldier-like way, and before he had ſtudied, and that perhaps he did not underſtand, or had not read Eraſmus, ſeem too frivolous; for the Oration againſt the Ciceronianus was printed in 1531. The Author was at that time full forty ſeven years of age; had ſtudied a great many years, and was perfectly well acquainted with the writings of his adverſary, and poſſeſſed a great deal of erudition. He had ſtudied with prodigious application all the time he was in the army; and it was then a conſiderable time ſince he had devoted himſelf entirely to the Muſes; as we are informed by the Author of the Scaligerana (80). What he relates concerning the ſuppreſſion of his father's Epiſtles againſt Eraſmus; and which ſome very accurate Writers (81) have underſtood to be ſpoken of the two Orations, (becauſe he would not have been ſparing of his money in order to get the two Orations alſo ſuppreſſed, had he not been perſuaded that they were no longer extant) is generous, and ought to be believed as fact; altho' his endeavours were render'd fruitleſs, by the care which Mr. de Mauſſac took, to cauſe the Orations and Epiſtles in queſtion, to be reprinted at Toulouſe in 1620. Farther, it was not in converſation only that Scaliger committed theſe miſtakes. The reader will find a great part of them, in his anſwer to Scioppius (82), that is, in a work to which he devoted his utmoſt application, knowing that he had (78) Printed at London 1690, in folio.

(79) Printed at Francfort and at Leipſic 1687 in 4to. The Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Savans, has taken notice of it in Dec. 1688.

(80) Epiſtola de vetuſt. Gentis Scaligeræ, & Jul. Cæſaris Scalig. Vita.

(81) Baillet, Jugem. des Sav. tom. 2. pag. 13. and tom. 3. pag. 134. Beauval, Hiſt. des Ouvr. des Savans, Dec. 1688, pag. 359.

(82) I ſhall cite the paſſages in the Remarks [L] and [M].

invectives, and endeavoured to deſtroy all the copies of them [L]. He was for ſome time had to deal with the moſt formidable Critick in the world.

I wiſh he had informed us, where, when, and by whoſe direction the Edition which Scaliger ſuppreſſed, was publiſhed. The repentance he ſpeaks of, agrees very well with a Letter which his father wrote to Omphalius (83), and with the Verſes he compoſed on Eraſmus's death, and which begin thus; Tune etiam moreris; though not with ſome paſſages of his Books (84), where he treats him very rudely, and that too ſometimes on a falſe ſuppoſition.

(83) It is the 17th in the Toulouſe edition: the Author expreſſes therein an inclination to be reconciled to Eraſmus.

But after all, might not Scaliger's great uneaſineſs, at his being called Soldier, be a mere fiction that has no foundation in Hiſtory? I cannot find any thing that gave riſe to it except a Letter (85), wherein Julius Cæſar Scaliger relates, that during the diſputes which aroſe at Paris, concerning the licence granted him to have his firſt Oration printed there, Eraſmus's friends found means to get a copy of it, and to ſend it him privately; and that after reading it, he conjured them, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt ſolemn terms, to oppoſe the printing of it; for that otherwiſe, the glory he had acquired with ſo much toil, and which was common to them as well as to him, would be eclipſed by a young, unknown Writer, and a foreign Soldier, unius juvenis ignoti militis peregrini operâ. It is therefore true, at leaſt, that Scaliger had heard, that Eraſmus writing to his friends, called him Soldier; but it is falſe to aſſert, that Scaliger was the more exaſperated by it. The only circumſtance which increaſed his indignation, was, to find himſelf deſpiſed by Eraſmus, who did not condeſcend to anſwer him, and who treated him only as a voluntary cuckold with regard to his own Oration. This contempt was the moſt cruel method of revenge that Eraſmus could poſſibly have employed. Scaliger flattered himſelf that he ſhould have the honour of being the challenger, and by this means would acquire a great name in the Republic of Letters. However he was miſtaken in his aim, and forced to ſeek out ſome other way to fame. Would not ſuch a diſappointment have highly exaſperated any perſon? Julius Scaliger compoſed an Oration on this occaſion. Eſt mihi perfecta oratio qua ruſticitati quorundam reſpondebam qui ita dictitarent, Eraſmum à ſcribendo manum abſtinuiſſe, qui me indignum putaret quicum loqueretur (86). i. e. "I have writ an Oration, "by way of anſwer to ſome uncivil people, who "have ſpread a report, that Eraſmus had refrained "from writing againſt me, as thinking me unworthy of contending with him."

(84) Poëtic. lib. 3. cap. 83. and lib. 4. cap. 1. Not. in Ariſtot. Hiſt. Animal. lib. 4. cap. 8. See Voſſium de Idolol. lib. 4. cap. 13. Exercit. in Cardan. 239. & alibi, ut patet ex indice, Voce Eraſmus.

(85) It is the 12th in the Toulouſe edit.

(86) Epiſt. 13. pag. m. 30, 31.

[L] Eraſmus ſeemed extremely ſhock'd at theſe invectives, and endeavoured to deſtroy all the copies of them.] The Dutch Editors of Eraſmus's Life, and of ſeveral of his Letters which till then had never appeared in print, own (87), that he cauſed his Emiſſaries to get together and burn all the copies they could poſſibly procure of the ſecond Oration, which Scaliger had publiſhed againſt him at Paris; inſomuch (ſay theſe Editors) that it cannot now be found. This laſt circumſtance was falſe, at the time that the Edition I now make uſe of was printed: for it is dated 1642, and the two Orations of Scaliger had been reprinted at Toulouſe ever ſince the year 1620 or 1621. Be this as it will, they confirm what is found in the Scaligerana, concerning this plot of Eraſmus againſt Scaliger's ſecond Oration; this plot, I ſay, which was ſo ſucceſsful, that ſome years after, it was ſought for, to no purpoſe, in all the Schools of Paris. Curavi conquiri Pariſiis apud omnes Pedantes, nemo habet: per emiſſarios ſeptem aut octo curavit omnia exemplaria conquiri & comburi (88). i. e. "I procured an enquiry "to be made among all the Schoolmaſters of Paris, "but in vain; he having cauſed ſeven or eight of his "Emiſſaries to buy up and burn all the copies." This ought to perſuade us of the truth of what is aſſerted by the elder Scaliger, in a Letter to Arnoul Ferron (89), viz. that a Fleming, by the inſtigation of Eraſmus, burnt wherever he came as many copies of Scaliger's firſt Oration as he could buy or borrow. Thus it appears, that the two Orations had met with very near the ſame fate; wherefore then does Joſeph Scaliger, and thoſe who publiſhed Eraſmus's Life, ſpeak of this diligent ſearch, this burning of copies, with regard to the ſecond Oration only? In my opinion, Eraſmus's Emiſſaries employed more diligence in ſuppreſſing the latter than the former; and that this was the reaſon, why the firſt was printed ſeparately at Colen in 1600; for had the Editors of it met with the ſecond, they would certainly have printed them together. Joſeph Scaliger tells us, that the firſt Oration was printed by the Jeſuits, with his Epiſtle concerning his father's Life, but curtailed as they thought proper. I don't know whether he hints at the Colen Edition of 1600, which, according to Draudius (90), and the Catalogue of Thuanus's Library (19), contains no other Additions but a few divine Poems, written by Julius Cæſar Scaliger; or whether he ſpeaks of ſome other. In the laſt caſe, it would be ſtill more evident, that the ſecond Oration had been ſuppreſſed more effectually than the firſt.

(87) In a little Memoir inſerted pag. 332. edit. de Leyden, 1642.

(88) Scaligerana, pag. 74.

(89) It is the 15th of the Toulouſe edition.

(90) Biblioth. Claſſica, pag. 1327, 1444, edit. 1625.

(91) Part 2. pag. 367.

This is all I could obſerve on this ſubject, in my plan or ſpecimen of this Dictionary; but I now can add ſome particulars to thoſe I have already given, by the favour of the illuſtrious Abbot (92), who ſent me ſome Remarks of Mr. de la Monnoie. I thereby find, that it was not poſſible for Eraſmus to deſtroy all the copies of Scaliger's ſecond Oration; he being dead at the time, that it came from the preſs. This is manifeſt by the following words (93): "Julius Scaliger's "firſt Oration againſt Eraſmus, ſent to Paris as early "as 1529, was printed there in 8vo by Peter Vidoue, "with a Licence of Morin the Lieutenant, dated the "firſt of September 1531. The ſecond, tho' finiſhed "ever ſince the 25th of September 1535, was nevertheleſs not printed by Vidoue abovementioned till "1537. There is a Letter prefixed to this Oration, "written by Hubert Suſſanneau (94) to Hubert de "Pradine, where he takes notice of this ſecond piece "of Scaliger againſt Eraſmus, on which occaſion he "diſcourſed with Scaliger himſelf at Agen." Inter colloquendum, ſays he, de Orationc ſua adverſus Eraſmum ſecunda percunctatus eſt. Legiſſe dixi, ſed manu ſcriptam. Ibi ille ſubiratus: O amici, inquit, ſi uſquam ulli amici ſunt, jam pridem exiſſe oportuit, ante complures menſes opuſculum in hoc Lutetiam miſſum, & huc ad me propter viam perlongam, & non ſatis tutam raro admodum nuncii adferuntur. Proinde te per Muſas, Suſſanæe, rogo, atque etiam multis precibus obſecro, ſi qui ſunt Lutetiæ tua mandata curaturi, commendatione editionis maturitatem adjuva. i. e. "During the diſcourſe, ſays he, he enquired about his ſecond Oration againſt Eraſmus. I ſaid that I had peruſed it "only in manuſcript; upon which he with ſome heat "cried; O friends, if there be any ſuch in the world, "that piece ſhould have been publiſhed ſome time "ſince; it having been ſent to Paris ſome months ago "for that purpoſe: but I ſeldom procure any infor"mation from thence, becauſe of the length and dan"ger of the way. I therefore, O Suſſanneau, by the "love you bear to the Muſes, moſt earneſtly conjure "you, if you have any perſon at Paris on whom you "can rely, to recommend to him the forwarding of "the impreſſion." "After which, Suſſanneau de"ſires his friend to forward the impreſſion as much as "poſſible, and to get it printed by P. Vidoue. The "Letter is dated from Bourdeaux, June the 5th; but "the date of the year is not expreſſed. It certainly "was not wrote in 1535, ſince Eraſmus's Epiſtle ad "Merbelium & Laurentium, to which this ſecond ſatyrical piece is an anſwer, was not delivered to "Scaliger till the 12th of September of the ſame "year, as he himſelf informs us in his Dedication. "And therefore it muſt neceſſarily be the year 1536. "The endeavours of Suſſanneau and his friend were "ſucceſsful; the piece was probably publiſhed to"wards the cloſe of the ſame year; tho' the Book"ſeller, in order to give it the greater air of novelty, "dated it as the ſucceeding year, in theſe words: "Vænit Lutetiæ è regione Gymnaſii Remenſis, apud P. "Vidovæum, MDXXXVII. This Oration is annex"ed to the firſt. The copies of it are not ſo ſcarce "but that ſeveral of them are ſtill met with. I have "one of them in my poſſeſſion, and have ſeen above "four more." This being the caſe, we muſt ſay hereafter, time a ſtranger to the true Author [M]; and aſcribed them with the utmoſt confidence to another perſon; a circumſtance that deſerves our notice. Thoſe who deny, that a deſign hereafter, in caſe we are deſirous of being ever ſo little accurate, that Eraſmus contributed no otherwiſe to the burning of the copies of the ſecond Oration; than that, out of regard to him, and perhaps at his requeſt, his admirers deſtroyed all the copies of it that they could poſſibly get into their hands (95); for it is to be obſerved, that Eraſmus knew very well that Scaliger had revived the diſpute. Scaliger rurſus evomuit neſcio quid libelli in me, quemadmodum & Petrus Curſius. Neutrum vidi. i. e. "Scaliger has again publiſhed a "ſatyrical piece againſt me, as has likewiſe Peter "Curſius; but I have not had a ſight of either of "thoſe productions." He thus expreſſes himſelf in a Letter written the 11th of March 1536 (96). His Emiſſaries doubtleſs informed him, that the ſecond Oration was in the preſs; they informed him, I ſay, of this, as ſoon as the manuſcript came to Paris; he therefore ſpoke of this piece, the 11th of March 1536, as of a work that had been publiſhed. He did not know how negligent Scaliger's friends, or the Bookſellers, had been in printing it (97). The reader will now find, that his ſon knew very few circumſtances relating to this famous diſpute.

(92) The Abbot Nicaiſe. See the Remark [B] of the Article BALBUS BALBI at the 3d a linea.

(93) They are extracted from Mr. de la Monnoie's Memoir.

(94) La Croix du Maine calls him Hubert Suſan, but his right name is Suſſanneau. His letter to Hubert de Pradine has not been reprinted.

We'll begin by ſuppoſing what follows to be fact; I*ſt*, That a Letter of Eraſmus written the 18th of March 1535, and communicated to Scaliger the 12th of September of the ſame year, made the latter reſolve to write a ſecond Oration againſt the former, which was finiſhed before the 25th of the ſaid month (98). II, That in June 1536, this ſecond Oration was not yet printed (99), tho' the Author imagined, that it had been publiſhed ſome months before (100). We may infer from all this, that Cæſar Scaliger's ſon is in an error, when he aſſerts, I, That Eraſmus cauſed ſome perſons to burn the copies of the ſecond Oration. II, That after this, he wrote a Letter in which he, by way of ſneer, called his adverſary a Soldier; and from that circumſtance declared he was incapable of compoſing ſuch Orations. III, That Scaliger being informed of this, wrote a third Oration, the publication of which was interrupted by Eraſmus's death. IV, That Eraſmus being informed of this third harangue, wrote a Letter in 1535 (101) wherein he declared, that Scaliger threatened to write ſome piece againſt him. Every Reader will eaſily diſcover the anachroniſms and other miſtakes of Joſeph Scaliger, without my being obliged to ſpecify them: I therefore ſhall only cite his words, Eraſmus, qui ubique gentium bracatas habuit, in quibus etiam mercenarios non paucos, tantum abeſt, ut aliter, quam Scaligerum vocaverit, ut, quia monitus erat eum fere ſemper militaſſe, hoc ſolo argumento negare auſus ſit eum auctorem fuiſſe Orationis, quam pro Cicerone adverſus illum ſcripſit; idque teſtatus eſt Epiſtola, quam ad amicos duos ſcripſit. Quod cœgit Julium aliam Orationem ſcribere, qua ſe prioris auctorem aſſerit; quæ una cum Epiſtola illa Lutetiæ apud Vidovæum edita eſt. Sed Eraſmus homo vaferrimus per emiſſarios ſuos omnia exemplaria magnis ſumptibus conquiſita flammis aboleri curavit. Unum exemplar Joſephus reliquit Aginni. Neque ullum præter illud poſtea nanciſci, aut videre potuit. Tanta fuit emiſſariorum Eraſmi diligentia. Quum autem poſtea in alia Epiſtola eum per contumeliam militem vocaret, & hoc ſolo aliis vellet perſuadere tantum eruditionis illi non fuiſſe, ut ejuſmodi Orationes meditari potuiſſet, ob eam cauſam Julius ad tertiam Orationem commentandam animum appulit, cujus editionem mors Eraſmi interpellavit: & cum reliquis operibus ejus in direptione ſuppellectilis primo bello civili periit.... De hac tertia Oratione monitus ab emiſſariis ita ſcribit ad Damianum a Goes, anno MDXXXV. Aiunt Doletum quendam in me ſcribere. Minitatur neſcio quid & Julius Scaliger (102). i. e. "Eraſmus, "who had emiſſaries every where, many of whom "were hirelings, is ſo far from treating Scaliger otherwiſe than he had called him, that having been informed he had ſpent the greateſt part of his life "in the army, he, from this ſingle argument, had "the preſumption to deny his being the Author of "the Oration which he had writ againſt him in favour of Cicero; as is manifeſt from the letter he "wrote to his two friends. This forced my father "to compoſe a ſecond Oration, in which he declares "the former to have been written by him; and this "together with the letter in queſtion, was, publiſhed "by Vidoue in Paris. But Eraſmus who was a very "ſubtle man, procured his emiſſaries to buy up all "the Copies at a high price, and throw them into "the fire. Joſeph Scaliger left one Copy at Agen: "and ſo induſtrious were Eraſmus's emiſſaries, that "not a ſingle one beſides this could afterwards be found. "Having ſince in another letter, called him ſoldier "by way of ſneer, and from this ſingle circumſtance "endeavoured to perſuade the world, that he was not "maſter of ſo much learning as was neceſſary for the "compoſing of ſuch Orations; Julius Cæſar was thence "prompted to write a third, the publication of which "was prevented by Eraſmus's death, and was deſtroyed "with the reſt of his Works when his houſe was "plundered in the firſt civil war.... Eraſmus's emiſſaries informing him of this third Oration, he writes "thus to Damian a Goes, anno MDXXXV. They ſay, "that one Doletus is writing againſt me; and Ju-"lius Scaliger likewiſe threatens I know not what." I know not what to think of the menace which Eraſmus mentions in his letter to Damian de Goes; for Julius Cæſar Scaliger proteſts, that he had quite laid aſide all thoughts of the diſpute (103), when on the 12th of September 1535, he received the letter which Eraſmus had writ to Merbelius and John Laurentia. Now the letter which Eraſmus wrote to Damian de Goes, is dated May the 21ſt, 1534.

[M] He was for ſome time a ſtranger to the true Author.] Let us take ſome little notice of the confidence with which Eraſmus aſſerted, that Scaliger did but lend his name to the firſt of thoſe two Orations. This, did he uſe to ſay, I know by ſeveral certain proofs, multis ac certis argumentis compertum habeo. He had affirmed in other Letters (104), that Aleander was the true Author of this Oration, and that he was as certain of it as of his own exiſtence; but that he was obliged to conceal this circumſtance, leſt he ſhould make Scaliger ſtill more furious, by thus diſcovering the cheat. Julii Scaligeri libellum tam ſcio illius (Aleandri) eſſe quam ſcio me vivere. Id tamen diſſimulandum eſt ne magis inſaniat prodito fuco. He repeats this aſſertion, and corroborates it with reaſons, in Epiſtle the 58th, Book 30. It nevertheleſs was very certain, that no one but Scaliger had writ this Oration (105); which circumſtance ſhows, that the moſt learned men miſtake in their aſcribing Books to ſuch and ſuch Authors; and if Eraſmus who was extremely mild and modeſt, confidently aſſerted an abſolute falſhood on this occaſion, we are not to depend in any manner on what ſome haughty obſtinate and fanatical perſons, who are paſſionate from both nature and habit, affirm in a magiſterial tone on the like occaſion. He committed the ſame error with regard to another work; for he aſcribed to Aleander a Book publiſhed under the name of Stephen Doletus; Aleander denuo emiſit librum furioſum ſub nomine Doleti (106). Nevertheleſs Aleander was not the Author of it; it being writ by the perſon whoſe name it bears in the title page (107). This error of Eraſmus is more excuſable than that committed by Joſeph Scaliger in the following words, Nihil Eraſmus tam ſerio affectavit quam ex militia ejus (Julii Scaligeri) eum literarum imperitum probare, quum tamen aliter ſe ſentire apud amicos diſſimulare non potuerit: quod quadam ad Conradum Goclenium epiſtola teſtatur: Julii, inquit, Scaligeri libellum tam ſcio illius eſſe, quam ſcio me vivere. Id tamen diſſimulandum eſt, ne magis inſaniat prodito fuco. Vides credidiſſe, & diſſimulaſſe, ex quo conſcientiam hominis æſtimare licet (108). i. e. "There was nothing "Eraſmus affected ſo much, as, from Julius Scaliger's "having led a military life, to prove that he was no "ſcholar; though he could not forbear telling his "friends that he thought otherwiſe, as is manifeſt "from his Letter to Conrad Glocenius. I am as cer-"tain, ſays he, that this is Julius Scaliger's Piece, as "that I live. But I muſt not let him know it, leſt I "ſhould exaſperate him the more. By this you perceive "that he believed it, and at the ſame time pretended "he did not; whence you may judge of his honeſty." It is very certain that by his illius is meant Aleander; and therefore Scaliger is very much to blame, after having committed ſuch an error to charge Eraſmus with fraud.

(95) It is certain that the two Orations were thus treated, noſtrarum Orationum exuſta exemplaria. Jul. Cæſar. Scalig. Epiſt. 16. pag. 55.

(96) It is the 51ſt of the 27th Book, pag. 1566.

(97) See here above citation (94) of the paſſage of Suſſanneau's Letter.

(98) See the Epiſtle Dedicatory of the 2d Oration.

(99) See the above cited Letter of Suſſanneau.

(100) Eam... muneri miſi P. Rubrio.... Speroque eſſe Lutetiæ jam in vulgus editam. Scaliger, Epiſt. 14. pag. 35. There is no date ſet down to this Oration, but the 1ſt of Jan. 1536, is mentioned therein, according to the method of computation made uſe of.

(101) It is the 69th of the 30th Book.

(102) Confutat. Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. 278, & ſeq.

(103) Conatus feci ut de integro deſcenderem in certamen, quod à me jam decertatum eſſet. Epiſt. Dedicat. 2d Orat. Veterum inimicitiarum memoriam quæ à me ſane depoſitæ eſſent renovarent. Epiſt. 14. pag. 34.

(104) Epiſt. ad Goclenium edita cum Vita Eraſmi, pag. m. 326. it is the 56th of Book 30. of the London edition.

(105) He offers in his 2d harangue to ſhew the original written in his own hand with razures, &c.

(106) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 70. lib. 30. pag. 1959, dated Sept. 2. 1535.

(107) See Julius Cæſar Scaliger, Epiſt. 14. pag. 35.

(108) Confutat. Fabulæ Burdon. pag. 280.

design was formed at Rome to make him a Cardinal are miſtaken [N]. The report which prevailed at Paris, viz. that a new edition of his works was preparing at Rotterdam, was without foundation [O]. We were promiſed an account of his Life [P], but [N] Thoſe who deny that a deſign was formed at Rome to make him a Cardinal are miſtaken.] Boiſſard (109) declares it was reported, that Eraſmus had refuſed the Cardinalate, and that the reſt of the Eccleſiaſtics had looked upon his refuſal of a dignity, which was ſo induſtriouſly ſought after by others, as a miracle. Lorenzo Craſſo (110) declares, that this was a tale more to be laughed at than credited: but he at the ſame time expoſed himſelf to the laughter of his Readers, ſince 'tis an undoubted fact that Eraſmus might have been a Cardinal. He would certainly have attained to the Cardinalate, under Pope Adrian VI, had he made his court to him, which he was ſo earneſtly ſollicited to do by this Pope himſelf, who was his countryman, his friend, and ſchool-fellow (111). He excuſed his not undertaking this journey, as well becauſe of his great infirmities, as principally to ſilence his enemies, who would have reported every where, that he was gone a hunting after Church Dignities (112). But under Pope Paul III, this matter was carried ſtill farther: the Cardinalate was by that time become a ripe fruit with regard to Eraſmus, who might have gathered it, had he only put forth his hand. He himſelf informs us of theſe particulars. Quum ſtatuiſſet (Paulus III) in futuram Synodum aliquot eruditos in Cardinalium ordinem allegere, propoſitum eſt & de Eraſmo. Sed obſiciebantur impedimenta, valetudo ad obeunda munia inutilis, ac cenſus tenuis. Aiunt enim eſſe Senatuſconſultum, quo ſubmoventur ab ea dignitate quibus annui reditus ſunt infra tria ducatorum millia. Nunc hoc agunt ut me onerent præpoſituris, ut hinc juſto cenſu parato doner purpureo galero (113) i. e. "When Pope Paul III intended in the "next Synod, to raiſe ſome learned men to the purple, "Eraſmus was propoſed. But to this the ill ſtate of "his health, and the narrowneſs of his circumſtances "were objected; for 'tis ſaid that all are excluded this "dignity by a Decree, whoſe annual income does not "amount to three thouſand Ducats. Now they intend to beſtow ſo many employments upon me, "that my income may thereby be conſiderable enough "to qualify me to accept of the Hat." He declares in the ſame letter that he had a friend at Rome, who ſet every engine at work on this occaſion, although he had ſeveral times told him by letter, that he did not deſire either Benefices or Penſions, being ſenſible that his diſſolution was approaching. The ſame circumſtance has been related in another letter (114); where he expreſſes his reluctance in ſtill ſtronger terms. Paulo III viſum eſt .... itaque nunc magno ambitu agitur ut me præpoſituris onerent, reclamantem, ac manibus pedibuſque recuſantem, ac perpetuo etiam recuſaturum. i. e. "This was Paul the IIId's reſolution ... hence I now "am earneſtly ſollicited to accept of employments, tho' "I ſtrenuouſly refuſe them, and for ever am determined "to do ſo." Rhenanus not only mentions this deſign of Paul III, but ſays alſo that the Pope in queſtion beſtowed the Proveſtſhip of Deventer on Eraſmus; and entreated the Queen of Hungary, who was Governeſs of the Low-Countries, to ſecure him the poſſeſſion of it: but as Eraſmus did not care for this employment, he did not ſend the letter in queſtion to the Queen abovementioned (115). Mr. Joly (116) cites the teſtimony of Peter Bembo, and of Mr. de la Rochepozé Biſhop of Poitiers, and ſeveral of Eraſmus's letters (117) to confirm what I have ſaid, Lorenzo Craſſo looked upon as ridiculous. Another Writer (118) quotes, on the ſame occaſion two or three letters which do not ſay as he pretends that Eraſmus was appointed the firſt, and nominated to the exalted dignity of Cardinal, and that Lewis As a Doctor of Louvain, who was his friend and afterwards made a Biſhop, was ſent to him by Pope Paul III, with Letters of Credence to aſſure him of this. Nevertheleſs the fact is certain, as has been proved here by Eraſmus's own words. I do not find this Lewis As, in the letters to which we are referred (119), but only (120) one Lewis Berus a Canon of Baſil, who had preſented a letter from Eraſmus to the Pope; whom his Holineſs ſent back to Eraſmus, in order and that he might be more particularly informed of his good intentions with regard to him. A man muſt have a great penetration to find there an Expreſs ſent to Eraſmus by Paul III to inform him, that he was the firſt who was appointed to be Cardinal. Had he received any ſuch meſſage, he would have mentioned it in the two letters cited by me; for this would have been ſomething more poſitive than the bare aſſerting, that endeavours were uſed to remove one of the obſtacles to his promotion, by ſeeking out benefices and ſupplies as for a poor Cardinal. I am prodigiouſly miſtaken, if Mr. Richard did not copy the following words he was appointed the firſt, and nominated, &c. from a letter which is not quoted by him. 'Tis the LXVIII of Book XXX, wherein Eraſmus relates that Pope Paul III having charged two Cardinals to exhort the Learned Men of Germany to exert themſelves in the defence of Religion, one of theſe Cardinals had reſolved to nominate Eraſmus, before any other. But how widely does this differ from the being nominated Cardinal, and notified by an Expreſs ſent from the Pope? Nothing is more common, than for Writers to ſtretch the ſenſe of the paſſages cited by them; and indeed 'tis ſcarce poſſible for this to be otherwiſe, unleſs ſome Authors would apply themſelves very cloſe, and write but few pages in a day.

From all that has been ſaid the Reader may now judge, whether the younger Mr. Patin has hit upon the true cauſe, when he aſſerted that, had it not been for the too early death of the Pope, Eraſmus would have been raiſed to the higheſt dignities of the Church (121). He doubtleſs means Adrian VI. Now it has been proved that Eraſmus's want of ambition, and not the ſhort life of this Pope, loſt him the Purple.

[O] The report .... that a new Edition of his Works was preparing at Rotterdam, was without foundation.] 'Tis Guy Patin who informs us, that this report prevailed at Paris. I hear, ſays he, that the Inhabitants of Rotterdam, in honour to the memory of him who was the glory of their city, are printing, at their own expence, a new Edition of all the Works of Eraſmus. This news pleaſes me mightily. There is ſtill virtue left in the world, and ſome brave and worthy perſons. I pray God that this report be true.

[P] We were promiſed an account of his life.] Let us again hear Mr. Patin. "There is here a worthy "Gentleman, who is writing the life of Eraſmus that "great and excellent man, who died at Baſil the 12th "of July 1536. He had the misfortune to diſpleaſe "the Monks; but this circumſtance he had in com"mon with ſo many good men, that I would not "have any perſon be grieved upon that account (123)." The year after he took notice of the ſame Work. "We "have here a very learned and honeſt Gentleman of "diſtinction, who has almoſt finiſhed Eraſmus's Life; "and by this we find that there are ſtill honeſt peo"ple in the world, who love virtue. 'Tis 200 years "ſince Eraſmus was at Nurſe, he being born in 1467; "and in my opinion, next to St. Auſtin and St. Thomas "Aquinas, he was the moſt ſhining Wit among the "Chriſtian Writers, in ſpite of what is advanced by "ſome Monks, who do not love him becauſe he has "exclaimed ſo vehemently againſt them, and made "them ſo well known to the world (124).

I am perſuaded for ſeveral very good reaſons, that the life hinted at here by Mr. Patin, is not that which Mr. Mercier, Sub Principal of the College of Navarre, publiſhed at Paris with the Colloquies of Eraſmus, commented upon and caſtrated. I could be eaſily perſuaded that this is the life which Mr. Battier, a learned man of Baſil in Switzerland, mentioned to Colomeſius, in 1668 (125). He told him that Mr. Joly, a Canon of Notre Dame at Paris, was writing Eraſmus's life; and for this purpoſe had read over ſeven times all the works of this great man. Here is then a life of Eraſmus, to be inſerted in the Bibliotheca promiſſa & latens of Almeloveen (126). Eraſmus's life promiſed (127), by Malinkrot Dean of Munſter, is another Piece proper for the ſame Bibliotheque. This Dean had drawn up Eraſmus's life in a chronological order, which is an excellent method, and clears up an hundred difficulties, as appears from Cicero's life written by Francis Fabricius.

(109) In Iconibus.

(110) Iſtoria de Poet. Græc. pag. 150.

(111) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 3, 4. lib. 23.

(112) Sentimens d'Eraſme, pag. 22, 23.

(113) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 28. lib. 27.

(114) The 25th of Book 27.

(115) Epiſt. præfixa. Operib. Eraſmi.

(116) Avis pour l'Inſtitution des Enfans, pag. 99.

(117) Some of the Letters which he cites do not mention the incident in queſtion.

(118) J. Richard, Prieur de Beaulieu. Site. Avoye, pag. 37. of the Sentiments of Eraſmus.

(119) The Index to the Epiſtles of Eraſmus, London edition, which is very accurate and uſeful, does not mention Lewis As.

(120) Epiſt. 26. lib. 27.

(121) Charles Patin, Relat. Hiſt. pag. 129.

(122) Vol. 1. Letter 115. dated Auguſt the 15th 1657.

(123) Tome 3. Letter 458. dated Sept. 2, 1667.

(124) Patin, tom. 3. Letter 476. dated Sept. 13, 1668.

(125) Colomies, Bibliot. Choiſie, pag. 139.

(126) It is a Catalogue of Books that had been promiſed the public, but never printed. It was printed in 1692. A German, called Rodolphus Martinus Meelfuhrerus, publiſhed, in 1699, Acceſſiones to this Bibliotheca promiſſa & latens. See the Acta Erudit. of Leipſic 1699, pag. 359.

(127) In Præfat. Tractatus de Arte Typographica.

but it has not yet appeared in print. Of all his works, those which have borne the most impressions are his Colloquies [Q], and his praise of Folly [R]. He scrupled for a long cius. It were to be wished, that the life of Erasmus might be composed after the same manner; and that the date of the first edition of his several Pieces might be exactly set down in it; for the most learned men mistake in this particular (128). Verheiden gave the public a very high idea of a manuscript, kept as a relick by Otho Werckman of Nimeguen, containing Erasmus's life, and written with his own hand. It is that which Merula published five years after (129). A very laborious and very accurate Author (130), has ranked among the Writers of Erasmus's life, Merula and Scriverius, who only published some Pieces that were wrote by others; and yet has not inserted among them Beatus Rhenanus, who actually composed a beautiful discourse on the life of this illustrious man. This inconsiderable error is only in the tenth Index; the body of the Work being right in that particular. There is a report (131), that Mr. Joly has delivered his life of Erasmus to the Censors of Books, in order to have their approbation; and by that means a licence to print it. I wish this news may prove true; and that these Gentlemen may not oblige the Author to complain, as so many others do, viz. that their manuscripts are detained too long, and that several particulars are struck out in them, See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Article III for February 1685.

(128) See the Remark [R].

(129) This Life of Erasmus contains an Advertisement to the Reader, in the edition I now make use of, which is of Leyden 1642, where we find, that the original is in Jerome de Backere's Library.

(130) Teissier, Catal. Auct. pag. 373.

(131) I write this in 1699.

[Q] Of all his Works, those which have borne the most impressions are his Colloquies.] Hofman and Moreri tell us, that a little after Erasmus had printed his Colloquies in Basil, at sixty years of age, Colineus, who reprinted them at Paris in 1527, took off 24000 copies, which according to Mr. Hofman were all sold. So singular a circumstance as this would require to be expatiated upon a little more; so that it would not be a very easy matter for those Gentlemen to clear themselves fully of being guilty of omission. They ought to have informed us, that the Bookseller in question employed artifice, in order to increase the sale of it, tho' at the same time he might fully hope to sell a large number of copies, because the impression was beautiful, and in a very small size. His stratagem was to spread a report, that this Book would be prohibited, Colineus quidam excuderat, ut aiunt, ad 24 millia Colloquiorum in modum Enchiridii, sed eleganter. Id fecerat non studio mei, sed amore quæstus. Quid multis? nihil erat in manibus præter Colloquia. Præcesserat nescio quis rumor, fortè à typographo studiosè sparsus, fore ut hoc opus interdiceretur, ea res acuit emptorum aviditatem. Itaque Bedda &c (132). The fear of this made every one desirous of purchasing the Book in question as soon as possible. The great vent it had, made Bedda, (Erasmus's professed enemy) sollicit to have the Colloquies suppressed; and they accordingly were so, which circumstance was probably of advantage to Colineus. It is plain by this, that the artifices, like to those which the Author of the Religion of the Dutch ascribes to a Bookseller of Amsterdam, with respect to a Socinian Work, did not first begin in Holland. He even asserts, that this Book was sentenced to the flames, at the request of the Bookseller himself, in order to raise the price of it. But Erasmus did not inveigh chiefly against such kind of artifices; several tricks being played him of much greater consequence. Books not written by him were published under his name (132 *): some manuscripts, which were designed only for private use, were sold to the Booksellers; and all this was done for the sake of profit; it being imagined that his name, in the title of a bad Work, would make it sell. It was thus that his Colloquies first appeared in print (133). He never had either the original or the copy in his possession; but one Helonius, having procured a manuscript copy from other hands, sold it at a very high price to Frobenius, who printed it long before 1522 (134). This disgusted the Author highly, who not being able to do himself justice, endeavoured to improve the Work, by several hasty additions. Colloquia me invito atque etiam irato prodierunt. Quibus adjeci quædam in gratiam typographi, levi sane brachio, ut qui uno die interdum tria absolverim colloquia (135). i. e. "The Colloquies were published very much "against my inclination. I made some additions "upon the Printer's account, but with too great dis-

(132) Erasm. Epist. 29. lib. 19. Note that in the Book intitled, Sentimens d'Erasme, pag. 73. this Letter is addressed to Alphonso Valdesco in 1528; but it is Alphonso Valdesio in 1529.

(132*) Idem, Epist. 42. lib. 27.

(133) Idem, ibid.

(134) Epist. Erasm. 57. lib. 30.

(135) Eras. Purgat. Adverss. Epist. Luther. pag. 54, 55.

"patch; I sometimes finishing three colloquies in a "day." We find in the XXXIII and XLII letter of Lib. XXI, the justification, written by himself, of his Colloquies, concerning the use of which he wrote a letter that is worthy of being perused: It is generally printed at the end of this Work. But above all it will be of advantage to peruse the memorial sent by him to the Divines of Louvain, where among other particulars, he represents that his Readers ought particularly to consider, who the persons are that are introduced in his Colloquies (136); for as the laws of Dialogue require every interlocutor to speak, not according to the Author's sentiments, but suitable to his character; nothing could be more improper than to ascribe to Authors those particulars which they put into the mouths of their Interlocutors. Otherwise that Writer must be supposed a Mahometan, who introduces a person speaking according to the principles of Mahometanism. Nisi forte, si Turcam loquentem facerem, mihi imputandum putent quidquid ille dixerit (137). It is agreeable to read what he alledges in excuse for the discourses which he has put into the mouth of Folly in his Moriæ Encomio; what he says is very judicious. Non perpendunt id quod in dialogis est potissimum, personæ decorum .... quasi verò si quis Ethnicum cum Christiano loquentem faciat, nefas sit Ethnicum quicquam dicere quod abhorreat à doctrina Christiana (138). i. e. "They do not con- "sider that which is most essential in Dialogue, viz. "the propriety of the Interlocutors .... as though "in the introducing a Heathen discoursing with a "Christian; it would be criminal to make the for- "mer speak any thing to the disadvantage of the "Christian Religion." Add to this Lystrius's Commentary on the Preface to the Moriæ Encomium. The only objection which can be made to this is, that a writer of Dialogues, or any such Pieces, who under the fiction of an imaginary person, will publish reflections, ought to make choice of subjects, which by the laws of verisimilitude, will not oblige him to speak of things disadvantageous to Society. This is the only objection that can be made. If this other should be added, viz. that whoever puts into the mouth of heresticks all such particulars as are strongest in favour of their heresy, either pleads the cause which he himself adheres to in his heart, or gives a rash and ridiculous judgment. Be this as it will, very few Books ever made so much noise as Erasmus's Colloquies. They have been read publickly in Colleges; the reading (139), and even selling them (140), has been prohibited in many places. The Cardinals and Prelates who were delegated by Pope Paul III, for the reformation of abuses, found that to desire a prohibition to teach those Colloquies in schools (141), was an article relating to their commission. They have been translated into several Languages (142); they have been illustrated with notes, and castrated (143) &c. I call to mind a passage in Erasmus's Epistles, where he complains that his Colloquies, disguised by a Dominican Friar, had been published at Paris, with the Preface which the corrupter had written under Erasmus's name. Lutetiæ rursus Dominicanus quidam corrupit mea Colloquia, & addidit Præfationem meo nomine, in quâ damno me ipsum (144).

(136) Idem, Epist. 57. lib. 30.

(137) Idem, ibid.

(138) Idem, Chil. 2. Cent. 8. num. 40.

(139) At Paris in 1528. Eras. Epist. 70. lib. 20. Epist. 29. lib. 19.

(140) In England in 1526. Idem, Epist. 33. lib. 21. at Dole in 1536. Idem, Epist. 55. lib. 27.

(141) Sleidan, lib. 12.

(142) See Colomes. Bibliosh. Choisi. pag. 140, 142.

(143) Baillet, Jug. sur les Critiq. tom. 3. pag. 152.

(144) Eras. Ep. 32. lib. 21. pag. 1101. It is dated Easter Sunday 1526.

[R] .... and his praise of folly.] Bucholcer, who has sometimes given the dates of Erasmus's writings (145), is mistaken (146), with regard to the first Edition of the Encomium Moriæ, fixing it to the 9th of June, 1508. Had he looked into the catalogue of Erasmus's Works, contained in a letter written by the Author to John Botzhemus, he would have found that he ought not to have followed the date of the Epistle Dedicatory; V. Idus Junias 1508, since Erasmus declares, that having writ this Work in England, he looked upon it as so trifling, that he did not think it worthy of being printed (147); and that he was in Paris, when Richard Crocus caused a bad edition of it to be published. Had the younger Patin recollected this passage, he would not have reckoned (148) as the first, of near an hundred Editions which have been made of the praise of folly, that of Frobenius at Basil, in 1514. It appears from a letter of Erasmus (149), that Badius printed this Work in 1512. Accepi, says he, postremas Badii literas .... in quibus scribit Moriam à se formulis

(145) In Indice Chronol.

(146) Pag. m. 457.

(147) He informs us, Chil. 2. Proverb 40. of the 2d Century, that he wrote it in a week, without the assistance of one book.

(148) Epist. Dedicat. of the edit. made by him at Basil of this Book in 1676, in 8vo, with figures by Holbein.

(149) The 15th of Book 10. dated at Louvain in 1512. This passage and the following were communicated to me in Mr. de la Monnoie's Memoir.

long time to let any Painter draw him [S], but at last consented. The famous Holbens, his intimate friend, drew his picture, which Beza adorned with an epigram that has been greatly applauded (e). As Erasmus did not embrace the reformation of Luther, and yet censured a great many things in Popery, he has been treated very injuriously both by Roman Catholics and Protestants [T]. No man was ever more averse to the imperious temper of certain Divines, who approve of forcible methods, and delight in sounding the trumpet mulis excusam, quam tamen hic non vidimus. Herold in his Philopseudes, seems to speak of Badius as the first who printed the Praise of Folly. Vix igitur tum Badius, says he, speaking in the person of Erasmus, Moriam absolverat Leone X, inaugurato Basileam huc me contuli. This Work was very favourably received by the public. It was most pleasing to persons of Quality. Dissolute Monks, and morose Divines were offended at it; and many people disapproved of Lystrius's Commentary, because it drew off the veil from things, from the obscurity of which they drew great profit. Vix aliud majore plausu exceptum est, præsertim apud Magnates. Paucos tantum Monachos, eosque deterrimos, ac Theologos nonnullos morosiores offendit libertas: sed plures offensi sunt, ubi Lystrius adjecit Commentarios, quod antea profuerat non intelligi (150). See what is said by the modern Author, who censured Maimbourg's Calvinism (151).

(e) See the critique of it in the remark [S].

(150) Erasm. Epist. ad Botzhemum.

(151) New Letters of the Author of the general Criticism of Maimbourg's Calvinism, pag. 757.

[S] He scrupled for a long time to let any Painter draw him.] The reason of this was, he did not think his face agreeable. Ac ne facie quidem propria delectabatur, vixque extortum est amicorum precibus ut se pingi pateretur. This he himself says in his own life: but the first time only of his being painted, must have given him pain, since it is certain that Holbens drew him several times (152). He painted him but in a half-length, which gave occasion to an Epigram of Theodore Beza, that has been very much applauded. Du Verdier Vau-Privas, page 2392, Tom. III. of his Prosographia, ascribes it falsly to Buchanan, and gives it as an epitaph. Beza claims it as his, where he treats of Erasmus in his Icones. Here follows the Epigram.

(152) See the Life of Holbens, at the head of the Encomium Moriæ of Patin's edition.

Ingens ingentem quem personat orbis Erasmum,
Hic tibi dimidium picta tabella refert.
At cur non totum? mirari define lector,
Integra nam totum terra nec ipsa capit.

That is,

This picture represents but half the man,
Whose fame so loudly ecchoes thro' the world.
Why not the whole? O Reader cease thy wonder;
This globe of earth's too narrow to comprize him.

I confess that it required wit to compose these four lines; and that they seem to contradict the maxim, viz. that no thought can be beautiful without being true; but all things considered, I had rather assert that there is only a false beauty in this Epigram, since it is grounded on a false thought, than contradict the maxim. I prove Beza's thought to be a false one, since it is as easy for a Painter to draw a portrait as big as the life, when it is the portrait of a learned man, or of a hero whose fame is spread to the remotest regions, as to draw that of a contemptible creature, who is not known out of the village where he lives. Therefore the reason given by the Poet, why Erasmus was represented only in a half length, is altogether chimerical (153). Some have sought for other refinements, and even malicious ones in this Epigram; as though it had alluded to the sort of neutrality, which Erasmus seemed willing to observe between the Pope and the Lutherans (154): but even this supposition would be false, since such a reason as this could never make it difficult for a Painter to draw a man's lower parts. I must not omit, that there is in the Latin Translation of Gucciardine (155), an addition which declares, that there is preserved at Rotterdam, in some place of public resort, a portrait of Erasmus, representing him very exactly as he was four years before he died; that this picture was sent by the Senate and people of Basil, and that it was on this portrait Beza wrote the very witty Epigram. Ingens ingentem, &c. All the persons I have consulted on this occasion, told me that they had never heard of the Magistrates of Basil's having made such a present to the Magistrates of Rotterdam; nor that Erasmus's portrait had ever been preserved in any place of public resort in the last mentioned city. I have only heard that it is in the possession of Mr. Brakel, Rear-Admiral of the Meuse (156), and is an excellent original of the famous Holbens. I have read in Vasari, page 307 of Part III of the lives of the Painters, that Albert Durer had made a print of Erasmus's head.

(153) Æmilius, Professor at Utrecht, has imitated this thought of Beza, in his distich put under the print representing Mrs. Schurman. Non nisi dimidiâ spectatur imagine virgo Maxima, quod totam nulla tabella capit. i. e. "You, in this "picture, see "but half the "maid: "The largest "canvas never "cou'd comprize her."

(154) Apud Verheiden, Elog. præst. Theolog. pag. 19.

(155) Pag. 308. edit. Arnhem. 1616. This Latin Translation was by Regnerus Vitellius Zirizæus.

(156) He was killed in the sea engagement fought on the channel, July 10, 1690.

[T] He has been treated very injuriously, both by Roman Catholicks and Protestants.] This is not the place for examining, whether Erasmus's conduct, with regard to Religion, was laudable. I shall only observe that he, in my opinion, was one of those witnesses to the truth who ardently wished for a Reformation, but who did not think that it ought to be brought about, by erecting another society, which should support itself at first by confederacies, and after proceed immediately from words to blows, a verbis ad verbera. He entertained too narrow an idea of God's Providence; and did not sufficiently consider that it conducts us to the same place, but by different paths. Thus Erasmus with his non amo veritatem seditiosam, i. e. "I do "not love seditious truths," continued in the slough; and falsly imagined, that all his business was, to cling to the body of the tree; since the manner in which Luther wrote, and the wars which accompanied his Reformation, was a presumption that the time for deliverance was not yet come. Si Lutherus omnia bene scripsisset, mihi tamen magnopere displiceret seditiosa libertas. Ego vel falli malim in nonnullis, quam tanto orbis tumultu pro veritate digladiari (157). i. e. "Tho' Luther had wrote nothing but what was good, "I yet should have been greatly displeased at his sedi- "tious freedom. I would choose to err in some parti- "culars, rather than to raise such a tumult in the "world for the sake of truth." But it was to no purpose that he lived and died in the Romish communion, and was treated very injuriously by zealous Protestants; for he was not therefore treated with less severity, both in his life-time and after his death, by several Romish Writers, as is evident singly from the work of Gaspar Chicocius (158. It is pity that the Author of Erasmus's Sentiments, published in 1688, stopt at the first part of it. See the Abstract of Erasmus's Thoughts, with regard to the pacification of the Church, by Mr. Seckendorff (159). He extracted them from the exposition of Psalm LXXXIV, published in 1533. It cannot be denied but that Erasmus, in general, was what is called a Catholic; nevertheless he was pleased with the first steps of Luther; and was not a little uneasy, when he thought that Lutheranism was going to be extirpated. He imagined, in 1528, that Luther had retracted the greatest part of his doctrines, and thereby exposed himself to the contempt of his brethren as a dotard. This made Erasmus uneasy; he being afraid that the Monks, as soon as this storm was blown over, would give rise to new Tragedies. He disclosed his sentiments on this head, to Gattinara, Chancellor to the Emperor Charles V. Indies mitescit febris Lutherana, adeò ut ipse Lutherus, de singulis propemodum scribat palinodias, ac cæteris habeatur ob hoc ipsum hæreticus ac delirus. Sed vereor ne quorundam monachorum stolida improbitas excitet nobis aliam tragœdiam (160). i. e. "The Lutheran fever abates every day, insomuch "that Luther himself recants most of the things he "had advanced; and on this account is considered "by the rest as a heretic and madman. But I am "afraid lest the absurd ill conduct of certain Friars "should occasion another Tragedy." What he wrote the same year to a Council of the Empire, relates to the same thing. Si inclinat factio Lutherana, quod ut fiat ipsi sedulo dant operam, exoritur intolerabilis Pseudomonachorum tyrannis (161). i. e. "If the Lutheran "faction, as endeavours are strenuously used to effect "it,

(157) Erasm. Epist. 26. lib. 17. pag. 769. See also Epist. 2. of book 1. pag. 8, 9.

(158) See the Article SAWICKI, remark [B]. See also what Aleander has said on this subject, in the remark [I] of his Article.

(159) Hist. Lutheran. lib. 3. pag. 19.

(160) Erasm. Epist. 63. lib. 20. pag. 1024.

(161) Erasm. Epist. 72. lib. 20. pag. 1030.

trumpet for war; Eraſmus loving peace, and having a due ſenſe of its importance [V]. He was a little too ſtrongly affected with the Libels which were written againſt him, as is manifeſt from the complaints he made againſt the Printers of thoſe Libels [X]. Eraſmus was thought to be the Author of ſeveral books which were not written by him [Y]. We are told that his peruſal of the Epiſtles obſcurorum Virorum had a ſurprizing

" it, ſhould decline, a moſt inſupportable tyranny of " mock-monks would ariſe." He had already been treated very injuriouſly by Luther, and ſome other pens of that party. Nevertheleſs he was not willing that this Sect ſhould be extirpated; he being deſirous that it ſhould cut out work for the Monks, and keep them in awe. He wrote the year after two Letters, in which the Lutherans were ſet in the moſt odious light (162). Luther accuſed Eraſmus publickly of Atheiſm in 1534 (163).

(162) The one in Pſeudevangelicos, the other ad Fratres Germaniæ inferioris.

(163) See Seckendorf, lib. 3. pag. 77.

[V] He loved peace, and had a due ſenſe of its importance.] One of the moſt beautiful Diſſertations which can be read, is that of Eraſmus on the proverb, Dulce bellum inexpertis. i. e. " War is delightful to " thoſe who have not tried it." He there ſhews, that he had weighed and examined, with the utmoſt ſeriouſneſs and attention, the moſt important principles of reaſon and revelation, and the moſt uſual cauſes of war. He ſhews, that the wickedneſs of particular perſons, and the folly of Nations, generally occaſion all wars; and that a thing, the cauſes of which are ſo blameworthy, is almoſt ever attended by a very pernicious effect. He declares that they, who, by their profeſſion, are particularly obliged to diſſuade from wars, are thoſe who excite to them. Si quis exactius rem excutiat, reperiat omnia ferè Chriſtianorum bella, vel è ſtultitia, vel è malitia naſci. Nonnulli juvenes, & rerum imperiti, majorum malis exemplis, hiſtoriarum, quas de ſtultis prodidere ſtulti monumentis, ad hoc inflammati, dehinc inſtigantibus adulatorum hortatibus, extimulantibus Jureconſultis ac Theologis, aſſentantibus, aut conniventibus Epiſcopis, fortaſſis & exigentibus, temere magis quàm malitioſe bellum ſuſcipiunt, & tanto totius orbis malo diſcunt bellum rem eſſe modis omnibus fugiendam. Alios occultum odium, alios ambitio, alios animi feritas in bellum impellit. Quandoquidem ne noſtra quidem Ilias quicquam præterquam ſtultorum Regum & populorum continet iras (164). The laws, continues he, ſtatutes, privileges, and every thing of that kind are ſuſpended during the horrid confuſion and tumult of war. Princes then find a thouſand opportunities of uſurping deſpotic power; and thence it is that peace is intolerable to ſome. Sunt qui non aliam ob cauſam bellum movent, niſi ut hac via facilius in ſuos tyrannidem exerceant. Nam pacis temporibus, ſenatus authoritas, magiſtratuum dignitas, legum vigor, nonnihil obſtant, quo minus liceat principi quidquid libet. At bello ſuſcepto, jam omnis rerum ſumma ad paucorum libidinem devoluta eſt. Evehuntur quibus bene vult princeps, dejiciuntur quibus infenſus eſt; exigitur pecuniæ quantum libet. Quid multis? Tum demum ſentiunt ſe vere monarchas eſſe. Colludunt interim duces, donec infelicem populum uſque ad radicem arroſerint. Hoc animo qui ſint, an eos putas gravatim arrepturos oblatam quamcunque belli occaſionem? i. e. " Some make war with " no other view, but to have a more eaſy opportunity " of exerciſing their tyranny over their ſubjects. For " in times of peace, the authority of the Senate, " the dignity of Magiſtrates, and the force of the " laws, reſtrain a Prince very much from acting arbitrarily. But when a war is broke out, the adminiſtration of all affairs falls into the hands of a " few. Thoſe whom the Prince ſmiles upon are raiſed; ſuch as are obnoxious to him, are caſt down: " he demands, in an arbitrary manner, what ſubſidies he pleaſes. In a word, 'tis then they find " themſelves true Monarchs. In the mean time their " Miniſters juggle together, till they have quite impoveriſhed the unhappy people. Can you believe " that men of this caſt of mind, would not ſeize upon every opportunity that preſented itſelf for engaging in war?" This Diſſertation is in Eraſmus's Adagia, and has been printed ſeparately under the title of Bellum. The Author there promiſes a Book, which he had wrote to Rome under Pope Julius II. I cannot ſay whether it was ever printed. It was to have been entitled Antipolemus.

(164) Eraſm. Adag. Chil. 4. Cent. 1. num. 1. pag. m. 859.

[X] He was a little too ſtrongly affected with the libels which were written againſt him, as is manifeſt from the complaints he made againſt the Printers of thoſe libels.] See the IIId Epiſtle of Book XXI, wherein he cenſures the good offices which a friend of his had done a Bookſeller, whom the Magiſtrates would puniſh for his having printed ſome ſatyrical pieces. Eraſmus remonſtrates to his friend, that this indulgence was of pernicious conſequence; becauſe this man, ſo far from leaving off printing libels, applied himſelf more than ever to that kind of work. It was anſwered in his juſtification, that he had no other way of ſupporting his wife and children (165). Let him beg, anſwered Eraſmus, or proſtitute his wife; for this would be a leſs crime than the ruining the reputation of his neighbour. A Writer muſt have been nettled to the quick by a Satyr, to employ ſuch expreſſions. The learned will be greatly pleaſed with the Author's Latin, and therefore I will quote it. We find, in the very beginning of it, that Eraſmus repreſented to his friend, who was a Proteſtant, that the libels and ſatyrical figures, which the Lutherans ſpread all over Europe, would be of prejudice to their party. An vos creditis talibus præſidiis proceſſurum Evangelii Negotium? magis metuo ne talium ſtulta malitia & malitioſa ſtultitia, ſubvertat cum bonas literas, tum Evangelium, ſi fieri poſſit, & vos veſtramque civitatem aliquandò pertrahat in grave diſcrimen. Scottus, inquis, habet uxorem & teneros liberos. Num iſta excuſatio videatur juſta, ſi ſcriniis meis effractis ſuſtuliſſet aurum? Non opinor. Et tamen hoc quod facit longè ſceleratius eſt. Niſi fortè putas mihi famam eſſe viliorem pecuniâ. Si deeſt unde alat liberos, mendicet. Pudet, inquies. Et hujuſmodi facinorum non pudet? Proſtituat uxorem, & ad Calices vigilanti naſo ſtertat adultero? Nefarium, in quis? Magis Nefarium eſt quod facit. Nulla lex punit capite qui uxorem proſtituat, at capitalem pœnam denunciant omnes iis qui libellos edunt famoſos (166).

(165) I was told a few days ſince in 1695, that a certain man, who is for ever publiſhing ſatyrs, gave the following reaſon for his conduct; that he would not be able to maintain his family, if he did not employ his pen in this manner.

(166) Eraſm. Epiſt. 3. lib. 21. pag. 1061, written to Gaſpar Hedion, in 1524.

[Y] He was thought to be an Author of ſeveral Books, which were not written by him.] The freedom he uſed in his writings, had created him many enemies. He had cenſured with great boldneſs the irregularities of the Clergy; whence they took every opportunity that came in their way, to make him paſs for a heretic and an unjuſt wretch. They declared him, in expreſs terms, to be Luther's aſſiſtant in the Reformation; and aſcribed ſome Books to him which Luther claimed. Quorundam tanta eſt perverſitas ut ea quoque mihi tribuant, quæ Lutherus in conventu Cæſaris agnovit pro ſuis (167). They aſcribed to him the Book entitled Captivitas Babylonica, becauſe the two firſt words of this work are almoſt the ſame as thoſe which Eraſmus had wrote at the head of a Panegyric. Faſſus eſt quoſdam fuiſſe ſuſpicatos eſſe hoc opus eſſe meum quod initium eſſet, Velim, nolim, non admodum abhorrens ab exordio Panegyrici mei, quo Philippo ex Hiſpaniis reverſo gratulor qui ſic incipit, velis, nolis: bella conjectura (168). i. e. " He owned that ſome people " ſuſpected this work to be mine, becauſe it began " with theſe words Velim, nolim, which does not differ much from the exordium of my Panegyric, " wherein I congratulate Philip on his return from " Spain, it beginning thus, velis, nolis. A moſt admirable conjecture!" Was not this a fine proof? Such are the people who cannot bear to hear their dangerous chimæras laugh'd at (169); to hear them laugh'd at, I ſay, in order to preſerve one's brethren from them. Immediately they ſet up for reformers; bring the moſt impertinent proofs that can be alledged; and meet with fools enough, who either are contented, or ſeem to be ſo, with them. They aſcribed to Eraſmus two other Books, the very titles whereof were unknown to him, and in one of which he was treated injuriouſly. Aleander indicavit mihi tribui duas libellos, quorum alteri titulus eſt Eubulus, alteri Lamentationes Petri. Emoriar ſi unquam mihi futurat auditus titulus antequam ille protuliſſet. Priorem necdum quivi nanciſci. In altero ſic tractor, ut ſi ſciam autorem ſim illi gratiam non optimam habiturus (170). i. e. " Aleander told " me

(167) Eraſm. Epiſt. 14. lib. 17. pag. 758. col. 2. It was writ in 1521.

(168) Ibid.

(169) It is by the maxim, Plura ſunt riſu digna revinci ne gravitate adorentur. This is Tertullian's.

(170) Eraſm. Epiſt. 14. lib. 17. pag. 758.

prizing effect on him [Z]. I ſhall take notice of ſeveral errors of Moreri in the remark below [AA]; and in the following ſhall juſt glance at ſome others [BB]. In my opinion it ought not to have been aſſerted, that Cœlius Rhodiginus accuſed Eraſmus of plagiariſm [CC]. There would have been more reaſon to aſſert, that he was accuſed of having but

" me that two treatiſes were aſcribed to me, the one " entitled Eubulus, and the other Peter's Lamentations. " May I die if I ever ſo much as heard the titles till " he told me of them. The former I could never " get; and I am treated in ſuch a manner in the lat- " ter, that, did I know the Author, I ſhould make " him ſuch a return as would be no ways grateful."

(171) The 1ſt of Book 11. written June 1, 1518.

In another Epiſtle (171), he relates, I, that the Divines of Louvain had fathered upon him a Satyr of Huttenus, entitled Nemo. II, That they had alſo imputed to him that whoſe title is Febris: and yet, ſays he, there is not any thing in this work that bears the leaſt reſemblance either to my ſtyle or genius; cùm tamen totus genius totaque phraſis à mea diſſentiat. III, That they imputed to him the Speech of Moſellanus againſt the adverſaries of the three learned languages, and the Book of Fiſher (172) againſt le Fevre, not conſidering how much the ſtyle of this Prelate differed from that of Eraſmus, cum tanta ſit orationis diſſimilitudo. IV, That they father'd upon him the Utopia of Sir Thomas More, and a certain writing in favour of France. V, That they alledged, as a proof, the ſimilitude of the ſtyles. VI, That he had never writ, nor would write, any piece without prefixing his name to it. Nullum adhuc opus conſcripſi neque conſcripturus ſum, cui non præfigam meum nomen. Thoſe who ſhall weigh the words which I ſhall ſoon cite, will juſtly wonder, that there ſhould ſtill be people who do not ſee the illuſion of the proofs, drawn from the ſimilitude of ſtyles. Impingunt (ſuſpicionem mihi) non alio freti argumento quàm ſtyli, qui tamen mei non admodum ſimilis eſt, niſi meus mihi parum eſt cognitus; quanquam quid mirum adeò ſoret, ſi quid illic aut alibi cum phraſi mea congrueret? cùm nemo ferme ſcribat hiſce temporibus, qui non aliquid mei ſtyli referat, propterea quòd meæ lucubrationes multorum manibus terantur, adeò ut in horum etiam libris qui ſcribunt adverſum me, non rarò ſtylum meum agnoſcam, meque meis pennis transfigi ſentiam (173). i. e. " They ground this ſuſpicion merely on the ſimilitude " of the ſtyles, which is not very great, if I am ac- " quainted with my own. But would it be a wonder " ſhould ſome phraſes now and then reſemble mine? " ſince there are very few Authors in this Age, as " my compoſitions are in the hands of moſt people, " but what employ ſome of my expreſſions; inſomuch " that in the Books of my adverſaries I frequently " diſcover my own diction, and find my ſelf attacked " with my own weapons."

(172) Biſhop of Rocheſter.

(173) Eraſm. Epiſt. 1. lib. 11. pag. 545. See alſo Epiſt. 1. of book 12.

[Z] The peruſal of the Epiſtles obſcurorum virorum (174) had a ſurprizing effect upon him.] It threw him into ſuch a fit of laughter, that it burſt an impoſthume which he had in his face, ſo that there was no occaſion to cut it, as the Phyſicians had ordered. Here follow our Author's words. Adeo ejus lectione in riſum profuſus fuit, ut abſceſſum in facie enatum, quem Medici ſecare juſſerant, præ nimio riſu ruperit. Simler, who informs us of this in Bullinger's Life, obſerves that John James Ammian, a native of Zurich, lent Eraſmus the book, which threw him into a laugh, that proved of ſo much advantage to him. Will not this be put among the examples of the great benefit of ſtudy?

(174) Quibus non tantum genus dicendi, ſed mores quoque Theologorum falſe perſtringuntur. Simler, in Vitâ Bullingeri, fol. 6. verſo. i. e. " In which not " only the Dic- " tion, but like- " wiſe the Mo- " rals of Divines " are ſmartly " cenſured."

[AA] I ſhall take notice of ſeveral errors of Moreri, in the Remark below.] The firſt is this, Eraſmus's father run away with one Margaret a Phyſician's daughter, whom he had got with child. We have ſhowed above (175) that Margaret did not run away with her Gallant; but only went to a neighbouring village to lie in, whilſt he fled away as faſt as poſſible. The ſecond, is to ſay, that Eraſmus aſſumed the habit of a Canon Regular of St. Auſtin's, in the Monaſtery of Sion. His preceptors indeed would fain have perſuaded him to enter into that Monaſtery which was near Delft, and the chief houſe of the Order; but he then eluded their ſearch; and when he was forced to comply, 'twas in the Convent of Stein near Tergou, that he aſſumed the Monkiſh Habit. I do not find either by the relation he himſelf has given of his own life, or by his Letter to Lambert Grunnius, nor by the Prefaces of Rhenanus that he ever ſtudied in the Convents of Sion, as Boxhornius and Valerius Andreas aſſert. The third, is to ſay, that he went to Baſil at ſixty years of age; for every part of the article ſhews, that according to Moreri, 'twas then that Eraſmus went for the firſt time to Baſil. Now 'tis eaſy to ſhew that this is falſe, and in the following manner. The 60th year of Eraſmus falls either in 1525, or in 1527, ſince his birth is fixed by Moreri, indefinitely either to the year 1465 or 1467. Now if it be found that Eraſmus was at Baſil in 1516 or 1518, which is manifeſt by his Epiſtles (176) 'tis plain that Moreri muſt be miſtaken. We have cited above (177), a man who aſſerts, that Eraſmus went to Baſil a little after the acceſſion of Leo X to the Pontifical Throne. Now this Pope was elected in March 1513. The fourth error is of the ſame kind with the third; He ſays that Eraſmus going to Baſil cauſed his Colloquies to be printed in that city, which were immediately ſold. This is evidently ſpoke of the firſt Edition of that Book; but we have ſeen above, that ſeveral Editions had been made of it, before the year 1522. The fifth error is his aſſerting, that Eraſmus knowing that the Hereticks returned to Baſil, where they had commited incredible diſorders, withdrew to Friburg in 1529: for this is ſuppoſing that the Proteſtants had been drove from thence ſome time before; but nothing can be more falſe than this ſuppoſition. Their party was for ever increaſing, from the year 1522, till that in 1529; the other was quite ruined: all the images which would have filled twelve carts, having been piled up before the Town-Houſe in nine heaps, and burnt, in order to put an end to the diſputes of the populace, who would employ them in domeſtick uſes (178). The ſixth is, that all the learned men of the country carried Eraſmus's corps upon their ſhoulders, to the Cathedral of Baſil, where he was buried. For this to be done, the coffin muſt have been as large as the King of Baſhan's bed, mentioned in the third chapter of Deuteronomy; otherwiſe all the learned men in the Canton of Baſil would not have found places for their ſhoulders. He ſhould have ſaid, that the body was carried by the Students in the Univerſity of Baſil; and that the reſt of the Students with all the Profeſſors, and a great number of the Magiſtrates attended at the funeral. Elatus eſt humeris ſtudioſorum ad ædem Cathedralem, atque ibi ..... honorificè ſepultus; nam in pompa funebri non Conſul modo, ſed etiam è Senatoribus plerique viſebantur, Academiæ Profeſſorum ac ſtudioſorum aberat nemo (179). I ſay nothing of his death's being fixed to the 11th of July 1516, it being manifeſt that they are both typographical errors. At leaſt 'tis plain that if Moreri writ the 11th of July inſtead of the 12th, it was certainly the Printers who compoſed 1516 inſtead of 1536. Hofman has likewiſe put the 11th of July; and has alſo fallen into the third and fourth error of Moreri.

(175) In the remark [B].

(176) The 19th of Book 2; the 53d and 55th of 3; and the 17th of the 15th. Add to this that Melchior Adamus, in Vita Eraſmi, ſpeaking of the latter's leaving Baſil in 1529, ſays, that it was fifteen years ſince he uſed to viſit that City; he coming to it, every now and then, from Brabant. This is extracted from Eraſmus's 10th Epiſt. Book 24.

(177) In the remark [R].

(178) Lexicon Hofmani, tom. 1. p. 258. ed. 1677.

(179) Rhenanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Origenis.

[BB] ... and in the following Note ſhall juſt glance at ſome other errors.] I ſhall not examine in this place, whether it be true, as Boiſſard was told, that Eraſmus had been Rector of the Univerſity of Baſil; and that upon his being injuriouſly treated by the Students, he threw part of the privileges of that Univerſity into the fire. I alſo ſhall not take upon me to refute a ſtory told in the beginning of Eraſmus's life, and in Melchior Adamus (180), viz. that Henry VIII of England, gave orders for him to be ſearched; and to take away all the money that ſhould be found about him, over and above what every perſon is allowed to carry out of the kingdom; and that upon Eraſmus's waiting upon the King to complain about it, he made him burſt out a laughing; and received a preſent from him, with an order to have all the money reſtored which had been taken from him. Had ſuch an accident happened to Eraſmus, he would not have ſuppreſſed it in a book (181) where he ſpeaks of the money he had loſt at Dover.

(180) The younger Patin mentions this incident, but without refuting it in the Life of Eraſmus, prefixed to the Encomium Moriæ, publiſhed by him at Baſil in 1676.

(181) In Catal. Lucubrat. ad Joan. Botzbemium Abſtemium. See alſo Rhenanus in Epiſt. præfixa Operib. Eraſmi.

[CC] In my opinion, it ought not to have been aſſerted, that Cœlius Rhodiginus charged Eraſmus with plagiariſm.] Eraſmus complains a little of Cœlius Rhodiginus, but at the ſame time beſtows the higheſt applauſes on him; he complains of him (182) I ſay, becauſe that he had obſerved in the Lectiones Antiquæ, (182) Eraſm. Chiliad. I. Cent. 1. pag. 16. edit. Baſil. 1546.

but a very imperfect knowledge of the Greek tongue [DD], and of writing many of his Compositions in too great haſte (f). We have taken notice (g) of his being reproached with drinking to exceſs: but I am perſuaded that this was mere calumny; for in the ſame place where he confeſſes that his life had not been ſufficiently chaſte, he proteſts that he had always been very ſober [EE]; and was ſorry that it was not poſſible for him to (f) See the Citation (61) of the Article BUDÆUS.

(g) In the Remark [I] of Citation (67).

ſome traces of the ingratitude of certain Authors, who in their borrowing from other Writers, not only forbear mentioning them, but even make a ſiniſter uſe of their theſts. And as in other reſpects, he does not complain of Rhodiginus, as accuſing him of plagiariſm, I am apt to think that the learned Morhof has miſtaken the one for the other, when he ſays, that Rhodiginus accuſed Eraſmus, as though the latter had ſtolen ſome thoughts from him concerning the Adagia (183). Rhodiginus, adds he, ought not to glory in his having contributed a drop or two to that fountain, ſince he had mentioned but a few particulars concerning ſome proverbs in his Lectiones Antiquæ. 'Tis certain that the firſt Edition of Rhodiginus's Book appeared ſeveral years after that of Eraſmus on the Adagia. I would add, that as the Author was dead when Eraſmus made the complaint abovementioned, it does not appear in what time he could have made the accuſation ſpoken of by Morhof, nor boaſt of his ſupplies. I would add, I ſay, this, did I not diſcover that Eraſmus's words are deceitful? He tells us, that whilſt he was writing this complaint, news was brought him that Cœlius Rhodiginus was dead. Cum hæc ſcriberem, ex eruditorum literis cognovi Rhodiginum obiiſſe ſupremum diem (184). But theſe words were added by him in a new Edition of the Work in queſtion. The complaint had appeared in a former Edition, and in Rhodiginus's life-time.

(183) Morhof. Polyhiſtor. pag. 252.

(184) Eraſm. Adag. Chil. 1. Cent. 1. pag. 16.

This is evidently proved by a Letter which Rhodiginus wrote to Eraſmus the 22d of April 1519 (185). He tells him, that he was very much ſurprized to hear that Eraſmus was angry with him. The cauſe we are told of this indignation, was, that Eraſmus's opinions had been combated in the Lectiones Antiquæ with an air of authority, and in a magiſterial tone. Te, ait, in antiquarum lectionum Commentariis ab ejus ſententia diverſum abiiſſe, atque id tanquam docere cuperes (186). Rhodiginus having juſtified himſelf with regard to this matter, adds, that he had read, not many days before, the complaint which Eraſmus had aſſerted in the laſt Edition of his Adagia. He aſſures, I, that this was the only work of Eraſmus he had read, when he publiſhed his Book. II, that his reading of this, was like the tearing out of his bowels, ſince that after having been long employed on the ſame ſubject, he ſhould now be obliged to lay it aſide. The reſolution he took, was to give his materials a different dreſs. Facto tuo, qui occupaſti, ad reſtim mihi rediit res. Evigilatæ mihi tot noctes periere, hauſtæ lucernarum fuligines, ſudoribus toties rigatæ veſtes in nihilum recidere... nova fuit redordienda tela (187). This was part of the materials of the Lectiones Antiquæ. He promiſes to dedicate one Book of them to Eraſmus. Theſe things perſuade me ſtill more that Morhof is miſtaken.

(185) It is the 30th of Gudius's Epiſtles, printed at Utrecht in 1697.

(186) Epiſt. Gudii, pag. 117.

(187) Ibid. pag. 118.

(188) Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, tom. 3. pag. 146.

(*) Not. ad Chryſoſt. in Paul. ad Hebræos.

(†) Mar. Vic. Reat. Præfat. ad Hier. Op. item poſter. Scaligeran. pag. 74.

(189) Girac. Replique à Coſtar, Sect. 15. pag. m. 133.

(*) Quod quidem eo magis miror quod in Chryſoſtomo quoque, quo nemo unquam luculentius faciliuſque ſcripſit, hoc illi nimis quam accidiſſe deprehendi: ac præſertim in octo prioribus in poſt. ad Corint. Epiſt. homiliis, in quibus hoc ſerio affirmare quam eum pluſquam 150 errores admiſiſſe. Bili. Obſ. Sacr. lit. 1. cap. 9.

[DD] He was accuſed of having but a very imperfect knowledge of the Greek Tongue.] See what is related by me in the Remark (E) of the Article CASTELLANUS, and add to it the following paſſage from Baillet (188). "There is another point that interferes with the univerſality in learning which ſome perſons have aſcribed to Eraſmus, and which ſeems to be better grounded, viz. its being pretended, that he had but a ſuperficial and imperfect knowledge of the Greek Tongue. Hales ſays (*), that it muſt be granted, that Eraſmus had a great penetration, juſtneſs, and eaſe with regard to the criticiſm of Latin Authors; but that it was far otherwiſe with reſpect to thoſe of the Greek. The famous Marianus Victorius (†), who gave us an Edition of St. Jerom, went ſtill farther; he declares that Eraſmus had not the leaſt knowledge of that tongue." To theſe two teſtimonies, that of the Abbot de Billi might have been added. Read the following words of Girac. He is even (189) ſays he, ſpeaking of Coſtar, ſo blind both in body and mind, that though Eraſmus is the moſt faulty Writer in the world, he yet has not been able to diſcover one of his errors. He nevertheleſs has miſtaken in a numberleſs multitude of places, inſomuch that the Abbot de Billy (*) affirms ſeriouſly, that in this Writer's tranſlation of eight of St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies he has committed upwards of an hundred and fifty very groſs errors; and in another place (†) he is forced to count by thouſands the miſtakes which occur in the whole tranſlation of the Homilies on St. Paul, tho' no Author ever writ with leſs obſcurity than St. Chryſoſtom; and thoſe who have compared the richneſs and beauty of his diction to gold, might with as much juſtice compare the clearneſs of it to the pureſt and moſt poliſhed chryſtal, and to the brighteſt and moſt limpid fountains. Eraſmus was nevertheleſs a man of great abilities; and it is my opinion that the errors he has committed, in his tranſlation of that great Saint, were wholly owing to the contempt in which he held him; ſince his inſolence was ſo great, that he boaſted in a letter written by him to Biſhop Tonſtal, that were he drunk he would write better than St. Chryſoſtom has done on the Acts of the Apoſtles. Such are the liberties which the wits of this age take. I have conſulted the letter which was writ to Biſhop Tonſtal, and I thereby find, that Girac did not make uſe of an hyperbole. But there is, in the paſſage of Eraſmus, an expreſſion which ſeems to inſinuate, that he did not believe that the Pieces which he deſpiſed ſo much, were really writ by St. Chryſoſtom. Here follows the whole paſſage, which I ſhall ſubmit to the judgment of my Readers. Ex Chryſoſtomo in Acta verteram Homilias tres, cujus operæ me pœnituit, quum nihil illic viderem Chryſoſtomi. Tuo tamen hortatu recepi codicem in manum, ſed nihil unquam legi indoctius. Ebrius ac ſtertens ſcriberem meliora. Habet frigidos & ineptos ſenſiculos, nec eos ipſos commodè poteſt explicare. Ex Commentariis in Epiſtolam ad Corinthios poſteriorem verti Homilias ſex, eundem artificem illic loqui ſentio. Itaque non eſt animus bonas horas collocare malè. Aliud ſpirat Chryſoſtomus (190). i. e. "I gave a verſion of three of St. Chryſoſtom's Homilies on the Acts, but repent the pains it coſt me, becauſe I did not perceive any thing of St. Chryſoſtom in them. However, at your perſuaſion I again took up the Book, but never in my life did I read any thing more illiterate. I could write better when drunk or aſleep. His thoughts are flat and trifling, and even theſe he cannot explain to advantage. I tranſlated ſix Homilies from his Annotations on the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Paul to the Corinthians, and find them to come from the ſame hand; whence I am no ways inclined to trifle away my moſt valuable moments. Chryſoſtom breathes different things."

(†) L. cod. c. 19.

(190) Eraſm. Epiſt. 59. lib. 26. pag. 1478.

[EE] He confeſſes that his life had not been ſufficiently chaſte . . . . he proteſts that he had always been very ſober.] He obſerves this in a letter written by him in 1524, and which gives a beautiful deſcription of the diſpoſition of his heart. I ſhall take notice but of the two following particulars. He declares, that he never was a ſlave to Venus, and that his very cloſe application to ſtudy, did not allow him leiſure to follow ſuch purſuits; but, in fine, that the errors he might have been guilty of in that particular, have long ceaſed; years having delivered him from that tyrant, for which reaſon he thinks old age very agreeable. A great deal of virtue is contained in theſe laſt words; and many people could not employ them without telling a notorious untruth; ſo cloſely do they follow the genius of Malherbe and not that of Sophocles (191). With regard to ſobriety, Eraſmus could not have written any thing that ſuited better with a Chriſtian Philoſopher, or that can be ſaid of fewer people than what is obſerved by him. Et juvenis cibum ac potum ſemper ita ſumſi, ut pharmacum. Ac ſæpenumerò doluit, non licere ſine cibo potuque perpetuò degere. Veneri nunquam ſervitum eſt, nè vacavit quidem in tantis ſtudiorum laboribus. Et ſi quid fuit hujus mali, jam olim ab eo tyranno me vindicavit ætas, quæ mihi hoc nomine gratiſſima eſt (192). i. e. "When I was a young man I alſo took victuals and drink as tho' they had been a medicament; and frequently lamented that it was not poſſible for me to ſupport nature without them. I never was a ſlave to Venus; nor indeed would the great variety of buſineſs in which I was engaged, allow me time for it. And if I ever

(191) See the Remark [C] of the Article MALHERBE.

(192) Eraſm. Epiſt. 5. lib. 23. pag. 1211. F.

to live without eating and drinking. The violent exclamations of Matthew Sladus, Rector of the College of Amſterdam, and a ſtrong oppoſer of the Arminians againſt him [FF], were refuted in the moſt ſolid manner by Gaſpar Barlæus, in a work intitled Bogermannus ἐλεγχόμενος. It is reported (b) that a new edition of all Eraſmus's works, under the direction of Mr. Le Clerc, is going to be undertaken at Leyden *. This is a very laudable deſign, and the execution of it muſt give great pleaſure to all lovers of polite Literature. We are told that ſeveral manuſcript pieces will be inſerted in this new edition. It doubtleſs will be more beautiful than that printed at Baſil in 1540, in nine volumes in folio, and dedicated to the Emperor Charles V. The Dedication was written by Beatus Rhenanus.

(b) I write this in 1699.

* N. B. This new edition has been publiſhed.

" ever was ſtruck with the paſſion of love, age has " long ſince delivered me from its tyranny, and for " this reaſon old age is very grateful to me." Of the two things declared by him, 1ſt, that he had fed his body merely from a kind of neceſſity, and had taken food as phyſic: 2dly, that his ſtudies did not allow him much leiſure: the former aſſertion may be credited; and the latter is proved beyond all diſpute by the great number of books he wrote. Now theſe two things being once laid down, we cannot eaſily doubt the truth of what he advances with reſpect to his chaſtity. He does not relate it to have been perfect: He confeſſes that he had not always triumphed over the ſuggeſtions of impure love; but then he declares, that he was never trampled upon by that paſſion; he aſſerts, that tho' he might not have been always the maſter on theſe occaſions, he yet was never the ſlave. A man who had much leiſure time upon his hands, and was an epicure, would (ſhould he make the like declaration) be ſuſpected of telling an untruth; for idleneſs and high-feeding are the parents of luxury.

Fac monitis fugias otia prima meis.
Hæc ut amet faciunt: hæc ut fecere tuentur.
Hæc ſunt jucundi cauſa cibuſque mali.
Otia ſi tollas periere Cupidinis arcus &c (193).
That is,
" If therefore you expect to find redreſs,
" In the firſt place take leave of idleneſs.
" 'Tis this that kindled firſt your fond deſire,
" 'Tis this brings fuel to the am'rous fire.
" Bar idleneſs, you ruin Cupid's game,
" You blunt his arrows, and you quench his flame.
Tate.

(193) Ovid. de Remed. Amor. ver. 136, & ſeq.

In amore hæc omnia inſunt vitia: injuriæ,
Suſpiciones, inimicitiæ, induciæ,
Bellum, pax rurſum: incerta hæc ſi tu poſtules
Ratione certa facere, nihilo plus agas,
Quàm ſi des operam, ut cum ratione inſanias (196).
That is,
" In love theſe diſadvantages are found;
" Affronts, ſuſpicions, enmities and peace;
" Next war, then peace again; and for a man
" To think of following reaſon, when in love,
" Is, as to hope to follow reaſon in madneſs.

(196) Terent. Eunuch. Act. 1. Scen. 1. ver. 14.

Moſt perſons form more than once this kind of engagement. Lovers do not extricate themſelves from it but with the piece of a chain, which ſoon captivates them anew.

Nec tu, cùm obſtiteris ſemel, inſtantique negaris
Parere imperio, rupi jam vincula dicas.
Nam & luctata canis nodum abripit: attamen illi,
Cùm fugit, à collo trahitur pars longa catenæ (197).
That is,
" Nor think, when once thou haſt reſiſted one,
" That all thy marks of ſervitude are gone:
" The ſtruggling greyhound gnaws his leaſh in vain,
" If when 'tis broken, ſtill he drags the chain.

(197) Perſius, Sat. 5. ver. 157.

It will be allowed that a man, who like Eraſmus, ſeldom lets his pen and books be out of his hand, cannot find leiſure enough for all theſe things; and therefore Eraſmus ſpoke very juſtly, in ſaying that his ſtudies did not allow him leiſure to devote himſelf to the pleaſures of love.

[FF] Matthew Sladus . . . . made violent exclamations againſt Eraſmus.] He put the moſt malicious conſtruction poſſible on a paſſage which he met with in Eraſmus's Epiſtles, where the Author ſeemed to queſtion the authority of St. Paul. Ego ſane nec Hieronymo, nec Auguſtino ſic addictus eſſe vellem, vix etiam Paulo, ut omnia illius ſcripta tuerer ac probarem (198). i. e. " I would not be ſo bigotted to St. Jerom, to St. " Auſtin, nor ſcarce to St. Paul, as to defend and " approve every part of his Writings." It is to be obſerved that Eraſmus, in the other Editions, added the ſoftening expreſſion following, ut aliquid dicam ὑπερβολικῶς. i. e. " To ſpeak hyperbolically." Barlæus (199) did not fail to inveigh ſtrongly againſt Matthew Sladus, who was not ſo juſt as to take notice of that ſoftning expreſſion abovementioned. He expatiated on the great injuſtice there is, in reproaching Authors for faults which they themſelves have corrected; and he made a juſt apology for Eraſmus on that occaſion; and endeavoured alſo to clear him with regard to a charge of Arianiſm, of which Sladus juſt now mentioned accuſed him. This was nothing but reviving the old complaints which the Monks had publiſhed. The apologiſt cites ſome of their impertinences; and does not omit (200) that of John Standiſh, an Engliſh Franciſcan, and Biſhop of St. Aſaph, who complained to the King his Sovereign, becauſe Eraſmus, in the beginning of St. John's Goſpel, had written ſermo inſtead of verbum. He obſerves (201) that the ſons of Martin Lydius, Profeſſor of Divinity in Franeker, preſerved as a treaſure the manuſcript of the apology pro Eraſmi Theologia, written by their father.

(198) Eraſm. Epiſt. ad Petrum Barbirium. It is the 3d of Book I, and is dated from Bruges Aug. 13, 1521.

(199) Barlæus, in Bogermanno ἐλεγχομένῳ, pag. 47, & ſeq.

(200) Ibid. pag. 58, 59.

(201) Ibid. pag. 60.

(194) Terent. Eunuch. Act. 4. Scene 5. ver. 6. See the Remark [I] of the Article EREMITA. Num. 4.

Sine Cerere & Libero friget Venus, ſays Terence (194): Diſtento ventre diſtenduntur ea quæ ventri adhærent, ſaid St. Jerom. Let it not be objected, that ſome very ſober and laborious perſons are very much addicted to venery; a ſmall exception to the general rule, grounded on the occult qualities of natural inclination, ought not to ſerve us as a guide, when we are to form a judgment of our neighbour; and therefore whilſt we do not know whether Eraſmus was of ſuch a complection as would make him an exception to the general rule; we ought to believe, that by forbearing from luxurious eating, and applying himſelf cloſely to ſtudy, he deadned the fire of love, and preſerved himſelf from ſlavery. Add to this, that his character; the reputation he had acquired; and his poſſeſſion of wiſdom and honeſty, neceſſarily engaged him to keep a good decorum outwardly; and to not violate the laws of chaſtity without the utmoſt circumſpection. Now for a man to do this, he muſt have a great deal of leiſure time upon his hands: He muſt turn his views, not towards the Venus volgivaga, towards thoſe Thais's who indulge their favours to the firſt comer; but towards perſons who, on their ſide, are obliged to preſerve a decent exterior. Theſe inſiſt upon preliminaries, and will be beſieged in due form. If they ſurrender, they become a benefice which require a perpetual reſidence (195). A thouſand great and petty cares ſucceed. It is a ſky which does not preſerve any more than before, the ſame ſerenity. Coldneſſes, jealouſies, complaints, debates, ruptures, and reconciliations continue to produce a multitude of changes in it, and this without the leaſt rule or order.

(195) See the citation above (22) of the Article ÆGIALEA.

ERESUS, in the Iſland of Leſbos, was the native place of Theophraſtus (a). The barley which grew in the territory of it yielded ſo very white a meal, that it was judged fit to be made into celeſtial bread. Hence it is that the Poets have feigned, that Mercury cury went to Ereſus, to buy this flower for the uſe of the Gods [A]. Henry Stephens ſpeaking of the good cheer in which the Clergy indulge themſelves, mentions this bread [B]: but he has not cited Athenæus as he ought to have done. See Hadrian Junius (b).

(a) Strabo, lib. 13. pag. 452.

(b) Animadverſ. lib. 3. cap. 4.

(1) It was intitled, Γαστρονομία. It has alſo been cited under other titles. See Athenæus, lib. 1. p. 4.
(2) Lib. 3. cap. 29. pag. m. 111.
(3) Apologie pour Herodote, pag. m. 264, 265.

[A] The Poets have feigned, that Mercury went to Ereſus . . . . for the uſe of the Gods.] A Sicilian Poet, Archeſtratus by name, relates this ſtory in a Poem (1) where he treated of good cheer. This Poem is now loſt; but Athenæus has quoted ſeveral paſſages from it, and among others that which is here hinted at (2).

[B] Henry Stephens ſpeaking of the good cheer in which the Clergy indulge themſelves, mentions this bread.] He ſays as follows (3): When we would expreſs, in a word or two, a moſt excellent wine, and fit for the palate of a King, we ſay Prieſt-wine. In like manner, if we are to ſpeak of bread that has all the qualities of fine, delicious bread, ſuch for inſtance, as that of Ereſus, for which Mercury took the pains to deſcend from the ſkies, and the purchaſe for the Gods, if Archeſtratus the Poet is to be credited) do we not immediately have recourſe to chapter-bread?

ERFURT, the capital of Thuringia, and one of the greateſt cities of Germany [A], was given to the Archbiſhops of Mentz by the Emperor Otho [B] after the death of Burcardus Lord of Thuringia. This Emperor permitted his ſon William, who obtained this Archbiſhopric, to poſſeſs not only that city, but likewiſe all Thuringia. The ſucceſſors of William maintained the poſſeſſion of it, till ſuch time as Lewis the Bearded ſeized upon Thuringia, and left it to his deſcendants, who have enjoyed it during near two Centuries, under the title of Landgraves. It afterwards paſſed, by marriage, to the Houſe of the Marquiſſes of Miſnia, which is the ſame with that of the preſent Dukes of Saxony. The Archbiſhops of Mentz, by their having ſo long loſt all poſſeſſion of Thuringia, have renounced their right to it; but they have never laid aſide their claim to Erfurt, of which they have always been recognized Lords. They indeed, for a long time, had little more than the title. The citizens pretended that they had purchaſed, at different times, all the rights of the Archbiſhops; and even aſſerted, that as theſe Prelates were not Lords of the Territory, they could not poſſeſs, in their own right, ſo much as an inch of land in the city. The Archbiſhops aſſumed more or leſs authority, according to the diverſity of the factions which divided the citizens; but when Erfurt, upon its embracing the principles of Luther, had put itſelf under the protection of the Dukes of Saxony, the Archbiſhops had no longer any authority there. Guſtavus King of Sweden poſſeſſed himſelf of that city; and becauſe it revolted from the Swedes, it was again ſubjected by General Banner. The Swedes computed, by the treaty of Weſtphalia, that it ſhould again be ſubject to the Archbiſhops. The citizens pretended that this was to be underſtood only as a chimerical obedience, and like to that they had paid in latter times; but the Archbiſhop of Mentz, on the contrary aſſerted, that by this article of the peace, he ought to be reinveſted with all the rights of a true Lordſhip. The Emperor declared in his favour, and put the city of Erfurt under the ban of the Empire. After which this Archbiſhop, aſſiſted by the troops of France, forced the inhabitants to a ſubmiſſion [C]; ſo that he now is poſſeſſed of the city and of the (a) citadel (b). The Univerſity of Erfurt, which had once been in a very flouriſhing condition, was ruined by the inſolent behaviour of the Students [D].

(a) It is called St. Ciriace, becauſe it was built in a place where there formerly had been a convent of nuns of that name. Journal des Savans of Jan. 19, 1665. The Germans call it Cyriacſburg.

(b) Extracted from a Memoir concerning the city of Erfurt, an extract of which is given in the Journal des Savans of Jan. 19, 1665.

ERMITA

[A] . . . . One of the greateſt cities of Germany.] "Some even go ſo far as to ſay, that it ſtands upon "more ground than any city in Germany. Several "places are alſo dependent on it, which conſiſt of "three Lordſhips, and ſeventy two villages. It took "its name from the caſtle of Effort ſeven leagues from "it, the Lord of which had toll paid him from the "city. Several Hiſtorians imagine that the Monaſtery of St. Peter on the mountain, was built there "by Dagobert King of France; others by King Pepin Lord of Thuringia, and ſix Flower-de-Luces "are ſtill ſeen on the gate of that Monaſtery (1).

(1) Heiſs, Hiſt. de l'Empire, lib. 6. cap. 1. pag. 198. of tom. 2. 1ſt Dutch edit.

[B] . . . . Erfurt was given . . . . by the Emperor Otho.] As the whole text of this article is taken from an Extract written from Germany, by Mr. Sallo, I only ſay, with him, the Emperor Otho; but for fear leſt ſo vague a way of expreſſion ſhould make the criticks accuſe me of being very negligent, I ſhall add, that the Emperor here ſpoken of, is Otho I; and will cite an Author who deſerves to be credited on this occaſion. The city of Erfurt, ſays he (2), was not ſurrounded with walls till the year 1163, a long time after that the Emperor Otho I had given it, together with Thuringia, to his brother (3) William, Archbiſhop of Mentz.

(2) Heiſs, ibid. pag. 199.

(3) He is made ſon to Otho, in the extract of the Journal des Savans.

[C] The Archbiſhop of Mentz, aſſiſted by the troops of France, forced the inhabitants to a ſubmiſſion.] Here follows another paſſage from Mr. Heiſs (4). "Now "we are talking of Erfurt, it will not be juſt to omit "the generoſity of the moſt Chriſtian King in 1664, "in ſending at his own expence, to the Elector of "Mentz, John Philip de Schonborn his ally, a powerful ſuccour of troops commanded by Count Pradel, "to aſſiſt him in reducing that city to his obedience, "in conſequence of the Ban, publiſhed againſt it by "the Emperor." There is ſufficient to content thoſe who would have an incident verified by the circumſtance of time, and that of perſons &c. Such a taſte is very juſt; for without theſe requiſites an incident or relation is a body without a ſoul, or a machine out of order, arena ſine calce: and nevertheleſs numberleſs Authors give relations entirely in this imperfect caſt.

(4) Hiſt. de l'Empire, liv. 6. chap. 1. pag. 199.

[D] The Univerſity of Erfort . . . was ruined by the inſolent behaviour of the Students.] Eobanus Heſſus had had 1500 Auditors in that famous Univerſity, Luther took his firſt Degrees in it, and uſed to call it the Paradiſe of Germany. But things were greatly changed afterwards. The Citizens being no longer able to bear the riotous conduct and inſolence of the Students, took up arms, beſieged the Colleges, took them, beat or killed as many Students as fell in their way; and were not eaſy till they had drove them all out of the city. I will preſent my readers with a long paſſage from a Speech of Alſtedius (5), in which he complains grievouſly of the irregularity of the Scholars. Quam vellem nobis ſemper ob oculos verſaretur cataſtrophe florentiſſimæ Academiæ Erfordienſis! Cum ſtudioſi illic loci ſe petulantiùs gererent adverſus cives, cum tumultibus nocturnis urbem laceſſerent, cum lapidibus tecta domoſque obruerent, cum feneſtras & fores hoſpitum frangerent, populus magno agmine excitus collegiorum domos admotis bellicis tormentis obſedit, expugnavit, ac ut quemque ſtudioſorum juvenum obvium habuit, velut hoſtem arripuit, vulneravit, trucidavit, neque priùs quievit, quam vitulantium adoleſcentum multitudo mœnibus urbis eſſet profligata. Jacet ex illo die etiamnum, olim florentiſſima Academia, quam Lutherus, qui primam ibi lauream conſecutus

(5) It is intitled, De Providentia Dei circa ſcholarum decrementum. It is in his Encyclopædia, col. 2764, & ſeq.

ERMITA (DANIEL), a native of Antwerp, and Secretary to the Duke of Florence (a), about the beginning of the seventeenth Century, was a pretty good writer [A]; but neither his conduct nor morals were consistent with the profession of the Belles Lettres, to which he had devoted himself. Scaliger had a great esteem for him, and recommended him in the strongest terms to Casaubon, for which he was sorry soon after [B], upon his hearing that this young man had turned Roman Catholic. Casaubon has expatiated pretty largely on that incident [C]. However, though Eremita had changed secutus est, paradisum Germaniæ id ætatis fuisse testatur: in qua Eobanus Hessus mille & quingentos auditores habuit: quæ denique id fuit in Germaniâ, quod Bononia in Italia, mater scilicet studiorum. i. e. "I wish we "could have for ever before our eyes the sad catastro-"phe of the most flourishing University of Erford! "The Students of it behaving with insolence towards "the inhabitants, irritating them by their nocturnal "tumults, throwing showers of stones at their houses, "breaking their windows, and forcing open their "doors; the populace assembling together in great "crouds, besieged the Colleges in a military man-"ner, took them, seized upon, wounded, and killed all "the Students they met with, as if they had been so "many enemies; nor ceased their fury, till they had "repulsed the whole multitude of these hot-headed "youths out of the walls of the city. From that fa-"tal day, to this time, lies in ruins the once most "flourishing University, which Luther, who there "gained his first laurel, declares to have been the Pa-"radise of Germany in that Age: wherein Eobanus "Hessus had 1500 Students; and which, in a word, "was the same in Germany as Bologna in Italy, viz. "the Mother of Studies."

(a) Valer. And. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 169.

[A] Was a pretty good Writer.] The Panegyric of the Duke of Florence, published by him in 1608, was esteemed. Epistolica Relatio (1) de Itinere Germanico quod legatione magni Etruriæ Ducis ad Rodolphum II. Imp. Principesque & respublicas aliquot Germaniæ anno 1609 peractum fuit; and his Epistle de Helveticorum, Rhetorum, Sedonensium situ Republica & moribus, deserve to be read. Here follows Scaliger's judgment of him (2): Quas (Literas) ad te ab  scriptas mihi misisti, aliquam bonæ frugis spem faciunt. Interest illud ingenium quibusdam finibus coërceri, in quibus si contineatur & illam luxuriem depascatur, nihil ab eo nisi bonum expectandum est. i. e. "The Letters wrote "to you by , and which you communicated to me, "give me some hopes of a good harvest in time to "come. That genius ought to be restrained to cer-"tain limits; and then, if its luxuriancy be also "prun'd away, every thing good and worthy may "be expected from it." His Latin Poems were inserted in Tom. II of Deliciæ Poëtarum Belgicorum.

(1) Christopher Arnoldus cites it with honour, in his Life of Marcus Velserus.

(2) Epist. 97. pag. 243. edit. Francof. 1628. He writes this to Casaubon. The letter is dated the 15th of August, but the year is wanting. It is 1603.

[B] Scaliger . . had recommended him, in the strongest terms, to Casaubon, for which he was sorry soon after, upon his hearing that this young man was turned Roman Catholick.] We have seen what he wrote to Casaubon, the 15th of August 1603; and here follows what he observed to him the 8th of December of the same year. Prob facinus indignum! quid de  audio? adeo immutatum ingenium ejus, ut alius ab eo quem tibi commendavi discederet? Me verò stipitem qui in aliis ὀξυδολίπτης sum, in isto ἰμωπισα, ἐτύφλωσσον. . . Nescio an unquam quicquam mihi acciderit, quod aut justius aut gravius doluerim, tum quia in illa ætatula vulpem non deprehenderim, tum quia à me expresserit ut se tibi commendarem. Sed væ illi qui in te ingratus fuit, & me hominem stultum qui vulpem non hominem tibi commendavi. Obstrinxerat me aliquo privato beneficio, non tamen quod æquaret comitatem qua illum complexus sum, sed tamen (quæ est πρυθυμία mea) quantulumcunque esset quod mihi præstitisset pro magno beneficio habui, neque potui illum splendidius remunerari quam si illi portam aperirem ad amicitiam tuam. i. e. "Good heavens! "what am I told of ? Is his mind so much chang-"ed, as to be quite different from what it was "when I recommended him to you? Tho' I am so clear "sighted in other matters, I yet must have been a mere "stock and quite blind on this occasion? I know not whe-"ther any accident ever befel me, for which I am more "justly or more deeply afflicted; not only because I "could not discover the concealed fox, but because "he should inveigle me so far as to procure a recom-"mendation of him from me to you. But woe be to the "wretch who was ungrateful to you: and silly sure "was I to recommend a fox, not a man. I had received "private favours from him, but none of them could "equal the kindness which I indulged him. I never-"theless, though the civility he had done me was so "small, consider'd it as a very considerable one; and "could not repay it to greater advantage, than by "giving him an opportunity of being indulged your "friendship." I think with Colomesius (3), that the affair here hinted at, is Eremita's changing his Religion; but I cannot guess the reason why the Editors of Scaliger's Letters should pay so much regard to this man's memory, as to put stars instead of his name. They did not range, in their proper order, the two Epistles where he is mentioned: for they computed as the XCVIIth, that in which Scaliger forms the judgment, in the last remark, of this man; and they reckon as the LXXXVIII, that in which he says of him what I have just now related. Colomesius, who fancied that Eremita was hinted at in both, should have taken notice that they were misplaced; for, according to his suppositions, it is plain, that the XCVIIth Epistle is prior to the LXXXVIIIth. This is manifest from another passage. Scaliger, in the XCVIIth Epistle, says, that he has received Casaubon's Commentary on the Roman History; and in the LXXXVth, he observes, that he had already sent him twice word of his having received the Book in question: it is consequently evident, that the XCVIIth Epistle was writ before the LXXXVth. Now the latter is dated September the 19th 1603; we must then, to supply the date of the year which is wanting in the XCVIIth Epistle, add 1603 to the XVIIIth Kalend. Septembris, expressed by the Author. This circumstance was not observed by the Editors of those Epistles. They have inserted the letter among those of 1604, at a good distance from the LXXXVIIIth Epistle, dated the 8th of December 1603.

(3) In Clavi Epistolarum Scaligeri, pag. 152. Opuscul. edit. Ultraj. 1669.

[C] Casaubon has expatiated pretty largely on that incident.] He had a great friendship and esteem for him, upon his being so well recommended by Scaliger (4). He procured him an employment, and endeavoured to get him into Mr. de Montaterre's family in quality of Preceptor. The affair was upon the point of being concluded, when Eremita found means to ingratiate himself with Mr. de Vic, who was going Ambassador into Switzerland. Mr. de Vic was a very worthy man, but vastly bigotted to the petty forms of devotion of his party, and fired with a zeal for making converts. Est autem Vicquius optimus vir quidem & ἐν τοῖς μάλιστα φιλόκαλος, sed superstitionibus & ἐξ ἐναντίας supra fidem obnoxius (5). He soon won over Eremita, which was wholly owing to a single conference with one of the bawling Enthusiasts of that age: a circumstance which vexed Casaubon to the heart. He knew the abilities of the converter and that of the convert: he knew Eremita was a better scholar than the Portuguese Monk, and yet he was informed that the Monk gave Eremita a fall at the first onset. Adolescentem πρὸς τὰ μαθήματα εὐφυῆ & bene doctum ab imperitissimo plano, cui nullus inest melioris eruditionis sensus, prima congressione devictum esse, indignissime fero (6). i. e. "I am exasperated to "think, that a youth of learning and capacity, should, "at the first attack, be totally defeated by a creature "who has neither." But he soon found the reason why so slight a resistance had been made; Eremita desired nothing better, than to persuade himself, that the richest Religion is at the same time the best. Ergo, mi Daniel, Lusitanus iste mirabile aliquod pietatis arcanum te docuit, antea tibi incognitum? Ego qui hominem intus & in cute novi, satis acceptum habeo non te ab illo, sed ipsum à te potuisse doceri: non acumen in eo tantum, non eruditio, non lectio patrum, ut ad primum ejus congressum herbam porrigere cogereris. Victus igitur es, non quia resistere non poteras, sed quia volebas optabasque vinci (7). i. e. "My friend, did that Portuguese instruct you in any "mystery of Religion which before was unknown to "you?

(4) Urgebat optimus & tui observantissimus Eremita noster. Casaub. Epist. ad Scalig. It is the CCLXXXIII, pag. 324. edit. Græviana, 1656. It was writ in February 1603. Ego illum semper tua maxime gratia habui charissimum, & quibuscunque potui officiis sum prosecutus. Idem, Ep. CCLXXXV ad eund. Scaligerum.

(5) Idem, Epist. CCLXXXIV.

(6) Idem, Epist. CCLXXXV.

(7) Idem, Epist. CCLXXXVI. dated the 11th of April 1603.

changed his Religion, he nevertheleſs retained a veneration for Scaliger. Of this he gave a public teſtimony even after the death of Scaliger, he defending him againſt the dreadful Scioppius [D]. But Eremita did not find his account in this; for Scioppius refuted him after his manner, that is, by publiſhing a thouſand ſlanderous particulars concerning his conduct [E]. Eremita died of the venereal diſeaſe at Leghorn in 1613. Some think that he was poiſoned (b). He was naturally inclined to ſlander, a proof of which

(b) Obiit Liburnæ ex morbo gallico, anno à Chriſto nato 1613. Sunt qui veneno extinctum ſcribunt. Quid juvat humanos ſcire atque evolvere caſus, Si fugienda facis & facienda fugis. Swert. Ath. Belgic. pag. 203.

" you? I who know that man thoroughly, am perſuaded, that there was nothing he could teach you; " but that you could have taught him many things. " He has not ſo mighty a genius, ſo much learning, or " knowledge of the Fathers, as to force you to ſubmit " to him at the firſt attack. You therefore was overcome, not becauſe you were not able to reſiſt, but becauſe you were deſirous of being vanquiſhed." A thirſt of riches, which had been perceived in him, ſeemed to promiſe no good (8). The employment which his friend procured for him, was worth beſides his board fifty crowns per annum (9). This ſum at firſt ſeemed very conſiderable, then very inconſiderable, and at laſt nothing at all. He watched for all opportunities of enriching himſelf; and kept his eye eſpecially on Epiſcopal Palaces. Caſaubon prevented him twice from entring into them, but he did not oppoſe his living in Mr. de Vic's family. The young man turned Papiſt there, and went into Switzerland with that Ambaſſador. His father, a worthy old man, and a good Proteſtant, was exceedingly afflicted at his ſon's forſaking his religion. He endeavoured to bring back this prodigal ſon, and he even made him recant; but this was mere ſhame. Caſaubon publiſhed in Leyden that Eremita was mad after images, and unaccountably greedy of maſſes. Scito neminem hodie vivere Miſſarum inexplebiliorem, aut ſitientiorem, quare illa παλινῳδία ſimulata fuit, mendax & ὑποκριτική. In dies ejus herus expectatur, quo præſente veram vocem audiet à me iſte Proteus (10). " No man in the world is more greedy " after maſſes than he; his recantation therefore was " all a Farce. His maſter is expected daily, and before him this Proteus ſhall hear the truth from me." But this was another miſtake, the only motive of Erimita's frequenting maſſes was, their leading the way to penſions. He had been heard to ſay, that all controverſies between Roman Catholics and Proteſtants were indifferent to him; that with regard to himſelf, he was ready to do any thing that might promote his intereſt; and he one day laughed at the folly of thoſe who don't chooſe the right path to fortune. Vir fide dignus & ſibi notiſſimus his diebus narrabat mihi audiſſe ſe cum diceret, omnia ſibi quæ hodie diſputantur æque & probari & improbari, paratumque ſe ad omnia pro tempore & rerum ſuarum emolumento. Cum vir pius hanc vocem abominaretur, chachinno Eremitæ eſt exceptus, ſtultitiam eorum πικρᾶς ridentis, qui neſcirent τὰ ἴδια ᾧ τίθεσθαι (11). i. e. " A perſon worthy of credit, who is very well " known to him, told me ſome days ago, that he " heard him ſay, that all matters which were the ſubject of controverſy at that time, were equally indifferent to him; and that he was ready to adhere to, or leave any of them, in compliance with the Times, and to promote his own intereſt. The good man diſcovering a deteſtation of ſuch a principle, Eremita " burſt out a laughing, and ridiculed the folly " of thoſe who did not know what was beſt for " themſelves."

(8) Erat mihi dudum hoc ingenium ſuſpectum propter incredibilem in ea ætate opum ſitim, quam non levibus notis in eo deprehenderam. Caſaubonus, Ep. CCLXXXV.

(9) Collocaveram ipſum in honeſta conditione ubi præter victum quinquaginta annuos aureos habebat. Idem, ibid.

(10) Idem, Epiſt. CCCXXXII, ad Scaligerum ſcripta VI Kal. April. 1604.

(11) Idem, Ep. CCLXXXV.

[D] He defending ..... Scaliger againſt the dreadful Scioppius.] Scioppius aſſerts (12), that Daniel Eremita is Author of Epiſtola nobiliſſimi & literatiſſimi viri Patavio ad Gaſp. Scioppium Romam ſcripta.. Excuſa anno 1610. I fancy Scioppius is not miſtaken in his aſſertion. [This Epiſtle is extremely ſcarce, inſomuch that Grævius could not procure it, in order to inſert in it his collection. Niceron, Mem. des hommes illuſt. p. 38. vol. 29.] Additional note by the Tranſlator.

(12) Scioppius, in Oporini Grubinii Amphotid. Scioppian. pag. 335. This book was printed in 1611.

[E] Scioppius refuted him .... by publiſhing a thouſand ſlanderous particulars.] Scioppius had ſeen him at Rome five years before. Eremita, as that Author tells us, came to him with the two Rubeins (brothers) and two other Flemings, in order to go to Tivoli; and theſe Gentlemen were greatly ſhocked at his converſation during their little journey. He was for ever talking about Petronius, and Aretine's poſtures; and he inſulted in the moſt unhandſome manner thoſe who ſeemed ſcandalized at the licentiouſneſs of his diſcourſe. But this was not all, for he drew the moſt obſcene figures on the walls of ſeveral of the public houſes where they lodged. In toto illa itinere illud unum agere viſus eſt ut Petronium velut unicum, & quemadmodum ipſe loquebatur, diviniſſimum pæderaſtiæ deſcriptorem, magiſtrum, artificem .... omnibus quotquot ſunt, Græcis ac Latinis Scriptoribus multum ad laudem anteferret. In quo ne parum profeciſſe crederetur, non modò obſceniſſimis picturis diverſorii parietes implevit, ſed perpetuo varia τῆς συνουσίας ſchemata in ore habuit, & tanquam Elephantidos libellorum commentatorem atque interpretem ageret, hiſtorias peccare docentes, quibus vel Hippolyto fibula laxari ac nequitia perſuaderi poſſet, recitare non ceſſavit. Ac ſi quis ex comitibus ejus nequitiam reprehenderet, ſuaſque aures tam impuris & nefandis ſermonibus violare nollet, huic ille hypocriſin & pudicitiæ ſimulationem invidioſè objiciebat. Nec enim quemquam mortalium caſtum ac pudicum eſſe perſuaſum habet, conjectura ſcilicet de animo ſuo ducta, ſed pleroſque, ſive propter Dyſcopian, ſive quod animi ſatis non habeant pœnaſque metuant, ſuam cujuſcunque generis libidinem diſſimulare & occultare credit. Itaque veriſimile non eſt quàm ſe comites ejus gaviſos eſſe dixerint, ſimul ac Romam reverſi à tam propudioſo monſtro liberatos ſe ſenſerunt. Nam piaculares ſibi facti videbantur, cum ejuſmodi exſecrabiles turpiſſimi & impudentiſſimi ſcurræ ſermones, quos neque ſuburranæ puellæ æquo animo audirent, in aures ſuas admiſerunt (13). i. e. " Throughout the whole journey, he did " nothing but applaud Petronius as the only, or, to " borrow his own expreſſions, as the moſt divine deſcriber and Profeſſor in Pederaſty .... ſetting him " far above all the Greek and Roman Authors. And " to ſhew that he had made no little improvement under ſo fine a maſter, he not only filled the walls " of the Inn with the moſt obſcene draughts, but was " for ever expatiating on the different poſtures; and " as if he had been a Commentator and Tranſlator of " the Elephantis, he was eternally telling the looſeſt " ſtories, capable of corrupting the chaſteſt minds. " And if any of his fellow-travellers cenſured him for " his lewdneſs, and begged him not to grate his ears " with ſuch looſe and abominable diſcourſe, he ſpitefully accuſed him of hypocriſy and a pretended modeſty. Nor could he perſuade himſelf that any mortal breathing was chaſte or modeſt; the depravity of " his own heart making him form ſuch a judgment; " he believing that moſt people, either out of baſhfulneſs, want of courage, or through fear of puniſhment, concealed their ſeveral laſcivious inclinations. It is therefore incredible what joy " his fellow-travellers expreſſed at their return to " Rome, to find themſelves freed from ſo ſcandalous a monſter. For it was infinitely ſhocking to them to hear ſuch deteſtable diſcourſes " from a moſt audacious and wicked wretch; diſcourſes " that would offend even the moſt profligate creatures " in ſtews." Having diſappeared for ſome time after, it was concluded that poverty had forced him to ſhelter himſelf in ſome Carthuſian Monaſtery; but it was found that he was retired to Sienna, where he made his court to Archbiſhop Aſcanio Piccolomini, who recommended him to Silvio Piccolomini, Great Chamberlain to the Duke of Florence; and by this means he obtained a penſion from that Prince, as a reward for a panegyric written by him on the nuptials of the great Duke with Magdalen of Auſtria. He ſollicited ſo earneſtly to be ſent into Germany with the Deputy who went to acquaint the ſeveral Princes of the Empire, as well as imperial cities, of the death of the great Duke's father, that his requeſt was granted. The perſuaſions of Silvio Piccolomini were of great ſervice on this occaſion; he repreſenting that as Eremita was a Fleming, he might upon ſeveral occaſions ſerve as a good interpreter and a ſpy at the ſame time. Eremita boaſted in one of his Letters, written from Auſburg, that he was one of the great Duke's envoys; which appeared very vain and ridiculous to Leonard le Coq,

(13) Scioppius, ubi ſupra, pag. 336, 337.

Confeſſor to Chriſtina of Lorrain, great Ducheſs of Tuſcany. At his return to Florence, he told a hundred idle ſtories concerning the drunkenneſs of the Germans, in order to make his court to the Italians. He made the latter laugh heartily, when he gave them an account of the ſtudies of Maurice, Landgrave of Heſſe; and the verſes compoſed by that Prince in honour of thoſe young ſtudents who took their Bachelor's Degree. He told them that this Landgrave, with the Marquiſs of Anſpach, and the Prince of Anhalt, had drank to the health of the Kings of France and England; and deſtruction to the King of Spain; that he had cauſed this health to be drank round, and toaſted it to the Envoy of the great Duke. Florentiam reverſus, nihil prius habuit, quam Germaniam veluti porcorum patriam Italis, quorum in eo gratiam aucupabatur, deſcribere, quantumque Principes Germani quotidie potare ac vomere ſoleant, ſatis feſtive commemorare: ſed in nulla hiſtoria tam faventes expertus eſt auditores, quam cum de Grammatica Mauritii Heſſiæ Landgravii, deque carminibus, quibus ille novis Baccalaureis & Magiſtris honorem gratulari ſoleat, narravit. Hoc enim Italicis, præſertimque Florentinis, uſque adeò inſolens ac novum videtur, ut id ad Ovidii Metamorphoſes rectiſſimè adjici poſſe exiſtiment. Cum porrò ex eodem Aretalogo ſuo audiunt, quod idem Landgravius ſimul cum Marchione Brandenburgico Onſpacenſi, & Chriſtiano Anhaltino, pro ſalute Regum Galliæ & Angliæ, proque peſte ac mala morte Regis Catholici votivum poculum circumtulerit, idque legato Florentino propinare nihil veritus fuerit, non videntur Itali tam barbaram immanitatem ſatis pro merito exſecrari poſſe (14). He was very officious about ſuch Lutheran Nobility as uſed to go from Germany to Florence. Thoſe young Gentlemen were overjoyed to meet with a Fleming there who underſtood Italian, and informed them of the cuſtoms of the place; and they were well pleaſed to go and lodge in the ſame houſe with him. By this means he fared well at a very little coſt; and after this he would give himſelf the trouble to introduce them to looſe women, where they were ſo polite as to treat him, for otherwiſe it would not have been eaſy for him to gratify his paſſions. Cum illud neſcio quid ſatietatem ejus tentare cœpit, venaſque inflavit tetra libido, quia non habet infelix Quintillæ quod dare poſſit, lenonis opera ei navanda, & adventoribus ad ipſam perducendis, amicam ſibi propitiam morigeramque facit (15). He carried one day, to a proſtitute's lodgings, a Roman Catholic who had received the Communion the day before; and who, not being willing to plunge again ſo very ſoon into vice, and ſuſpecting that he was going into a bawdy houſe, was in doubt with himſelf whether he ſhould go in. Eremita ſwearing that it was the place in which he kept his Library and uſed to ſtudy, he was believed, and his companion went in. The proſtitute happened to be abroad; but nevertheleſs he perceived by ſeveral ſigns, that it was an ill houſe. The Roman Catholic complaining to Eremita, he only made a joke of it; whether it were that he laughed at the ſcruples of the complainant, or ſuſpected him to be a hypocrite. He purchaſed all the political Pieces and Paſquinades that fell in his way, and ſold them to Lutheran Gentlemen, who fancied the Books had transformed them into ſo many Stateſmen; and accordingly uſed to trumpet the name of Daniel Eremita wherever they came. Quicquid conſultationum ac relationum de rebus politicis undeunde corrogare potuit (ſicut ejuſmodi frivolorum, quos vocant dicurſuum plena eſt Italia) tum præcipuè paſquinos ſive ſatyras, quibus ſummi Pontifices, Cardinales, omnis Clerus, præcipuè Jeſuïtæ, contumelioſiſſimè ac plerumque mendaciſſimè infamantur, cum eis communicat. Et illi poſtea mercibus ejuſmodi onuſti plurimumque ſibi de tantarum rerum ſcientia . . . gratulantes, conſummatiſſimos politicos ſe factos putant (16). Eremita likewiſe ſet up in Florence, for a man who was profoundly ſkilled in affairs of government; and promiſed a Commentary which ſhould exceed whatever had been writ upon Tacitus. Parum adhuc profeciſſe ſe putat niſi etiam Florentinis imponat, ſeque ingentem Statiſtam, quem vulgo dicunt, ſive politicum & civilis ſcientiæ imprimis gnarum videri faciat. Eo conſilio paſſim jactat, ſe commentarios politicos in Tacitum moliri, quibus cornici oculum configat (17). i. e. "He fancies he has made but little progreſs, unleſs "he alſo can impoſe on the Florentines; and make "them believe that he is a mighty Stateſman, and a "deep Politician. In this view he boaſts wherever he "comes, that he is writing a political Commentary "upon Tacitus, which will ſurpaſs every thing that "has hitherto been publiſhed on that ſubject." He mortally hated the Inquiſition, and had writ a Letter to the great Duke's Secretary, in which he exclaimed in the ſtrongeſt terms againſt the Inquiſitors, for having obliged him to ſuppreſs certain particulars, which they thought impious and unchriſtian, in his Panegyric. Atheïas quidem ſpecimen vel hodiè panegyricus ejus nobis exhiberet, niſi non pauca, impietatem & omnis Chriſtianæ religionis vacuitatem redolentia Inquiſitores inde ſuſtuliſſent: quod quidem uſque eò Eremitæ doluit, ut Epiſtola Laurentio Uſimbardo magni Ducis Secretario inſcripta dolentiſſimè & rabioſiſſimè in Inquiſitorum ruditatem, barbariem, inſcitiam ac tyrannidem invectus fuerit (18). i. e. "The Panegyric he compoſed would, at this day, "have given us a ſpecimen of his Atheiſm, had not "the Inquiſitors ſuppreſſed a great many particulars in "it that ſavoured ſtrongly of impiety, and a diſregard "for the Chriſtian Religion; which offended Eremita "to ſuch a degree, that in the Letter to Laurence U-"ſimbardo, the great Duke's Secretary, he inveighed "moſt furiouſly againſt their ignorance, their barba-"rity and tyranny." The fear of what was to come, inſpired him with no leſs hatred for this dreadful Tribunal, than the reſentment for what was paſt. He had contracted an ugly diſtemper by his commerce with women; and ſince that he had turned his laſcivious paſſion into another channel. Criminis nomine quàm habeat Eremita, cur ab Inquiſitione metuat, nequaquam ignorant ii, qui eum ſciunt, ex quo ſcabiem ei Gallicam affricuit

Famæ non nimium bonæ puella, Quales in media ſedent Suburra, toti propemodum femineo, & quemadmodum ipſe ſerò cenſet, ſequiori ſexui inimicum eſſe factum, & illud Umbri Callimachi ſuum feciſſe:

Hoſtis ſi quis erit nobis, amet ipſe puellas;
Gaudeat in puero ſi quis amicus erit (19).

He alſo contracted an averſion to women upon the following account. Hearing that a company of female Muſicians were come to Florence, in the time of the great Duke's nuptials, in order to get ſomething by playing on inſtruments, and perhaps alſo by other leſs lawful methods; he went with a rich Sileſian to the houſe where they lodged; and endeavoured, by all the tumultuous and forcible methods poſſible, to get into their bed-chamber; but not ſucceeding, he revenged himſelf by calling them for a long time together, at the door, the worſt names he could think of. The Muſicians complained of this to the great Ducheſs; and ſo much regard was paid to their petition, that Eremita was thrown into priſon; and he would certainly have been ſent to the gallies, had not Scipio de la Scala interceded for him; but at his earneſt entreaty, Eremita was puniſhed only with the ſtrapado (20). Auxit ejus erga mulieres odium, quod propter ipſas non ut prius penalem, ſed pœnè capitalem in fraudem incidiſſe ſe perſenſit. Cum enim Cithariſtrias ſive Fidicinas quaſdam mulieres ſatis ſpecioſas, quæ occaſione nuptiarum magni Ducis ex arte, atque haud ſcio an etiam ex corpore ſuo, quæſtum facturæ Florentiam venerant, in hoſpitio Coronæ divertere accepiſſet, comite Sileſio quodam Equite, eodemque Lutherano, quod is bene nummatus non minùs in ſe lenonem ac perductorem ſuum, quàm in ipſas amicas liberalis forè videretur, ad diverſorium illarum venit, omnique vi diruptis pœnè clauſtris atque valvis, in cubiculum earum ut admitteretur contendit, ac poſtquam nihil profecit, irritus & excluſus oſtium occentare, ac benè diu turpiſſimum ante ædes convicium eis facere non deſtitit (21). But when he had reflected ſeriouſly on the folly and unhappineſs there is for a man to be the cauſe of his being burnt alive, he gave over his purſuit after diſſolute women; and by that means was under no farther apprehenſions of getting the venereal diſeaſe a ſecond time. Mox tamen ut ſatietatem hominis, poſtquam ſe alicubi in magni alicujus amici flore liberi ſauciaſſet, libido diſtenta rurſum tentare cœpit, quod à mala illa Beſtia, quam Vivicomburium dicunt, male metueret, (14) Scioppius, in Opor. Grub. Amphot. Sciopp. pag. 341, 342.

(15) Sciop. ibid. pag. 343.

(16) Ibid. pag. 345.

(17) Idem, ibid.

(18) Ibid. pag. 351, 352.

(19) Ibid. pag. 352.

(20) Cum plus ſemel SURSUM CHORDA ſubductus ac viciſſim dimiſſus fuiſſet nec paulo moleſtiore quam Petronii ſui Eumolpus oſcillationis genere luſiſſet. Sciop. in Opor. Grub. Amphot. Sciopp. pag. 360.

(21) Ibid. pag. 359.

which is ſeen in his account of Germany [F]. The manner of compoſing a Panegyric, which is aſcribed to him, is common to a great number of Orators [G]. The learned Conringius is miſtaken, in ſaying that he lived to old age [H].

There is now printing at Utrecht, ſome pieces of Daniel Eremita, and, among others, the Treatiſe De Aulica & civili vita. They were in manuſcript in the Duke of Florence's Library; and the manuſcript muſt be returned to it, as ſoon as the edition is compleated. Grævius will refute, in the Preface, the ſlanders of Scioppius; a circumſtance he aſſures me of, in a letter with which he honoured me in June 1699, [The title is, Aulicæ vitæ ac Civilis libri IV. Ejuſdem Opuſcula varia. Cura Joannis Georgii Grævii. Ultrajecti 1701, in 8vo. This work of Eremita, was communicated by Magliabecchi to Grævius.... It was very worthy of appearing in print; and the peruſal of it muſt neceſſarily pleaſe, both on account of the purity and elegance of the ſtyle, and the multitude of the examples which are always well choſen and properly introduced; as on account of the ſatyrical Strokes with which it is interſperſed. Father Niceron. pag. 38 vol. 29. Addit. by the Tranſl.] By the way, the words I employed in one of my remarks, viz. I am not to examine in this place, whether Bacchus encroaches more upon Venus, or the latter upon Bacchus (c), prompted a man of genius, and a great traveller to tell me in a letter, that he is ſorry I did not expatiate on this ſubject. He therefore inſiſts upon my treating on it in the ſecond edition of this work; though it ſhould be done in no other view than to refute ret, utcumque in gratiam cum Suburranis puellis rediit, & recidivi Gallicani illius morbi periculum infra fiduciam poſuit, fraudavitque animum diſſidentem (22). As he look'd upon the Hiſtory of our Saviour as fabulous, he took a delight in exclaiming againſt the Inquiſitors and the Clergy; and had a hundred tales ready on that occaſion, to all which he gave a burleſque turn (23). One day Scipio de l'Eſcala exaſperated at the vileneſs of his diſcourſe, gave him a ſtout box on the ear (24). Cum more ſuo Eremita ſcurraretur, & de Inquiſitorum fama atque honore ita, uti dixi, improbiſſime maledicentiſſimeque detrahere nec monitus deſineret, Scaliger, qui tum aderat, ſcurram pugnis & colaphis ita accepit, & os ejus ferreum adeo molle reddidit, ut &c (24). Such is the idea that Scioppius gives us of Eremita. I will not ſay whether it be true or falſe; all I know is, that Scioppius was of a very ſatyrical caſt of mind. But Caſaubon has related ſome particulars (25), which give an air of probability to what is told by Scioppius.

(c) In the remark [F] of this Article, citation (28).

(22) Ibid. pag. 360.

(23) Ibid. pag. 363, 364.

(24) Ibid. pag. 369.

(25) In the remark [C].

[F] He was naturally inclined to ſlander, a proof of which is ſeen in his account of Germany.] The Epiſtle he publiſhed, has pretty much of the ſatyrical caſt. Conringius does not ſay, whether the ſlander that is found in it againſt ſome Courts of the Empire be falſe; but he owns that they make one bluſh. Nonnihil illa Epiſtola ſimile quid habet famoſis literis, ſiquidem quædam de Germanicis Principibus eorumque aulis ſcripſit, quæ pudorem incutiunt. An falſo an vero ſcripſerit animo, neſcio (26). I have already mentioned the reproaches which Scioppius made to Eremita, viz. his having diverted the Italians with ſtories relating to the carouzing of the Germans. It is a conſolation to the Italians, againſt whom a thouſand Satyrs are written with regard to laſciviouſneſs, to contraſt their ſobriety with the drunkenneſs of the Northern people, whence their inclination to Satyr ariſes: and methinks that even religious controverſies have ſometimes employed theſe mutual reproaches. It cannot be denied, but that the Chriſtians of Europe are addicted to two great vices, drunkenneſs and uncleanneſs. The former of theſe is predominant in cold countries, and the latter in hot climates. Bacchus and Venus have divided theſe Nations under their reſpective Empires. The Reformation having divided this part of Chriſtendom into two parts, that which is under the dominion of Venus continues in its former condition; but the greateſt part of the portion ſubject to Bacchus has thrown off the Papal yoke. Hence it is that the Spaniards and Italians are more apt to exclaim againſt drunkenneſs, and impute it to the Northern Nations as a great crime (27); as tho' this could ſerve as a compenſation with regard to the crimes relating to uncleanneſs; and prevent one Religion from filencing the other, by reproaching it with a diſſoluteneſs of conduct. I am not to examine in this place, whether Bacchus encroaches upon Venus, or the latter upon Bacchus (28). It is enough for me that I have explained, by a ſhort Commentary, the flattery of Daniel Eremita. Caſaubon and Scioppius, ſo oppoſite in all other reſpects, would have eaſily agreed on the features proper to be employed in Eremita's picture. Homo procax & dicax, according to Caſaubon (29), quales eſſe ſolent qui per gradus Syncretiſmi in apoſtaſiam labuntur. i. e. "He is a domineering, abuſive fellow, as thoſe commonly are, who are gradually brought to apoſtacy "by bad company."

(26) Conringius, Diſſert. MSS. Rerum PP. apud Magirum, Eponymol. pag. 320.

(27) I am informed that a Flemiſh Monk told his auditors in a Sermon, that God would judge drunkenneſs, according to the idea which the Spaniards and Italians form of that vice; and uncleanneſs, according to the notion which the northern Nations entertain of it

(28) See the remark [I].

(29) Epiſt. 458. pag. 551. apud Magirum, Eponymolog. pag. 321. I cite in this manner, becauſe this does not agree with the edition employed by me.

[G] The manner of compoſing a Panegyrick, which is aſcribed to him, is common to a great number of Orators.] The method was this, to peruſe attentively the ancient Panegyriſts; to collect their phraſes and thoughts, and afterwards apply them to the ſubject which the Orator deſigned to applaud. This method is uſed by multitudes of people. There are very few ſubjects of applauſe but are found in the ancient Panegyriſts. Pliny has exhauſted moſt of the ideas with regard to the perfections of a Monarch. An Orator ſeldom enquires in theſe times, whether the Prince he is deſirous of applauding, is endued with qualities which are ſo finely expreſſed by the ancients? He is ſuppoſed to poſſeſs them; the thoughts and terms give the writer very little pains after ſuch a ſuppoſition; they being ready made to his hand in other Panegyricks: the only trouble is, to make a few alterations according to time and place. Eremita, if his adverſary may be credited, would have been greatly puzzled had he been obliged to write a ſecond Panegyric a little after the firſt; for he had therein exhauſted all his collections, and it would have required a conſiderable time, in order for him to gather new flowers. Scioppius's Latin is worthy of being quoted on this occaſion. Quoniam à multis jam annis legendis Panegyricarum Orationum ſcriptoribus vetuſtis, itemque Martialis, Auſonii & ſimilium præfatiunculis pedeſtri ſermone contextis, quaſdam ſententiarum verborumque argutiolas floreſque laborioſè comportârat, Magni Ducis & Magdalenæ Auſtriacæ nuptias occaſionem ſuam ratus eſt, qua ſuam facundiam iis, qui patricias artes iſtas ac ſolemnem Criticaſtris hodiernis ſucum ignorant, venditaret. Edidit ergo panegyricum, in quo omnem ſuam ſcientiam ita conſumpſit, ut ſi repentè nec opinanti novæ alicujus Orationis ſcribendæ neceſſitas impoſita fuiſſet, omnino jejunus, ſiccus, nuduſque, & ab omni cum verborum . . . tum ſententiarum quoque inſtrumento flagitioſiſſime imparatus futurus fuerit &c (30). i. e. "By ſtudying for ſeveral "years the ancient Writers on Panegyricks, and the "Prefaces of Martial, Auſonius and ſuch like, in "proſe, he had collected with great labour ſome pret"ty good turns both with regard to words and pe"riods. The marriage of the great Duke with "Magdalen of Auſtria, was in his opinion the beſt "opportunity he could meet with, to put off his elo"quence to ſuch as are not acquainted with thoſe "patrician artifices, and the uſual falſe colouring of "little criticks. He therefore publiſhed his Panegy"ric, in which he ſo far exhauſted his knowledge, "that had he been obliged unexpectedly and ſuddenly "to compoſe a new Oration, he would have been flat, "jejune, and moſt ſadly at a loſs both for words as "as the turn of his periods."

(30) Scioppius, in Opor. Grub. Amphot. Scioppi, pag. 338.

[H] Conringius is miſtaken, in ſaying he lived to old age.] Scaliger and Caſaubon ſpeak of him as a young man in 1603 (31). As therefore he died in 1613, Conringius could not ſay that he lived to be an old man (32).

(31) See the Remarks [B] and [C].

(32) Diu in Italia vixit, ibique in aula Florentina tandem conſenuit. i. e. "He lived "many years in "Italy, and at "laſt grew old "in the court of "France." Conring. Diſſert. MSS. Rerum PP. apud Magir. Eponymol. pag. 320.

fute certain aſſertions which were often advanced to him in Spain and Italy. It will not be poſſible abſolutely to treat ſo largely as I could have done on this ſubject, nor can I abſolutely refuſe his requeſt. The Reader will find below ſome collections and notes relating to the hints which he was pleaſed to communicate to me [I]. Moſt impartial and [I] Some Collections and Notes which relate to the hints he was pleaſed to communicate to me.] He writes to me, that being in thoſe parts of Europe where the Romiſh Religion is moſt triumphant, it was an agreeable amuſement to him, to point out the horrid laſciviouſneſs which prevails in thoſe countries. People perceived that he deſigned to draw ſome conſequences from it, to the advantage of the Proteſtants; and accordingly they made the following obſervations to him, viz. that he was miſtaken; that Religion had nothing to do in this matter; that the vices in queſtion are owing to the climate, not to the Religion; that ſhould the Proteſtant Religion be profeſſed in Italy, the people of that country would be ſtill addicted to the ſame vices in which they now immerſe themſelves; and that the ſame reflection muſt be made with regard to the Northern Countries, ſhould they turn Proteſtant. It was added, that the Roman Catholicks in Germany were as great drinkers as the Proteſtants of that Country; and that tho' there is ſo wide a difference between the Religion of the Poles and that of the Muſcovites, yet both are notoriouſly fond of drinking to exceſs (33). That be this matter how it would, an allowance ought to be made. Forgive us, ſaid they, our fault, for the ſake of our ſobriety, and we'll overlook your vice of drunkenneſs; you'll be gainers by this exchange; for it is not in favour of the chaſtity of the Northern countries that we ſhall wink at bacchanalian exceſſes. This chaſtity is a mere chimæra. People are as laſcivious in the Northern Countries as in thoſe of the South; and the only advantage which the former might gain, would relate only to a certain unnatural vice; for the other is as predominant in the colder countries as in Italy. To prove this paradox, the effect of high feeding and drinking of good wine was inſiſted on. It was confeſſed that fleſh is more juicy in hot climates, and that it diffuſes over the whole body, more expeditiouſly and more copiouſly, its ſpirituous particles; theſe particles detach themſelves eaſily from the groſs and terreſtrial parts by digeſtion and circulation; the ſun has already done half the work before the ſtomach begins to act. But then, what is wanting in the quality of aliments in cold countries, is made up by the quantity. There people eat heartily, and drink ſtill more in proportion: The inhabitants of hot countries take but little ſuſtenance; and inſtead of wine drink cooling liquors; and by this means they leſſen as much the ſtrength and fire of Venus, as the others increaſe it by hard drinking. The Gentleman who writes me theſe particulars was very much ſurprized to hear ſuch arguments; and as by his travels, which are infinitely more conſiderable than thoſe of Ulyſſes, he inherited the elogium that was beſtowed on this Grecian Prince (34), i. e. his having contraſted the manners of various Nations; he could not bear to hear any perſon refer him to experience. Enquire about this matter, ſaid they to him, of thoſe who have travelled into cold countries; they will tell you, that they there found the fair ſex much more frail and not ſo obdurate, as in hot countries. They themſelves were ſurprized at the rapidity of the conqueſts they made; a fair-one indulged their ſofteſt wiſhes the very firſt time the queſtion was put to her: and this obliged them to give the good advice following, with the inſtructions they give to thoſe who travel into thoſe countries; When ſome inconveniency or other important cauſe ſhall prohibit your improving the opportunity, be ſure you don't preſs your ſuit with the ardour of a man who is earneſt to be gratified in what he deſires; for you would be taken at the firſt word, and the ſhame and reproach would fall to you. Some pretend, added he, that this eaſe in granting the laſt favour was not owing to lewdneſs, but to a ſimple, indolent and good-natur'd turn of mind. But this is all a miſtake; for ſhould you go to rob them of their money, you would find them amazingly vigorous and reſolute. . . . You muſt not pretend to impoſe upon me, replied my traveller: I know how the affair ſtands; and all the inſtances you have given are entirely falſe. This is the ſubſtance of his Letter; and here follow my compilations and remarks.

I. I will firſt cite a paſſage from Sorbiere, in which the toleration allowed in Rome to brothels, is compared to that which is allowed to drunkenneſs in Holland. This was one of the particulars which Sobiere anſwered, to invalidate the hope that was entertained, viz. that his viſiting Rome would be the occaſion of his returning to the proteſtant communion. "The errors and vices "of ſome particular men, ſays he, ought not to reflect "an odium on the public in general; nor the licentiouſneſs of certain governments on the ſeverity which "is obſerved in the Courts of Conſcience, where "thoſe things are condemned which the maxims of a "wiſe government do not allow to puniſh corporally, "with ſo much rigour. You are not to doubt, Sir, "but that what I here obſerve to you, and which you "ſeem to have reproached Italy with, has been ex"amined over and over, and that by worthy old men "who had no intereſt to connive at theſe things; and "that had human things been ſuſceptible of that per"fection to which you juſtly wiſh they were carried, "endeavours would have been uſed to raiſe them to it. "But men in all Countries are fired with vicious in"clinations and particular irregularities which it is "very hard to reform without running the hazard of "depraving ſome other things which are whole and "uncorrupt. And this is in my opinion the reaſon, "why ſobriety, in all the northern countries, is look"ed upon as an inconſiderable virtue; or at leaſt drun"kenneſs is tolerated in them, and perhaps paſſes for "gallantry, and the effect of indiſpenſible civility: "which, however, muſt not make you imagine, that "true Religion has taken its refuge in thoſe countries. "I am ſenſible that the Proteſtant Miniſters exclaim "againſt that vice: but nevertheleſs the Magiſtrate "tolerate it, and fancy, with ſome ſhew of reaſon, "that were not this vice winked at in thoſe parts of "the world, men would grow unſociable; as in other "places, ſome vices are tolerated for fear of opening "a door to greater." Courcelles, an Arminian Profeſſor at Amſterdam, refuted this, from the following reaſons among others; "That there is a wide "difference between conniving at a vice which it is "impoſſible to eradicate; and authorizing it by laws or "leave from the Magiſtrate (35)." And that among Proteſtants, the offices of Magiſtrate and Prieſt are not joyned in the ſame perſon, as in the Pope.

II. I obſerve in the ſecond place, that they who accuſe the inhabitants of the cold countries of being as luſtful as thoſe of hot climates, leave them a great advantage, ſince they except a certain unnatural ſin. But this advantage did not ſatisfy in a diſpute that broke out between a German and an Italian. The former pretended, that even with regard to fornication in general, Italy was more diſſolute. Lepidâ eſt inter Italum & Germanum altercatio . . . . ille nimiam hanc bibendi conſuetudinem, tanquam probroſam objiciebat, iſte inconceſſam Venerem exprobrarat, tanto perniciofiorem ebrietate, quanto leges ſeveriores in eam latæ. Sed elegans Epigramma apponam:

Ut nos vina juvant, ſic vos Venus improba vexat, Propoſita eſt Veneri Julia, nulla mero (36).

That is,

"There is a pleaſant conteſt between an Italian and "a German: . . . . the former declared that the cuſ"tom of drinking to exceſs was infamous; and the "latter exclaimed againſt unlawful love, by ſo much "the more pernicious than drunkenneſs, as the laws "made againſt it were more ſevere; but I ſhall add "an elegant Epigram.

"As wine delights us, women is your curſe;
"No Julian Law's enacted 'gainſt the grape.

III. It is certain that ſome travellers have carried their ſlander ſo far, as to publiſh, that women are not over virtuous in cold countries, and are ſoon prevailed upon to indulge their favours. I ſhall cite but one

(33) See Matthias à Michow, lib. 2. cap. 3. de Sarmatia Europæa.

(34) Πολλῶν δ' ἀνθρώπων ἴδεν ἄστεα καὶ νόον ἔγνω. Homer. Odyſſ. lib. 1. ver. 3. See alſo Horat. de Arte Poetic. ver. 142. where he has thus tranſlated this Greek verſe of the Odyſſey; Qui mores hominum multorum vidit & urbes. i. e. "Muſe "ſpeak the man, "who ſince the "ſiege of Troy, "So many towns "ſuch change of "manners ſaw." Roſcommon's Tranſlation.

(35) Courcelles, Réponſe à Sorbiere, pag. 16.

(36) Dempſterus, Paralipom. ad Roſinum de Antiq. Romanis, lib. 5. cap. 30. pag. m. 866.

and diſintereſted perſons will readily ſubſcribe to this aſſertion, viz. that lewdneſs is

French Gentleman, whoſe Memoirs were lately printed at Amſterdam. It is no unuſual thing, ſays he (37), to meet with handſome women in Denmark; The country women are generally very beautiful; and moſt of the young laſſes have an eaſy air, a ſprightly behaviour, and a lovely countenance. . . . They ſet off their hair in large rolls. . . . Their fair treſſes are well adapted to inſpire an amorous Poet with new Epithets. The virtue of the Daniſh women ſeems made for their beauty; I mean, that they indulge the uſe of it, and do not ſuffer it to lie as a uſeleſs treaſure. However, this is not the effect of a vicious inclination in them; it is an indolent eaſineſs of temper; and I am perſuaded that the only reaſon of their frailty is, their not having ſtrength of mind ſufficient to keep the men at a proper diſtance. To this we may oppoſe the teſtimony of another Frenchman, who aſſerts that the Daniſh women are ſo grave and modeſt, that they do not give their ſuitors the leaſt hopes. They do not (ſays he) lay any ſnare for the eyes; they do not ſhew either their neck or hair, they have nothing of the coquet in their gait or mien. Here follows his Latin, which expreſſes the whole with greater ſtrength. Cæterùm illæ ſua nimia gravitate atque modeſtia omnem amorem, & familiaritatis ſpem, & occaſionem excludunt. Nullæ ibi prætereuntium oculis inſidiæ tenduntur; nullum eſt incedendi, aut vibrandi ſeſe lenocinium; non pectus detegunt, non capillos criſpant, ac ne oſtendunt quidem (38). This Writer is the more worthy of credit in this, as he on other occaſions has ſpoke ſo freely of the incontinence of the Northern nations. He levels his ſatyrs principally againſt Eccleſiaſticks. He tells us (39), that an old Swediſh Miniſter, after having emptied his large bowl ſeveral times, grew ſo very jocund, that he at laſt ſung ſeveral very lewd ſongs. This Miniſter was a man of learning, and had a daughter who ſpoke Latin. He uſed to dally with other men's wives, tho' his own was living. The Author accompanies this with a reflection, which is, that Luther is miſtaken in his aſſertion viz. that marriage is a means to bridle the luſt of Prieſts. Deprehendimus hujuſmodi homines, tametſi litteratos, & ſenes, & in oculis omnium poſitos, cùm ſive vino, ſive cerviſiâ incaluerunt, non in ineptas tantum voces, ſed in turpes etiam atque inceſtas efferri. Circumferatur (inquiebat ille) cantharus: adducatur virgo nuda. Atque hoc carmen canens repetebat, addebatque, en inquit, cantilena quam juvenes perſonabamus. Didicimus poſtea, illum hâc etiam ætate petulco more in oves ſuas inſilire. At enim uxorem habebat, in quam libidinem iſtam deſpumare poterat. I nunc, & Luthero crede, nefandorum ſacerdotum laſciviam matrimonio compoſci poſſe (40). But the Author does not ſtop in ſo noble a career, he adding many particulars to his firſt remark. It is inexpreſſible, ſays he, how ſtrongly moſt of thoſe men are fired with a paſſion for wine and women. Mirum eſt quantum hæc tam potus, quam concubitus libido in pleriſque his hominibus ardeat (41). The fact is notorious with regard to the firſt aſſertion; de potu manifeſtum eſt; and I have obſerved, with reſpect to the ſecond, that there is nothing they inculcate more ſtrongly to the moſt chaſte Divines, than the neceſſity they are under of taking wives, in caſe they are deſirous of leading a chaſte and pious life. De altero verò obſervavi, nihil magis caſtiſſimis Theologis inculcari, quàm hanc matrimonii neceſſitatem omnibus, qui caſtè, ac piè vivere cupiant, eſſe ſubeundam. Hanc doctrinam adoleſcentulis ipſis, qui nondum puberes ſunt, & nondum de Venere cogitant, in infimis ſcholis inſinuant (42). They inſtill this doctrine in the loweſt claſſes to children, who being very young, have no thoughts of love. They ſpread among the people viz. that Pope Urban VIII intends to marry, and that all the Cardinals will follow his example in that particular. Eò denique amentiæ ac impudentiæ devenerunt perverſiſſimi Doctores, ut apud populum rumores ſpargant, Urbanum hunc VIII. Pontificem Romanum de uxore ducenda cogitare, idemque conſilium omnium Cardinalium animos ſubiiſſe; quam ſtolidiſſimam fabulam non in hac modo Suecia, quæ longius ab hominibus abeſt, ſed jam in ipſa Dania audieramus (43). Is not this inſinuating that according to theſe Doctors, the reformation of the Church would be made under unhappy Auſpices, ſhould it not begin with aboliſhing of Celibacy, and by celebrating the marriage of the Pope and the Members of the Sacred College? And is not this pretending, that theſe very Doctors find themſelves ſo very incapable of abſtaining from women, that they think it is impoſſible to live chaſtly without marrying? But we will again hear Mr. Ogier. Another Miniſter, ſays he, excuſing himſelf, becauſe he was not able to lodge us as commodiouſly as he would have done, gave as his reaſons, that fortune was very cruel, and life was grown a burden to him. Being aſked what was the motive of his affliction, he replied, it is becauſe my wife is dead. Suas quippe fortunas pene eſſe ſubverſas vitamque ſibi inviſam: cum rogarem, quid rei eſſet: uxorem, inquit, non habeo amplius (44). I ſuppoſe, ſays Mr. Ogier, that you are not allowed to marry a ſecond wife. The Miniſter anſwered, yes; I may marry again, but alas! (here he fetched a deep ſigh) I muſt ſtay till my mourning's out, that is, a long, long twelvemonth. The Author adds, that when he conſiders what he has ſeen and enquired into, it is his opinion, that the law which obliges Prieſts to celibacy, is the only obſtacle that prevents their uniting with the Church of Rome: Hanc ſolum matrimonii & concubii obicem eos à noſtra communione dividere. When ſuch diſadvantageous things, with regard to continence, are told by him of the Swedes, ought not he to be credited in what he advances with reſpect to the chaſtity of the Daniſh women? It was therefore juſt in me to contraſt Mr. Ogier to the Chevalier Beaujeu. I confeſs that a ſpecious objection may be made to me. Mr. Ogier ſpeaks of matters as he found them in 1634, and the other of what he ſaw in 1679. Such an interval is more than ſufficient to change the whole face of things in the article of faſhions and decorums. Such modes as tend to the ſuppreſſion of the laws of auſterity and modeſty, make ſo rapid a progreſs, that a traveller who viſits a country twice, thinks himſelf conveyed into a new world; for when he compares the conduct of young maidens and wives to that of their mothers, the one ſeems as different from the other as light is from darkneſs.

IV. Generally ſpeaking, no ſolid anſwer can be made with reſpect to the objection raiſed by the Italians, viz. that wine and high feeding excite to uncleanneſs. This is the conſtant doctrine of the old Heathens and antient fathers of the Church, and it is confirmed by the experience of all ages and nations. There is nothing that monaſtic Writers recommend more ſtrongly, to thoſe who are devoted to a life of celibacy, than faſting and abſtinence. Tertullian exaggerated moſt things, and he at laſt proceeded ſo far as to condemn ſeveral kind of aliments, and to inſiſt more than he ought to have done on the eating of dry meats. He nevertheleſs cannot be accuſed of having had recourſe to hyperbole, when he has obſerved the affinity there is between gluttony and uncleanneſs, by making us attend to the ſituation of the organs. But it will be better to give this in the language written by him. Monſtrum haberetur libido ſine gula, cum duo hæc tam unita atque concreta ſint, ut ſi disjungi omnino potuiſſent, ipſi prius ventri pudenda non adhærerent. Specta corpus & una regio eſt. Denique pro diſpoſitione membrorum ordo vitiorum: prior venter, & ſtatim cetera ſaginæ ſubſtructa laſcivia eſt: per edacitatem ſalacitas tranſit (45). Clemens Alexandrinus obſerves, that ſuch as are deſirous of not raiſing the paſſion for venery, ought not to eat fleſh; and he quotes an Author who ſays, that wine and fleſh invigorate the body, but weaken the mind. Τάχ' ἄν τις τῶν γνωσικῶν, ϗ ἀσκήσεως χάριν σαρκοφαγίας ἀπόχοιτο, ϗ τῦ μὴ σφριγᾶν περὶ τὰ ἀφροδίσια τὴν σάρκα. Οἶνος γάρ, φησιν Ἀνδροκύδης, ϗ σαρκῶν ἐμφορήσεις, σῶμα μὲν ῥωμαλέον ἀπεργάζονται, ψυχὴν ϑ νοχαλεστέραν (46). We meet with ſeveral ſentences in the Greek Poets of the like import. Peruſe what Eraſmus ſays on the Proverb Sine Cerere & Baccho friget Venus (47). It was thought eſpecially that wine excited to luſt, and for this reaſon Ariſtophanes called it the milk of Venus (48). The antient Romans forbid, with the utmoſt ſeverity, their women the uſe of wine, they looking upon it as an incentive to adultery: Vini uſus olim Romanis feminis ignotus fuit, ne ſcilicet in aliquod dedecus prolaberentur: quia proximus à Libero patre intemperantiæ gradus ad inconceſſam Venerem eſſe conſuevit (49). Martial deſcribing the ſordid life of a certain perſon, ſays, among other

EFFECTS of drinking with regard to uncleanneſs.

(37) Mémoires du Chevalier de Beaujeu. lib. 1. cap. 2. pag. 58. edit. Amſterdam 1700.

(38) Carolus Ogerius, in Itinere Danico, pag. 34, 35.

(39) Idem, in Itinere Suecico, pag. 209.

(40) Idem, ibid.

(41) Idem, ibid.

(42) Idem, ibid.

(43) Idem, ibid. pag. 210.

(44) Idem, ibid.

(45) Tertull. de Jejun. cap. 1. pag. 544.

(46) Clem. Alexand. Strom. lib. 7. pag. 718. C.

(47) It is the 97th of the 3d Cent. of Chil. 2.

(48) Athen. lib. 10. pag. 444.

(49) Val. Max. lib. 2. cap. 1. num. 5. pag. m. 134.

is not ſo flagrant in the northern countries, as in thoſe of the ſouth.

ERPENIUS

other particulars, that when wine heated him, the only object of his choice was a country woman.

Villica vel duri compreſſa eſt nupta coloni,
Incaluit quoties ſaucia vena mero (50).
That is,

" As often as his veins were fir'd by wine,
" He, with the Farmer's wife, wou'd quench his " flame."

(50) Mart. Epig. 66. lib. 4.

The Thracians were antiently ſtigmatized, as a people equally abandoned to drunkenneſs and impurity; Fuiſſe apud Thracas (Alcibiadem) homines vinolentos rebuſque venereis deditos (51). Theſe are Cornelius Nepos's words. One of his Commentators (52) has collected a pretty great number of authorities, to prove the connection between theſe two vices. He cites a ſcholiaſt (53) who ſays, that the tradition of the Phallus, aſſociated to Bacchus, was grounded on this reaſon, viz. that acts of venery are a conſequence of wine. He did not omit Agrippina, that abominable woman, who, to preſerve her authority, endeavoured to engage the Emperor her ſon in an inceſtuous commerce. She uſed to take her time when he had intoxicated himſelf with liquor; and it was then ſhe uſed to appear before him in the moſt alluring dreſs, and make the firſt advances (54).

(51) Cornel. Nep. in Vita Alcibiad. ſub fin.

(52) Janus Gebhardus.

(53) That of Ariſtophanes in Acharn.

(54) See Tacit. Annal. lib. 14. cap. 2.

All theſe particulars favour thoſe who pretend, that uncleanneſs is as predominant in cold countries as in thoſe of the South; for 'tis certain that the Northern Nations eat much more meat, and drink much more wine than in any other parts of the world. Even the ſtrongeſt wines are not thought ſufficient; they conſume a prodigious quantity of brandy, and are very careful to eat heartily of ſuch aliments as heat the body. Theſe are great obſtacles to chaſtity. What idea can we entertain of thoſe young women in Flanders, who, with bumpers in their hands, drink down the Officers in garriſon among them (55)?) Should I grant that their heads are ſo ſtrong, that they can drink a great deal without being intoxicated; is this a proof that it is ſtrong enough to keep them from a temptation of another kind? There is juſt reaſon to fear, that the ſtrength of the upper part is the weakneſs of the lower. And what is more likely, than the anſwer which we are told one of theſe tippling Heroines made to an Officer? Were we as powerful in the Art of Love, as in that of drinking, you would not gain ſo many conqueſts as you do in this country. Had they read Ovid, they would have known that the bottle has been long conſidered as a promoter of Cupid's ſoft delights.

(55) See the Fureterieana, pag. 177, & ſeq. Dutch edit.

Dant etiam poſitis aditum convivia menſis:
Eſt aliquid, præter vina, quod inde petas.
Sæpe illic poſiti, teneris adducta lacertis
Purpureus Bacchi cornua preſſit amor.
Vinaque cum bibulas ſparſere Cupidinis alas,
Permanet, & capto ſtat gravis ille loco.
Ille quidem pennas velociter excutit udas:
Sed tamen & ſpargi pectus amore nocet.
Vina parant animos, faciuntque caloribus aptos;
Cura fugit, multo diluiturque mero.
. . . . . .
. . . . . .
Illic ſæpe animos juvenum rapuere puellæ:
Et Venus in vinis, ignis in igne fuit (56).

(56) Ovid. de Arte Amat. lib. 1. ver. 229, & ſeq.

" In Feaſts, as at our Shows, new means abound,
" More pleaſure there than that of Wine is found.
" The Paphian Goddeſs there her ambuſh lays,
" And Love betwixt the horns of Bacchus plays.
" There Cupid's purpled wings no flight afford,
" But wet with Wine he flutters on the board,
" He ſhakes his pinions, but he cannot move,
" Fix'd he remains, and turns a maudlin Love.
" Wine warms the blood, and makes the ſpirits flow;
" Care flies, and wrinkles from the forehead go.
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
" Love ſparkles in the cup, and fills it higher,
" Wine feeds the flames, and fuel adds to fire.
Dryden.

A German Author whom I have cited, gives a teſtimony in favour of the pretenſions of the Italians. He obſerves two things: the one, that wine is the forerunner and ſtrong promoter of luxury; the other, that the coldneſs of the air increaſes the ſtrength of that paſſion, by turning inwards the heat of the whole body; and that wine is like an oil, which being poured on the internal fire, raiſes a much ſtronger flame. His words are theſe (57): Ebrietatis pediſſequa eſt Libido, Bacchuſque certus Veneris hortator & armiger Apuleio appellatur, neque fortius homines in Venerem ſtimulantur, quàm cum mero alioque generoſiore potu incaluerunt . . . . . Alterum (frigido cœlo eſſe natum) intendendam ad libidinem non minimum conferre norunt omnes, præſertim cum interiore parte per frigus cohibitus calor vini, quaſi ſuffuſo oleo, gravius ſuccendatur (58). Another German (59) bewails the corruption which prevails in certain Colleges among Students, and ſays that 'tis chiefly found in Suevia vinoſa.

(57) Janus Gebhardus, Not. ad Cornel. Nepot. in Alcib. num. 67. pag. m. 154.

(58) Idem, ibid. pag. 155.

(59) Lyſerus, in Polygamia triumphat. pag. 352.

V. But here follows a circumſtance which does not favour the pretenſions of the Italians. People drink to too great exceſs in the Northern countries, and thereby overthrow what a chearful glaſs had raiſed. The evil itſelf affords a remedy; for it is certain that a man who is a little intoxicated has the ſtronger inclination to violate the law of chaſtity; 'tis no leſs true, that a perſon who is quite drunk, has no great diſpoſition that way. Ovid, who could lay down Aphoriſms on this ſubject as juſt as thoſe of Hippocrates, ſhall be my Voucher here.

Quid tibi præcipiam de Bacchi munere, quæris?
Spe brevius monitis expediere meis.
Vina parant animum Veneri, ni plurima ſumas;
Ut ſtupeant multo corda ſepulta mero.
Nutritur vento, vento reſtinguitur ignis.
Lenis alit flammam, grandior aura necat.
Aut nulla ebrietas, aut tanta ſit, ut tibi curas
Eripiat: ſi qua eſt inter utramque, nocet (60)

(60) Ovid. de Rem. Amoris, ſub fin. ver. 805.

" If my opinion you would have of wine,
" It quenches love, and does to love incline.
" A little breath of wind but fans the fire,
" Whoſe flame will in a greater blaſt expire.
" In wine you muſt no moderation keep;
" You muſt not drink at all; or drink ſo deep,
" So large a doſe, as puts your cares to ſleep.
Tate.

I ſhall add to this teſtimony that of a Modern, whoſe genius will be admired as long as there are judges in the world, The perſon I mean is Montagne. He obſerved, that the French began to leave off drinking to exceſs. Are we, aſks he (61), reformed in any particular? In none. But perhaps we are much more addicted to fornication than our forefathers. Theſe are two things which reciprocally damp each other's vigour. On one ſide, our ſtomachs have been weakned; and on the other, ſobriety makes us more gallant and alert in the exerciſe of love. It would be an overſight in me not to mention the great Ariſtotle, who declares, that exceſs in drinking debilitates the amorous faculties, and gives the reaſons why they do it. Athenæus takes notice of this, where he ſpeaks of Alexander the Great's drunkenneſs; a vice, ſays he, which perhaps was the cauſe of the little inclination he had to venery (62). Μὴ ποτ' ἂν διὰ τοῦτο καὶ πρὸς τὰ ἀφροδίσια εἶχεν ὁρμήν· ἐξυθρεῦσθαι γάρ φησιν ὁ Ἀριστοτέλης ἐν τοῖς προβλήμασι φυσικοῖς τῶν τοιούτων τὴν γονήν. Ob immoditam forte illam vini appetentiam, ad Venerem ideo proclivis non fuit (Alexander) quoniam, ut explicat Ariſtoteles in quæſtionibus phyſicis, hominum ejuſmodi genitura in aquam eliqueſcat.

(61) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 2. chap. 2. pag. m. 20.

(62) Athen. lib. 10. cap. 10. pag. 434.

VI. Be this as it will, I fancy it cannot be denied but that the vices of the South make a greater progreſs in the North, than the vices of the North make in the South; and conſequently we muſt ſay, that Bacchus does not encroach ſo much upon Venus, as the latter over Bacchus. Drunkenneſs is deteſted, and looked upon as infamous in hot countries. To call a Spaniard a Drunkard, is the moſt ſhocking affront that can be put upon him. I am aſſured that a Lacquey who ſhould

ERPENIUS [A] (THOMAS) a very learned Writer, and excellently ſkilled in the Oriental Languages, was ſon of Gerard John of Erpe and Beatrix de Bye, both deſcended of noble families at Bois-le-Duc, in Brabant, which place they had quitted on account of the Proteſtant Religion, which they had embraced (a). He was born at Gorcum in Holland Sept. the 11th, 1584 [B]; and from his earlieſt years ſhewed a peculiar diſpoſition for learning, which induced his father, who, though no ſcholar himſelf, had a great love for men of learning, to ſend him at ten years of age to Leyden, where he began his ſtudies. He did not continue long at Leyden; for his father removing the year following from Leyden to Middelburg in Zealand, he went with him, but the next year returned to Leyden, that he might have a better opportunity to proſecute his ſtudies, which he did in a ſhort time with ſuch ſucceſs, as extremely ſurprized his Maſters (b). At the age of eighteen he was admitted into the Univerſity of that city, where he took the degree of Doctor of Philoſophy under Rodolphus Snellius on July 8, 1608 (c). He had already paſſed thro' a courſe of Divinity, and gained a conſiderable ſkill in the Oriental Languages, to which he had applied himſelf at the perſuaſion of Joſeph Scaliger, who foreſaw how great a man he would prove in that branch of learning. He afterwards travelled into England [D]. France, Italy, and Germany, in which countries he contracted an acquaintance with the moſt learned men there. He continued a year at Paris, where he gained the friendſhip of Iſaac Caſaubon [E], and learned Arabic of an Egyptian Jacobine, whoſe name was Joſeph Barbatus.

(a) Ger. Johan. Voſſii Oratio in Obitum Tho. Erpenii, habita ſtatim ab Exequiis in Auditorio Theologico, XIII Nov. ann. 1624. & Meurſii, Athenæ Batavæ, lib. 2. pag. 301. edit. Lugduni Batav. 1625, in 4to.

(b) Voſſius, ubi ſupra.

(c) Idem, ibid.

ſhould have been called Drunkard by his Maſter, might carry him before a Magiſtrate for it, and that ſatisfaction would be made him for the injury, altho' ſuch a one patiently ſuffers himſelf (and indeed no redreſs would be given him) to be called Raſcal, Dropgallows, Son of a —— &c. We don't find that fornication is thus treated in any country in the world. Men in the moſt frozen regions indulge as much as they pleaſe in the pleaſures of venery, without drawing the leaſt ſcandal upon themſelves; and ſo far generally ſpeaking are they from bluſhing at their feats, that they glory in them, and ridicule thoſe who abſtain from ſuch delights. The empire of Venus ought not like the earth, to be divided into five zones; one torrid, two temperate, and two frozen: all the zones in this caſe are torrid, with this only difference, that ſome are hotter than others (63). No monarchy was ever more univerſal than this; not a nook in the earth has been exempt from its yoke. There are indeed ſome particular perſons who aſpire to a ſtate of independence, and who even engage themſelves by a vow, not to recognize this ſovereign; and yet theſe are ſometimes the moſt faithful ſubjects of that empire. The Heathens have profeſſedly believ'd, that the monarchy of Venus is more extenſive than that of any other Deity. Heaven was allotted to Jupiter, the ſea to Neptune, and Hell to Pluto; but Venus reigned in all theſe worlds, and all animated nature was her province.

(63) Compare this with the remark [E] of the Article BOREAS.

Illa, quibus ſuperas omnes, cape tela, Cupido,
Inque Dei pectus celeres molire ſagittas,
Cui triplicis ceſſit fortuna noviſſima regni.
Tu ſuperos, ipſumque Jovem, tu numina ponti;
Tartara quid ceſſant? cur non matriſque, tuumque
Victa domas, ipſumque regit qui numina ponti.
Imperium profers? agitur pars tertia mundi.
- - - - - - - - - - - - - -
- - - - - - - - - - - - - -
Dixit Venus. Ille pharetram
Solvit, & arbitrio matris de mille ſagittis
Unam ſepoſuit: ſed quâ nec acutior ulla,
Nec minus incerta eſt, nec quæ magis audiat arcum:
Oppoſitoque genu curvavit flexile cornu,
Inque cor hamata percuſſit arundine Ditem (64).

That is,

" Venus beheld him.....
" And in theſe words the flutt'ring God addreſt.
" O thou, my arms, my glory and my power,
" My ſon, whom men, and deathleſs Gods adore;
" Bend thy ſure bow, whoſe arrows never miſs'd,
" No longer let hell's King thy ſway reſiſt:
" Take him, while ſtraggling from his dark abodes
" He coaſts the Kingdoms of ſuperior Gods.
" If ſovereign Jove, if Gods who rule the waves,
" And Neptune, who rules them, have been thy
" ſlaves,
" Shall hell be free? The tyrant ſtrike, my ſon,
" Enlarge thy mother's Empire, and thy own.
- - - - - - - - - -
" She ſaid; and from his quiver ſtrait he drew
" A dart that ſurely wou'd the buſineſs do.
" She guides his hand, ſhe makes him touch the " teſt,
" And of a thouſand arrows choſe the beſt:
" No feather better pois'd, a ſharper head
" None had; and ſooner none, and ſurer ſped.
" He bends his bow, he draws it to his ear,
" Thro' Pluto's heart it drives, and fixes there.
Maynwaring.

(64) Ovid. Met. lib. 5. ver. 366.

[A] Erpenius.] In Dutch he is called Thomas of Erpe.

[B] Born . . . . Sept. 11th 1584.] Mr. Wood erroneouſly aſſerts (1), that he was born in 1589.

(1) Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 175. 2d edit. London 1721.

[C] At the age of eighteen he was admitted into the Univerſity of that City.] Voſſius informs us (2), that not long after he was admitted a Student here, he grew ſo diffident of ſucceſs in his ſtudies, that he began to relax his former vigour and application to them, and was extremely deſirous of engaging in ſome other employment. But being fearful of diſcovering this to his father, who, as he knew, had deſigned him from his earlieſt years for learning, he was in a very uneaſy ſituation of mind, when he met with Joachim Fortius Ringelbergius Andoverpianus's Book de Ratione ſtudendi (3); which he read over with the utmoſt attention, and was inſpired by it with new zeal for the proſecution of his ſtudies. He made himſelf maſter of the ſeveral branches of Literature, and particularly Metaphyſics; for which purpoſe he read over, not only Ariſtotle, but likewiſe his Interpreters, Aphrodiſienſis, Philoponus, Syrianus, Averroes, Aquinas, Fonſeca, and others, with all the Commentaries of Suarez, in which he was ſo converſant, that ſeveral years after he had gone through his courſe of Philoſophy, and was engaged in other ſtudies, he could give a diſtinct account of the contents of almoſt every page of that vaſt work.

(2) Oratio in Obitum Tho. Erpenii habita ſtatim ab Exequiis in Auditorio Theologico XIII Nov. ann. 1624.

(3) There is an edition of this Treatiſe in a Collection, intitled, H. Grotii & aliorum Diſſertationes de ſtudiis inſtituendis, Amſterdam 1645, in 24°.

[D] He afterwards travelled into England.] As he was but four years in his travels thro' the ſeveral parts of Europe, and returned to Leyden in 1612, Mr. Wood muſt certainly be miſtaken in ſuppoſing (4), that he was a Sojourner in the Univerſity of Oxford about the month of July 1606. Gerard John Voſſius (5) tells us, that at London he became acquainted with Mr. William Bedwell, who was excellently ſkilled in the Oriental Languages, and adviſed our Author to the ſtudy of them.

(4) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(5) Orat. in Obitum Tho. Erpenii.

[E] He gained the friendſhip of Iſaac Caſaubon.] That learned man has ſeveral Letters to Erpenius printed among his Epiſtles. In his Letter dated at Paris the 29th of November 1609, he tells our Author, that his own ſtudies in the Arabic Language were grown cold ſince his departure. Mea ſtudia Arabica poſt tuum diſceſſum frigent. In his Letter dated at Paris 7th of April 1610 he exhorts him to proſecute his ſtudies in the Arabic Tongue, and tells us, that it would be of the greateſt importance to learning. That if he look'd round in all parts of the Chriſtian world, he would find no perſon, who had taken the proper method to gain their point in that kind of Literature. That Joſeph Scaliger had diſappointed their hopes; that Bed-

Barbatus. During his ſtay at Venice, by the aſſiſtance of ſome learned Jews and Turks, he learned the Turkiſh, Perſian, and Ethiopic Languages; and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Italy to ſuch advantage, that he was offered a ſtipend of five hundred Ducats a year to tranſlate ſome Arabic Books into Latin. After four years ſpent in his travels, he returned to Leyden on July the 4th 1612 (d); about which time there was a deſign to have ſent for him into England, and to have allowed him an honourable ſtipend (e); but on the 9th of February the year following, he was choſen by the Curators of the Univerſity of Leyden Profeſſor of the Arabic, and other Oriental Languages, except the Hebrew, well, tho' a man of great learning, proceeded ſo ſlowly, and followed ſuch a courſe of ſtudies, that they knew not what to hope from him; that the German, who made ſo great a noiſe, was not to be depended on; that the Italians, after raiſing a great expectation, had of a ſudden deſerted them. In ſhort, that Erpenius was the only perſon, who had laid a ſolid and firm foundation for a future ſuperſtructure. He encourages him therefore to proceed with vigour, and not to doubt, but that he ſhould have an opportunity, either in his own or ſome other country, of proſecuting thoſe ſtudies to his own and the public advantage. Nemo dubitat ſanus rem eſſe omnium φιλομαθῶν votis expetendam, ut ad linguæ Arabicæ illuſtrationem aliquis ſe accingat, cujus operâ τοῖς φιλάραψι poſſit eſſe uſui & emolumento. Conjice oculos in quamcunque volueris orbis Chriſtiani partem; neminem invenies, qui in iis literis eam viam ſit ingreſſus, quæ ſola ad finem propoſitum perducere eſt idonea. De Chriſtianis hominibus loquor, quorum nomina & conatus nobis innotuerunt. Ὁ τρισμέγιστος Scaliger nos ſimul & ſpem noſtram deſtituit. Beduelus vir doctiſſimus ita lente procedit, & curſum ſtudiorum eum tenuit, ut quid de eo ſperare queamus neſciam. Ille Germanus, qui tanto cum ſtrepitu ſe commovet, συχνὴν eſt ἀπιχουρίαν, quod tu omnium optimè noſti. Itali, poſtquam in ſpem magnam nos erexiſſent, repentè nos deſeruerunt. Tu unus es omnium, qui futuri, volente Deo, ædificii fundamenta jeciſti firma & ſolida. Noli ſpem noſtram fallere; neque dubita vel in patriâ vel alibi terrarum oblatum iri aliquam occaſionem, cum publica utilitate & tua, hæc nobiliſſima ſtudia excolendi. Denique Spartam ἔλαχες, ταύτην κόσμει: aderit Deus inceptis. In another Letter dated at London 5th of April 1611 new ſtyle, he tells our Author, that he wrote now ſo ſoon in anſwer to his Letter, becauſe he imagined, that he was ready to leave Paris; and adviſes him to put an end to his travels, ſince they could not be of any great advantage to his ſtudies. From another Letter of Caſaubon to Erpenius, dated at London July 9, 1612, it appears, that the latter was not long before returned to Leyden. From another letter dated at London June 13, 1613, we find, that Caſaubon had then ſeen Erpenius's Notes on Franciſcus Raphelingius's Lexicon Arabicum. In another Letter dated at London 29th of January 1614 he entreats our Author to publiſh the Arabic Hiſtory of the Patriarch of Alexandria; and expreſſes his joy for the edition, which he was preparing of the Arabian Proverbs.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Meurſius, pag. 301.

[F] Publiſh'd a great many excellent works, which ſpread his reputation over all the world.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them: I, Annotationes ad Lexicon Arabicum Franciſci Raphelengii. Leyden 1613 in 4to. Theſe Annotations are printed with Raphelengius's Arabic Lexicon. II, Grammatica Arabica. Leyden 1613 in 4to. Cum Lokmanni Fabulis & aliquot Adagiis, Arabicè & Latinè. Leyden 1636 in 4to. Cum Lokmanni fabulis ex editione Golii, qui addidit Carmen Abul Olai, aliquot Suratas Alcorani, & alia quædam ad Praxim. Arabicè & Lat. Leyden, 1656 in 4to. III, Proverbiorum Arabicorum Centuriæ II, Arabicè & Latinè, cum Scholiis Joſephi Scaligeri & Thomæ Erpenii. Leyden 1614 in 4to, and 1623 in 8vo. Joſeph Scaliger having tranſlated and illuſtrated with Notes part of the Arabian Proverbs, after his death, Caſaubon engaged Erpenius to compleat that work. Erpenius refuſed for a long time, alledging, that he could not pretend to put himſelf upon a level with that great man. But Caſaubon urged him ſo importunately, that he at laſt complied; and not only finiſhed what had been begun, but likewiſe corrected a great number of errors, which had eſcaped Scaliger. He compleated this work during his firſt reſidence in France; but he did not commit it to the preſs till he had concluded his travels, and was returned to his own country. Dr. Thomas Hyde (6) has expreſſed himſelf very erroneouſly, when among the works of Joſeph Scaliger he places Scholia ad Erpenii Proverbia Arabica. Lugd. Bat. 1623, 8vo; which ſeems to inſinuate, as if Scaliger had written Notes on a work of Erpenius, whereas the contrary is the caſe. But Dr. Hyde in another place (5) has given the title of this Book right. IV, Lokmanni Fabulæ & ſelecta quædam Arabum Adagia, cum Interpretatione Latina & Notis. Leyden 1615 in 8vo. Amſterdam 1636 and 1656 in 4to, with the Arabic Grammar abovementioned. V, Giarumia Grammatica de centum Regentibus, ſive Linguæ Arabicæ particulis, Arabicè & Latinè cum Notis. Leyden 1617 in 4to, 1636 in 4to. Giarumia is an Arabic Grammar, which takes its name from its Author, and is highly eſteemed in Aſia and Africa. It had already been printed at Rome at the Printing-Houſe of the Medicis in very beautiful characters, but ſo incorrectly, that Erpenius was obliged to collate it with four manuſcripts, in order to correct the errors of it. VI, Novum Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti Teſtamentum Arabicè. Leyden 1615 in 4to. The Author of this Arabic Verſion, which is very ancient, is not known. Erpenius was the firſt who publiſhed it from a manuſcript of above three hundred years old. Francis Raphelengius had accurately collated a great part of it, namely, the Acts of the Apoſtles and the Epiſtles, with another manuſcript; and that manuſcript thus collated was in the Library of the Univerſity of Leyden, to which it had been left by Joſeph Scaliger together with a great many other Books in the Oriental Languages. From thence our Author publiſhed it. VII, Hiſtoria Joſephi Patriarchæ ex Alcorano Arabico, Arabicè, cum Verſione Latina & Notis. Leyden 1617 in 4to. This Hiſtory contains ſomething of truth, which Mahomet took from the Scriptures, and a great number of falſities, which he has blended with it. VIII, Canones de Litterarum Evi apud Arabes natura & permutatione. Leyden 1618 in 4to. IX, Rudimenta Linguæ Arabicæ: item Praxis Grammatica, & Conſilium de Studio Arabico feliciter inſtituendo. Leyden 1620 in 8vo. Secunda Editio, Leyden 1628 in 8vo. and Paris 1638 in 8vo. X, Verſio & Notæ ad Arabicam Paraphraſin in Evangelium Joannis. Roſtoch 1629. XI, Grammatica Hebræa generalis, Amſterdam 1621. Geneva 1627. Leyden 1659 in 8vo. XII, Orationes tres de Linguarum Hebreæ atque Arabicæ Dignitate. Leyden 1621 in 8vo. XIII, Pentateuchus Moſis Arabicè. Leyden 1622 in 4to. This Arabic Verſion is ancient, and was made by a Chriſtian. XIV, Georgii Elmacini Hiſtoria Saracenica a Muhamede ad Atabacæum XLIX. Imperatorem, Arabicè & Latinè, cum Notis & Tabulis Geographicis & Genealogicis. Leyden 1625 in fol. Eadem Hiſtoria Latinè tantum cum Notis. It. Arabicè tantum. Leyden 1625 in 4to. This Book was tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed at London 1626. XV, Pſalmi Davidis Syriacè, cum Verſione Latina. Leyden 1625 in 4to. XVI, Grammaticæ Chaldæa & Syra. Amſterdam 1628 in 8vo. Leyden 1659 in 8vo. XVII, De Peregrinatione Gallica utiliter inſtituenda Tractatus. Leyden 1631 in 12mo. XVIII, Præcepta de Lingua Græcorum communi. Leyden 1662 in 8vo. XIX, Arcanum Punctationis revelatum, & Oratio de Nomine Tetragrammato. Leyden 1624 in 4to. He had a deſign to have publiſhed an Edition of the Koran with an accurate Latin Verſion and Notes, and a Confutation of it, where it was neceſſary; and a Theſaurus Grammaticus for the Arabic Tongue, and a Lexicon of the ſame Language; but he was prevented by death from executing theſe deſigns, as we are informed by Mr. Leonard Chappelow in the Preface to his Elementa Linguæ Arabicæ ex Erpenii Rudimentis, ut plurimum, deſumpta. Cujus Praxi Grammaticæ novam legendi Praxin addidit Leonardus Chappelow, Linguæ Arabicæ apud Cantabrigienſes Profeſſor. London 1730 in 8vo. T.

(5) Under Erpenius's Works, pag. 232.

(6) Catalog. impreſſorum Librorum in Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ, pag. 142. of the ſecond part, edit. Oxon. 1674, in fol.

Hebrew, of which there was already a Profeſſor. He filled this chair with great applauſe, and ſoon after ſet up, at extraordinary expence, a Preſs for the Eaſtern Languages, and publiſhed a great many excellent Works, which ſpread his reputation over all the world [F]. Many of his ſcholars afterwards proved great men, particularly Conſtantine L'Empereur, Sixtinus Amama, Adolphus Vorſtius, James Golius, William Merula, Samuel Bochart, and Hadrian Junius. October the 6th 1616 he married Jaquelina Buyes, daughter of a Counſellor in the Court of Holland, by whom he had ſeven children, three of whom ſurvived him (f). In 1619 the Curators of the Univerſity erected a ſecond chair for the Hebrew Language, of which they appointed him Profeſſor (g). In the beginning of the year 1620 he was ſent by the Prince of Orange and the States of Holland into France, to ſollicite Peter du Moulin or Andrew Rivet to undertake the Profeſſorſhip of Divinity at Leyden. And though he prevailed not in that journey, yet he was ſent again the year following; and after ſix months ſtay in France, procured Andrew Rivet, with the conſent of the French Churches, to remove to Leyden. Some time after his return, the States of Holland appointed him their Interpreter, and employed him in tranſlating the letters which they received from the ſeveral Princes of Aſia and Africa (h). In the midſt of theſe employments he was ſeized with a contagious diſeaſe, which was then epidemical; and being carried to Leyden, died there on the 13th of November 1624, being forty years of age. He was a man of great application, of a lively genius, ſolid judgment, and a very tenacious and comprehenſive memory. The Emperor of Morocco was ſo highly charmed with the purity of his Arabic ſtyle in his Letters, that he ſhewed them to his Nobles, as a prodigious curioſity for their elegance and propriety. He rejected ſeveral advantageous offers which were made to him by ſeveral countries. The King of Spain and the Archbiſhop of Seville invited him into that Kingdom to explain certain Arabic Inſcriptions. His behaviour was ſo engaging, that he inſpired every one with the utmoſt regard for him (i). A great many learned Writers ſpeak of him in the ſtrongeſt terms of commendation (k). Gerard John Voſſius made his Funeral Oration in Latin, printed at Leyden 1625 in 4to; and the ſame year were publiſhed at the ſame place in 4to, Peter Scriverius's Manes Erpeniani, cum Epicediis Variorum. Salmaſius in a Letter to Monſieur Daillé (l), dated at Grigny the 22d of October 1631, obſerves, that he had been ſeveral times aſſured by Grotius, that our Author had a deſign to ſhew, that the Copts held the ſame Faith with the Proteſtants with regard to the Sacrament.

(f) Voſſius and Meurſius, ubi ſupra.

(g) Voſſius, ibid.

(h) Idem, ibid.

(i) Idem, ibid.

(k) See Caſaubon, Epiſt. ad Thuan. 3 Kal. Quintil. 1610. Georg. Hornii, in Præfat. ad Sulpic. Severum; Meric Caſaubon. de quatuor Linguis, pag. 45. Seldeni, Præfat. ad Eutychii Patriarch. Alex. Eccleſ. ſuæ Origin. pag. 7.

(l) See Claudii Salmaſii Epiſtolarum lib. 1. pag. 69. Epiſt. 32. edit. Lugduni Batavor. 1656, in 4to.

ESMENDREVILLE (JOHN du BOSC Lord of), Preſident of the Court of Aids at Roan, was executed with Marlorat a Proteſtant Miniſter, and ſome others, as being one of thoſe who principally occaſioned the reſiſtance which that city made to the arms of the King, in the firſt civil war under Charles IX. (a) He was worthy of a better fate, he having united in his perſon all the exalted qualities that can be deſired in an accompliſhed Magiſtrate. He had been educated like the illuſtrious men of his age, who thirſted to poſſeſs the arts and ſciences, and particularly the Civil Law, which Eſmendreville went and learnt at its fountain-head, in Italy, whither he went for that purpoſe..... "He was admitted Counſellor and Commiſſioner in the Requeſts of the "Pleading Hall at Roan, the laſt day of June 1544; and afterwards appointed ſecond Pre- "ſident of the Court of Aids in the ſame city, the 26th of January 1562, which was the "year of his death; he having been beheaded, and his body hanged upon a gibbet the 1ſt "of November following. (b) He left by N. Guyot his firſt wife, three ſons and two "daughters, who did not inherit any part of his eſtate. Catherine Guerin his ſecond wife, "married afterwards Robert du Tour. Martin du Boſc Lord of Bourneville his younger "brother, who ſerved in the troop of the Vidame of Chartres, obtained by a decree, the "Lordſhip of Eſmendreville; and from him and Iſabella le Moine his wife, Lady of "Surdeval, are deſcended the reſt of the Lords of Eſmendreville. He was a Roman "Catholic; and 'tis he who is mentioned as a great Leaguer, in the Catholicon d'Eſpagne." This is an antient family [A], and from it ſeveral branches have ſprung. The Preſident Eſmendreville

(a) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 878, 879.

(b) Ibid. pag. 881.

[A] This is an antient family.] He was ſon of LEWIS DU BOSC, Lord of Radepont, d'Eſmendreville &c. and his elder brothers were, I. LEWIS DU BOSC Lord of Radepont, from whom are deſcended the Lords of Radepont and Fleuri: 2. ROBERT DU BOSC Lord of Beaumoncel, who left but two daughters. He was grandſon of LEWIS DU BOSC Lord of Radepont, and great grandſon of ROBIN DU BOSC Lord of Eſmendreville, of Branville, &c. whoſe father, WILLIAM DU BOSC Lord of Tendos, of la Chapelle and Eſmendreville, was a hoſtage for King Charles the VIIth in England, and died the firſt of November 1430. He was ſon to WILLIAM DU BOSC Lord of Coquereaumont of Feſcamp, of Eſmendreville &c. who died in 1409, and grandſon of JOHN DU BOSC who died in 1381 and was ſon to MARTIN DU BOSC Lord of Tendos, Lieutenant to the Chief Juſtice in Eyre of Normandy. This Martin died in 1360, and had two other ſons viz. 1ſt. MATTHEW DU BOSC Lord of Breteville, who was father of SIMON DU BOSC, Doctor of the Canon Law, Monk of St. Oüen, Abbot of Jumieges, Chamberlain to the Pope; 2dly, NICOLE (1) DU BOSC Biſhop of Baieux. This Prelate contributed equally to the honour and aggrandizing of his family; for it was he who purchaſed the eſtates of Eſmendreville, Eſpinai, Bois d'Annebout, and other eſtates..... He was firſt Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris, afterwards Biſhop of Baieux in 1374, afterwards firſt Preſident Clerk of the Chamber of Accounts, having a penſion for life of a thouſand livres of Paris. The letters of Creation dated the 13th of February 1398, declare that this employment was given him, to reward his faithful ſervices during forty years. By other letters dated the laſt day of December 1380, he was appointed Counſellor of the King for his Demeſnes and Subſidies, with a ſalary of 1000 gold franks; continuing ſtill (2) firſt Preſident of the Chamber of Accounts. He died the 19th of September 1408. He had been employed on two important

(1) See the Errata of Le Laboureur.

(2) I copy Le Laboureur verbatim, but it is plain there is an error in the figures; for if this Biſhop was created firſt Preſident in 1398, he could not join this employment in 1380, with that of Counſellor with reſpect to the demeſnes.

(c) Mezerai, Hiſt. de Charles IX, pag. 85. of vol. 3. in folio.

Eſmendreville wrote ſome books [B]. Mezerai calls him Jaques du Boſc Mandreville [C]; a zealous Huguenot, added he, who ruined himſelf by his bad oeconomy (c). This laſt circumſtance is related by le Laboureur (d).

(d) Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 879.

tant embaſſies, the firſt into Britany anno 1394 with the Duke of Burgundy; and the other to Ardres in 1381, to negotiate a peace with the Engliſh, he being allowed twelve livres a day for his expences. He was interred in the Chapel of St. Lewis, in the Church of the Franciſcans at Paris (3). See divers branches of this family in le Laboureur.

(3) Extracted from le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 897, & ſeq.

[B] He wrote ſome Books.] During his journey into Italy, "he wrote a Latin Book printed anno 1532, "entitled Joannis Boſchæi Neuſtrii περὶ δικαιογαμίας (4). "Beſides this, he compoſed a treatiſe concerning the "vertues and properties of the number 7, and of the "reaſon why Juſtinian divided his Pandects into ſeven "parts. He therein refutes certain opinions which "he had heard the famous Alciat his contemporary "maintain publickly; and there are ſtill extant ſome "other manuſcript Works of his (5)." Theodore Beza (6) aſcribes to him a Work entitled de Numæ Pompilii ſacris, which generally offended the Roman Catholics.

(4) We read in le Laboureur δικαιογονίας. This work is generally cited under the following title, de Legitimis Nuptiis.

(5) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 2. pag. 878.

(6) Beza, Reſp. ad Balduin. pag. 229 tom. 2. Operum.

[C] Mezerai calls him Jaques du Boſc Mandreville.] Mezerai is often miſtaken in Chriſtian names. With regard to the error of Mandreville inſtead of Eſmandreville, it muſt be aſcribed to this. The Pronunciation is the ſame in moſt Provinces, and is uſed by ſeveral perſons all over the Kingdom, whether we ſay the Preſident de Mandreville, or the Preſident d'Eſmandreville. Thoſe who love accuracy in the moſt minute particulars, do not truſt to the pronunciation, but ſearch for the true orthography of proper names. Thuanus had not made any enquiries on this occaſion, ſince he latinized the name of this Preſident by that of Mantrevilla (7). But this is nothing in compariſon of what is found in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Proteſtant Churches, written by Beza. This Author gives us an account of the proſecution and ſentences pronounced againſt Eſmandreville, Marlorat &c. and calls him for ever Mantreville. Did not the regiſters of theſe proſecutions and ſentences know the true names of theſe criminals, or did Theodore Beza make uſe of an incorrect copy (α)?

(7) Thuan. lib. 33. pag. 668. ad annum 1562.

§ (α) We read Mandreville, Tom. II, pag. 620 of Beza's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; and the Index of this volume ſuppoſes that it is thus read in every part of the volume where mention is made of this ill fated Magiſtrate. He is called Mantreville in the Index to Thuanus, and Mandreville by d'Aubigné, Tom. I. pag. 222, in the laſt Edition of his Hiſtory. But it is probable that people uſed to ſay, indifferently, Mantreville, or Mandreville and Eſmandreville; in like manner as Pâquier, Lib. III, Cap. XXIX, of his Recherches, calls Toute-ville the famous Cardinal who reformed the Univerſity of Paris, called Eſtoteville by Naudé, Cap. VI. of his addition to the Hiſtory of Lewis XI. pag. 192. of the Edition of 1630. CRIT. REM.

ESPAGNE (JOHN D') born in Dauphine, and Miniſter of the French Church in London in the ſeventeenth Century, publiſhed ſeveral little Tracts [A], and one among the reſt intitled, Popular Errors with regard to the general points which relate to the underſtanding of Religion.

He is thought to have explained very happily the doctrine of the Euchariſt. He has cenſured with pretty great freedom a work of Calvin, notwithſtanding the public and very ſingular favour with which it was honoured [B].

[A] He has publiſhed ſeveral little Tracts] They were collected into one body, in the Geneva Edition of 167 . . . . which is in three volumes (1) in 12mo. This Author is worthy enough of being read, there being ſeveral good things in his book concerning popular errors. He dedicated it to Charles I King of England. He informs us, in the Dedication, that the firſt of his Books was publiſhed by the command of King James. This ſhews, that Mr. Allard (2) does not juſtly ſpecify the time, in ſaying that John d'Eſpagne was a Miniſter in London, anno 1662.

(1) The Hague edit of 1674, conſiſts but of two vol. 12mo.

(2) Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 87.

[B] He has cenſured with pretty great freedom a work of Calvin, notwithſtanding the public and very ſingular favour with which it was honoured.] This work of Calvin, is a Catechiſm divided into LV Sections. It ſerves as a text for one of the Sunday's Sermons, in the Churches of the Geneva confeſſion, and is one of their liturgical Books. It was received with applauſe as ſoon as it appeared in print, and has been tranſlated into ſeveral languages. Eodem anno, that is in 1450 (3), ſcripſit (Calvinus) Catechiſmum Gallice & Latine . . . . quem tanti fecerunt Calviniſtæ, ut non modo vernaculis plurimis linguis, utpote Germanica, Anglica, Scotica, Belgica, Hiſpanica, ſed etiam Hebraïca donatus ſit ab Emanuële Træmelio, & Græca ab Henrico Stephano (4). This is the Book that was criticized by John d'Eſpagne.

(3) I ſhall examine this date in the remark [B] of the Article SCHULTINGIUS.

(4) Natalis Alexander, Hiſtoria Eccleſ. tom. 8. pag. 135, folio.

ESPAGNET (JOHN of) Preſident of the Parliament of Bourdeaux, was a learned man in the ſeventeenth Century. He approved of the new Philoſophy, and gave public marks of the progreſs he had made in it [A]. He publiſhed in 1616 an old manuſcript intitled,

[A] He gave public marks of the progreſs he had made . . . . in the New Philoſophy.] A Book is aſcribed to him, entitled, The Natural Philoſophy of the Antients reſtored to its purity (1).

(1) See de la Montagne's Preface to the book intitled, The World in the Moon, printed at Roan 1656, in 8vo. This book is a tranſlation from the Engliſh.

I ſhall now enlarge a little this remark which was too ſhort in the firſt edition (2). In the year 1623, a Work was printed at Paris entitled Enchyridion Phyſicæ reſtitutæ, which was known to be written by Meſſire John d'Eſpagnet, Preſident of Bourdeaux, becauſe ſome perſons of his acquaintance aſſerted it to be ſo; not to mention that this was conjectured from their ſeeing the following motto at the beginning of the Book; Spes mea eſt in agno, i. e. "my hope is in the lamb;" and before the Treatiſe on Chemiſtry, Penes nos unda Tagi, i. e. "From the banks of the Tagus," which are two anagrams of his name. It may be affirmed, that this is the firſt Book that appeared in France, containing a complete ſyſtem of Phyſicks contrary to that of Ariſtotle. Nevertheleſs, the Author pretends that he has only reſtored the antient Philoſophy to its rights and privileges. But notwithſtanding this aſſertion, he has added a great many particulars of his own invention. He refutes the opinion concerning the firſt matter, (materia prima) which was held to be extended univerſally without being perceived in any place; and to deſire inceſſantly an alliance with forms, without having any; being the baſis and ſupport of contraries, viz. of the Elements which are ſaid to be produced from it. He ſhews that this ſyſtem of nature is imaginary; that there is no contrariety in the Elements; and that that which is perceived in them, proceeds only from the exceſs of their qualities; and that when they are tempered, no contrariety is found in them. He nevertheleſs thinks that there is a materia prima whence the elements proceed, and become the ſecond matter of things which are in the water and earth; he not conſidering the air nor fire as elements. The elements, according to him, do not change from one into the other: the water only aſcends in vapour, and vapour becomes water by circulation. As to the true fire of the world, he places it in the ſun (3), which he calls not only the eye of the univerſe,

(2) Sorel, de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 249. Paris edit. 1655.

(3) It is to be obſerved, that he believes the light of the Sun, and all other light to be ſpiritual; and that our material fire is in ſome meaſure ſpiritual. Ibid. pag. 250.

intitled, Le Rozier des Guerres [B], and annexed to it a Treatiſe of his own concerning the inſtitution of the young Prince. It is he who is ſpoken of by Father Abram, in his Commentary on Tully's Orations [C].

I forgot to mention that in publiſhing the Rozier des Guerres, he did not imitate thoſe who change the antiquated diction of ſuch manuſcripts as they get printed. He copied his original with the utmoſt exactneſs, and even followed, to a tittle, the whole orthography of it. The reaſon he gave for this may ſerve to corroborate a remark I made on the new edition of Cardinal d'Oſſat's Letters (a) [D].

(a) See the Article OSSAT, at the latter end of the text.

univerſe, but the eye of the Creator of the univerſe, by which he beholds, in a ſenſible manner, his creatures, and which is the firſt agent of the world. In every other part of his Book there are a great number of very curious particulars with regard to the origin of things, their ſubſiſtence and various changes, which bear a near relation to the deſign this new Philoſopher had, to ſpeak of Chymical Things. Accordingly he annexed a treatiſe entitled by him, Arcanum Hermeticæ Philoſophiæ opus, in which he ſpeaks of the matter of the Philoſophical Stone and its digeſtions, of the degrees of fire, of the figure of the veſſels, and that of the furnace; of the compoſition of the Elixir and its multiplication. . . . This Book was tranſlated into French a few years ſince, and entitled, La Philoſophie des Anciens retablie en ſa pureté.

[B] He publiſhed . . . . an old Manuſcript, entitled, le Rozier des Guerres.] It was found at Nerac in the King's Cabinet. D'Eſpagnet thought that his edition was the firſt, but he was miſtaken. This Book had been printed in folio anno 1523, which Edition is more ample than that of 1616. In the manuſcript of Nerac, the whole IId part, and the three laſt chapters of the Iſt were wanting (4). The Prologue alone is capable of proving, that Lewis XI is not the Author of that Work (5), as is aſſured in the title: and yet it is he who ſpeaks in it, to give inſtructions to the Dauphin his ſon. See Colomiés's Bibliotheque Choiſie (6), and the remark [Z] of the article Lewis XI.

(4) See Naudé, Addit. à l'Hiſt. de Louis XI, pag. 72. and in Syntag. de Studio militari, pag. m. 73.

(5) Naudé, ibid.

(6) Pag. 15.

[C] It is he who is ſpoken of by Father Abram, in his Commentary on Tully's Orations.] I make this Remark only for thoſe who would be at a loſs at reading of the following words. Atque etiam nunc pueros à ſagis rapi ſolere, & dæmonibus devoveri teſtatur Spagnetus in ſua præfatione ad Petrum Anchoranum (7). That is to ſay, that the Preſident d'Eſpagnet, in a Preface of his to a Work of Peter de Lancre, Counſellor in the Parliament of Bourdeaux, declares that witches ſteal children, and devote them to the devil.

(7) Abram. in Cicer. Orat. tom. 1. pag. 294. col. 2.

[D] . . . . He followed, to a tittle, the whole Orthography of it. The reaſon he gave for this may ſerve to corroborate a remark I made on the new Edition of Cardinal d'Oſſat's Letters.] " This little Tract Du " Rozier, ſays he (8), appeared ſo beautiful to me, " that I would not paint or diſguiſe it, but have left " it in its native ſimplicity. And tho' his diction is " different from that of this age, it nevertheleſs will " be eaſily underſtood, it being ſo nervous and full of " good ſenſe, that his jargon will ſilence the affected " language of the Court and the Bar. I alſo was de- " ſirous of preſerving carefully the orthography; be- " cauſe that by retrenching or adding a letter, one " oftener changes a word, and transforms an old to a " new one. By this method, in my opinion, the dic- " tion of Philip de Comines's Hiſtory has been cor- " rupted: By this, Editors thinking to correct the " orthography, and poliſh the ſtyle, have diveſt- " ed it of its antique dreſs, whereby the ſtyle of " his Work is no longer that of the age in which " he lived; as may be judged both from this little ma- " nuſcript, and from ſeveral others of the ſame age " which are met with in famous Libraries, particularly " by the Hiſtory of King Charles VI, written by John " Juvenal des Urſins, and ſince publiſhed by the Sieur " de Godefroy. I imagine this error is owing to the " inability of the Correctors, who have corrupted the " orthography in their attempting to correct it, and " thereby became Plagiaries."

(8) Eſpagnet, in his Advertiſement to the reader.

(a) See the remark [B] of the Article GUISE (Lewis de Lorraine Cardinal de).

ESPINE (JOHN DE L') a Proteſtant Miniſter. See SPINA.

ESSARS (CHARLOTTE DES) miſtreſs to Henry IV of France, and afterwards to the Cardinal of Guiſe (a), married Marſhal de l'Hoſpital, as I obſerved in another place (b); but I muſt here rectify an error that eſcaped me [A], and add, that this Lady intermeddled too much in intrigues of ſtate [B].

(b) In the remark [B] of that Marſhal's Article.

ESSE

[A] I muſt here rectify an error which eſcaped me.] Truſting to Father Anſelme, I imagined that Marſhal de l'Hoſpital had married to his ſecond wife, Frances Mignot, anno 1633; whence I conclude that he had divorced Charlotte des Eſſars his firſt wife, and I made ſome reflexions on that occaſion. I drew this conſequence from Father Anſelme's having fixed the death of Charlotte des Eſſars, to the year 1651. I have been informed ſince the ſecond edition of this Dictionary, that this Marſhal's ſecond marriage was contracted in 1653 (1). It therefore muſt not be aſſerted, that the firſt marriage was declared void. I intended to ſuppreſs my reflexions; but ſome perſons whom I greatly revere, adviſed me to keep them in. They repreſented to me, that they are falſe only with regard to the particular application of them to Charlotte des Eſſars; and that if I do but tell my Readers, that they ought to be rectified in this particular, they will not be diſpleaſed at my preſerving a paſſage which may be juſtly applied on a great many occaſions.

(1) See the Errata of Father Anſelme.

[B] She intermeddled too much in intrigues of ſtate.] I ſhall give but one inſtance of this. She had a ſon in the Duke of Lorrain's ſervice; a ſon, I ſay, who called himſelf the Chevalier de Remorantin, and whom ſhe had by the Cardinal of Guiſe. She imagined that the way to advance him would be, to do ſome ſervice to the Duke of Lorrain, by reconciling him with France, and getting him reſtored to his dominions. Accordingly, ſhe deſired Mr. du Hallier her huſband, who commanded in Lorrain, to adviſe the Court of France to treat with the Duke; and at the ſame time ſhe ſollicited the Princeſs of Cantecroix, whom this Duke had married, though he had another wife living, to employ all her rhetoric and addreſs to make him conſent to an accommodation (2). The negotiation was agreed upon on both ſides, and was terminated by the treaty of St. Germains in 1641; but the Duke not performing his promiſes, and not thinking it would be poſſible for him to ſtand his ground, he retired with his troops to his old poſt between the Sambre and the Meuſe. " However, in order to give ſome colour " to his retreat, he diſpatched a Courier to Cardinal " de Richlieu, to acquaint him that he did not retire " with a deſign of infringing his late treaty; but " that the fear which Madam du Hallier had raiſed " in him, viz. that he the Cardinal intended to have " him ſeized, was the ſole cauſe of it. To ſhew that " this fear was not altogether groundleſs and chimeri- " cal, he ſent him a letter, written by that Lady her- " ſelf to the Superior of the Maidens of the Congre- " gation of Nanci, named Angelica her great Confi- " dante, by which ſhe deſired her to let him know, " that the Court took ſuch umbrage at his conduct, " that they were reſolved to ſeize his perſon. The " Cardinal was ſo highly exaſperated at Madam du " Hallier's boldneſs in ſending ſuch an information, " that her huſband who was employed in recovering " the ſmall towns in Lorrain, and at that ſame time " beſieging Chaté, received orders by a Courier ſent " for that purpoſe, to ſend his wife to one of his ſeats, " to remove the Major of the garriſon of Nanci, and " put in his room one Belcaſtel, who was not his " friend; and immediately after the reducing of Chaté, " to come to Court, and there give an account of his

(2) Memoires de Beauvau, pag. 70, 71.

ESSE' (ANDREW DE MONTALEMBERT Lord of) ſprung from one of the nobleſt and moſt antient families of Poitou, commanded in Landrecy when the Emperor Charles V beſieged that town in 1543. He defended it ſo vigorouſly with ruined fortifications, and a garriſon oppreſſed with miſery, that the Emperor was forced to retire from it the 5th of November, after having beſieged it three months and a half. D'Eſſé in recompence of the ſervice he had done on this occaſion, was appointed one of the Gentlemen of the Bedchamber to Francis I. He was ſent into Scotland by Henry II, there to command the army which that Prince ſent to the aſſiſtance of the Scots againſt the Engliſh. He ſignalized himſelf greatly in that Kingdom; and at his return was made Knight of the Order. " It was he who alſo defended Terouenne againſt the army of Charles V, and " who was at laſt killed in the breach, after having ſuſtained three ſucceſſive aſſaults, which " laſted ten hours. By his death he loſt the poſt of Marſhal of France, which was de- " ſigned for him, according to du Bouchet Author of the Annals of Aquitain. Mezerai " ſays in his Hiſtory of France, that he is the immortal honour of Perigord, he " miſtaking with regard to the Province in which D'Eſſe was born, viz. Poictou. " Brantome ſpeaks largely of him under the name of Eſſe (a)."

(a) Extracted from a Letter inſerted in the Mercure Galant of Auguſt 1705, pag. 317, & ſeq.

(3) Ibid. pag. 76. " own actions, as well as thoſe of his wife (3)..... " towns that had been given up to the Duke, and re- " Mr. de Hallier obeyed the King's orders punctually: " duce them to the power of his Majeſty. With re- " and as his Majeſty had always entertained an affec- " gard to his wife, whoſe ambition had made her ſuſ- " tion for him, and judged him to be of an incorrup- " pected, ſhe was forced to continue in the houſe to " tible fidelity, he was ſent ſome time after to Lorrain, " which ſhe had been baniſhed (4). (4) Ibid. pag. 77. " with orders to complete the reduction of all thoſe

(a) See the Advertiſements with regard to the ſecond edition.

ESTAMPES (a), in Latin STAMPÆ, a city of France in Beauſſe with the title of Dukedom. It ſtands on the river de la Juine between Paris and Orleans, in a pretty fruitful ſoil. There is here a Baliwick, Provoſtſhip, Election, Marſhalſea, and Granary of ſalt: two Collegiate Churches of royal foundation, one called Noſtre Dame our Lady with a Dignitary, and ten or eleven Canons; and another called Sante-Croix, i. e. Holy Croſs, with two Dignitaries, and nineteen Canons: five pariſhes, and ſeveral religious houſes. King Robert laid the firſt foundations of the caſtle of Eſtampes, which was demoliſhed at the requeſt of the inhabitants, in the beginning of Henry the IVth's reign. The Prince of Condé garriſoned it in 1652, with part of the forces which Andelot had brought from Germany; and theſe during the ſix weeks they continued there, oppreſſed the inhabitants, and particularly the Clergy, in a moſt dreadful manner. This city is of the antient demeſnes of the Crown. King Charles IV made it an Earldom in favour of Charles d'Evreux his couſin. It had before been a Barony, as appears from the letters by which it was created an Earldom, dated in September 1327. It having reverted to Charles VII, he gave it in 1421 to Richard de Bretagne; and afterwards having been reunited to the Crown, Lewis XI gave it to John de Foix. The letters of donation are dated in April 1498. Gaſton de Foix, ſon of John, having loſt his life in the battle of Ravenne; Anne de Bretagne, wife to Lewis XII, became Counteſs of Eſtampes, by the donation of the King her conſort, in June 1513. After the deceaſe of that Princeſs, which happened the following year, the Earldom of Eſtampes devolved to Madam Claude of France, her eldeſt daughter, who was afterwards married to Francis I, then Duke of Valois. This good Princeſs dying, the King gave it to John de la Barre. After the death of the latter, Francis I created Eſtampes a Dukedom, in favour of John de la Broſſe de Bretagne, and Anne de Puiſſeleu his Lady, who had a great ſhare in the King's favour. Her name is conſpicuous enough in hiſtory. Henry II diſpoſſeſſed them of this Dukedom in 1553, to beſtow it on Diana of Poitiers his favourite, wife to Lewis de Breze, great Seneſchal of Normandy. Upon the acceſſion of Charles IX to the Crown, he reſtored it to John de la Broſſe in April 1562. He dying without iſſue, Henry III beſtowed it in 1576 to Duke John Caſimir; but he renouncing it the year after, the King gave it by engagement to the Ducheſs of Montpenſier, from whom he afterwards took it to beſtow it on Margaret of Valois his ſiſter, Queen of Navarre; and this Princeſs gave it ſome years after to Gabriele d'Eſtree, Ducheſs of Beaufort, who left it to Cæſar Duke of Vendôme, natural ſon to Henry IV. The illuſtrious deſcendants of this Prince are ſtill poſſeſſed of it. Some pretend that Arthur Gouffier, grand Maſter of France, was Count of Eſtampes, but the deed of donation is not found. If this be ſo, the poſſeſſion of Madam Claude of France muſt have been interrupted. However this be, this Lord did not enjoy it very long, he dying in 1518. During the troubles of 1652, the city of Eſtampes, to the great regret of the inhabitants who had always been faithful to the King, was ſurrendred by a traitor to the army of the Princes, but was immediately beſieged in it by the King's forces, which, after having inveſted the city near ſix weeks, and made ſeveral aſſaults, in which great numbers were killed on both ſides, was at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege, in order to march againſt the Duke of Lorrain, who was coming to the aſſiſtance of the Princes, with an army of nine or ten thouſand men.

COUNCILS held in ESTAMPES.

The city of Eſtampes has had the honour to have ſeveral provincial and one national Council held in it. The ſubject of the firſt, which was convened by Gerduin Archbiſhop of Sens, and held in 1048, is not known. We read what follows in the Lives of the Archbiſhops of Sens. Gerduinus Synodum Stampis habuit anno 1048, in qua Imbertus Pariſienſis, Yſambertus Aurelianenſis, Maynardus Trecenſis, Hugo Nivernenſis, Gilbertus Antiſſiodorenſis, & Galtherius Meldenſis, adfuere Rege Henrico præſente. The ſecond was convened by Richerius Archbiſhop of Sens in 1092, concerning the ordination of Yves of Chartres, performed by Urban II. This Archbiſhop pretended, that Yves was guilty of high-treaſon, for cauſing himſelf to be ordained, out of the Kingdom, without the King's permiſſion, and therefore that he ought to be depoſed. The third was held in 1112, and Daimbert, Archbiſhop of Sens, preſided in it. The firſt thing that this Council opened with was, the hearing of complaints made concerning the ill conduct of the Biſhop of Troyes; upon which the Council wrote to him. They afterwards proceeded to the conſecration of a Biſhop of Nevers; and at laſt, ſeveral regulations were made in it for the reformation of manners. The national Council held in Eſtampes anno 1130, was aſſembled by order of Lewis de Gros; and the deſign of its being convened was, to enquire whether Innocent II or Peter de Leon, who aſſumed the name of Anacletus II, ſhould be recognized Pope. St. Bernard, who was preſent at this Council, inſiſted ſtrenuouſly, that Innocent had been canonically elected; and that the proceeding to a freſh election was irregular, and invalid. The whole Council acquieſced in St. Bernard's judgment; and Innocent was accordingly acknowledged for the true and lawful ſucceſſor of St. Peter. This Pope came from Chartres to Eſtampes, purpoſely to give the inhabitants a teſtimony of the ſenſe he had of the favour they had done him. He ſtaid two days there, and lodged in the Abbey of Morigni, of St. Benedict's Order, half a quarter of a league from Eſtampes. This we learn from the Chronicles of that Abbey, which never acknowledged any ſuperior but the Archbiſhop of Sens. Lewis le Jeune, before he went into the Eaſt, aſſembled his Parliament in Eſtampes, and left the regency of the Kingdom to Ralph Earl of Vermandois, and to Suger, Abbot of St. Denis. In the conteſt between Alexander III and Cardinal Octavian who had aſſumed the name of Victor, the ſame Prince aſſembled, in 1160, the Gallican Church at Eſtampes, to know which of the two ſhould be recognized; and, on the judgment of the Biſhops, the King adhered to Alexander.

ESTAMPES (ANNE of Piſſeleu Ducheſs of) miſtreſs to Francis I, inflamed the heart of that Prince, a little after his being releaſed from his impriſonment. She was at that time one of the maids of honour to the Queen-Regent (a), and was called Mademoiſelle de Heilli [A]. She had attended on that Princeſs when ſhe went to meet the King her ſon as far as the frontiers of Spain [B]. The King dallied with her as often as he pleaſed; and though no one doubted of it, he yet found a huſband for her, whom he created Duke of Eſtampes [C]. Notwithſtanding her marriage, ſhe ſtill continued her amorous

(a) Louiſa of Savoy, mother to Francis I.

[A] She was called Mademoiſelle de Heilli.] She was daughter of William de Pisseleu Lord of Heilli, and of Ann Sanguin his ſecond wife (1). He had three wives, and thirty children. He was ſon to John de Pisseleu Lord of Heilli, who had the honour to be one of the Knights at the coronation of Lewis XI, and had been ſo conſiderable as to marry Jane de Dreux, a Princeſs of the blood-royal, after the deceaſe of Mary de Hargicourt his firſt wife, mother to William, father of the Ducheſs d'Eſtampes (2).

(1) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 863.

(2) Ibid.

[B] She had attended on the Queen Regent . . . as far as the frontiers of Spain.] According to Varillas (3), the Queen Regent excited undeſignedly this new paſſion in the King, by taking to meet him, as far as Mount Marſan, young Ann de Piſſeleu, who was called Madam de Heilli, and who was lately come into that Princeſs's family, in quality of a Maid of Honour. All Hiſtorians are agreed, that the Queen Regent went as far as Bayonne, and this Varillas had declared ten pages before. Why then does he ſhorten the journey in this place? Does he mean that ſhe left her Maids of Honour at Mount Marſan, and advanced as far as Bayonne without this part of her train? But would not this be advancing of paradoxes out of mere whim? As the Author of the Gallantries of the Kings of France has only copied Varillas, with regard to Francis I, let me not be aſked whether he ſtopt at Mount Marſan. I am firmly of opinion, that Brantome is miſtaken in aſſerting that the Queen Regent preſented Madam Heilli to King Francis I, at his return from Spain to Bourdeaux (4).

(3) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francis I, lib. 6. pag. m. 401 ad annum 1526.

(4) Brantôme, Dames Galantes, tom. 2. pag. 394.

[C] The King . . . . nevertheleſs found a huſband for her.] She married John de Broſſe ſon to René de Broſſe, and of Jane daughter to Philip de Comines. This René had followed the Duke of Bourbon, and was killed at the battle of Pavia, the 24th of February 1525. By an arret of the Parliament of Paris dated the 13th of Auguſt 1522, he had been ſentenced to be beheaded, and afterwards hanged, and his eſtate confiſcated. He was deſcended from John de Broſſe and Nicole de Châtillon, ſirnamed of Bretagne, Counteſs of Pentheure, a very rich heireſs, which John de Broſſe was the only ſon of John de Broſſe, Marſhal of France, who deſcended from father to ſon from the antient Viſcounts of Limoges. John de Broſſe ſon of René imploring in vain the benefit of the treaty of Madrid, in order to recover the poſſeſſion of the eſtates which had been confiſcated becauſe of his father's rebellion; and finding no other way to get them reſtored, but by that of becoming a cuckold, he reſolved to marry Madam de Heilli. The King in conſideration of this marriage, gave him the confiſcated eſtates, and added to them the dukedom of Eſtampes (5), and alſo made him Knight of the order, and Governor of Britany. The new Duke of Eſtampes was not the happier for this: for, "beſides that all theſe poſſeſſions and titles came to him "from a poyſonous ſource, in which he did not dare "to view himſelf, for fear of ſeeing a monſter in his "own perſon; he had ſo little happineſs in the enjoy-"ment of them, that as they ſerved only as a title or "cover to his wife, he not only poſſeſſed them but "nominally, but alſo paid very dear for them (6)." Having no children, his eſtates devolved on Sebaſtian of Luxemburg, Viſcount of Martigues, ſon of Charlotte his ſiſter, and father of an only daughter who was wife to Emanuel of Lorrain Duke of Mercœur (7).

(5) Extracted from le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 863.

(6) Le Laboureur, ibid. pag. 864.

(7) Ibid.

amorous commerce with the King; and ſhe roſe to the higheſt degree of favour [D], which laſted as long as that Prince's reign. The furious jealouſy ſhe harboured againſt the Dauphin's miſtreſs (b), prompted her to the commiſſion of a very black and treacherous act [E], which the Cardinal of Lorrain would not ſuffer to be puniſhed.

(b) Diana of Poitiers, widow to the great Seneſchal of Normandy.

[D] She roſe to the higheſt degree of favour.] She made this the inſtrument to the raiſing of her family. At her requeſt Anthony Sanguin her uncle was made Abbot of Fleuri Biſhop of Orleans, Cardinal, and at laſt Biſhop of Toulouſe. She gave to Charles, her ſecond brother, the Abbey of Bourgueil and the Biſhopric of Condom. Francis, her third brother, was Abbot of St. Corneille de Compeigne and Biſhop of Amiens; and the fourth, named William, had the Biſhopric of Pamiers. Two of her ſiſters were Abbeſſes, the one of Maubuiſſon, and the other of St. Paul in Beauvoiſis. She married the reſt into the families of Barbançon Canni & Chabot Jarnac; and the laſt and beſt beloved had no children by Francis de Bretagne Count of Vertus and of Goello, Baron of Avaugour. From Adrian de Piſſeleu Lord of Heilly, her eldeſt brother, are deſcended the other Lords of Heilly down to this day (8). Some Hiſtorians pretend that this Ducheſs, the Conſtable of Montmorenci and Admiral Chabot, had the greateſt ſhare in the adminiſtration (9); and that Charles V, fearing he ſhould be ſeized in the Court of Francis I, could not find a better expedient than to bribe this woman, who had an abſolute aſcendant over the King (10). He won her favour, as we are told, by means of a rich ring, which he let fall purpoſely that the Ducheſs might take it up; and that he might ſay to her, with an air of gallantry, that he would not take back what was fallen into ſuch good hands (11). Mezerai rejects this as an idle ſtory (12); but he confeſſes (13) that the King could not refuſe this Lady any thing; and that ſhe had credit enough firſt to contribute greatly to the reſtoring of Admiral Chabot to favour, after he had been degraded and declared, by a ſolemn Arret, unworthy of his employments. Secondly, to ruin the Chancellor Poyet. His ill fortune, as it is related, ſays he (14), ſpeaking of this Chancellor, came from the Antichamber of the Ladies. The Ducheſs had procured royal Letters or Mandates for la Renaudie, who was at law with du Tillet, and who carried them to the Chancellor with a recommendation from this Lady. This Chancellor, who ſupported du Tillet, refuſed to let the Letters paſs the Seals, unleſs ſome things were changed which did not pleaſe him. The Lady hearing of this, was exaſperated to the higheſt degree at this contempt, and took a cruel revenge; for ſhe prevailed with the King to impriſon the Chancellor, who afterwards was ruined by an Arret of Parliament. According to ſome Hiſtorians (15), ſhe was very inſtrumental in the Conſtable's diſgrace: but they alſo ſay, that the Queen of Navarre joined the Ducheſs in ruining the Chancellor. The royal Mandates of Renaudie were ſhewn to the King, with the alterations which Poyet had made in them; and it was obſerved to his Majeſty, that this was an infringement of his authority (16). The King however only ordered la Renaudie, to carry back his Letters to the Chancellor, and to give him more expreſs orders, in his Majeſty's name, to diſpatch them without the leaſt alteration. La Renaudie returned to the Chancellor; and delivered his meſſage, with an arrogant tone of voice, in preſence of the Queen of Navarre, who was then ſolliciting his favour for a domeſtic of her's, convicted of ſtealing a very rich heireſs. The Chancellor took la Renaudie's Letters; and ſhewing them to the Queen of Navarre, added: Such is the good that Ladies do at Court: Not ſatisfied with exerciſing their Empire there, they even attempt to violate the Laws, and dictate to Magiſtrates who are moſt profoundly ſkilled in the exerciſe of their employments. Though the Chancellor hinted only at the Ducheſs, it happened unluckily for him, that the Queen of Navarre applied part of it to herſelf; becauſe the words were ambiguous, and might be interpreted, as well of her ſolliciting the Chancellor, in favour of her domeſtic who had ſtole the heireſs; as of the violence committed in his perſon, by forcing him to ſeal la Renaudie's Letters. . . . . The inſtant the Queen was got out of the Chancellor's houſe, ſhe flew to the Ducheſs, to inform her of the paſſion this Magiſtrate was in; and did not leave her till they had concerted meaſures to make the Chancellor loſe the King's favour. It is a great unhappineſs, it muſt be confeſſed, that the fate of people, their favour or their diſgrace, ſhould depend on the caprice of a coquet, who ſcandalizes a whole Kingdom by the criminal correſpondence ſhe carries on, publicly and with an air of triumph, with the Monarch. But ſhould any perſon cry, O tempora! ô mores! ſhould they ſeem aſtoniſhed at this, they would juſtly be look'd upon as ſtrangers in the world; for ſuch perſons would admire, as ſomething extraordinary, a thing that has always been very common, and that is ſtill ſo (17), and which in all probability will be ſuch to the end of the world. A circumſtance that conſoles thoſe who are diſguſted at theſe irregularities is, that the power of coquets ſtands upon a very tickliſh foundation (18).

(8) Ibid.

(9) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francois I. lib. 9. pag. m. 370.

(10) Ibid. pag. 389.

(11) Ibid. pag. 390, 391.

(12) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, folio, tom. 2. pag. 1007.

(13) Ibid. pag. 1009, ad ann. 1540.

(14) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, pag. 1014, ad ann. 1542.

(15) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francois I. lib. 9. pag. 397.

(16) Ibid. pag. 413.

(17) Caſus multis hic cognitus. Et à medio fortunæ ductus acervo. Juven. Sat. 13. ver. 9.

(18) See the remark [I] of the Article of ÆSOP, the firſt, &c.

[E] Prompted her to commit a very black and treacherous action.] The Ducheſs d'Eſtampes perceiving, that the infirmities of Francis I increaſed daily, and having juſt reaſon to fear the worſt after his death, as well becauſe ſhe could not flatter herſelf with the hopes that her huſband would take her again, as becauſe the Dauphin's miſtreſs would be all-powerful; this Ducheſs, I ſay, perceiving how matters ſtood, carried on a ſecret intelligence with Charles V. She knew the antipathy which the Dauphin and the Duke of Orleans, who were brothers, harboured againſt one another; and this ſerved as the baſis to her negotiations. She prevailed with the Emperor to favour the Duke of Orleans's faction; and the inſtant ſhe heard that his Imperial Majeſty was inclined to beſtow the inveſtiture of the Milaneſe, or that of the Low-Countries, on this young Prince, "ſhe engaged in ſo cloſe "a correſpondence with the Emperor, that ſhe informed "him punctually of the moſt ſecret tranſactions of the "Court and Council; and indeed the very firſt Letter "he received by the Count's means (19), did him ſo "ſignal a piece of ſervice, that it ſaved his perſon and "his whole army (20)." He was at that time in Champagne, at the head of a very powerful army; but he wanted proviſions, "for which reaſon his ſol-"diers were going to deſert, when the Count wrote "him a Letter, the ſubſtance of which was as follows: "That the Dauphin had got together a vaſt quantity "of proviſions of all kinds neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence "of his army in Epernay: that this town was very "weak in itſelf; but that the French imagined the "Emperor would not attempt to ſurprize it, becauſe "the River Maine lay between it and his army: that "orders had been given to break down the only "bridge they could march over; but that the Ducheſs "had ſo artfully prevented the executing of this, that "the bridge might be ſtill ſerviceable; from all which "the Count concluded, that his Imperial Majeſty had "no more to do but to procure refreſhments as ſoon "as poſſible for his army; and to reduce that of the "French to the ſame neceſſity from which he would "free himſelf. The Emperor made his advantage of "the information; and appeared, at a time when he "was leaſt ſuſpected, before Epernay, whoſe inhabi-"tants were in ſuch terror, that they opened their "gates to him. He was ſtill flushed with the joy of "this conqueſt, which recovered his affairs, when he "received a ſecond Letter from the Count, informing "him that there was in Chateau-Thierri another ma-"gazine of meal and corn, full as conſiderable as that "of Epernay. That no troops were appointed to "guard it at this time; and that ſhould the Dauphin "loſe it, it would be impoſſible for him to follow his "Imperial Majeſty's army ſo cloſe, as to hinder the "chief progreſs of it. The Emperor, allured by the "prodigious advantage he had reaped by the firſt ad-"vice, turned towards Chateau-Thierri, and forced it "with little loſs; the inhabitants, as no troops had "been ſent them, not being able to withſtand the aſ-"ſault. The abundance of all things which was there "found, even beyond the hopes of the Imperialiſts "&c (21)." The Court of France being prodigiouſly perplexed, did whatever could be done in ſuch a juncture; but ſecrecy, which was to be the ſoul of that grand affair, was not obſerved; and France would certainly

(19) This was the Count of Boſſu, the perſon who managed the Ducheſs of Eſtampes's affairs and her negotiator with Charles V. He was of the family of Longueval.

(20) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francois I. lib. 11. pag. 101. ad ann. 1544.

(21) Ibid.

puniſhed [F], and which would have ſubjected France to a foreign power, had Charles V taken advantage of the opportunity. As ſhe had behaved very ill towards her huſband (c), ſhe had no reſource left after the death of Francis I, and was reduced to the neceſſity of paſſing the remainder of her days at a country ſeat [G]. It is related that ſhe there profeſſed the Proteſtant Religion [H]. The Duke of Eſtampes had ordered an tainly have changed its Sovereign, had not ſomething ſtill ſtronger than human reaſon, oppoſed the approaching revolution with which it was menaced. The Dauphin acted nothing but in concert with the King his father; and the King did not form the moſt inconſiderable meaſure, but the Ducheſs immediately acquainted the Emperor with it by the Count de Boſſu's means (32). Paris was in ſuch conſternation, that the richeſt Citizens fled from it with their moſt valuable effects, ſome towards Orleans and others toward Roan (23). A woman was the cauſe of all this diſorder and confuſion (24), Dux fœmina facti. A woman would at that time have ſubverted the Monarchy, had not Charles the Vth's brain turned; or rather, had not ſecret jealouſies broke out between him and Henry VIII of England (25), with whom he had beforehand divided the whole Kingdom. Francis I extricated himſelf from theſe difficulties at a very eaſy rate, and obtained peace in the month of September of the ſame year (26).

(c) See the Remarks [C], [I], and [K].

(22) Ibid. pag. 103.

(23) Ibid. pag. 104.

(24) The deſcription which Mezerai has given, tom. 2. in folio, pag. 1031. of the conſternation the Pariſians were in, is dreadful. Such as fled were plundered in the way, and the women defiled.

(25) He was at that time on the coaſts of Picardy, where he took ſome cities.

(26) The treaty of Creſſi was concluded the 18th of September 1544.

As Varillas always delights in relating things that border upon the marvelous, I ſhould not have laid much ſtreſs on what I have here quoted from him, did I not find the ſubſtance of it in Mezerai. " The French " Army, ſays he (27), had plenty of proviſions; " whilſt that of the Imperialiſts was in ſuch want, " that it muſt have periſhed in a few days, had not " the treaſon of a woman reſtored it to its ſtrength and " vigour. There were at this time two parties in the " Court, that of the Lady d'Eſtampes the King's " miſtreſs; and that of Diana de Poitiers, miſtreſs to " the Dauphin. The former of theſe Ladies, ſtung " with a furious jealouſy againſt the latter, ... had " devoted herſelf to the intereſt of the Duke of Or- " leans, that ſhe might have a ſupport in caſe the " King ſhould die ... and gave the Emperor notice " of whatever was tranſacting in Council; truſting " to the glaring promiſes he made her, viz. that in " caſe the peace ſhould be concluded, he would make " the Duke of Orleans one of the moſt powerful " Princes in Europe. And it is ſaid (28), that being " reduced to ſuch extremity, that there was no other " way for this Emperor to ſave his own life and his " army, but by ſurrendring it, at diſcretion, to the " enemy; ſhe gave him intelligence that there was a " great quantity of proviſions in Eſpernay, one of the " magazines of our camp; and that even the Dauphin " having commanded a Captain of foot to break down " the bridge, and to throw into the river all ſuch provi- " ſions as could not be carried off in three days; ſhe " retarded the execution of this order, by the artifices " of Longueval her confident and very familiar friend. " Thus the enemy having met with a great abundance " of proviſions and booty in this town, and a ſtill " greater quantity in Chateau-Thierry, which they " ſurprized by the intelligence of the ſame Lady, they " refreſhed themſelves at their eaſe &c."

(27) Tom. 2. folio pag. 1031.

(28) Mezerai ſpeaks more affirmatively in the Life of Henry II. Nicholas Boſſu-Longueval, ſays he, pag. 1058 of the 2d vol. who had been one of the Lady d'Eſtampes's faction, and accuſed, NOT WITHOUT REASON, of having given advice to the Imperialiſts to ſeize upon Eſpernai and Chateau-Thierri, ſaved his life by means of his fine houſe of Marchez near Laon, which he gave to the Archbiſhop of Rheims under colour of a ſale. See the following Remark.

[F] . . . Which the Cardinal of Lorrain would not ſuffer to be puniſhed.] I ſhall employ Varillas's words, to explain this whole myſtery of iniquity. Here follows the account he gives of the ſtate of affairs, in the firſt year of Henry IId's reign. " The Count of " Boſſu was the chief cauſe of the progreſs the Empe- " ror had made in Champagne, before the Treaty of " Creſpi; and it was thought that the protection of " the Ducheſs d'Eſtampes, would alone have been ſuf- " ficient to ſcreen him from puniſhment. After that " this Lady's favour expired by the King's death, it " was reſolved to bring Boſſu to juſtice; and it was " thought that the proſecuting of him would contri- " bute to maintain the reputation of France; by in- " forming foreigners, that the Emperor would not " have advanced ſo near the Capital, had he not been " favoured by an infamous act of treachery, the pu- " niſhment of which might have been ſuſpended, but " not omitted. Boſſu was not forgetful of his own " ſafety in ſo dangerous a conjuncture; and conſcious " of his guilt, he ſought for protection from the Car- " dinal of Lorrain only (29)." Accordingly, he let him know, that he would give him his houſe of Marchez, provided that his perſon and the other eſtates he poſſeſſed in France, might be ſecured to him (30). The propoſal was accepted, and the Cardinal ſollicited for de Boſſu's pardon. " The expedient which proved " moſt effectual was, his remonſtrating to the King, " that the Ducheſs of Eſtampes had joined with Count " de Boſſu in his guilt; and conſequently, that it would " not be poſſible to begin a proſecution legally, with- " out involving the Ducheſs in it; and without ble- " miſhing the beginning of his reign by a notorious " and unneceſſary affront done to the memory of his " father, by abandoning to the ſword of juſtice, an " object whom he had ſo tenderly loved for near twen- " ty two years." The King was pacified with this reaſon, tho' it might have been anſwered; and accordingly Boſſu extricated himſelf very happily out of his difficulties (31).

(29) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. lib. 1. pag. 67. ad ann. 1547.

(30) The perſon who made this propoſal was Nicholas de Pelvé, his ſiſter's ſon, and domeſtic of the Cardinal.

(31) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. lib. 1. pag. 68.

[G] She was reduced to the neceſſity of paſſing the remainder of her days in a country-ſeat.] Here follows what Mezerai ſays on this ſubject, where he ſpeaks of the changes that were made at Court, after the death of Francis I. " As for the Lady d'Eſtampes, ſhe " withdrew to one of her ſeats, being univerſally de- " ſpiſed, and even by John de Broſſe her huſband; " where ſhe lived ſome years after, in the ſecret ex- " erciſe of the Proteſtant Religion, corrupting a great " many other perſons by her example (32)." Varillas expatiates on the motives which prompted the Seneſchal's Lady (33), not to quite ſatiate her vengeance, and concludes with theſe words (34); " Be " this as it will the Seneſchal's Lady was ſatisfied " with only ſhewing an indifference for every thing " that related to the Ducheſs: and ſuffered her to en- " joy in peace the riches ſhe had amaſſed in the pre- " ceding reign; though ſhe had acted many things " which would have been juſtly cognizable by the " Laws, had they been put rigorouſly in force againſt " her. It was eaſy to perceive that the Ducheſs d'E- " ſtampes had been more fortunate on this occaſion " than any other perſon, or than ſhe herſelf could " have hoped; ſince that there was not a ſingle Cour- " tier but look'd upon her as ruin'd. She withdrew " to one of the country ſeats ſhe had purchaſed; " where ſhe ſupported with ſo much the more eaſe " the abſence and hatred of the Duke d'Eſtampes her " huſband, as ſhe had never entertained much eſteem " for him. The cauſe of this is not diſcovered by " private Memoirs; but if we may be allowed to " gueſs from the information taken out by this Duke " againſt her, which is found among the manuſcripts " of Lomenie; we muſt conclude, either that he was " a man of very little ſenſe, or was not affected with " any thing (35), ſince he contributed to his own in- " famy, by employing as much pains to blazon his " wife's infamy, as ſuch perſons of quality, who " have the leaſt prudence, take, to eſtabliſh or in- " creaſe their reputation."

(32) Mezerai, tom. 2. folio, pag. 1058.

(33) i. e. Diana de Poitiers, miſtreſs to Henry II.

(34) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 1. pag. 34. ad ann. 1547.

(35) Theſe words will be examined in the remark [K].

[H] It is ſaid that ſhe there profeſſed the Proteſtant Religion.] The Reader has heard what Mezerai relates on this ſubject: but he does not expatiate ſo much as Varillas, who ſearches into the motives of it and relates ſeveral circumſtances. " The judgments " of God, ſays he (36), are dreadful againſt habitual " ſins, and eſpecially againſt ſuch as are contrary to " purity. The Ducheſs d'Eſtampes had led publickly " for one and twenty years a diſſolute life; and Cal- " viniſm appeared to her the moſt proper of all ſects, " to ſtifle the remorſe of conſcience; becauſe on one " ſide, it took away the neceſſity of confeſſion; and " on the other, declared that all men were equally the " enemies of God, and were diſtinguiſhed from one " another only by an imputative righteouſneſs. Nothing " could be more commodious than theſe two maxims, " to encourage the Ducheſs of Eſtampes in her crime; " and ſhe was ſo ſtrongly perſuaded of the truth of it, " that ſhe not only turned Calviniſt, but alſo protected " to the utmoſt of her power, (but not too publickly) " thoſe who had been ſeized for imbibing the modern " hereſy, and would have been ſentenced without mer-

(36) Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 1. pag. 34.

" cy

an information to be taken out againſt her [I], in which a very extraordinary circumſtance

" cy to the flames. On this occaſion, ſhe was obliged " to exert the utmoſt power of her charms and em- " ploy all artifices; for tho' the love which Francis I " entertained for her, the firſt time he ſaw her at " Mount Marſan, whither ſhe had accompanied the " Ducheſs of Augoulême his mother, in quality of Maid " of Honour, was not leſſened; it is nevertheleſs pro- " bable, that had he heard ſhe was turned Calviniſt, " he would have cenſured her as much as he did Mi- " tron his Valet-de-Chambre upon the ſame account, " whom he reprimanded ſo very ſeverely, that it " quite turned his brain; and in conſequence of this, " flung himſelf into the firſt well he came to, at his " coming out of the Louvre. But after the death of " Francis I, the Ducheſs d'Eſtampes did not think her- " ſelf obliged to obſerve ſo profound a diſſimulation as " ſhe had done hitherto. She profeſſed the principles " of Calvin in her country ſeat; and the only cau- " tion ſhe obſerved was, not to keep a Proteſtant Mi- " niſter in her houſe. She never went to maſs but " on ſolemn feſtivals; and ſhe was not content with " perverting ſuch of her domeſticks as had the weak- " neſs to change their Religion in order to ingratiate " themſelves with her, and to turn away ſuch as re- " fuſed to do it; but ſpent no more of the income " of the mighty poſſeſſions ſhe had amaſſed whilſt ſhe " was in favour, than what was abſolutely neceſſary " for the ſupport of her family; and put the reſt into " a place that was then called la Boëte à Perrete; " that is, in the hands of thoſe who diſtributed it " among poor Calviniſts, or employed it in corrupt- " ing poor Mechanicks and Peaſants, who did not " ſcruple to change their old Religion; becauſe at the " ſame time that money was given them, it was aſ- " ſured, they ſhould not want any thing for the fu- " ture, provided they would profeſs the Proteſtant Re- " ligion and perſevere in it."

REFLECTIONS on the account given by Varillas, concerning the Ducheſs of Eſtampes turning Calviniſt.

I ſhall make two reflections on this relation. I. I am ſurprized at the ſilence of Theodore Beza. If it be true that the Ducheſs of Eſtampes was extremely charitable to thoſe of the Reformed Religion, and did all that lay in her power to increaſe the number of Proteſtants; he muſt certainly have known it. What then can be the reaſon why his Hiſtory of the Churches, which takes notice of things of much leſs importance, ſhould not mention any particulars relating to this Lady? I will take it for granted, that he was prompted from political views, not to join her with the Queen of Navarre, as Maimbourg has done (37), in perſuading Francis I to hear the Calviniſtical Preachers. I will ſuppoſe that he thought it would reflect an odium on the reformation, ſhould it be confeſſed that this Lady, who was actually immerſed in public adultery, favoured the new Religion; but I would aſk why he ſhould have the ſame caution, when it related to the good offices ſhe did the cauſe, during her retirement? Was it a ſcandal to the Proteſtant Religion, to have ſuch a woman profeſs it; a woman, I ſay, who had loſt her virginity in a criminal way; who afterwards had been unfaithful to her huſband, to her gallant (38), to her King, and to her country; who had made her favour ſubſervient to the committing of a thouſand unjuſt actions; whom, in a word, all France might charge with the ruin of ſuch numbers of families; the raviſhing of ſo many women; the ignominy of a diſadvantageous treaty of peace; and the loſs of a very favourable opportunity which preſented itſelf, for deſtroying the army of Charles V; and for revenging in a glorious manner, all the affronts which had been received from that mortal enemy to the French name? But beſides that Theodore Beza might not be acquainted with the deteſtable intrigues of this Ducheſs with Charles V, and her dark and vile ingratitude to a King who loved her with ſo much tenderneſs; would we have this Proteſtant Miniſter to be more ſcrupulouſly delicate on theſe matters than the Scriptures? Have the Evangeliſts made any difficulty to inform the world that Mary Magdalen followed our Saviour? Have not the Apoſtles introduced (39) Rhahab the harlot, amongſt the moſt illuſtrious cloud of witneſſes that the Old Teſtament can produce, for the ſupport of our faith? What ſcandal could have accrued to the Proteſtant Churches, had their Hiſtorian owned, that a miſtreſs to the illuſtrious Monarch Francis I, being undeceived with regard to the vanities of a Court, ſhould have diſcovered the groſſneſs of the Popiſh ſuperſtitions, and given glory to the truth, in order to expiate her paſt crimes? I conclude, that as Theodore Beza, and ſuch Writers, took no notice of an incident that could not be unknown to them, and which they had not good reaſon to ſuppreſs, ſtronger proofs muſt be given before we ought to credit it. I know that the late Author of the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantz aſſerts (40), that this Ducheſs openly favoured the Lutherans; and that after the King's death, ſhe led a very retired life in the full exerciſe of the Proteſtant Religion; protecting to the utmoſt of her power, all who profeſſed it; but as I am perſuaded that he has only copied Mezerai on this occaſion, I ſhall ſtill continue in my opinion.

My IId reflection relates to the controverſies, which Varillas has touched upon in ſuch a manner, as might naturally draw upon him the ſtrongeſt reſentment of ſome choleric Divine. I do not believe that any Chriſtian Sect have tenets which may ſuit a woman, who is publickly immerſed in habitual adultery: but of all the weſtern Communions, none ſeems to have been ſo little adapted to the taſte of the miſtreſs of Francis I, as that which is called Calviniſm; for this Communion not only inveighed in the ſharpeſt terms againſt adultery and gallantry, but againſt all the court-vanities, againſt gaming, dancing, ludicrous diſcourſe, &c. Now let the Reader judge, whether ſuch a Goſpel could have many temptations for our Ducheſs. The two reaſons given by the Hiſtorian are very bad ones; for confeſſion is not the only method of waking a remorſe of conſcience, nor is it a very forcible means to awaken it. The Seneſchal of Normandy's Lady was no better than the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, notwithſtanding what Varillas ſays, viz. (41), that ſhe had a ſtrong averſion to Proteſtants. But farther, this Author confeſſes that the Ducheſs in queſtion, during the life time of Francis I, did not dare to reveal her ſentiments. She conſequently muſt have ſubmitted to the auſterities of the Romiſh Religion, to faſting, confeſſion, &c. what advantage would it then have been to her, had ſhe adhered internally to the principles of Calvin? If ſhe thought them very commodious, ſhe yet was not allowed to take advantage of them; conſequently the charm was removed, and the allurement had loſt its force. Add to this, that he could not adhere internally to the Roman Calviniſm, without believing at the ſame time, that ſhe committed the worſt of crimes in going to maſs; and conſequently nothing could torture her conſcience more, than to follow the doctrine of the Reformers, in a Court where ſhe was obliged to make an open and regular profeſſion of that of the Romaniſts: for with regard to the tenet concerning imputative righteouſneſs, Varillas judges of it as a blind man does of colours, ſince all Proteſtants acknowledge, that this juſtice is of no uſe without repentance; and conſequently it is not the only thing that diſtinguiſhes good men from ſuch as are bad.

Since the firſt edition of this Dictionary, I have found that Florimond de Remond takes ſome notice of the pretended Lutheraniſm of the Ducheſs of Eſtampes. He ranks her among the Ladies againſt whom the Lutherans had inveighed; and who procured them acceſs to the Queen of Navarre, ſiſter to Francis I. He ranks in the ſame catalogue, the Ladies of Cani, and of Peiſſeleu ſiſter to that Ducheſs; and declares, that theſe won over ſome others. It was a very eaſy matter, adds he, to gain thoſe ſimple ſouls, this weak ſex; for the rigour of the Laws, and Inſtitutions of the Church, and eſpecially the reſtraint of confeſſion, was inſupportable to many of them (42). But beſides his not citing any Author, he inſiſts ſo little on this incident; gives us ſo few particulars, and is ſo deſtitute of circumſtances; that he cannot prevail upon me to change my opinion. I fancy that what he relates was procured only from a random hear-ſay, which he was deſirous of publiſhing merely that he might have the opportunity of diſcourſing upon a common topick; I mean that of the ſtratagem of the old ſerpent, who occaſioned the fall of the firſt woman. This Hiſtorian has collected I know not how many moral reflections and authorities on this occaſion. But this is a moſt wretched common place; it has this defect, that it may be retorted by every ſect. See the Critique generale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme (43).

[I] The Duke of Eſtampes had ordered informations

(40) Tom. 1. lib. 1. pag. 8, 9.

(41) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri II. liv. 1. pag. 36.

(42) Florimond de Remond, Hiſt. de la naiſſance & progres de l'Hereſ. liv. 7. chap. 3. pag. m. 847.

(43) In paragraph 13. of the 30th Letter, 3d edit. See alſo the Remark [D] of the Article GREGORY I.

(37) Hiſt. du Calviniſme, lib. 1. pag. m. 22.

(38) It is very probable, that the Count de Boſſu uſed to lie with her. Conſider attentively the expreſſions of Mezerai mentioned above, citation (27). See alſo the remark [I], and Brantome, Vie de Henry II. pag. 6.

(39) See the Epiſtle to the Hebrews, chap. xi. ver. 31.

ſtance happened, viz. Henry the IId's ſubmitting to the interrogatories in favour of that unhappy huſband. Varillas did not know either the time or the motives of this incident [K]. I ſhall take notice elſewhere (d) of the other chronological errors which he and to be taken out againſt her.] We ſhall ſee another error in Varillas. She was at ſuch variance with the Duke d'Eſtampes her huſband, continues he (44), that he had cauſed a juridical enquiry to be made into her conduct, ever ſince their marriage: which could be aſcribed to nothing but to jealouſy, which obliged him to have recourſe to ſuch ignominious meaſures, in order to wreak his vengeance on his wife, when ſhe ſhould have loſt the King's protection. Had Varillas peruſed attentively the Manuſcripts which he boaſts were communicated to him, he would not have reaſoned as he has done, with reſpect to the motives of the Duke d'Eſtampes. He would know that the enquiry with regard to the Ducheſs's conduct was made a long time after the death of Francis I; and that the deſign of the huſband, in this, was not to make it publicly known that his wife had violated her conjugal fidelity. He muſt have been the moſt ſilly man that ever lived, had he imagined that informations were wanting to prove him a cuckold. All France was perſuaded of it, would have ſworn it, and have laughed in the face of any perſon that ſhould have queſtioned it. The enquiry therefore was not an affair of jealouſy; and the deſign of it was not to take revenge, after Francis I. ſhould be dead. I have already obſerved, that it was made after the death of this Monarch; and I add, that the tendency of it was to ſhew, not how much the Duke had ſuffered in his honour, by the conduct of his wife, but how greatly he had been injured in his poſſeſſions, of which he wanted to get proofs, in order to ſtrengthen a law-ſuit. This le Laboureur will tell us. The Duke, ſays he (45), not only poſſeſſed nominally the Eſtates which Francis I had beſtowed upon him, but he alſo paid intereſt for them out of his own fortune. Here follows a proof of this from the very mouth, and atteſted in Court, upon oath by King Henry II, whom he humbly intreated to depoſe in his favour, in the ſuit he had with Odet of Bretagne, Count of Vertus his couſin, as heir to Francis de Bretagne his elder brother Count of Vertus; which Francis having married Charlotte de Piſſeleu ſiſter to the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, ſhe obliged the Duke her huſband, to do her what juſtice ſhe pleaſed with regard to her pretenſions on account of Magdalen de Broſſe, de Bretagne, her grandmother. And beſides the permiſſion to enquire farther into that matter, which the King granted him at Paris, the 3d of June 1556, he alſo was ſo gracious as to ſubmit to the interrogatory the 12th of the ſaid month, in the houſe, commonly called la Maiſon Maigret in the ſtreet St. Avoye, which he afterwards gave to the Conſtable de Montmorenci, in whoſe preſence he declared, that the Duke d'Eſtampes had told him often, that he was afraid the marriage of the Count de Vertus with the ſiſter of the Lady d'Eſtampes, would be made at his expence, ... That it was very commonly reported, that Longueval managed all the affairs of the Ducheſs (46); and that the Duke often complained of her making him do ſeveral things to his diſadvantage. That the honours which have been beſtow'd on the ſaid Longueval are well enough known, and are owing to the favour of the ſaid Lady. That the ſaid Duke had often complained, that the ſaid Lady receiv'd the monies ariſing from his government of Britany, and that he himſelf did not poſſeſs any thing. That what aggrieved him moſt, was, the contracts made for the Lady d'Avaugour. That the Duke had oftentimes complained to him, .. that he was forced to do ſeveral things, and engage in many contracts to the prejudice of himſelf and his family, according to the pleaſure of the ſaid Ducheſs, of the ſaid de Longueval, and others their aſſociates; wherefore &c.

(d) In the Article of POITIERS (DIANA).

(44) Varill. Hiſt. de Francois I. liv. 11. pag. 96.

(45) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 864.

(46) See the remark [E] Citation (19).

[K] Varillas did not know either the time or the motives of this incident.] This is evident from the preceding remark, but here follow other proofs. Inſtead, ſays he (48), ſpeaking of the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, of endeavouring to gain the favour of the Duke . . . . her huſband, whoſe inſenſible diſpoſition, which was but little inclined to love, might have been amuſed by ſome trifling marks of the King's beneficence, and by empty employments, provided they had been beſtowed on him at the time when he wanted them; ſhe had exaſperated him to ſuch a degree of indecorum, by the moſt odd caprice that ever jealouſy inſpired, by proclaiming himſelf his diſhonour, by the juridical enquiry into the conduct of his wife, already mentioned. This procedure, which made them irreconcileable enemies, deprived the Ducheſs of the hopes of ever returning to her huſband, and brought her to that ebb of miſery, that the Seneſchal's Lady, after the King's death, might make uſe of the ſame huſband, as an inſtrument to torture her, till ſuch time as ſhe ſhould have fully ſatiated her vengeance. We here find that Varillas was fully perſuaded, that the judicial enquiry of the Duke of Eſtampes, had been already made in 1544, in the life time of Francis I, and nevertheleſs it was not made till 1556. Conſequently all the ſpecious arguments he builds on them are ſo many chimæras. This is too dangerous a rock for all ſuch Hiſtorians, as take too much pleaſure in enquiring into the motives of the conduct of Courts, and will not conſult ſufficiently Chronology. We alſo find this Author firmly perſuaded, that an odd caprice of jealouſy, prompted the Duke to take out informations in a legal way againſt his wife; and yet the only motive of them was, in order that he might gain a conſiderable law-ſuit. By the way, Varillas is not the only perſon who pretends, that this Duke was ſo weak as to expoſe his own diſhonour to the eyes of the publick. Abbé de St. Real was of the ſame opinion, he writing as follows (48). " What you have obſerved of Cæſar, " who would not impeach his wife's gallant, brings " to my memory another huſband, whom I heard men- " tioned ſome time ſince, and who was not ſo ſcrupu- " lous. I mean the huſband of the beautiful Ducheſs " d'Eſtampes, the firſt miſtreſs to Francis I. After " the death of this Prince, this ſilly man was deter- " mined to revive a law-ſuit againſt her (49), which " he had not dared to carry on againſt her before, " becauſe of the high regard the King had ſhewn, dur- " ing his whole life, to that Lady; and having occa- " ſion to prove that impoſſibility in Court, he cauſed " an information to be taken out, in which Henry the " IId, and the perſons of the greateſt diſtinction in " his Court, depoſed, at his requeſt, in the moſt de- " cent expreſſions they could employ, the great aſcen- " dant which his wife had over the late King, and the " ſtrict friendſhip that had been between this Prince and " her." Le Laboureur does not vary much from this way of judging. The poor Duke, ſays he (50), muſt have ſuffered very much, in being obliged to leave to poſterity, this injurious monument of his ignonimy and unhappineſs. Thus, we ſee, that there are Writers who think as Varillas does, tho' they do not expreſs themſelves in ſuch ſtrong terms, when he affirms (51), that the Duke of Eſtampes muſt have had little underſtanding, or been very inſenſible, ſince he contributed to his own infamy, by taking as much pains to inveigh againſt his wife, as prudent perſons of quality do to eſtabliſh or raiſe their reputation.

(47) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francis I. liv. 11. pag. 92. ad ann. 1544.

(48) Ceſarion, Entretien 1. pag. 24. edit. de la Haie, 1685.

(49) Le Laboureur ſeems to me much more worthy of credit, he ſaying, Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 864. that the Duke did not go to law with his wife, but with the Count de Vertus his couſin.

(50) Le Laboureur, ibid. pag. 865.

(51) Hiſt. de Henri II, liv. 1. pag. m. 34.

JUSTIFICATION of the Duke d'Eſtampes with regard to the information againſt his Ducheſs.

With ſubmiſſion to theſe Writers, methinks they are a little miſtaken in the ſentence they pronounce againſt this Duke. He is not to be ranked among thoſe huſbands who reflect infamy upon themſelves by publiſhing their being cuckolds. When a man is made a cuckold by a ſuperior power, and takes ſuch ſteps publickly, as plainly ſhew that ſo far from being a voluntary cornuto, he is exaſperated at his not being able to revenge the inſult, he preſerves, in the moſt conſpicuous manner both his honour and reputation If the quality of ſovereign does not blot out the infamy with regard to a miſtreſs, it at leaſt does ſo with reſpect to every huſband who boldly expreſſes his indignation; and a huſband, ſo far from diſhonouring himſelf by bringing public proofs of the contempt in which he has his wife, would on the contrary diſhonour himſelf, ſhould he make himſelf a ſcreen to her; and if to prevent her being thought a leud woman, he ſhould father the children that ſhe might have had by the Prince. I am ſenſible that courtiers give the name of ſtupidity to the ill humour of a huſband, who has not the art of getting penſions, employments, and governments of provinces, by freely conſenting to let his wife indulge their King the laſt favours. But I know on the other ſide, that they deſpiſe every voluntary cuckold who has this art, and throw out many pleaſant jokes about his cornucopiæ or horn of plenty. And it is ſo true, even according to the corrupt judgment and his Tranſcriber (e) have committed. I can ſcarce believe that Francis I ever declared ſeriouſly that he did not lie with this Lady [L], and I very much queſtion whether ſhe would have been pleaſed that this had been credited.

(e) The Author of Galanteries des Rois de France.

If what a learned man aſſerts be true, we muſt conclude that the paſſion which Francis I entertained for her, did not begin at the time in which it is dated (f); that is, upon his return to France, after he had been impriſoned at Madrid; for this learned Gentleman ſuppoſes, that ſhe was the King's miſtreſs before the Conſtable of Bourbon had of the age, that it is honourable in a huſband to deſpiſe his wife who has given up herſelf to the embraces of a Prince; that a Poet would think it a compliment to expreſs ſuch a conduct in an epitaph, a funeral oration, or any piece of that kind; and a Writer would not dare to applaud for having acted in a quite contrary manner, thoſe who ſhould have put up ſuch an affront purely to make their fortunes. Mankind indeed are very much corrupted, but not to ſuch a degree, as to conſider the traffic which a man may make of his wife as honourable. This method is indeed too often employed in order to get riches. It was known to the antient Romans (52); has never been diſuſed; and yet he does not quite ſcreen a huſband from the contempt and ignominy which it deſerves.

(f) In the remark [B].

(52) Scortator erit, cave te roget: ultro Penelopen facilis potiori trade. Horat. Satyr 5. lib. 2. ver. 75.

Beſides, we ought well to weigh the difference there is between our Duke of Eſtampes, and Cæſar, or any other private man who goes to law in order to prove himſelf a cuckold. The gallantries of Cæſar's wife were not public; the parties accuſed did confeſs the fact; the ſame may be ſaid of thoſe proſecutions for adultery which ſometimes come into our courts. But as for the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, ſhe did not deny her being miſtreſs to Francis I. This Prince denied it ſtill leſs (53); ſo that all Europe looked upon their amorous correſpondence, as a certain and indiſputable fact. The Duke therefore did not increaſe his ignominy by ſuch an enquiry; hence we muſt not conclude him to be a ſilly or inſenſible man, becauſe of this information: we ought not to compare him to thoſe huſbands who diſplay adventures, over which they might always have held a curtain. A juridical enquiry is not ſo formidable a monument as hiſtory. Now the Duke of Eſtampes muſt have been firmly perſuaded, that an hundred good Hiſtorians would eternize his wife's adultery; ſince therefore the enquiry might be of great ſervice in a law-ſuit of that conſequence, he deſerves praiſe for cauſing it to be made; for his not making of it would not prevent his ignominy, if there was any from being as public as before.

(53) See the following remark.

I have one circumſtance more to obſerve, which alone would juſtify him, and that is, that he did not make the enquiry in order to prove himſelf a cuckold, but to prove that his wife had ſquandered away a conſiderable part of his eſtate. Ought that man to be blamed, who, in a law-ſuit for the recovery of it, proves by juridical proceedings, that his wife had unjuſtly taken it from him? People fancy, unleſs they examine the thing very attentively, that no wives are more complaiſant to their huſbands, than thoſe who cuckold them. Read one of La Fontaine's tales which relates to the preſent ſubject (54). Therefore the Duke of Eſtampes's adverſaries might have pleaded that his wife had made over ſeveral gifts to him, in order to make him ſubmit patiently to the title with which ſhe had dubbed him: conſequently he was obliged to prove in a juridical way, that ſhe had been the occaſion of his ſuſtaining very great loſſes.

(54) The reader may alſo ſee a book printed in Holland, in 1682, and intitled, Les Privileges du Cocuage, i. e. "The Privileges "of Cuckol-"dom." It is a dialogue between a cuckold and a jealous husband.

Let him therefore not be cenſured, for having added to the title of cuckold in hiſtory, that of cuckold upon record; for the latter was eminently included in the former; and at the ſame time that it could not poſſibly add to his diſhonour, it might ſave him a very conſiderable eſtate. A man may blame as much as he pleaſes thoſe who, not being afraid of having their diſhonour inſerted in the annals of the State, carry it to the Parliament and there regiſter it; but do not blame ſuch who act in this manner, when they are ſure not to eſcape the pens of the moſt faithful Hiſtorians. Count de Buſſy Rabutin received a letter in 1668, where mention is made of a man who was in the former caſe. It is as follows. With regard to Madam's .... letter to Mr. de .... it has not been handed about. The huſband ſhewed it to the King, and gave it to the Parliament. Thus, not being a cuckold in hiſtory, he will be one upon record (55).

(55) Lettres de Buſſi Rabutin, tom. 2. Letter 153. pag. 335. Dutch edit.

[L] I can ſcarce believe that Francis I ever declared ſeriouſly, that he did not lie with this Lady.] The Author whom I contradict here, is not conſiderable enough for me to have any ſcruples with regard to the liberty I take with him. His words are theſe. King Francis being therefore releaſed from priſon, and returning out of Spain, the Queen Regent his mother came to meet him at Bourdeaux, with a great train of Ladies and Gentlewomen, among whom was Anne of Piſſeleu, who was afterwards Counteſs of Pontievre, and at laſt Ducheſs of Eſtampes, on her huſband's account. This Lady was afterwards always in favour with the King, he doing for her what he would have denied another perſon. And tho' diſhoneſt ſuſpicions were raiſed on account of this intimacy, yet the King cleared himſelf, proteſting that the only motive of his loving that Lady was for her gracefulneſs and ſprightly humour. Be this as it will, it is thought that he lay with her, ſince he was pretty fond of the fair ſex, which was the only vice that could be objected to this Prince (56). It is altogether improbable that this Prince ever proteſted in earneſt, that there never was any indecent commerce between him and the Ducheſs of Eſtampes. He had too much ſenſe, and knew the world too well, not to be ſenſible, that no perſon would give credit to ſuch proteſtations, as the love he had for the fair-ſex was not a ſecret to any one. Beſides, according to the taſte that then prevailed, he would have been afraid of being deſpiſed by his whole Court, had he paſſed for a young Prince, who had ſo long been the ſervant of a beautiful young Lady, without aſking, or receiving the leaſt favour from her. The proteſtation which is aſcribed to him would not be ſo improbable, had he begun to addreſs that Ducheſs at a time when both were in a mature age; but he ſeemed to have fallen in love with her, the inſtant he was returned from his confinement, at which time he was but thirty two years of age, and Madam de Heilly was a very charming young Lady. It is probable that he was not urgent to bring matters to a concluſion, and was not ſoon indulged his ſofteſt wiſhes? Had the fair one's virtue been inſurmountable, he doubtleſs would have fixed his paſſion upon ſome other object, before the year had been expired. But I don't find any Author ſo ſilly, as to applaud our Anne of Piſſeleu for her chaſtity. The credulity of the Author whom I refute, ſtopped in the middle of its career; for, if he was perſuaded that Francis I made a proteſtation of his innocence, he did not believe that his proteſtation deſerved credit. If it merited belief, and if the Ducheſs had been a Proteſtant, thoſe of that perſuaſion would have had, in their communion, the greateſt model of chaſtity that the world could ever boaſt. In this caſe the Ducheſs would have excelled, with reſpect to this virtue, not only the Virgins in the Martyrology, but alſo the Heroines of Romance. Let not the reader wonder at this parallel; I am not the firſt who has aſſerted (57) that the fictitious examples of virtue, which are found in our voluminous Romances formerly (58), were carried to a greater height than the practice of the moſt holy women. For the Heroines of Romance preſerve themſelves pure and inſullied, in the midſt of a court, tho' vigorouſly addreſſed by a very accompliſh'd lover whom they adore, tho' they are ſtole from time to time, and are ever ſurrounded with the moſt dangerous temptations. The chaſtity of Nuns, and of Virgin-martyrs, has not the ſame difficulties to ſurmount; and therefore is not ſo ſurprizing as that of the Ladies in Clelia would be. But as the latter, at the expiration of two or three years, found a period put to all their troubles, by their being happily married; their unſullied virtue does not equal that which muſt be aſcribed to the Ducheſs of Eſtampes, in caſe the King never enjoyed her.

(56) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Proſogr. tom. 3. pag. 2347.

(57) See Abbé de Villiers, in his Reflexions ſur les Defaute d'autrui.

(58) Caſſandra, Cleopatra, Cyrus, Clelia, &c.

had gone over to Charles V. Now the Conſtable did this in 1523, and Francis I was not releaſed till 1526.

☞EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS, an eminent Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtorian in the ſixth Century, was born at Epiphania, a city of Syria Secunda [A], about the year 536 or 537 (a). At four years of age, he was committed by his parents to the care of a School-maſter, in order to learn Grammar (b). Two years after, the peſtilence raging in the Eaſt [B], he was ſeized with it, as he informs us himſelf (c). After he had quitted

(a) Vide Henric. Valeſium in Vitâ Evagrii, & ejuſdem Notas in Evagr. Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 29.

(b) Valeſ. in Vita Evagrii, and Cave, Hiſt. Literar. pag. 355. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(c) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 29.

[A] Born at Epiphania, a city of Syria Secunda.] He ſtiles himſelf Ἐπιφανεὺς in the title of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; and in his third Book, c. 34. he aſſerts, that he was born at Epiphania. For ſpeaking there concerning Coſmas Biſhop of that city, his words are theſe; Κοσμᾶς τὴν ἡμετέραν, ἐπισκοπῶν Ἐπιφάνειαν, ἣ τὸν Ὀρόντην σύνοιχον ἔχει &c. i. e. "Coſmas, Biſhop of "our Epiphania, near which the River Orontes runs." Beſides this Photius (1) affirms, that he was born at Epiphania, a city of Cœloſyria. But it is very ſtrange, that Nicephorus Calliſtus in two places calls our Evagrius, not Ἐπιφανεὺς, i. e. "of Epiphania," but Ἐπιφανὴς, i. e. "illuſtrious." For in Nicephorus's firſt Book c. 1. his words are theſe: Ὅγε μὴν Εὐάγριος ὁ ἐπιφανὴς. And in Book xvi. c. 31. Nicephorus quoting a paſſage of Evagrius out of his third Book, c. 34. (which paſſage is above cited) expreſſes himſelf thus, οἷα δὲ καὶ Εὐάγριος ὁ ἐπιφανὴς περὶ Σεϋήρου ἱστόρησεν. But Henry Valeſius (2) is of opinion, that the Tranſcribers have committed an error in both theſe places, and have written Ἐπιφανὴς inſtead of Ἐπιφανεὺς. For Nicephorus might have evidently ſeen from Evagrius's words quoted by him, that the latter was born at Epiphania. Gerard John Voſſius (3) has erroneouſly aſſerted, that our Author was born at Antioch.

(1) Biblioth. XXIX.

(2) De Vitâ & Scriptis Evagrii.

(3) Addend. ad lib. 2. cap. 23. de Hiſtoricis Græcis.

[B] Two years after the peſtilence raging in the Eaſt.] This peſtilence is ſaid to have begun in the year after Baſilius's Conſulſhip, which was in the year of the Chriſtian Æra 543, as it is atteſted by Victor Turonenſis in his Chronicon, and by the Continuator of Marcellinus Comes's Chronicon. Baronius affirms this plague to have begun in the year 544. Evagrius tells us (4), that it raged for two and fifty years, and in a manner deſtroyed the whole earth, πᾶσαν γῆν ἐπινεμηθείσης. He informs us, that two years after Antioch had been taken by the Perſians, this peſtilential diſeaſe began to rage, in ſome reſpects like that recorded by Thucydides (5), though in others different from it. It took its riſe from Ethiopia, as it was then reported; but by turns overrun the whole world, leaving no perſon untouched. Some cities were ſo greatly oppreſſed by this calamity, that they became wholly empty of inhabitants; but in other places it was leſs fatal. Nor did it rage at any certain and ſet ſeaſon of the year; nor, after it had raged, did it recede in the ſame manner. It ſeized ſome places in the beginning of winter, others in the ſpring, others in the ſummer, and others in autumn. In ſome cities, when it had ſeized ſome parts, it left others uninfected. And one might frequently ſee in a city not infected ſome families utterly deſtroyed; but in other places, one or two families having been conſumed, the reſt of the city for the future continued untouched by the diſtemper. But after a more accurate inſpection into the matter, it was found, that thoſe families, which had remained untouched, were the year following the only ones, which ſuffered by this diſeaſe. But what was moſt wonderful was, that if it happened, that the inhabitants of the cities infected removed to any other place, where this diſtemper raged not, they were the only perſons ſeized with theſe diſeaſes. Theſe things happened frequently both in cities and other places at the periods of thoſe Cycles termed the Indictions; but eſpecially in the ſecond year of each Indiction almoſt a total deſtruction befel mankind. This diſtemper conſiſted of a complication of diſeaſes. For in ſome it began from the head, and having made the eyes bloody, and ſwelled the face, it deſcended into the throat, and cut off the perſon ſeized with it. In others it occaſioned a violent diarrhœa; in others bubo's, and afterwards high fevers, which put an end to them in two or three days, being as ſound in body and mind, as thoſe who had been afflicted with no diſtemper. Others became diſtracted and mad, and ſo ended their lives. Carbuncles breaking out deſtroyed a great many. Some perſons having been once or twice ſeized, and having eſcaped with their lives, were afterwards infected again, and died. The manner likewiſe of contracting this diſeaſe was very various and unaccountable. Some periſhed merely by converſing and living together; others by a touch only; others by entering into an houſe; others in the Forum. Some having fled out of infected cities, continued uninfected themſelves, but imparted the diſeaſe to thoſe, who were not infected. Others eſcaped infection, tho' they had lived with many infected perſons, and had touched not only perſons diſtempered, but likewiſe thoſe, who died of it. Others, tho' they endeavoured to deſtroy themſelves, becauſe of the loſs of their children or families, and for this purpoſe were perpetually converſant with the infected, yet after all were not ſeized with the diſeaſe. Evagrius obſerves, that he was ſeized with the bubo's in the beginning of this peſtilence, while he was young at the Grammar-ſchool; and that he afterwards loſt during the ſeveral ſtages of it many of his children, his wife, his daughter, his grandſon, and ſeveral of his relations, and ſervants. Procopius (6) has likewiſe given us an account of this plague, with as much art and exactneſs, ſays Dr. Freind (7), and as much in the language of Phyſic, as if he had been a profeſſed Phyſician. We ſhall tranſcribe the account here in Dr. Howell's words (8), that the Reader may compare it with that of Evagrius abovecited. "This was a plague, which almoſt conſumed mankind, of which Procopius concludes there "was no other cauſe than the immediate hand of God "himſelf. For it neither came upon one part of the "world alone, nor in one ſeaſon of the year, whence "ſubtile wits (as he ſaith) might fetch pretenſions. "It afflicted the whole world, and all conditions of "men, tho' of never ſo contrary a nature and diſpoſition, ſparing no conſtitution nor age. The difference of men as to their places of dwelling, diet, "complexions, inclinations, or any other thing, did "no good in this diſeaſe. Some took it in ſummer, "ſome in winter, and others in other ſeaſons. It "began among the Egyptians of Peluſium, and ſpread "to Alexandria with the reſt of Egypt one way, and "the other to thoſe parts of Paleſtine, which border "upon Egypt. From thence it travelled to the utmoſt bounds of the world, as by ſet journies and "ſtages, making deſtruction its only buſineſs, and "ſparing neither iſland, cave, nor top of mountain, "where mankind inhabited; for if it leaped over a "country, returning afterward, it left no cauſe to rejoice above its fellows. It began ſtill at the ſea-coaſt, "and thence went to the inland parts. In the ſecond "year of its progreſs it arrived at Conſtantinople "about the middle of the ſpring, where it was the "fortune of Procopius then to reſide. Apparitions "of ſpirits in all ſhapes human were ſeen by "many, who thought the man they met ſtruck "them in ſome part of the body; and ſo ſoon "as they ſaw the ſpirit, they were ſeized with "the diſeaſe. At firſt when they met them, they repeated divine names, and fled into Churches to no "purpoſe. Afterwards they were afraid to hear their "friends call them, locking themſelves up in their "chambers, and ſtopping their ears. Some dreamed "they ſaw ſuch ſights; others heard a voice tell them "they were enrolled in the number appointed to die. "But moſt without warning became feveriſh ſuddenly; "their bodies changed not colour, nor were hot; the "fever being ſo remiſs till evening, that neither the "patient nor Phyſician by his pulſe could apprehend any "danger. Yet to ſome the ſame day, to others the "next, or many days after, aroſe a bubo both in the "groin, the arm-holes, under the ear, and in other "parts. Theſe were the general ſymptoms which "happened alike to all the viſited perſons." There were others different, whether ſo made by the diverſity of bodies, or the will and pleaſure of him that ſent the diſtemper, our Author cannot ſay. Some were ſeized with drowſineſs and ſlumbering; others with a ſharp diſtraction: the ſlumberers forgot all things; if they were

(4) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 4. cap. 29.

(5) Lib. 2.

(6) De Bello Gothico.

(7) Hiſtory of Phyſick, Part. 1. pag. 143. edit. London 1725, in 8vo.

(8) Hiſtory of the World.

ted the Grammar-School, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Rhetoric, and making a great progreſs in that art was regiſtred among the Advocates; whence he obtained the name of Scholaſticus [C]. It is very probable that he practiſed Law at Antioch [D], where he gained the friendſhip of George the Patriarch of that city, who made our Author his Aſſeſſor and Counſellor, and carried him along with him to Conſtantinople, when he appealed to the Emperor and a Synod upon an accuſation of inceſt charged upon him by a Silver-Smith before Johannes, Comes of the Eaſt (d). In the reign of Tiberius Conſtantinus he had the dignity of Quæſtor conferred upon him; and looked to, ſome would eat, ſome that were neglected, ſtarved to death. Thoſe who were diſtracted were vexed with apparitions, crying there were men to kill them, and running away; being ſo troubleſome and unruly, that their keepers were pitied as much as they themſelves. No Phyſician or other caught the diſeaſe by touching ſick or dead bodies; many ſtrangely continuing free, tho' they tended and buried infected perſons, and many catching it they knew not how, and dying inſtantly. Many leaped into the water, tho' not for thirſt, and ſome into the ſea. Some without ſlumbering or madneſs had their bubo gangrened, and died with extreme pain; which doubtleſs happened alſo to thoſe that had the phrenſy, tho' being not themſelves they underſtood it not. Some Phyſicians hereupon conceiving the venom and head of the diſeaſe to lie in thoſe plague-ſores, opened the dead bodies, and ſearching the ſores, found an huge carbuncle growing inward. Such whoſe bodies were ſpotted with black pimples the bigneſs of a lentile, lived not a day. Many died of vomiting blood. Some that were given over by the moſt eminent Phyſicians unexpectedly recovered; others, of whoſe recovery they thought themſelves ſecure, ſuddenly periſhed. No cauſe of this ſickneſs could be reached by man's reaſon. Some received benefit by bathing, and others it hurt. Many died for want of cure, and many eſcaped without it. In a word, no way could there be found of preſervation, either by preventing the ſickneſs, or maſtering the diſeaſe, no cauſe appearing either of their falling ſick, or of their recovery. " Women with " child which were viſited, certainly died; ſome miſ- " carrying, ſome fairly delivered, and ſome periſhing " with their children. Three women only were ſafely " brought to bed, and recovered, their children dying; " and one died, whoſe child had the hap to live. " Such as had their ſores great and running plenti- " fully, eſcaped; the violence of the carbuncle being " thereby aſſwaged; and this was the moſt certain " ſign of health. Such whoſe ſores ſtaid, as they " firſt aroſe, underwent the miſerable accident formerly " mentioned. Some had their thighs withered, when " the ſores roſe upon them, and did not run. Some " eſcaped with diminiſhed tongues, and lived ſtam- " mering, or uttering ſounds without diſtinction all " their days. In Conſtantinople this peſtilence laſted " four months, raging three months with all extremity. " In the beginning few died more than uſual. Then " it growing hotter and hotter, it came to five, and " at laſt to ten thouſand and more every day. At " firſt they buried their dead carefully; but at length " all came to confuſion, and many lay long unburied. " Servants were without maſters; rich men had none " to attend them. In the afflicted city was little to " be ſeen but empty houſes, no trade going or ſhops " open. The Emperor was much concerned, as he " had reaſon, and committed the overſight of the poor " to Theodorus, one of the Referendarii that ſubſcribed " the Emperor's anſwers to petitions; who to thoſe " that were in want diſtributed money out of the trea- " ſury. To theſe paſſages Procopius adds, that many " out of fear leſt their bad courſes of life, and conſe- " crated themſelves to God; and many when the dan- " ger was over, fell to their old deſpiſing of God again."

(d) Valeſ. in Vitâ Evagrii.

Dr. Howel obſerves, that ſince this plague continued the ſpace of two and fifty years, and outlived Procopius, no wonder, if in ſo long a time, and ſo various climates and countries, it changed its ſymptoms, and varied ſomething from thoſe accidents, which fell out in his days. Yet the deſcription of Evagrius differs very little from that of his. . . . But whereas the Hiſtory of Procopius was ſufficiently known to the world, and particularly to Evagrius himſelf, who has taken, as all learned men know, much out of it, it is a great wonder he ſhould ſay, that the Hiſtory of this plague was not penned, till the time he undertook it; for we cannot in the leaſt imagine, but it was the ſelf ſame plague they both ſpeak of. Dr. Freind remarks upon this (9), that it was no doubt the ſame plague they both ſpeak of, viz. that which laſted 52 years, and began in the Eaſt, as Agathias relates, in the fifth of Juſtinian; tho' to make his account agree with that of Procopius, it ſhould be read the fifteenth. The Doctor adds (10), that there is this further diſtinction to be made in the caſe, that Procopius only deſcribed it as it appeared the ſecond year at Conſtantinople; and that Evagrius gave ſuch an account of it, as fell within his own obſervations many years after, as he aſſures us himſelf; for when it firſt began, he was but a child and learning his Grammar, tho' indeed he had the plague at that time. So that we may eaſily perceive the true reaſon why theſe Authors differ in ſome points. The latter for example, relates one circumſtance as very wonderful, that no native of an infected town, tho' he was in a region diſtant from the infection, found any advantage in changing the climate; for ſuch a one was ſure to be ſingled out as a ſacrifice to this diſtemper, which raged among his countrymen. A fact, in which perhaps the veracity of the Author would have been called in queſtion, had not there been a parallel inſtance in more modern times in the caſe of the ſweating ſickneſs in England.

(9) Ubi ſupra. pag. 152, 153.

(10) Ibid. pag. 153.

[C] Was regiſtred among the Advocates, whence he obtained the name of Scholaſticus.] This term ſignifies a Lawyer, as Macarius informs us in his fifteenth Homily, in theſe words: " He that deſires to have a " knowledge in forenſic cauſes, goes and learns the " Notes [Letters or Abbreviatures;] and when he hath " been the firſt there, he goes to the ſchool of the Ro- " mans, where he is the laſt of all. Again when he comes " to be the firſt there, he goes away to the ſchool of the " Pragmatici [or Practicants,] where he is again the " laſt of all, and Arcarius [or Novice.] Then, when " he is made a Scholaſticus, he is Novice, and the laſt " of all the Lawyers. Again, when he comes to be " firſt there, then he is made a Preſident [or Governor " of a Province]; and when he is made a Preſident, " he takes to himſelf an Aſſiſtant [Counſellor] or Aſ- " ſeſſor. Ὁ θέλων μαθεῖν πράγματα, ἀπέρχεται καὶ μανθάνει τὰ σημεῖα· καὶ ὅταν γένηται ἐκεῖ πρῶτος, ἀπέρχεται εἰς τὴν σχολὴν τῶν Ρωμαικῶν· πάλιν ἐκεῖ ὅταν γένηται πρῶτος, ἀπέρχεται πρὸς τὴν σχολὴν τῶν πραγματικῶν, καὶ ἔσι πάλιν ἐκεῖ ὅλων ἔσχατος, ἀρχάριος. εἶτα ὅταν γένηται σχολαςικὸς, ὅλων τῶν δικολόγων ἀρχάριος καὶ ἔσχατος ἐσὶ, πάλιν ὅταν γένηται πρῶτος, τοτε γένεται ἡγεμών. Καὶ ὅταν γένηται ἄρχων, λαμβάνει ἑαυτῷ βοηθὸν τὸν συγκάθεδρον. In this paſſage Valeſius has corrected the common reading ὁ θέλων μαθεῖν γράμματα, by ſubſtituting the word πράγματα inſtead of γράμματα.

[D] It is very probable, that he practiſed the Law at Antioch.] It is certain, as Valeſius obſerves, that he could not be an advocate at Epiphania, where he was born, ſince that city had no Judiciary Forum, but brought its cauſes to Apamia, in which the Conſularis of Syria Secunda held a Court of Judicature. The principal reaſon why he may be ſuppoſed to have been an Advocate at Antioch, rather than at Apamia, is, that he was moſtly converſant in that city, where he married a wife, and had ſons by her. He gave his daughter likewiſe in marriage in that city, as he informs us himſelf (11); and after ſhe, together with her ſon, died, in the tenth year of Mauricius, Evagrius being deprived of his wife and children, married again, and took to wife a young virgin of that city, which upon that occaſion kept an holiday, and celebrated a public feſtivity, both in pompous ſhews, and about his marriage-bed (12). Whence by the way, it appears, of how great authority he was at Antioch. Beſides he wrote his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory at Antioch, as may be inferred from the 20*th Chapter* of his firſt Book, where ſpeaking concerning the Empreſs Eudocia's journey to Jeruſalem, he ſays, that ſhe came to Antioch; χρόνοις ὕσ- ςερον ἐπὶ τὴν ἁγίαν ἐπειγομένη Χριςῷ τῷ Θεῷ ἡμῶν πόλιν, ἐν- ταῦθα

(11) Lib. 4. cap. 29.

(12) Lib. 6. cap. 8.

and not long after, when he had made an Oration in praiſe of Mauricius Auguſtus upon the birth of Theodoſius, he was appointed Prefect by Mauricius (e). After this he publiſhed ſix Books of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory [E], beginning with the year 431, where Theodoret, Socrates, and Sozomen conclude; and ending with the 12th year of the Emperor Mauricius, which was the year of our Lord 594. It is not certain when he died. Photius tells us (f), that his ſtyle is not unpleaſant, but is ſometimes too redundant; but that of all the Greek Hiſtorians he has moſt ſtrictly adhered to the Orthodox Faith. However, Valeſius obſerves, that he has been leſs diligent in collecting the monuments of Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity, than thoſe of Profane Hiſtory. And indeed, almoſt his whole ſixth Book is ſpent in an account of the Perſian War. Dr. Cave remarks likewiſe (g), that he is too credulous in relating upon all occaſions fabulous ſtories relating to miracles ſaid to be performed by the Croſs and Relicks of Saints. Beſides his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory he wrote a Volume of Letters, Relations, Decrees, Orations, and Diſputations; the greateſt part of which were written in the name of Gregory Patriarch of Antioch (h); but theſe are now loſt; as is likewiſe his Panegyrick to the Emperor Mauricius upon the birth of Theodoſius (i).

(e) Evagr. lib. 6. cap. 24.

(f) Bibliothec. Cod. 29.

(g) Pag. 355.

(h) Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 24.

(i) Ibid.

τοῦδα τε γίνεται: i. e. "A long time after, in her "journey which ſhe made to the holy city of Chriſt "our God, ſhe comes hither [viz. to Antioch]." Evagrius therefore lived at Antioch, when he wrote this. Hence it is, that he is ſo diligent in giving an account of the Works and public Edifices of that city, as may be ſeen in his firſt Book, Chap. 18. and in his third Book, Chap. 28. where he plainly intimates, that he lived at Antioch whilſt he wrote theſe things. Hence likewiſe it is, that he mentions with ſo much care and diligence, the earthquakes with which Antioch was ſometimes ſhaken; and that in the notation of the times, he always makes uſe of the Antiochean year. Laſtly, this may be collected from the ſeventh Chapter of his ſixth Book, where he relates, that Gregory Patriarch of Antioch having been accuſed before Joannes, Comes of the Eaſt, by a Silver-ſmith, and appealing to the Emperor and a Synod, went to Conſtantinople, and took our Author along with him, as his Aſſeſſor and Counſellor. By which words Evagrius plainly enough declares himſelf to have been an Advocate and a Lawyer. For Aſſeſſors were uſually taken out of their body as well by the civil as Military Magiſtrates.

[E] After this he publiſhed ſix Books of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.] This Work was publiſhed in Greek by Robert Stephens at Paris 1544 in fol; at Geneva in Greek and Latin in 1612 in fol. and at Paris 1673 in fol. with a new Verſion and Notes by Henry Valeſius. T.

EUCLID, born in Megara, and a Diſciple of Socrates [A], did not purſue the ſtudies of his Maſter; for inſtead of applying himſelf to the doctrine of Morality, he refined upon the ſubtilties of Logic. He founded a ſect which is conſidered as a branch, or rather a continuation of the ſchool of Xenophanes, of Parmenides, and Zeno Eleates (a). Thoſe who followed his method of philoſophizing, were called Megarici; afterwards Diſputers, and laſtly Dialectici or Logicians (b). We know very little concerning the particulars of his tenets; and it is difficult to comprehend any thing in his doctrine concerning the nature of Good [B]. He employed only concluſions in his diſputes;

(a) Cic. Academ. Quæſt. lib. 4. cap. 42.

(b) Diogen. Laert. lib. 1, 2. num. 106.

[A] The Diſciple of Socrates.] Cicero (1), Strabo (2), and Diogenes Laertius (3) aſſert this; but none of them have related a very curious circumſtance, which we meet with in Aulus Gellius, viz. that Euclid, not daring to go to Athens, becauſe the Athenians had pronounced ſentence of death againſt all the Megarenſes who ſhould go thither, went to that city by night, diſguiſed in women's apparel; and after having received the inſtructions of Socrates, returned to Megara the next day, in the ſame diſguiſe. It is to be obſerved, that he had been the diſciple of this Philoſopher, before this ſevere Decree had been made by the Athenians. Decreto ſuo Athenienſes caverant, ut, qui Megaris civis eſſet, ſi intuliſſe Athenas pedem prehenſus eſſet, ut ea res ei homini capitalis eſſet. . . Tum Euclides, qui indidem Megaris erat, quique ante id Decretum & eſſe Athenis & audire Socratem conſueverat, poſtquam id Decretum ſanxerunt, ſub noctem quum adveſperaſſet, tunica longa muliebri indutus & pallio verſicolore amictus, & caput rica velatus, è domo ſua Megaris Athenas ad Socratem commeabat; ut vel noctis aliquo tempore conſiliorum ſermonumque ejus fieret particeps; rurſuſque ſub lucem millia paſſuum paulo amplius viginti, eadem veſte illa tectus redibat (4). Aulus Gellius relates in this place, what he had heard from a celebrated platonic Philoſopher, named Taurus, who at the ſame time was making a compariſon between what had been practiſed towards Socrates, and the cuſtoms of the Philoſophers in that Age. We now, ſays he, ſee Philoſophers go and teach in the houſes of the rich, and ſtay till noon in order that their diſciples may have evaporated the fumes of the laſt night's wine. At nunc, inquit, videre eſt Philoſophos ultro currere, ut doceant, ad fores juvenum divitum; eoſque ibi ſedere atque opperiri prope ad meridiem, donec diſcipuli nocturnum omne vinum edormiant (5). Many people who read this, will call to mind the Bourgeois Gentilhomme of Moliere, one of the moſt agreeable Scenes (6), of which conſiſts of a Maſter in Philoſophy, a Muſic-Maſter, a Dancing-Maſter, a Fencing-Maſter &c. I know not whether Ariſtophanes and Lucian ever rallied more ſeverely the Philoſophers than Moliere has done in this place. He repreſents them as men who go and teach in families after the ſame manner as Dancing-Maſters, and Fencing-Maſters; and he afterwards ſuppoſes that they fall out with thoſe Maſters, and are heartily drubbed by them. It is to be obſerved, that the Civil Law has been as much debaſed as Philoſophy. Moſt of the young Law-Students uſed to have a Prompter of Inſtitutes come to them; and did not give themſelves the trouble to frequent the public Lectures. Mr. le Tellier, who died Chancellor of France, made ſome regulations againſt this abuſe.

(1) Cicero, Acad. Quæſt. lib. 4. cap. 42.

(2) Strabo, lib. 9. circa init. pag. m. 271.

(3) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. in Socrate, num. 47.

(4) Aul. Gell. lib. 6. cap. 10.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) The 3d of Act 1.

[B] It is difficult to comprehend any thing in his doctrine concerning the Nature of Good.] He made it but one under different names. It is ſometimes, ſays he, called Prudence, ſometimes God, at other times Underſtanding, and ſo on (7). He rejected all things contrary to Good, and even taught that they had no exiſtence (8). Such is the account that is given of his doctrine by Diogenes Laertius; but Cicero ſpeaks of it in the manner following: Euclides Socratis diſcipulus Megareus, à quo iidem illi Megarici dicti, qui id bonum ſolum eſſe dicebant quod eſſet unum & ſimile, & idem & ſemper (9). i. e. "Euclid, the diſciple of "Socrates, was a native of Megara, from whom "thoſe were called Megarici, who aſſerted that to "be the only Good which was one, ſimilar, invariable and eternal." Either Cicero or Diogenes Laertius muſt have given a wrong account of this tenet of Euclid; for if there be but one Good; and if Good for ever reſembles itſelf, and is always one, as Cicero ſuppoſes, how could prudence, God, and the underſtanding be called the Good? Are not the pru-

(7) Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 106.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Cicer. Acad. Quæſt. lib. 4. cap. 42.

putes [C]; from whence we may form a judgment of the ardour and impetuosity with which he blended them. We also may judge from thence of the turn of mind with which he inspired his Disciples, viz. a furious passion for disputation (c). Eubulides, who succeeded him, invented curious sophisms, that were exceedingly captious and perplexing [D]. Alexinus dence and understanding of man different from God? Are they like to God? Do they form a simple and individual essence with God? It is my sincere opinion that none of these Authors had a just idea of the doctrine of the Megarenses; and that even these did not either understand it, or not give a good explication of it. We therein have a glimpse of some of the rays of what our Divines teach concerning the Nature of sovereign Good. Our Euclid also seems to have had some little idea of what they teach with regard to the nature of Evil. They say that Evil is nothing; and that it consists in mere privation. But who could the Megarenses think would believe that diseases, afflictions, vices, and all other things contrary to good, are chimæra's that have no real existence? Their System in this respect was a perfect chaos.

(c) See the remark [D].

[C] He employed only Conclusions in his Disputes.] Here follow the words of Diogenes Laertius (10): Ταῖς τε ἀποδείξεσιν ἐνίσατο, ὡ κατὰ λήμματα, ἀλλὰ κατ' ἐπιφοράν. Utebatur probationibus, non his quæ per assumptiones, sed quæ per conclusiones fiunt. This Latin Version is better than that of Aldobrandinus, which I shall here transcribe: Argumentorum conclusiones non sumptionibus, sed conclusionibus refellendis oppugnabat. To speak with greater freedom; Aldobrandinus's version is good for nought. It is in vain for him to cite Cicero, who has observed; that the word ἀπόδειξις signifies Argumenti conclusio (11), and that the word λῆμμα signifies sumptio (12); he will never persuade one, that there is sense in the following words, to combat the conclusions of arguments, not by refuting the propositions, but by refuting the conclusions. In my opinion Gassendi here has perfectly well explained the thought of Diogenes Laertius. Duo fere solum, says he (13), novimus ex Laërtio, unum quod soleret Euclides cæterorum demonstrationibus non sumptionibus impugnare, sed conclusionibus duntaxat, nimirum quasi consequutiones forent satis perspicuæ, illationes congerebat, Ergo, Ergo, Ergo; quæ arguendi ratio, quasi respirare non sinens, est omnium urgentissima, quare & cum hoc modo foret instans, premens, ac vehemens, notatus fuit à Timone quasi quandam Litigii, seu contentionis rabiem λύσσαν ἐριστικὴν Megaricis inspiravisset. Alterum quod &c. i. e. "There "are two things, says he, for the knowledge of which "we are chiefly indebted to Laertius: the one, that "Euclid used to combat the propositions of others, "not by assumptions, but barely by Conclusions; "and, as tho' the consequences had been sufficiently evident, he used to heap inference upon inference, Therefore, Therefore, Therefore; which "manner of reasoning, not allowing as it were a "man time to take breath, is of all other the most "forcible. Timon censured him for his heat, vehemence and overbearing way; as having thereby inspired the Megarenses with a litigious frenzy. The "other &c." Doubtless nothing is more apt to puzzle and confound those who maintain a Thesis, than for a disputant to heap conclusions one on the other, therefore, therefore, therefore, which was Euclid's custom.

(10) Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 107.

(11) Cicero, in Quæst. Academ. lib. 4. cap. 8.

(12) Idem, de Divinat. lib. 2. cap. 53.

(13) Gassend. de Logic. cap. 3. pag. 40. tom. 1. Operum.

[D] Eubulides . . . invented various Sophisms that were exceedingly subtle and perplexing.] Here follow their names: The liar, the deceiver, the Electra, the veil'd, the Sorites, the horrid, the bald (14). The Reader will find, in Gassendi (15), a good explication of all these Sophisms, supported by examples. The same is also found in Menage (16). I shall only shew what the liar was. A man was supposed, who said I lie; and afterwards the reasoning was carried on in such a manner, that from what he said true, it was concluded that he lied; and from what he lied in, it was inferred that he spoke truth. Si dicis te mentiri, verumque dicis, mentiris: dicis autem te mentiri, verumque dicis, mentiris igitur (17). To puzzle the more, it was observed, that in arguments resembling this with regard to the form, the conclusion was true; how then dare you reject the Conclusion of this, said they, whilst you admit that of others? Cicero observes that Chrysippus, who himself started these difficulties, was not able to solve them. Qui potes hanc non probare, quum probaveris ejusdem generis superiorem? Hæc Chrysippea sunt ne ab ipso quidem dissoluta (18). The same sophism was built on what Epimenides, who was a Cretan had asserted, viz. that all the Cretans were liars. He therefore, was it concluded, told a lie in asserting this; the Cretans therefore are not liars; they therefore are worthy of belief, Epimenides's assertion must therefore be credited, and therefore all the Cretans are liars. Aristotle (19) has acknowledged that these sophistries are almost inexplicable. Africanus the Civilian having proposed a case in which the knot was indissoluble, compares it to the sophism in question. Dixi τῶν ἀπόρων hanc quæstionem esse: qui tractatus apud Dialecticos τῷ ψευδομένῳ dicitur, etenim quidquid constituerimus verum esse, falsum reperietur (20). i. e. "I declared that this argument was one "of the unresolvable, which the Logicians call the "Liar; for whatever we lay down as true, will be "found false." It is pleasant to hear how Seneca laughs at those who used to trifle away their time in these vain subtilties. Quid me detines in eo, quem tu ipse Pseudomenon appellas, de quo tantum librorum compositum est? Ecce tota mihi vita mentitur: hanc coargue, hanc ad verum, si acutus es, redige (21). i. e. "Why "do you perplex me so much with what you yourself "call Pseudomenos (Liar), on which so many Books "have been written? . . . Come on; my whole life is "a lie: do you disprove this: Do you, if it is in the "power of your art, shew this to be true." Some, by too intense a meditation on these things, fell into a consumption that killed them, which circumstance was mentioned in their Epitaph (22): Κινδυνεύεις ἦν ποτε διὰ ταῦτας φροντίδας, ὥσπερ ὁ Κῷος Φιλητᾶς ζητῶν τὸν καλούμενον Ψευδόλογον τῶν λόγων, ὁμοίως ἐκεῖνον διαλυθῆναι. ἰσχνὸς γὰρ πάνυ τὸ σῶμα διὰ τὰς ζητήσεις γενόμενος, ἀπέθανεν· ὡς τὸ πρὸ τῆς μνημείου αὐτῆς ἐπίγραμμα δηλοῖ.

(14) Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 108.

(15) Gassend. de Logic. cap. 3. pag. 40. tom. 1. Operum.

(16) Menag. in Laert. lib. 2. num. 108.

(17) Cicero, Academ. Quæst. lib. 4. cap. 28, 29.

(18) Idem, ibid.

(19) Aristot. Ethic. ad Nicomach. lib. 7. cap. 3.

(20) Africanus, L. LXXXVIII, D ad L. Falcid. Vide ibi Cujacium, item Menag. in Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 108.

(21) Senec. Ep. 45. pag. m. 241.

(22) Athen. lib. 9. pag. 401, E. See also Hesychius Illustrius, in Philetæ.

Ξεῖνε Φιλητᾶς εἰμὶ λόγων ὁ Ψευδόμενός με
Ὤλεσε, καὶ νυκτῶν φροντίδες ἰσπέριαι.

"There is danger, lest, by meditating too intensely
"on these subjects, you, like Philetas of Coos, should "come to your end. For he thereby fell into a con"sumption, and died, as we find by the following "words engraved on his tomb.

"Here lies Philetas, lost by captious wiles,
"Which day and night, incessant, he pursued."

It might then be said, without an hyperbole or figure, that Eubulides's inventions were so many sophisms fit to kill people. The subtilties of Stilpo, his fellow-disciple, were now no less murthering (23). This brings near to truth what Timon the Phliasian objected to our Euclid. His expression rage or frenzy in disputation, becomes thereby less hyperbolical.

(23) See the text of this Article, Citation (e).

Ἀλλ' ἔμοι τούτων Φλειάσιος μέλει, οὐδὲ γὰρ ἄλλου
Οὐδενός, ὦ Φαίδων, ὅτις γέ μιν, ἢ δ' ἐριδάντεω
Εὐκλείδου, Μεγαρῆσιν ὃς ἔμβαλε λύσσαν ἐριστικὴν (24).

(24) Timon, apud Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 107. pag. m. 142.

"I value not these triflers nor their clan,
"Nor Phædo, nor the ever-wrangling Euclid,
"From whom the Megarensians catch'd their rage."

I am to observe, that the Schoolmen tried their skill on this subject. We need but see what they relate concerning the propositions called by them Seipsas falsificantes (25).

Having expatiated sufficiently on the Sorites in another place (26), it would be unnecessary to take farther notice of it in this place. I shall only observe, that the sophism called the bald was a kind of Sorites; and that it consisted in enquiring the exact number of hairs that must be taken away from a man's head to make it bald. Are one or two sufficient? You must answer, No. The person continued to ask whether three, four, five, and so on, were enough: And if at last it was answered this number is sufficient; the respondent

(25) See Arriaga, Disput. 2. in Summulas, Sect. 4. Subsect. 4. pag. m. 21, 22.

(26) In the remark [O] of the Article CHRYSIPPUS.

Alexinus who ſucceeded Eubulides, was a great lover of diſputes; and ſo vehement in them, that he acquired a ſurname from thence (d). Diodorus, another Diſciple of Eubulides, was ſo ſtrongly infatuated with this kind of conteſt, that he died with grief becauſe he was not able to reſolve off hand the Logical Queſtions that Stilpo had put to him (e). Had this ſect contributed in any manner to the clearing up of truth, it muſt have been looked upon as a prodigy; ſince nothing is more apt to darken and perplex matters, and to raiſe doubts in the minds of Authors and Readers, than an application to the ſubtilties and refinements of controverſy [E], which commonly degenerate into wrangling ſpondent was obliged to own, that the difference between a bald head and one that was not ſo, conſiſted only in a ſingle hair. See Gaſſendus, page 41, tom. I. of his works.

(d) Ἀπὸ φιλονεικότατος· διὸ καὶ Ἐλεγξῖνος ἐπεκλήθη. Diog. Laert. lib. 2. num. 109.

(e) Idem, ibid.

[E] Nothing is more apt to darken and perplex matters, and to raiſe doubts .... than an application to the ſubtilties and refinements of controverſy.] Among all the exerciſes of Philoſophy, there is none in which moderation is more neceſſary than in that of diſputation; for the inſtant a man proceeds beyond certain limits, he degenerates into uſeleſs trifles, and even into irregularities which deprave the mind, and prevent its ſeeing truth. It is to this we may very juſtly apply the following words of Aulus Gellius (27). Hos alioſque tales argutæ delectabiliſque deſidiæ aculeos quum audiremus, vel lectitaremus; neque in his ſcrupulis aut emolumentum aliquod ſolidum ad rationem vitæ pertinens, aut finem ullum quærendi videremus; Ennianum Neoptolemum probabamus, qui profecto ita ait:

Philoſophandum eſt paucis: nam omnino haud placet.

i. e. " When I was told or read theſe and ſuch like " ſubtle conceits, the product of an undiſturbed leiſure, " and did not find any thing in them that may contribute to the ſolid advantage of life, nor could perceive any end in theſe enquiries, I approved the follwing ſentiment of Neoptolemus in Ennius,

" We ſhould philoſophiſe in narrow limits."

A diſputation, where well regulated, and confined to proper limits (28), and where the only deſign is to clear up and illuſtrate matters, is the moſt uſeful thing poſſible in the ſearch after truth; and it is with great juſtice that diſputation is compared to the ſtriking of flints one againſt the other, which thereby forces out their hidden fire (29). But it is extremely difficult to obſerve a juſt medium on this occaſion, and it is chiefly with regard to this that the obſervation of Tacitus may be applied. Retinuit quod eſt difficilimum ex ſapientia, or in ſapientiæ modum (30). i. e. " And, a circumſtance " that is moſt difficult, he obſerved a mean in Philoſo- " phy." If a man gives but ever ſo little the reins in his paſſion for diſputation, he gets a taſte of falſe glory, which prompts him to contradict on all occaſions; and from that inſtant ſhuts his ear to good ſenſe, and abandons himſelf to the paſſion of being reputed a great maſter in ſubtilties. We may pardon a profeſſor for the pains he takes to rouſe, by this method, the genius of a very young ſcholar; but no ſuch excuſe can be pleaded in favour of Euclid or his ſucceſſors, for having made this their principal buſineſs during their whole lives; and for endeavouring to diſtinguiſh themſelves by inventions, whoſe only tendency was to perplex the mind. They were of no ſervice to the correcting of vice; they could not eradicate any important defect; and farther, they did not in any manner advance the knowledge of ſpeculative truths, but were much more apt to retard it. Theſe are two horrid faults, the former of which has been very well deſcribed by Seneca, Invenisſent forſitan neceſſaria, niſi & ſuperflua quæſiſſent. Multum illis temporis verborum cavillatio eripuit, & captioſæ diſputationes, quæ acumen irritum exercent. Nectimus nodos, & ambiguam ſignificationem verbis alligamus, deinde diſſolvimus. Tantum nobis vacat? jam vivere, jam mori ſcimus? Tota illo mente pergendum eſt, ubi provideri debet, ne res nos, non verba decipiant. Quid mihi vocum ſimilitudines diſtinguis, quibus nemo unquam niſi dum diſputat, captus eſt? res fallunt: illas diſcerne. Pro bonis mala amplectimur .... Adulatio quam ſimilis eſt amicitiæ? .... Doce quemadmodum hanc ſimilitudinem dignoſcere poſſim. Venit ad me pro amico blandus inimicus: vitia nobis ſub virtutum nomine obrepunt: temeritas ſub titulo fortitudinis latet: moderatio vocatur ignavia: pro cauto timidus accipitur. In his magno periculo erratur: his certas notas imprime. Ceterum qui interrogatur, an cornua habeat, non eſt tam ſtultus, ut frontem ſuam tentet: nec rurſus tam ineptus aut hebes, ut non habere ſe neſciat, quod tu illi ſubtiliſſima collectione perſuaſeris. Sic iſta ſine noxa decipiunt, quomodo præſtigiatorum acetabula & calculi, in quibus fallacia ipſa delectat. Effice, ut quomodo fiat intelligam: perdidi uſum. Idem de iſtis captionibus dico: quo enim potius ſophiſmata appellem? nec ignoranti nocent, nec ſcientem juvant. Si vis utique verborum ambiguitates diducere; hoc nos doce, beatum non eum eſſe, quem vulgus appellat (31). i. e. " They " probably might have diſcovered things neceſſary, " had they not ſought after ſuch as are ſuperfluous. " They trifled away a great deal of time in cavilling " about words, in captious diſputations, which give " exerciſe to the wit to no manner of purpoſe. We " raiſe difficulties, annex an ambiguous ſignification to " words, and afterwards ſolve thoſe difficulties. But " have we ſo much time to throw away? Do we " know how to live or die? We ought to bend our " whole mind to things, to prevent our being impoſed upon by words. To what purpoſe is this " diſtinction in the ſimilitude of words, with which " no perſon, except while he is diſputing, is taken " up. Things deceive: diſtinguiſh them. We embrace the bad inſtead of the good .... How great a " reſemblance is there between flattery and friendſhip? .... Teach me how to diſtinguiſh this reſemblance, a ſoothing enemy addreſſes me under the " appearance of a friend, vices inſinuate themſelves to " us under the name of virtues, raſhneſs conceals itſelf " under the maſk of courage, moderation is called ſupineſs, and fear cautiouſneſs. To err here is very " dangerous, and therefore teach us how to diſtinguiſh " juſtly on theſe occaſions. But that man who is aſked " whether he has got horns, is not ſo ſilly as to feel about " his forehead, nor ſo exceedingly ſtupid as to fancy " he has, what you, by a moſt ſubtle train of conſequences, would perſuade him. Error on theſe occaſions does us no harm, like the juggler's box and balls, " where the fallacy it ſelf is pleaſing. Enable me to " underſtand how this is done; I have loſt the uſe of " it. I ſay the ſame of thoſe quirks; for what better " name can I give thoſe ſophiſms, which neither hurt " him who does not underſtand them, nor profit another who does? But in caſe you are deſirous of " dealing in ambiguities, teach us this, viz. that the " man is not happy, whom the vulgar pronounce to " be ſo." Nothing can be more beautiful or judicious than theſe words of Seneca. I now proceed to the ſecond defect.

(27) Aul. Gell. lib. 5. cap. 15. He ſays in the following chapter, Ejuſdem illius Enniani Neoptolemi ... conſilio utendum eſt, qui deguſtandum ex philoſophia cenſet, non in eam ingurgitandum. i. e. " We ſhould " purſue the " counſel of the " ſame Neoptolemus in Ennius, viz. to " take a taſte of " Philoſophy, " but not drown " our ſelves in it.

(28) See the Art de Penſer, Part 3. chap. 19. num. 7. pag. 354. where the good and evil effects of diſputation are extremely well deſcribed.

(29) Quærit pars ſemina flammæ Abſtruſa in venis ſilicis Virg. Æneid. lib. 6. ver. 6. i. e. " Some " ſtrike from " claſhing flints " their fiery " ſeed." Dryden.

(30) Tacit. in Vita Agricolæ, cap. 6.

(31) Senec. Epiſt. 45. pag. m. 240.

A ſpirit or paſſion for diſputation may eaſily degenerate into falſe ſubtilty. Thoſe who devote themſelves to this kind of ſtudy fall into their own ſnares; and after having perplexed their adverſary, are unable to reſiſt the ſophiſms they themſelves have invented, and which may be employed againſt their doctrines. See what I have ſaid of Chryſippus (32), who is a great example of what I have juſt now obſerved. He profeſſed himſelf a dogmatical Philoſopher, and yet he laboured almoſt as vigouroufly for the intereſt of ſcepticiſm as Carneades, who profeſſed to affirm nothing. Both of theſe ſacrificed chiefly to the ſubtilties of their own wit; they had very little regard to truth, provided they could have the raviſhing ſatisfaction to dazzle and triumph by employing their objections. He who ſaid, that men by dint of diſputing loſe the truth (33), was no fool. How many people, who enjoy a profound tranquillity from a firm perſuaſion that they profeſs the true doctrine, would be diſturbed by doubts, were they to hear the reaſons on both ſides? And how many, inſtead of removing their uncertainty, would be ſtill more embaraſſed by it, ſhould they liſten to the replies and rejoinders wrangling, obſtinacy, inſincerity, and vain ſophiſtry. We know nothing concerning the phyſical ſyſtem of theſe Philoſophers; and it is not very probable that their paſſion for refining on Logical Ideas, ſhould either inſpire them with a deſire, or left them leiſure to attempt an explication of the effects of nature. I have read in Ariſtotle (f), that they taught that there was no power ſeparate from its act; that is, that a cauſe which does not actually produce an effect, has not the power to produce it. This is one of the impious paradoxes of the Spinoſiſts, which has been ſtrongly refuted by Ariſtotle (g). I refer EUCLID the Geometrician to the ſupplement; and ſhall here take notice of ſome errors of Father Rapin [F].

(32) In the remarks [E], [F], [Q], of his Article.

(33) Nimium altercando veritas amittitur.

(f) Ariſtot. Metaphyſ. lib. 9. cap. 3.

(g) Idem, ibid.

EUDES,

joynders of two ſubtle diſputants? Thoſe who do not doubt, would complain of the ill office that diſputation had done them; and would inveigh againſt it in much the ſame terms as an orator employed to paint the power of eloquence. Malam, inquit, crucem importunæ iſti eloquentiæ, quæ me ſecurum animi, compoſitumque in alteram partem, jam ſuſpenſum, & utroque trahentem malè perdidit, quaſi in foro diſceptaretis apud Judicem, adeo me contorto pugnacique iſto genere dicendi exanimaſtis (34). i. e. "A curſe upon that importunate eloquence which "has brought me from a fixed tranquillity of mind, to "a torturing ſtate of doubt and uncertainty; as tho' "you were contending at the bar before a Judge." Thoſe who have ſome doubts, would complain of their being much more wavering than before; and would ſay to the two diſputants, what Terence put into the mouth of one of his actors. Feciſtis probe: Incertior ſum multo quam dudum. i. e. "Many thanks to you: I am "much more uncertain than before." In St. Auſtin's opinion, the public diſputes of Logic are ſo dangerous, that people ought to beg of God, by public proceſſions, not to be expoſed to them (36). Facere non poſſum, quin hic referam, quæ de Beato Auguſtino, viro Διαλεκτικωτάτῳ, quique de Logica plures libros reliquit, tradit Beatus Ambroſius Serm. 92, illius ſcilicet pertinaciam & diſputationis acrimoniam ſupplicationibus publicis compeſcendam, & quaſi averruncandam exiſtimaſſe. It is an inſtrument which may be of great uſe againſt falſhood, but it does not ſtop there; for after deſtroying error, it attacks truth. It is like thoſe corroſive powers which after having eat away the proud fleſh of a wound, would alſo prey upon the ſound fleſh, and pierce the very bone were they not prevented. But not to go to ſuch lengths: let us only conſider the evil effects of diſputing, from the reaſons laid down by Montagne. "Our diſputes, ſays he (37), ought to be no leſs prohi- "bited and puniſhed than other verbal crimes. What "vices are not awakened and fomented by them, as "they are commanded and directed by anger? We "begin to harbour an enmity, firſt againſt the argu- "ments and afterwards againſt the men. We learn to "diſpute with no other view but to contradict: and by "every one's contradicting and being contradicted, the "only reſult of diſputing is, that truth is thereby quite "loſt. For this reaſon Plato, in his Commonwealth, "forbids the exerciſe of it to unſkilful and diſingenuous "minds. . . . . What will this end in? the one goes to "the eaſt, the other to the weſt; they loſe the princi- "pal, and drive it from them in the croud of inci- "dents. After ſtorming an hour, they know not "what they ſeek for; one is high, the other low, "another is wide. One man catches at a word or ſimile; "another no longer perceives what is oppoſed to him, "ſo intenſely is he engaged in his career, and thinks "of following himſelf, not you. One finding him- "ſelf weak, fears every thing, refuſes every thing, "and at the entrance into his ſubject confounds it; "or, in the heat of the diſpute is at once ſilent thro' "a churliſh ignorance, affecting either a haughty con- "tempt, or a ſtupidly-modeſt flight from the diſpute. "One man provided he can but ſtrike, does not value "how much he lays himſelf open; another counts "his words, and weighs them out as arguments; ano- "ther employs no other advantages than thoſe of his "voice or lungs. Here we meet with one who con- "cludes againſt himſelf, and another who quite deafens "you with uſeleſs prefaces and digreſſions. Another "takes up no other weapons but harſh invectives, to "diſengage himſelf from the ſociety and argumenta- "tion of a man whoſe genius bears hard upon his. "This laſt man does not ſee any thing in reaſon; but "he keeps you beſieged within the logical incloſure of "his clauſes, and the formularies of this art."

(34) Famian. Strada, Proluſ. 2. lib. 2. pag. m. 242.

(35) Terent. in Phormione, Act. 2. Scen. 3. ver. 18, 19.

(36) Menag. in Diogen. Laert. lib. 7. num. 83. pag. 296.

(37) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 3. chap. 8. pag. m. 252, 253. See the judgment which the Author of the Art de penſer, Part 3. chap. 19. num. 7. pag. 356, has formed of theſe thoughts of Montagne.

It may be very juſtly affirmed, that the genius and character of our Euclid, and of his ſucceſſors, have been predominant in the Chriſtian Schools, ever ſince that famous Logician Abelard. But what has all this produced to the advantage of truth? What Philoſophical tenets have the Nominaliſts and Realiſts, the Thomiſts and Scotiſts illuſtrated? What have they done but multiply opinions; and found out the art of maintaining pro and con, by the aſſiſtance of ſeveral barbarous terms? What one aſſerts, another denies; and they have all ſubterfuges to prevent their being ſilenced. They have alternately made the moſt contrary tenets triumph: now this is the natural conſequence of this method of philoſophizing. Rohault has deſcribed this admirably well. There is obſerved, ſays he (38), an invincible obſtinacy, "in moſt of thoſe "who have gone thro' their courſe of Philoſophy; and "who probably would not have degenerated into ſo "pernicious a turn of mind, had they been accuſ- "tomed to convincing truths; and had not found, "that thoſe who maintain any doctrine whatſoever in "public always triumph over thoſe who endeavour to "prove the contrary; ſo that they conſider all things, "as mere probabilities. They do not conſider ſtudy "as a means to arrive at the knowledge of new truths; "but only as a ſport of the mind in which men exer- "ciſe themſelves, and whoſe aim is only to confound "truth and falſhood in ſuch a manner, by the help of "certain ſubtilties; that either the one or the other "may be maintained, without one's appearing to be "ever forced to yield to any reaſon, how extravagant "ſoever the opinion may be that is defended. And "this indeed is the uſual reſult of all public diſputa- "tions where frequently in the ſame pulpit, opinions "directly oppoſite are alternately propoſed, and tri- "umph equally, without the ſubject's being rendered "more clear, or any truth better eſtabliſhed." I take no notice of an evil infinitely greater than that which a wrangling and logical turn of mind has produced. It has paſſed from the chairs of Philoſophers to the ſchools of Divines, and there made the fundamental points of Chriſtian morality doubtful (39); for have not looſe Caſuiſts ſhaken all the tenets in morality, and thrown ſuch a cloud over them, that the only method of coming to any certainty is, to attend ſolely to the ſimplicity of the Scriptures, without once regarding the ſubtle and captious reaſons of thoſe Doctors?

(38) Rohault, Preface de ſa Phyſique.

(39) See the Article LOYOLA, Remark [S].

The Reader will find in the following Remark, ſome reflections of Father Rapin, which exhibit as ſtrongly the defect of our Philoſophers of Megara, as that of the Schoolmen.

[F] I ſhall take notice of ſome errors of Father Rapin.] I ſhall firſt preſent the Reader with ſome fine reflections of his (40). "The moſt ſprightly and ſubtle genius's "are not always the moſt proper for Philoſophy. It "would be better to cloud a little the imagination, "than to let it evaporate in too refined ſpeculations. "The plain and unaffected good ſenſe of Socrates "triumphed over all the art and ſubtlety of the So- "phiſts. Philoſophy did not become abſtracted, till "it ceaſed to be ſolid. Men attached themſelves to "formalities, when they had no more realities; and "they did not attempt to have recourſe to ſubtlety, "till they had no farther hopes of making reaſon tri- "umph by its native ſimplicity *. Protagoras, he who "firſt ſought for captious arguments, aſſumed this air of "ſubtlety, only becauſe he had a wrong turn of "mind. . . . By an endeavour, ſays Seneca †, to re- "fine on all things, all things were depraved. For "men merely to make an empty parade of wit, aban- "doned the moſt eſſential particulars in the ſciences: "they began to weaken the truth of things by the ar- "tifice of words; and when ſound reaſons were want- "ing, (40) Rapin, Reflexions ſur la Philoſophie, num. 28. pag. m. 358, 359.

* Habet hoc ingenium humanum, ut cum ad ſolida non ſuffecerit, in futilibus atteratur. Verulam. de Augm. Scient.

† Vide quantum mali fecerit nimia ſubtilitas & quam infeſta ſit veritati. Sen. Ep. 98.

EUDES, Duke of Aquitain, contemporary of Charles Martel, was concerned in the greateſt affairs of his time. The detail of his Genealogy is not well known; but there is ſome probability that he was ſon of Bertrand Duke of Aquitain, and younger brother of St. Hubert (a). He took advantage of the troubles of the Court of France, and the misfortunes into which Spain was plunged by the invaſions of the Saracens; for whilſt the latter thought of nothing but eſtabliſhing their new dominion, and they were vainly endeavouring in France to ſubdue Auſtraſia, where the Mayors of the palace had made themſelves independent, he not only poſſeſſed himſelf of the firſt and ſecond Aquitain, between the Loire and the Garonne, but likewiſe of the whole country of Toulouſe and Uſſez. The Gaſcons at the ſame time overran the countries between the Garonne, the Sea, and the Pyrenean Mountains. We need not be aſtoniſhed if Eudes, having ſuch ſtrength, ſaw himſelf courted by Chilperic II King of France. Reinfroi, Mayor of the Palace, had endeavoured to reduce the Kingdom of Auſtraſia to the obedience of the Crown of France, with the aſſiſtance of the Friſons; but Charles Martel had attacked him ſo opportunely in the Ardennes, in 716, that he had put him to rout. Chilperic and Reinfroi his Mayor were obliged to fly; and having been again defeated the following year, they had every thing to fear from Charles Martel. In this perplexity, they had recourſe to the Duke of Aquitain; and far from finding fault with his having aggrandized himſelf, or his uſurpations, they declared him Sovereign [A], and intreated him

(a) See Audigier, Origine des François, tom. 2. pag. 226.

" ing, ſophiſms were employed. By this new art, " Nauſiphanes and Parmenides were victorious in all " arguments..... Thus the ſimplicity of reaſon was " corrupted by the artifices of words; and inſtead of " reſpecting truth, they only ridiculed it. This was " the error of the Spaniards of the laſt age. They " did by Philoſophy as by Politicks; they by the na- " tural turn of their minds formed for reflection, car- " ried both to inconceiveable ſubtilties, inſomuch that " every diſciple refined upon his maſter. Hence aroſe " a diſorder like to that which Seneca complained an- " tiently §: the only fruit of Philoſophy was diſputing: " and it was employed, not ſo much to cure the ſoul, " as to exerciſe the wit." This is juſt and beautiful; our Euclid and Eubulides might have known themſelves by this picture. But let us hear what Father Rapin ſays of them in particular.

§ Philoſophia non in remedium animi, ſed in exercitationem ingenii inventa. Seneca, lib. 7. cap. 1. de Benefic.

" Euclid of Megara ſubtilized ſtill farther the moſt " ſubtle things in Logic, and added to it a more " ſprightly air of diſputation, by giving more vehe- " mence and ardour to his diſcourſe. He even car- " ried this to ſuch an exceſs, that Timon reproached " him, with having inſpired the Megarenſes with a " rage or frenzy for diſputation †, by that captious ſo- " phiſtical Logic, which he taught them, and which " Socrates did not any way approve, becauſe his me- " thod was altogether inſincere. Euclid and Eubuli- " des his diſciple invented thoſe ſophiſms, which " were afterwards ſo famous in the ſchool mentioned " by Diogenes Laertius*; and which after all have " nothing real but their ſubtlety, as the dilemma, the " horned argument, the Electra, the Sorites, thoſe ſo " renowned Megarenſian interrogations (41) mentioned " by Plutarch: and all thoſe cavils of their invention, " which brought Logic into ſuch contempt at Athens, " that Socrates was obliged to treat it as ridiculous, in " his ſpeeches againſt the Sophiſts, in order to unde- " ceive mankind. It was from this Euclid that De- " moſthenes learnt the art of the dilemma, and that " earneſtneſs which made him ſo vehement in the " ſpecies of eloquence he aſſumed (42)." There are ſix errors in this paſſage. I. Socrates was dead when Euclid's Logic appeared, and conſequently it was not poſſible for him to cenſure it. II. Diogenes Laertius did not rank the dilemma among the Sophiſms invented by Euclid and Eubulides. I do not think that other Authors have included it in that liſt; and in reality, it is falſe that the dilemma is a ſophiſm. It is as good a method of reaſoning as the ſyllogiſms; and if ſome dilemmas are falſe, certain ſyllogiſms have the ſame ill quality: but upon pretence that there may be ſophiſtical ſyllogiſms, it would be a great miſtake to aſſert that a ſyllogiſm is a ſophiſm. If the Reader applies all this to the dilemma, he will find that Father Rapin is miſtaken, both with regard to the citation and the matter it ſelf. III. If Socrates could not have diſapproved of Euclid's Logic, much leſs could he have ridiculed that of Eubulides, diſciple and ſucceſſor to Euclid. IV. Demoſthenes learnt the art of reaſoning, not of Euclid but of Eubulides, as Apuleius (43) and Diogenes Laertius (44) affirm. V. After having included the dilemma among the ſophiſms, which rendered Logic ſo contemptible in Athens that Socrates was obliged to ridicule it, he ſhould not have aſſigned it as one of the cauſes of that ſpecies of eloquence which cauſed Demoſthenes to be admired (45). VI. This Orator diſtinguiſhed himſelf, not by the dilemma, but the enthymema; whether the latter be taken according to the idea which the Rhetoricians have of it, or according to the idea of the Logicians. I ſhall take no notice of Father Rapin's citing Peter Ramus; he ought to have quoted Laertius.

† Λύσσαν ἐρισμῶν. Ram. lib. 1. Dialect. cap. 7.

* Diog. lib. 2.

(41) See the remark [G] of the Article CHRYSIPPUS.

(42) Rapin, Reflexions ſur la Logique, num. 3. pag. 372.

(43) Apuleius, in Apologia, pag. m. 283.

(44) Diogen. Laert. in Euclide, lib. 2. num. 108.

(45) Nothing was more wonderful in this Orator than his vehemence.

To juſtify the firſt of theſe ſix animadverſions. It is certain that the diſciples of Socrates did not found a ſchool in their maſter's life-time; and that Euclid did not retire from Athens till after Socrates's death (46). He then withdrew to Megara, and founded a ſchool of Philoſophy, and conſequently the Logic he taught, and to which he gave a new air of ſubtlety, was after the death of Socrates. It may be obſerved, by the way, that he received in his houſe at Megara, Plato and the reſt of the Athenian Philoſophers (47), when the ſame tyranny which had deſtroyed Socrates, forced them to withdraw to ſome place of ſafety.

(46) See Plato in Phædone, where he ſays that Euclid was preſent at the laſt Diſcourſe of Socrates.

(47) Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 106. Heſychius illuſtrius, in Euclide.

[A] Chilperic and . . . his Mayor . . . declared him Sovereign.] I might have ſaid King; for theſe are the terms of Fredegarius: Chilpericus itaque & Raganfredus legationem ad Eudonem ducem dirigunt, auxilium poſtulantes, rogant : REGNUM & munera tradunt. We muſt not imagine that regnum here ſignifies a ſimple ornament of the head, called a Crown, ſent to the Duke of Aquitain; we muſt underſtand the dignity and authority of which the crown is the ſymbol. Thus Valeſius has underſtood it. Ut ſuo, ſays he (1), ſummoque jure ac regia poteſtate in Aquitaniæ dominaretur provincia regiæ ditioni exempta. i. e. "That he might " rule in the Province of Aquitain by ſovereign right " and royal power, exempt from the royal juriſdiction." I make this Remark after a modern Author (2), who ſeems to accuſe the learned Father le Cointe of having believed that the regal authority was not given to Eudes; but that they had only ſent him a crown. In the paſſage which that Father quotes (3) regnum is taken for a crown, I grant: yet it is not a crown without relation to the ſovereign authority. Rhegino confirms my opinion, when he ſays, under the year 735, that Charles Martel deprived Eudes both of the Kingdom and of his life; Eudonem REGNO ſimul & vita privavit. The modern Author cites for a third witneſs an Inſcription of S. Maximin, which imports that in 710, under Eudes the moſt pious King of the French, and during the invaſion of the Saracens, they tranſported the body of S. Mary Magdalen: Anno nativitatis Domini 710, ſexta die menſis Decembris . . . regnante Odaino piiſſimo rege Francorum, tempore infeſtationis gentis perfidæ Saracenorum; but this other authority has too great defects; the one, that the year 710 is not a time wherein the inundation of the Saracens was terrible in Gaul; the other, that Eudes at moſt was but King of Aquitain, and here is an inſcription which calls him King of the French. I am ſurprized that Monſr. Audigier did not perceive the fault in

(1) Adrianus Valeſius, Hiſt. Francor.

(2) Audigier, Origine des François, tom. 2. pag. 235.

(3) Romanus Pontifex in ſignum imperii utitur regno, & in ſignum Pontificii utitur mitra. Innocen. III, apud Audigier, Origine des François, tom. 2. pag. 235.

him to concur with them againſt the immoderate and rebellious ambition of their enemy. Eudes aſſembled all his troops, and went to join the army of Chilperic near Paris, and when they were beaten he carried with him to Aquitain that unfortunate King, who ſtood in need of ſuch an aſylum to protect him againſt the deſigns of the Conqueror; for that Conqueror was openly paving the way to the uſurpation which afterwards broke out in the moſt ſolemn form (b). The retreat of Chilperic to Aquitain, and his defeat near Soiſſons, happened in the year 719. Charles purſued him as far as Tourain. Some time after he ſent Embaſſadors to Eudes, to demand Chilperic. Eudes would not deliver him up, till he had obtained a promiſe that he ſhould be treated according to his dignity. He made him great preſents, and was, perhaps, the principal cauſe why that Prince did not die in a monaſtery. He rendred a ſignal piece of ſervice to the Nation two years after, by the Victory which he gained before Toulouſe over the Saracens. Thoſe Infidels, aſpiring to the conqueſt of the Gauls, had no ſooner made themſelves maſters of Narbonne, than they advanced as far as Toulouſe, and laid ſiege to it. If they had not there loſt Zaman their General, and great part of their troops, it may be imagined in what a fair way they would have been. This defeat did not prevent their returning a little after, and ſeizing on Carcaſſon, Nîmes, and all Septimania as far as the Rhone: ſo that Eudes, who did not think it very reaſonable to ſuffer Charles Martel to take ſuch large ſtrides towards the uſurpation of the Crown [B], found himſelf greatly embarraſſed: he was afraid of the Saracens, and had no mind to depend on a man, who had no more right to the ſovereign power than himſelf. The precautions which he took were, on the one ſide, to favour underhand the cabals which aroſe in Neuſtria (c), and, on the other, to make an alliance with Munuza, a valiant Mooriſh Captain, to whom the Saracens had intruſted Cerdaña. Munuza, being in love with the daughter of Eudes [C], who was very beautiful, in order to obtain her, engaged to revolt. It happened therefore that Eudes, fully perſuaded that the Saracens could not take advantage of his abſence, as being ſufficiently employed by the work which Munuza cut them out, made an irruption into Neuſtria. This enterprize was not ſucceſsful: for he was defeated (d) by Charles Martel, and his country pillaged by the victorious army. His ſon-in-law was yet more unfortunate, as we ſhall relate in a proper place (e): he periſhed in the troubles which he raiſed; and then Abderama, who had vanquiſhed him, finding nothing to hinder him from penetrating into Aquitain, entered it with a very numerous army. Eudes diſpatched Embaſſadors to Charles to intreat for ſuccour, and, without waiting the arrival of that ſuccour, he had the boldneſs to ingage in a battle with the Saracens ſo ſoon as they had paſſed the Dordogne (f). Policy, perhaps, had a greater ſhare in this action than courage: he imagined that if he beat Abderama before the arrival of Charles, he might gain another victory over the latter in caſe of need; to ſay nothing of the glory which he might expect, if he expelled the Infidels without any other's contributing to it. He fought well, but at length, after a long reſiſtance, he was put to flight. Though it is ſaid his loſs was very great [D], he nevertheleſs, with what troops he could get together, advanced to the place where Charles Martel was to paſs the Loire, and fought with him in the famous battle wherein Abderama was ſlain [E], the 7th of October 732. But he could not prevail

(b) When Pipin his ſon cauſed the lawful King to be depoſed, and himſelf elected in his ſtead, in the year 752.

(c) This was the name of the weſtern part of the French Monarchy.

(d) In 731.

(e) See the Article of MUNUZA.

(f) Iſidore of Badajos, quoted by Catel, Mémoires de l'Hiſt. du Languedoc, pag. 527, ſays the Battle was fought between the Garonne and the Dordogne. See alſo ibid. pag. 529.

the figures 710. It is not an error of the preſs in his Book; but however it be, it is an error. Catel, quoting this inſcription, has pointed it in ſuch a manner that it falls on the year 716 (4). Anno nativitatis Domini ſeptuageſimo decimo ſexto, die menſis Decembris, &c. I have read in Belleforet (5), that in the year 741 the Saracens deſtroyed the city of Aix in Provence, and that it was then that Girard de Rouſillon, Count of Burgundy and Provence, cauſed the body of the bleſſed Mary Magdalen to be tranſported from Aix to Vezelai.

(4) Memoires de l'Hiſt. du Languedoc, pag. 524. He borrows it from Friar Bernard Guido in his Chronicle of the Popes, and in the Life of Nicholas III.

(5) Chronique de France, folio m. 52.

[B] He did not think it very reaſonable to ſuffer Charles Martel to take ſuch large ſtrides towards the uſurpation of the Crown.] One knows not whether it be better to be angry or to laugh at the baſe partiality of ſo many Writers, who beſtow the appellation of ſeditious perſons and rebels on thoſe who endeavoured to oppoſe the ambition of Charles Martel, and that of Pipin. Theſe ſame Authors would have changed their note if Fortune had declared for thoſe pretended Rebels; and then the diſadvantageous titles of factious, and diſturbers of the public repoſe, of perfidious men, and traitors, would have been reſerved for the Martels and the Pipins: So true it is, that there are vulgar every where, among the Hiſtorians, as well as among the ordinary tradeſmen.

Sed quid
Turba Remi? Sequitur fortunam ut ſemper, & odit
Damnatos. Idem populus ſi Nortia Tuſco
Faviſſet; ſi oppreſſa foret ſecura ſenectus
Principis, hac ipſa Sejanum diceret hora
Auguſtum (6).

(6) Juvenal. Sat. 10. ver. 73.

" How goes the Mob? (for that's a mighty thing,)
" When the King's Trump, the Mob are for the " King:
" They follow Fortune, and the common cry
" Is ſtill againſt the Rogue condemn'd to die.
" But the ſame very Mob, that raſcal crowd,
" Had cry'd Sejanus with a ſhout as loud;
" Had his deſigns (by Fortune's favour bleſt)
" Succeeded, and the Prince's age oppreſt."
Dryden.

[C] Munuza fell in love with the daughter of Eudes.] The miſtakes of ſome Authors concerning this affair ſhall be examined in the Remarks of the Article MUNUZA.

[D] It is ſaid his loſs was very great.] Roderic of Toledo (7) gives a frightful idea of it, as if God alone knew the number of thoſe who periſhed on that occaſion. I have already obſerved it in the Article of ABDERAMA (8); but here are the words of that Hiſtorian: Abderamen .... cum amnes Garumnæ & Dordoniæ pertranſiſſet Eudonem de quo diximus invenit ad prælium præparatum, ſed infelicitate præterita comitatus in fugam dilabitur fugitivus, & tot ibi de ejus exercitu ceciderunt quod ejus numerus omni humanæ ſcientiæ occultatur. He adds a very falſe fact, viz. that Abderama ſacked and burned the city of Tours.

(7) Hiſt. Arabum, cap. 14.

(8) Remark [D].

[E] He fought with Charles Martel in the famous battle wherein Abderama was ſlain.] Several Hiſtorians (9) aſcribe to him the chief part in that ſignal victory (10); for they ſay it was he who forced the Saracens

(9) De Serres, Du Haillan, &c.

(10) See the Remark [K] of the Article ABDERAMA.

vail on himſelf to let Neuſtria be at peace; he took arms again in the year 735. This was for the laſt time; for he died of grief the ſame year [F], having ſeen that Charles had entred Aquitain, and had deſtroyed every thing with fire and ſword. Hunaud, his ſon, as ambitious as he, would not acknowledge Charles: this rekindled the war, which, after a great deal of various ſucceſs, ſometimes good, and ſometimes bad, ended to the diſadvantage of Hunaud. He was obliged to ſubmit, and they left him in poſſeſſion of the Dutchy (g).

(g) See l'Hiſtoire de France de Cordemoi.

Saracens camp, where having put all to the ſword without diſtinction of age or ſex (11), he went to charge the enemy in the rear; and then, thinking themſelves ſurrounded on all ſides, they loſt courage and quitted the field. But if thoſe Hiſtorians had no better Memoirs with relation to this fact, than they had with relation to another which they boldly advance, viz. that Eudes invited Abderama into France, they would not deſerve to be credited. I know very well that Fredegarius relates this laſt fact. See Catel, in the third Book of his Memoirs of the Hiſtory of Languedoc, where, on an examination of the queſtion, he inclines to the negative, tho' he owns that Ado of Vienna, the Annals publiſhed by Pithœus, Sigibertus, Marianus Scotus, Hermannus Contractus, and ſeveral other Hiſtorians, have written that Eudes, to oppoſe Charles Martel, had called in the Saracens to his aſſiſtance. I have refuted this in the Article of ABDERAMA (12). (12) Remark [I].

(11) They ſay the Saracens had entred France with their wives and children.

[F] He died of grief the ſame year.] The Annaliſt of Fuld is miſtaken in placing his death under the year 728. Rhegino is alſo miſtaken in the words above quoted, wherein he ſays that Charles Martel deprived Eudes of his life and Kingdom. Fredegarius relates the matter more exactly: he ſays that Charles, being informed of the death of Eudes, held a Council, repaſſed the Loire, advanced to the Garonne, took Blaie, &c.

☞EUDOCIA, wife of the Emperor Theodoſius, was called Athenais, before ſhe was converted to the Chriſtian Religion. She was daughter of Leontius, a Philoſopher of Athens, and inſtructed by him in all parts of learning, in which ſhe made an aſtoniſhing progreſs (a), as appeared from her writings [A]. Her father at his death left his whole eſtate to his two ſons, except an hundred pieces of gold, which he bequeathed to his daughter, with this declaration, that her own good fortune would be ſufficient for her. Upon this ſhe went to Law with her brothers, but without ſucceſs, and therefore carried her cauſe to Conſtantinople, where ſhe was recommended to Pulcheria, the Emperor's ſiſter, and became her favourite. By Pulcheria's inſtructions ſhe embraced Chriſtianity * in 421. About the twenty firſt year of her age (b) ſhe was baptized by Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and ſoon after was married to the Emperor Theodoſius (c), through the recommendation of his ſiſter (d). In the year 445 ſhe was expoſed to the Emperor's jealouſy on a very ſlight occaſion. For, as Zonaras informs us (e), the Emperor having ſent to her an apple of an extraordinary ſize, ſhe gave it to Paulinus, who was highly eſteemed by her on account of his learning; and he not knowing from whom the fruit came, preſented it to the Emperor, who ſoon after ſeeing the Empreſs aſked her what ſhe had done with it. She being apprehenſive of giving any ſuſpicion to her huſband, if ſhe ſhould tell him, that ſhe had given it to Paulinus, proteſted ſolemnly that ſhe had eaten it. This occaſioned the Emperor to ſuſpect that there had been criminal converſation between her and Paulinus; and producing the apple he threw her into the utmoſt confuſion, and obliged her to retire. Upon this ſhe went to Jeruſalem, where ſhe employed herſelf in building and adorning of churches, and aſſiſting the poor. Du Pin tells us (f), that ſhe did not return from thence till after the Emperor's death; but Dr. Cave affirms, that ſhe was reconciled to him, and returned to Conſtantinople, and continued with him till his death; after which ſhe went again into Paleſtine, where ſhe ſpent the remainder of her life in pious works. She died in 460, according to Du Pin, or 459, according to Dr. Cave, who obſerves that upon her death-bed, ſhe declared herſelf entirely innocent from all inſtances of unchaſtity. By the Emperor ſhe had a daughter named Eudoxia, who was afterwards married to the Emperor Valentinian (g).

(a) Socrat. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 7. cap. 21.

* Juſti Lipſii Monita & Exempla Politica, lib. 1. cap. 5. Monit. 5. pag. 41. edit. Amſtelod. 1668.

(b) Cave, Hiſt. Literar. pag. 259. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(c) Socrates, ubi ſupra.

(d) Evagrius, in Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 20.

(e) Apud Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom 3. Part. 2. pag. 212. edit. de Mons 1691.

(f) Ubi ſupra.

(g) Evagrius, ſupra.

[A] Her Writings.] Dr. Cave tells us (1) that ſhe finiſhed and digeſted the Centones Homerici, begun by Pelagius a Patrician, as appears from Zonaras (2), and the Inſcription of the work itſelf. It is extant in Latin in the Bibliotheca Patrum, and in Latin and Greek in the Collection of Chriſtian Poets printed at Paris 1624 p. 95. Du Pin obſerves (3), that Zonaras and Cedrenus affirm, that Pelagius abovementioned, who was put to death by the Emperor Zeno, wrote a work under this title; and in the Catalogue of the Library of Heidelberg this work is aſcribed to one Patricius, who is erroneouſly ſtiled a Prieſt. We meet alſo there with an Epigram of Eudocia upon that Poem. The firſt Greek Editions of Aldus and Stephens in 1554 and 1578 do not mention the Author's name. And Photius, who in his Bibliotheca (4) ſpeaks of the other Writings of Eudocia, ſays nothing of this. Theſe conſiderations induce Du Pin to think, that this work was not written by her, but by Pelagius, and that it was aſcribed to her only becauſe ſhe had written an Epigram in commendation of it at the beginning. But Oudin * ſhews, that this work could not be written either by Eudocia or Pelagius. Eudocia wrote Metaphraſis Octateuchi, or a Paraphraſe upon the eight firſt Books of the Old Teſtament in Heroic Verſe. Photius aſſures us (5), that this work was excellent, and not inferior to any other of the kind in the beauty of the verſification. But as ſhe confined herſelf ſcrupulouſly to the laws of Tranſlation, ſhe ſometimes broke through the rules of art. However this conduct is approved by many perſons, who aſſert that Tranſlations are to be made in that manner. She does not amuſe herſelf in flattering the ears of the youth by taking the liberty uſual with Poets of changing the truth into fiction. She does not lead her readers by long digreſſions from the ſubject, but follows the text with ſuch exactneſs and fidelity, as might eaſily be diſpenſed with by thoſe, who read her work. She preſerves the ſentiments, and even the very expreſſions of the original, as far as poſſible (6). At the end of every Book ſhe informs us in two verſes, that ſhe was the Author. Photius tells us afterwards (7), that ſhe wrote alſo a Paraphraſe on the Prophecies of Daniel and Zachariah; and three Books of the Life of St. Cyprian. The firſt Book contained the Life of St. Juſtina, the Artifices, which Cyprian uſed to debauch her, the Converſion of Cyprian, and his ordination. The ſecond contained the Life of Cyprian; and the third his Martyrdom under Diocletian. Socrates tells us (8) that ſhe wrote an Heroic Poem upon the Victory gained by Theodoſius her huſband over the Perſians.

(1) Hiſt. Liter. pag. 259. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720.

(2) Annal. tom. 3. pag. 37.

(3) Nouvelle Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 3. Part. 2. pag. 211.

(4) Cod. CLXXXIII.

* Comment. de Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. col. 1260

(5) Ibid.

(6) Du Pin, ubi ſupra.

(7) Cod. CLXXXIV.

(8) Lib. 7. cap. 21.

H.

EVE, the wife of Adam, was ſo named by her huſband becauſe ſhe was to be the mother of all living (a). She was formed out of one of Adam's ribs, and brought to him that ſhe might become his wife (b). God gave them his bleſſing, and commanded them to increaſe and multiply, and repleniſh the earth (c); and yet Adam did not think of performing conjugal duty, till after he and his wife had violated the prohibition which God had laid on them. It was Eve who firſt diſobeyed God's command: ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be deceived by the lies and fair promiſes of the Serpent [A], and then ſhe ſollicited

(a) Geneſis iii. 20.

(b) Ibid. ii. 22.

(c) Ibid. i. 28.

[A] She ſuffered herſelf to be deceived . . . by the fair promiſes of the ſerpent.] I ſhould never have done, were I to relate all the fictions which are to be met with in Books with regard to this ſerpent. I. Some ſay (1) it was the real animal we call by that name, which tempted the wife of Adam, and they ſuppoſe that at that time the ſerpent converſed familiarly with man, and that he loſt the uſe of Speech as a puniſhment for the malice wherewith he had abuſed the woman's ſimplicity; but this opinion is ſo abſurd, that it is aſtoniſhing ſuch a Writer as Joſephus was not aſhamed to advance it. I am leſs aſtoniſhed at this, than to find ſuch a Viſionary as Paracelſus ſay (2) that not only the firſt ſerpent had the power, by a ſpecial permiſſion of God, to raiſe Adam and Eve to a ſublime degree of natural knowledge; but that even to this day all kinds of ſerpents retain the knowledge of the higheſt natural myſteries thro' the particular will of God. II. Some Rabbins (3) agree with Joſephus that the tempter of Eve was no more than a ſerpent; but inſtead of ſaying, as that Hiſtorian does, that the ſerpent tempted the good woman out of a ſpirit of envy, on conſidering the happineſs promiſed to man in caſe he did not diſobey God, they ſay that the ſpirit of uncleanneſs prompted him to it. He ſaw Adam and Eve enjoying one another, as the laws of marriage allow: he ſaw them employed in that exerciſe quite naked; and that object excited in him very irregular deſires, ſo that he wiſhed himſelf in Adam's place, and hoped that happineſs would befal him if Eve ſhould become a widow: now he thought his ambuſcade would be fatal to the huſband only, becauſe the huſband would be the firſt who would eat the apple; he reſolved therefore to lay the ſnare for them. Is it poſſible to advance impertinences more ill-concerted than theſe? Would a tempter who had ſuch motives, have made the woman eat the apple in the abſence of her huſband? III. If we believe Abarbanel (4), the ſerpent was a tempter only by the ill conſequences which were drawn from his conduct. He had no manner of deſign to do miſchief; he ſaid not one word to Eve, but had only the cunning, which other beaſts had not, to climb up the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and to eat of its fruit. Eve ſeeing he received no manner of hurt, concluded there was nothing to fear from that tree, and eat of it without any apprehenſion of dying. Is it not to make leſs account of the Scripture than Eve did of the prohibition, to explain in this manner a relation which ſo preciſely mentions a Dialogue between the ſerpent and the woman? IV. Some ancient Heretics dreamed that the ſerpent who tempted Eve was a Virtue (5) which Jaldabaoth produced under the form of a ſerpent. This Jaldabaoth was vexed that a greater Deity than himſelf had made man to walk, who before was but a worm, and had given him the knowledge of the ſuperior Deities; for Jaldabaoth would fain have paſſed for the only true God. Spite therefore made him produce the ſerpent of Paradiſe, to whoſe word Eve gave credit, as to that of the Son of God. Theſe Heretics had a great veneration for the ſerpent; for it is he, ſaid they, who having taken of the fruit of the tree has communicated the knowledge of good and evil to mankind. They were called Ophites. V. They carried their wild imaginations yet farther, if we believe St. Auguſtine (6); for they pretended that the ſerpent tempter was Jeſus Chriſt; and for that reaſon they kept a ſerpent, which at the word of their Prieſts ſlid on their Altars, and wound itſelf about their oblations, and licked them; after which he returned into his hole: and for their part, they thought that then Jeſus Chriſt came to ſanctify their elements, and they performed their communion. The trueſt opinion, viz. that Eve was ſeduced by the Devil, concealed under the body of a ſerpent, has been tacked to a thouſand ſuppoſitions by the liberty which human invention has taken. VI. For there are ſome Rabbins (7) who ſay that Sammael, the Prince of the Devils, got aſtride on a ſerpent of the ſize of a camel, and in that equipage approached Eve to tempt her. VII. Some ſay (8) the tempter drew great advantages from Eve's not repeating the prohibition in the ſame terms wherein God had pronounced it. God had forbidden them to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, but Eve told the ſerpent God had forbidden them either to eat of that tree, or to touch it. Now as ſhe paſſed near that tree, the ſerpent took her and puſhed her againſt it, and having made her take notice that it had not killed her, he thence inferred that neither would ſhe have died if ſhe had eaten of it. Some of the Fathers, and ſeveral modern Divines (9), condemn Eve for not exactly reporting what ſhe had heard from God; and it may be ſaid that it was an ill omen for man's memory. It was, in all likelihood, the firſt time that what one had heard was told again to another; yet ſeveral alterations were made in it: and they were yet in the bleſſed ſtate of innocence. Are we then to wonder that ſinful man every day makes unfaithful relations, and that a fact cannot paſs from hand to hand for a few hours without being diſguiſed? Let this be ſaid by the by, as alſo what I am going to add; that ſome Authors will have it that Eve was not acquainted with the prohibition otherwiſe than by the report of Adam, and that Adam had of his own head made her believe that they were not permitted ſo much as to touch the tree; that he, I ſay, made her believe this in order to render her more circumſpect. A uſeleſs precaution. VIII. Some (10) deny that the ſerpent ſpoke to Eve: he made himſelf underſtood, ſay they, either by his hiſſing, or by certain ſigns; for at that time man underſtood the voices of all the beaſts. Cajetan (11) will not allow the intervention of voice in the temptation of Eve; he maintains the ſerpent made uſe of none but internal ſuggeſtions. IX. A Rabbi named Laniado has ſo nicely canvaſſed (12) the expreſſion dying thou ſhalt die, that he thinks the ſerpent preſuppoſed it contained a double death, one of which was to depend on the quality of the forbidden fruit, and the other on the prohibition to eat of it; or elſe, the one was to be cauſed by the wood of the tree, and the other by the fruit: whereupon the ſerpent, by a true turn of a Sophiſter, and as if he would have avoided a lie by the help of an equivocation, denied that the threat would be followed by the effect with regard to the wood of the tree; therefore he perſuaded Eve to taſte of that wood; and as ſhe found it had an agreeable taſte, ſhe concluded the fruit muſt be quite another thing; ſo ſhe eat of it. Diſtillers of the holy Scriptures, you would be far leſs blameable if you threw away your time in chymical diſtillations, in ſeeking after that fantom, the Philoſopher's ſtone. X. It has been feigned that the ſerpent aſſumed a face like that of a beautiful maid, when he had a mind to tempt Eve. Nicholas de Lyra mentions this idle imagination (13), and you may ſee in the German Bibles printed before Luther, among other figures, that of a ſerpent with the face of a very handſome girl.

(1) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. 1. cap. 2. Aben Ezra ad Geneſ. iii.

(2) Paracelſ. de Myſter. Vermium, apud Rivinum, Serpent. Seduct. pag. 24.

(3) Salom. Jarchi, apud Rivinum, ibid. pag. 27.

(4) Apud Rivinum, ibid. pag. 95, & ſeq.

(5) Tertullian. de Præſcript. adverſus Hæret. cap. xlvii. Epiphan. Hæreſ. xxxvii.

(6) Auguſtin. de Hæreſ. cap. 17.

(7) Vide Rivinum, pag. 5, 43, 44.

(8) Apud eund. pag. 73.

(9) Ambroſius, de Paradiſo, cap. 12. Rupertus, de Trinit. lib. 3. Cajetanus, Pererius, Calvinus, Oecolampadius, Lutherus, apud Rivinum, pag. 73, 74.

(10) Apud Rivinum, pag. 103.

(11) Ibid. pag. 104.

(12) Ibid. pag. 122.

(13) See Rivinus, pag. ult.

Definit in piſcem mulier formoſa ſuperne (14).
" A maid's fair face ends in a fiſh's tail."

(14) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 4.

The Sirens were alſo a monſtrous compoſition, whoſe upper part reſembled a virgin. Their deceitful and treacherous voice may well be compared to that of this ſerpent; but would to God Eve had done what Ulyſſes is ſaid to have done! She liſtened too much to the ſeducer's diſcourſe; not that we are obliged to give any great credit to all thoſe fine compliments which Alcimus Avitus makes to have paſſed on both ſides (15); for according to the narration of Moſes, this great affair was diſpatched in a very few words. Never was there an enterprize of ſuch importance: the fate of mankind for all future ages was the thing in queſtion: the eternal (15) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for July 1686, pag. 764. Some faults of Garaſſe are there taken notice of.

ſollicited her huſband to the ſame diſobedience. The incommodities of breeding, the pains of childbearing, and ſubjection to her huſband were the puniſhments to which God condemned her. Adam knew her not till after they had been driven out of the garden of Eden [B]. This is no neceſſary proof that it was incompatible with the ſtate of innocence.

How weak a Reſiſtance Eve made.

nal felicity or the eternal damnation of all men depended on it, without reckoning all the follies, and all the ridiculous vanities of the preſent life; and yet never was any affair ſo ſpeedily determined, never, perhaps, has the Devil had ſo cheap a bargain of man. In all likelihood the criminal thoughts of particular perſons, which are of no conſequence, have always coſt him more than that which was deciſive for the whole world; and it muſt be allowed that the two heads, to which God had intruſted the ſalvation of mankind, preſerved it ſo ill, that nothing could be worſe: they ſurrendred the fort to the enemy, almoſt without a blow; and inſtead of fighting for ſo precious a depoſit, as ſtoutly as ſinful man fights for his Religion and his Country, pro aris & focis, they made leſs reſiſtance than a child from whom his play-thing is going to be taken. They acted as if a pin had only been at ſtake: ſic erat in fatis. However, let us by no means imagine, either that Moſes has abridged this narration too much, or that, according to the genius of the Orientals, he conceals the fatal event under the vail of certain fables. This would be expoſing the intereſt of our fundamental Verities too much; and after all, the great innocence of Eve, and her want of experience in all things, ought to leſſen our admiration at her ſhort and feeble reſiſtance. There is nothing ſo proper to prevent being impoſed upon, as the being exceſſively wicked and deceitful one's ſelf. People of probity are the moſt eaſily taken in the ſnare.

Incapables de tromper,
Ils ont peine à s'échaper
Des pieges de l'artifice.
Un cœur franc ne ſauroit ſoupçonner en autrui
La fourberie & la malice,
Qu'il ne ſent point en lui.

" Incapable of fraud, they hardly ſcape
" The ſnares of artful and deſigning men.
" The heart from guile exempt cannot ſuſpect
" Malice in others, in itſelf unfelt."

It was a victory, therefore, infinitely more uſeful than glorious, which the Devil won over the firſt of women; and we might almoſt addreſs him, and the ſerpent who was his ſecond, in the following words:

Egregiam vero laudem & ſpolia ampla refertis,
Tuque puerque tuus, magnum & memorabile nomen,
Una dolo divum ſi fœmina victa duorum eſt (16).

(16) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 4. ver. 93.

" A mighty triumph this, high honours won
" By your atchievement and your hopeful ſon!
" Two potent Gods one woman hath undone!"
Mr. Sherburn.

For what a modern Author urges, that the good Angels would not have ſuffered ſo unequal a match between a Dæmon thoroughly experienced in buſineſs, and a woman who had juſt been created, and had never ſeen the riſing or ſetting of the ſun, deſerves no other anſwer, than that ſuch an argument, by proving too much, proves too little. Quod ſi hoc totum, ſays he (17), ab inſcitia & imbecillitate mulieris proveniſſe dixeris, æquum utique fuiſſet ignavæ & imbecilli fœminæ ſuccurriſſe ex altera parte bonos Angelos. Æqui ſpectatores rerum humanarum haud tuliſſent tam imparem congreſſum. Quid enim, ſi dolo mali Dæmonis multiſcii & in rebus verſatiſſimi victa fuerit imbellis fœmina, quæ ſolem nondum orientem vel occidentem viderat recens in lucem edita, & rerum omnium inexperta? Meruit certè tam charum caput quod annexam ſibi tenuit humani generis ſalutem, meruit, inquam, cuſtodiam angelicam. i. e. " Again, if you " ſay that all this proceeded from the ignorance and " weakneſs of a woman, it would, on the other ſide, " have been but juſt that ſome good Angels ſhould have " honoured a poor ignorant weak woman; thoſe juſt " guardians of human affairs would not have permit- " ted ſo unequal a conflict: for what if an evil ſpirit, " crafty and knowing in buſineſs, had by his ſubtlety " over-reached a ſilly woman, who had not as yet " ſeen the ſun either riſe or ſet, who was but newly " come out of the mould, and wholly unexperienced " in all things? Certainly a perſon who had ſo great a " price ſet on her head, as the ſalvation of all man- " kind, might well have deſerved a guard of Angels."

(17) Burnet. Archæol. pag. 441. edit. Amſtelod. 1694.

[B] Adam knew her not till after they had been driven out of the garden of Eden.] None but thoſe who ſhew greater regard to their own imaginations than the authority of Scripture, will deny that Adam and Eve left that Garden before they had carnal knowledge of each other; and Cornelius à Lapide (18) unjuſtly charges the Proteſtants with denying it. I. I ſend thoſe, therefore, to the land of Fables, who ſay that Cain was conceived in the terreſtrial Paradiſe, and that Eve was no ſooner formed, than ſhe loſt her virginity; Adam not having delayed to enjoy her, ſo ſoon as ever he ſaw her. The Author of the Sibylline Verſes maintains that as the exemption from all ſhame was one of the privileges of innocence, man in that ſtate exerciſed the duty of marriage in the ſight of the ſun, and as freely as the brutes (19); but he is an Apocryphal Author, and abſolutely unworthy of credit. The Rabbins, who have had the impudence to give out (20) that the Serpent fell in love with Eve, ſeeing her in the act with her huſband, and on that ſight formed the black deſign of ſeducing them, are more intolerable than the pretended Sibyl, and thoſe other Rabbins, who ſay that Adam was aſleep while Eve diſcourſed with the ſerpent (21), and that he was fallen aſleep to refreſh himſelf after his conjugal toils. Theſe latter Rabbins, however, are very extravagant. We ſhall meet with ſome others in the following Remark, who, tho' they be guilty of ſome idle imaginations, yet confirm the fact which we here maintain with a Father of the Church (22); viz. that Adam did not think of celebrating his nuptials till he went out of paradiſe: Nuptiæ terram replent, virginitas paradiſum (23). i. e. " The world is a ſtate of matrimony, but paradiſe of " virginity." II. Let us avoid alſo the oppoſite extreme. There are ſome who have pretended that Adam deferred the conſummation of his marriage fifteen years, or even thirty. Others carry the matter yet farther, and maintain that Adam and Eve by mutual conſent, and to bewail their ſin, preſerved their continency for an hundred years. The reaſons which refute this are very good, whether they be taken from the want the world then was in of being peopled, and the commiſſion they had received from God on that head; or whether they be taken from the diſpoſitions in which their age, the conſtitution of their bodies, and the firſt fires of concupiſcence muſt have put them. Probabiliter cenſet Torniellus in Annal. Cain genitum eſſe mox poſt expulſionem Adæ & Evæ ex Paradiſo, ſcilicet primo anno Mundi & Adæ, tum quia Adam & Eva creati ſunt in ſtatura perfecta & habili ad generandum, tum quia poſt peccatum mox acres libidinis & copulæ ſtimulos ſenſerunt, tum quia ipſi erant ſoli in Mundo, & per eos Deus volebat ſtatim propagari & multiplicari toto orbe genus humanum (24). III. Thoſe who ſay that Adam had no part in that continence of ſeveral years, are dotards who deſerve not to be heard. They (25) ſuppoſe he continued excommunicated 150 years, for having eaten of the forbidden fruit, and that during that time he lived with a wife who had been formed, like himſelf, out of the earth, and whom they name Lilia. They add that he begat Devils by his commerce with that woman, and that at length, when his excommunication was taken off, he married Eve, who had proceeded out of his head, and begat men. This relation is more confuſed than what we find in other Books (26), viz. that Adam, deſiring to do penance, kept himſelf at a diſtance from Eve for 130 years, and cohabited with another woman named Lilitha, on whom he begat none but Dæmons. This fruit was worthy ſo irregular a penance. But, on the other hand, Epiphanius mentions a ſect of Heretics (27), who ſaid that the Devil had had to do with Eve, as a huſband with his wife, and had Cain and Abel by her. See below, Remark [G]. Here are compenſations: Adam quits Eve to beget Devils on

(18) In Geneſ. iv. 1. See Heidegger, Hiſt. Patriarchar. tom. 1. pag. 168.

(19) Καὶ ὡς θῆρες δὴ βίοτον ἀπὸ σκοπιῆσι. Luce palam vulgo coëuntes more ferarum, lib. 1. pag. 45. edit. Gallæi.

(20) Apud Rivinum, Serp. Seduct. pag. 27.

(21) Apud eundem, pag. 77, 78.

(22) Hieronymus, lib. 1. in Jovin.

(23) See the following Remark.

(24) Corn. à Lapide in Geneſ. cap. 4. ver. 1.

(25) Apud Saint Romuald, Abrégé du Threſor Chronolog. tom. 1. pag. m. 35.

(26) See Heidegger, Hiſtor. Patriarchar. tom. 1. pag. 168.

(27) Epiph. Hæreſ. 40.

innocence [C]. They had ſeveral children, of whom Cain was the firſt, and Abel the ſecond: as to Seth, he did not come into the world till after Abel had been killed by Cain. All this is not to be doubted, ſince the Word of God ſays it; but as it goes no farther, we are at liberty to paſs ſuch judgment as we ſhall think fit on the other particulars which have been related of Eve. For example, that ſhe lay-in every year (d), and every time of a boy and a girl [D], or even of a greater number of each ſex; and that on another woman, and the Devil goes and finds out Eve, to beget men on her. IV. But what ought principally to be condemned, is the profane and impious error of thoſe who ſay that the tree of knowledge of good and evil was nothing elſe but the pleaſure of love: whence they conclude that the fall of our firſt parents was only, on the woman's part, the deſire of loſing her virginity, and, on the man's part, the accompliſhment of that deſire. Cornelius Agrippa is not the firſt who has vented this piece of impertinence: the Cathari, the Manicheans, the Priſcillianiſts, and the Baſilidians, had advanced it long before (28); and it appears from the Book of the Count de Gabalis that it is one of the Doctrines of the Cabala, and that the Initiated and Adepts explain the ſtory of the temptation in no other manner. The wiſe man eaſily unfolds theſe chaſte figures, ſays that Author; when he ſees that the taſte and the mouth of Eve are not puniſhed, and that ſhe is delivered with pain, he knows that it is not the taſte which is criminal: and diſcovering what the firſt ſin was by the care which the firſt ſinners took to hide certain parts of their bodies with leaves, he concludes that God did not deſign men ſhould be multiplied that filthy way. Robert Flud, therefore, was far from departing from this abſurd opinion (29). Graviter erravit Cornelius Agrippa in declamat. de Orig. peccati & Robertus Flud, ſub nomine anagrammatiſato Rudolphi Otreb, in tract. Theologico-Philoſophico, de vita, morte, & reſurrectione, lib. 2. cap. 2. & 3. dum tradunt, primum & originale peccatum aliud nihil fuiſſe, quàm copulam carnalem viri mulieriſque, & nullum alium Dæmonem Evam tentaſſe arbitrantur, quàm illum de quo ait Job, cujus virtus eſt in lumbis & in umbilico poteſtas. A quâ etiam opinione non plane alienus videtur Philo Judæus de opific. mund. fol. 26. & ſeqq. (30). i. e. "Cornelius Agrippa, in his Declamation on the Original of ſin, and Robert Flud, under the anagrammatized name of Rudolphus Otreb, in his Theologico Philoſophical Treatiſe on life, death, and reſurrection, have been guilty of a grievous error, in aſſerting that the firſt and original ſin was no other than the carnal commerce between the man and the woman, and fancying that no other Devil tempted Eve, than he of whom Job ſays, whoſe ſtrength is in his loins, and his force in the navel of his belly. From which opinion alſo Philo Judæus ſeems not much to differ." Though it ſhould be granted that there is ſomething figurative in Moſes's account, it would nevertheleſs be certain that we ought to take it literally with regard to the order of time. Now it is inconteſtable that the firſt congreſs of Adam and Eve is related in Scripture as poſterior to the ſentence which God pronounced on their crime. Reyſſenius has ſolidly refuted the Fable of theſe Libertines (31). Here are four falſities with regard to one ſingle point.

(d) See Genebrard's Chronicle.

[C] .... This is no proof .... that it was incompatible with the ſtate of innocence.] Several of the ancient Fathers, too much prejudiced in favour of the preeminencies of virginity, have pretended (32) that if man had perſevered in innocence, he would not have entered into the commerce of marriage, and that the multiplication of mankind would have been effected in quite another manner; but St. Auguſtin has maintained the contrary by very ſtrong reaſons (33): for, in ſhort, the bleſſing of God, the command to multiply, and the difference of the ſexes, are things which preceded the fall; and it would be abſurd to ſay that ſin was abſolutely neceſſary, that human generations might furniſh God with the number of his elect (34). It is true, St. Auguſtin grants that in the ſtate of innocence generation would have been performed without any mixture of paſſion, and without the loſs of virginity, and that the natural parts would have been intirely ſubject to reaſon; ſo that, according to him, the rebellion of thoſe parts was the next and moſt immediate conſequence of the diſobedience of our firſt parents, as appeared from the ſhame which preſently ſeized them and obliged them to make themſelves aprons. Voluntati membra illa (in Paradiſo) ut cætera cuncta ſervirent. Ita genitale arvum vas in hoc opus creatum ſeminaret, ut nunc terram manus (35). Seminaret igitur prolem vir, ſuſciperet fœmina genitalibus membris quando id opus eſſet, & quantum opus eſſet, voluntate motis, non libidine concitatis (36). Ita tunc potuiſſe utero conjugis ſalva integritate fœminei genitalis virile ſemen immitti, ſicut nunc poteſt eadem integritate ſalva ex utero virginis fluxus menſtrui cruoris emitti (37). It ſeems that certain Rabbins have attributed this to a natural quality of the forbidden fruit: the mechanic principles of the new Philoſophy would eaſily furniſh them with arguments to defend their opinion. Theſe Doctors add (38) that the knowledge, which the tempter promiſed to our firſt parents by the means of that fruit, was that they ſhould have a deſire to couple, the only thing wherein their knowledge was defective (39). The tree was to open their eyes in this manner: Adam was to perceive the beauty of his wife, which he took no notice of, being too much taken up with intellectual things, and they were both to conſider the parts deſigned for the functions of marriage. In conſequence whereof they were to produce other men, and to become like unto God in the power of producing new beings. Can a bolder impiety be ſeen than what is to be found in Abarbanel (40); that God, out of jealouſy to man, and that himſelf might be the ſole producer, forbade him to eat of the tree which communicated the power of generation? The Rabbins apply to this the proverb Figulus figulo invidet, faber fabro; and there are ſome who maintain (41) that Adam did well in eating of the forbidden fruit, becauſe without that man would have been like a brute beaſt, not diſcerning good and evil, and would have had no privilege above the beaſts, except only that of ſpeech. The learned Maimonides has refuted this extravagance. Thoſe people ſeem to have believed that the machine of Adam and Eve were of ſuch a conſtruction, that it wanted the ſpirituous parts of the forbidden fruit to open certain obſtructions, without which they would have always been inſenſible and impotent, like thoſe mentioned in the title de frigidis & maleficiatis.

[D] It is ſaid that ſhe lay in .... every time of a boy and a girl.] Some have thought that Cain and Abel were twins; but the contrary may eaſily be proved from the narration of Moſes. Neither is it the more common opinion. They chuſe rather to ſuppoſe that a ſon and a daughter were born at each birth, and then they ſuppoſe that ſhe who was born with Cain married Abel, and that ſhe who was born with Abel married Cain, and ſo of the reſt (42). They pretend by this means to extenuate the inceſt as much as poſſible. But it was not neceſſary for that or any other reaſon that the twins ſhould be of different ſexes; for if Eve had lain in the firſt time of two boys, and the ſecond time of two girls, they might have married as well and with as little inceſt as on the other ſuppoſition. However it be, the moſt common opinion is, that a ſon and a daughter were born together, and they have even undertaken to tell us the names of the daughters. Cains's-twin-ſiſter was named Calmana (43), or Caimana (44), or Debora (45), or Azrum (46): that of Abel was named Delbora (47), or Awina (48). St. Epiphanius, in his XXXIXth Hereſy, mentions Azura and Sava as two daughters of Adam (49), and ſays that Sava was the wife of Cain. Cedrenus and ſome others give the name of Aſua to Adam's eldeſt daughter, and make her the wife of Cain. According to Toſtatus it was very true that the Rabbins gave Cain his twin-ſiſter for wife; but her name was Calmana. See the Remark [F] of the Article ABEL. They who have ventured to affirm theſe kinds of particularities, deſerv'd, for the puniſhment of their raſh credulity, to fall into yet greater variations than thoſe which we obſerve in

(28) See Hadrian. Beverland. de Peccato Originali, pag. 44, 45.

(29) Jacobus Mollerus, in Tractatu de Hermaphroditis, cap. 6. pag. 176.

(30) See in the Remark [I] what will be quoted from Leo Hebræus.

(31) In juſta Deteſtatione ſcelerati Libelli Adr. Beverlandi. See alſo Polygam. triumphat. pag. 233, & ſeq. Saldeni Otia Theolog. pag. 595, & ſeq.

(32) Vide Salianum, tom. 1. pag. 174.

(33) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. 14. cap. 21, & ſeq.

(34) Idem, ibid. cap. 23.

(35) Idem, ibid.

(36) Idem, ibid. cap. 24.

(37) Idem, ibid. cap. 26.

(38) Apud Rivinum, pag. 127, & ſeq.

(39) Unicam rem ignoravit, coïtum nempe. Aben Eſra, apud Rivin. pag. 127.

(40) Apud Rivinum, pag. 129.

(41) Apud eundem, pag. 126.

(42) See Heidegg. Hiſtor. Patriarch. tom. 1. pag. 169, 198.

(43) Corn. à Lapide, in Geneſ. pag. 95.

(44) Comeſtor, apud Salian. pag. 178.

(45) Methodius, apud Raderum, Not. in Chron. Alexandr. citante Saliano, pag. 175.

(46) Saidus Patricides, apud Heidegg. tom. 1. pag. 169.

(47) A Lapide, in Geneſim, pag. 95.

48) Saidus Patricides, apud Heidegg. tom. 1. pag. 169.

(49) Vide Heidegg. ibid. and Salian. pag. 183.

that ſhe lived 940 years (e) [E]. There is nothing improbable ſo far; but what I am going to ſay ſavours ſtrongly of romance and monkiſh invention, viz. that ſhe inſtituted a Religious Order of certain young women who were to continue virgins, and to preſerve unextinguiſhed the fire which had fallen from heaven on Abel's victim, and which was called Veſta, or the flame of God (f). Hence came the Origin of the Veſtal Virgins according to this fine ſtory. We ſhall ſee elſewhere that the ſame has been referred to Noah's wife. It is alſo a moſt groſs fable to ſay, as ſome have done (g), that Eve cut off a branch of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and made a ſwinging cudgel of it with which ſhe forced her huſband to eat of the fruit of that tree. Moreover, it is quite a prophane thought to ſay, as others have done (h), that Eve was herſelf the tree of knowledge of good and evil, whoſe fruit was forbidden (i). As to thoſe who believe that if ſhe had not taſted that fruit, there would never have been any love between the two ſexes [F], but only friendſhip; their opinion can neither be ſolidly refuted, nor ſupported by good proofs.

(e) Salianus, Ann. tom. 1. pag. 231.

(f) Saint Romuald, Abrégé du Tréſor Chronologique, at the year of the World 99.

(g) Apud Salden. Otia Theol. pag. 607.

(h) Ibid.

(i) See the Remark [B].

Beſides in them. A confuſion of tongues ought to be the lot of too audacious enterprizes; but what extreme boldneſs is it to pretend to penetrate beyond the deluge, and even to the firſt origin of things, without the aſſiſtance of the only Hiſtorian we have remaining? We might ſooner build the tower of Babel, than find out the names of Adam's daughters at ſuch a diſtance of time. We ought in that particular, and in ſeveral others, to ſtick ſolely to the Text of Moſes; and ſeek for thoſe things only which might be learned from the inſpired Writers. They alone knew things truly; the reſt was all fable. We ſhould ſay to them, as the Poets of old did to the Muſes, It belongs to you, who know theſe things, to teach us:

Et meminiſtis enim divæ, & memorare poteſtis,
Ad nos vix tenuis famæ perlabitur aura (50).
That is,
" For ye well know, and can record alone
" What Fame to future times conveys but darkly
" down." Dryden.

(50) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 7. ver. 645, in imitation of this paſſage of Homer. Iliad. lib. 2. ver. 485.
Ὑμεῖς γὰρ θεαὶ ἐστὲ παρίστε τε ἴστε τε πάντα,
Ἡμεῖς δὲ κλέος οἶον ἀκούομεν οὐδέ τι ἴδμεν.
Vos enim deæ eſtis, adeſtisque ſcitiſque omnia,
Nos autem famam ſolum audimus neque quicquam ſcimus.

We refute in the Article of CAIN thoſe who ſay that Eve had had but two children when Abel was murdered.

[E] . . . . and that ſhe lived nine hundred and forty years.] If you require witneſſes, they will produce you three, Marianus Victor, Genebrard, and Feuardent (51): but a hundred thouſand ſuch as theſe are incapable of leſſening the uncertainty of ſuch a fact. Beſides, I meet with ſome Authors (52) who think it deſerves notice that Eve ſhould live ten years longer than Adam, notwithſtanding ſuch frequent breeding and lyings-in, notwithſtanding the perpetual dominion of her huſband, the death of Abel, the Schiſm of the Cainites, and her continual ſorrow for her ſin. They are in the wrong to crowd into this Liſt Adam's authority over his wife; for unleſs they take him for an ill huſband, that authority cannot be ſuppoſed to contribute to the ſhortening of Eve's life. However it be, they muſt give this firſt woman the beſt conſtitution in the world; for they pretend that ſince her huſband could live nine hundred and thirty years, and communicate to his ſons for ſeveral generations the principles of ſo long a life (which is no leſs applicable to Eve than to him) he muſt needs have been of a very vigorous conſtitution. His long penance, ſay they, and grief for having loſt ſo much happineſs, with reſpect both to himſelf, and to his poſterity, perhaps weakened his conſtitution; but it is not known that he was ever ſick. Turn the thing as you will, it will always be an argument from the greater to the leſs, to ſhew that Eve's body was better conſtituted than that of her huſband. Quantum porro fuerit Adami robur, quæ firmitas laterum, quis nervorum vigor, quis contextus muſculorum docet nongentorum & triginta annorum ætas, nullo quod ſciatur languore debilitata, eademque in multorum ſæculorum poſteros propagata, etſi fortaſſis illam totius corporis firmitatem nonnihil tam diuturna pœnitentia, tam multiplex triſtitia, de tot tantiſque bonis ſibi ſuiſque amiſſis, afflixerit (53).

(51) Salian. tom. 1. pag. 231.

(52) Idem, ibid.

(53) Idem, ibid. pag. 109.

[F] Some think that if ſhe had not taſted the forbidden fruit, there would never have been any love between the two ſexes.] I have quoted (54) the words of St. Auguſtine, which clearly teſtify that according to him Fathers would have produced children with the ſame tranquillity that our huſbandmen feel when they ſow their ground. It might be objected to him that the brutes remain in the ſtate of their creation, and yet they are incited to multiply their ſpecies with incredible ardour.

Inde feræ pecudes perſultant pabula læta,
Et rapidos tranant amnes (55).
That is,
" Hence beaſts forget their rage, and entertain
" A ſofter fury, thro' the flow'ry plain;
" Thro' rapid ſtreams they ſwim, &c."
Creech.

(55) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 14.

What they call libido, and whatever can be conceived of the greateſt impurity and moſt violent eagerneſs under that term, is manifeſtly ſeen among brutes when the fire of love ſtimulates them: yet they have done nothing to deſpoil them of their natural ſtate. It ſeems, therefore, that thoſe impetuous motions, accompanied with pleaſure, and yet ſubject to reaſon, have nothing incompatible with the ſtate of innocence. St. Auguſtin would not have failed to intrench himſelf behind the eſſential differences which are found between a reaſonable creature, made in the image of God, and brute beaſts; and it would be very hard to beat him out of ſuch intrenchments. Wherefore let us leave him there undiſturbed, and content ourſelves with ſaying, that ſince man after his fall became conſequently unable to pay exact obedience to the light of reaſon, nothing was more neceſſary than to introduce love into the world; for it is inconceivable how mankind could have ſubſiſted without it. The paſſions, with regard to the natural good of ſocieties, are the ſame thing as repentance with regard to celeſtial good, a plank after a ſhipwreck: and ſince reaſon was to become ſo weak, recourſe could not be had to a better ſhift than that of the paſſions, among which love is without diſpute the principal, and in ſome manner the ſoul of the world. See what Lucretius ſays of it, in the ſequel of the verſes quoted above:

Ita capta lepore
. . . . . .
Te ſequitur cupidè, quò quamque inducere pergis.
Denique per maria, ac montes, fluvioſque rapaces,
Frondiferaſque domos avium, campoſque virentes,
Omnibus incutiens blandum per pectora amorem
Efficis, ut cupidè generatim ſæcla propagent.
Quæ quoniam rerum naturam ſola gubernas,
Nec ſine te quidquam dias in luminis oras
Exoritur, neque fit lætum, neque amabile quidquam;
Te ſociam ſtudeo ſcribundis verſibus eſſe,
Quos ego de rerum natura pangere conor (56).
That is,
" Whole nature yields to thy ſoft charms; the ways
" Thou lead'ſt, ſhe following eagerly obeys:
" Acted by principles Thou doſt infuſe,
" Each bird and beaſt endeavours to produce
" His kind, and the decaying world renews.
" Thee, nature's pow'rful Ruler, without whom " Nothing that's lovely, nothing gay, can come
" From darkſome Chaos' deep and ugly womb;
" Thee, now I ſing of Nature, I muſt chuſe
" A Patron to my verſe; be Thou my Muſe."
Creech.

(56) Lucret. ibid. ver. 15, & ſeq.

(54) In the Remark [C], Citation (35). See the Maſter of the Sentences, in 19 diſtinct. ſecund. and other Authors, apud Caſp. à Reyes, Elyſ. jucund. Quæſt. Campo, Quæſt. 42. num. 2.

See what has been ſaid on the uſefulneſs of the paſſions and prejudices by the Critic on Maimbourg, in the ſecond volume of his Nouvelles Lettres, from page 499, to page 572. See alſo the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for the month of September 1686, Article I, page 989.

Beſides the preceding, I ſhall mention two or three extravagant fancies of the Rabbins. Some of them ſay that Eve was formed out of her huſband's tail. They pretend (k) that God, having at firſt ſet a tail to Adam's body, perceived afterwards that it diminiſhed the beauty of his Workmanſhip, and therefore he reſolved to cut it off; however he made uſe of it to produce the woman which he gave to the firſt man (l). This woman, ſay they, was ſo beautiful that the Prince of all the Angels became violently in love with her (m) [G]; which occaſioned his falling from his ſtate of innocence. She alone could quench the amorous ardour of Adam: he had in vain tried every other way [H]; and this made him ſay, This is now bone of my bones, and fleſh of my fleſh (n). So madly are they bent, not only to utter abominable imaginations, but alſo to ground them on Scripture by the moſt abſurd method of interpretation that can be. The whimſies of a Jewiſh Author who lived in the ſixteenth Century, and is commonly called Leo the Hebrew (o), are not much more ſolid. He pretends (p) that the man whom God formed on the ſixth day of the Creation was at the ſame time both male and female; and that this man, having made a review of the terreſtrial animals and birds, without finding any one whoſe company and help might be agreeable and proper for him, was caſt into a profound ſleep, that being divided in two, he might be taken out of the ſolitude wherein God did not think good to leave him. After this diviſion, the woman, who before had no particular name, was called Eve. The Author reconciles his Hypotheſis, in the beſt manner he can, with the Androgynes of Plato (q), and imagines that Man would never have ſinned, if the two ſexes which were at the beginning united in the ſingle perſon of Adam, had not been ſeparated [I]. He pretends alſo that in each ſex there was a maſculine part, (k) See Bartolocci's Bibliotheca Rabbinica, tom. 1. pag. 69.

(l) Ibid. tom. 3. pag. 396.

(m) Ibid. tom. 1. pag. 322.

(n) Geneſ. ii. 23.

(o) He was ſon of the Rabbi Abrabanel. See above the Remark [I] of the Article ABRABANEL.

(p) Leon Hebreu, Philoſophie d'Amour, Dialogue III. pag. m. 612, 613.

(q) See above the Remark [F] of the Article ADAM.

[G] The Rabbins ſay . . . . that the Prince of all the Angels fell violently in love with her.] They call him Samael, and make him the father of Cain, who, according to their whimſical imaginations, was Abel's brother by the mother only: on which occaſion they allow of what the Phyſicians call ſuperfœtation. Read this Latin: Ingreditur ad Evam (nempe Samael) equitans ſuper ſerpentem, & gravidavit eam Caino; deinde aſcendit Adam, & fœcundavit eam Abele (57). i. e. "Samael went in unto Eve riding on a ſerpent, and "got her with child of Cain; then Adam took his "turn, and begot on her Abel." Father Bartolocci adds, that they ſuppoſe all the people in the world, except the Jews, owe their origin to the like adulteries of Adam's wife. Non Samael ſolum cognovit Evam, ſed & ſerpens ipſe antiquus cum Eva coivit, ex cujus ſemine omnes mundi nationes (Judæis exceptis) provenire dicunt (58). i. e. "Not only Samael knew Eve, but the "old ſerpent himſelf alſo lay with her, from whoſe "ſeed they ſay all the nations of the earth (the Jews "excepted) are derived." They likewiſe make her the mother of ſeveral Dæmons. Adamum intra ſpatium centum triginta annorum Dæmones procreaſſe ex Lilith . . . . Evam autem Dæmonum concubitum per idem tempus appetiiſſe, ex qua Dæmones nati ſunt, volunt (59). i. e. "They pretend that Adam during the "ſpace of 130 years begot Dæmons on Lilith. . . And "that Eve, during the ſame time, lay with Dæmons, "and brought forth Dæmons." The ſtrangeſt of all is, that they ground all theſe chimæra's on the words of Scripture, which they pervert and ſophiſticate in a wretched manner.

(57) Bartolocci, Bibl. Rabbin. tom. 1. pag. 291, tranſlating a paſſage of the Jalkut, Sect. Bereſcith, pag. 26.

(58) Idem, ibid.

(59) Idem, ibid. pag. 222.

[H] She alone could quench the amorous ardour of Adam: he had in vain tried every other way.] Let us here make uſe of the words of an Italian Monk (60). "What wonder is it, ſays he, if they ſay theſe things" (viz. 1, that Adam knew Eve the very day he was created: 2, that ſhe conceived four children, Cain, Abel, and two daughters: 3, that they made haſte to conſummate their marriage, becauſe their conduct in that reſpect was to be a leſſon and example to all the brute creation, to ſet about the multiplication of individuals: 4, that no creature performed that function before man (61):) "which are of leſs conſequence, "when they ſhameleſly aſſert of our firſt parent that "before the formation of Eve he tried every method "to ſatisfy his luſt, but was not able to do it till he "carnally knew her." Read his Latin, which expreſſes this in a plainer manner. Quid mirum ſi hæc dicant quæ minora æſtimantur, cum de protoparente Adamo ita ſiniſtre ſentiant, ut etiam ipſum nefariæ incontinentiæ, quod referre pudet, inſimulent? In Ialkut tom. I. n. 24. ante Evæ formationem omnia jumenta, feraſque campi, carnaliter cognoviſſe aiunt his verbis . . . dixit R. Eleazar, quid ſibi vult, hac vice? (Vulg. hoc nunc) Gen. ii. 23. ad docendum, quòd ingreſſus fuerat Adam ſuper omne jumentum & feram, neque refrigerata eſt illius concupiſcentia, quoſque copulata eſt ei Eva. Father Bartolocci obſerves that there are ſome modern Rabbins, who ſay that this is to be underſtood in a metaphorical ſenſe; but he maintains the contrary, ſince the laſt words, quouſque copulata eſt ei Eva, are to be taken in the literal ſenſe, and the Rabbi's thought is ſo clear, that it is ſurprizing ſome Chriſtian Authors ſhould have endeavoured to ſtrain it to an allegorical meaning. Solomon Jarchi (62), continues he, underſtood it literally.

(60) Idem, ibid. pag. 75, 76.

(61) Non coivit aliqua creaturarum ante primum hominem. Bartolocci, ibid. pag. 75.

(62) In Poſtilla Geneſ. ad hunc locum.

[I] Leo Hebræus . . . imagines that man would never have ſinned, if the two ſexes . . . had not been ſeparated.] Leo ſuppoſes that the ſerpent could not deceive the woman while ſhe was joined to the man, nor deceive the man and the woman jointly (63). So that the power of ſin was a conſequence of the diviſion of the two ſexes; a diviſion which God had made for good ends, that is, that each of the two ſexes might help the other in the work of generation. Let us ſay ſomething of the allegories which this Writer adds hereto. He pretends (64) that every man, and every woman, is compoſed of a maſculine part and a feminine part. The underſtanding is the maſculine part, and the matter, or body, is the feminine. Between theſe two parts there was at the beginning a very good underſtanding: The ſenſual feminine Corporeity was obedient and ſubſervient to the Intellect and maſculine Reaſon; ſo that there was no diverſity in man, and life was altogether intellectual (65). The prohibition to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil ſignified that Adam was not to turn aſide his intellect towards acts of ſenſuality (66), or towards the acquiſition of uſeful things: for ſenſual, corporeal, and corruptible objects make the intellect which is too much addicted thereto, material and corruptible, that is, ſubject to puniſhment and condemnation (67). However, adds this Jewiſh Doctor, the Deity did not permit the obedience of the corporeal feminine part to the intellectual maſculine part, to be conſtant. God foreſaw that the union of thoſe two parts would make the eſſence of man more and more immortal and perfect, but that, on the other hand, it would be very prejudicial to the corporeal and feminine part, as well with regard to the individual, as with regard to the propagation of human ſpecies: for 1, When the Intellect is inflamed with the knowledge and love of eternal and divine things, it abandons the care of the body, and lets it die before its time. 2, Thoſe who are ardently engaged in intellectual contemplations, deſpiſe corporeal love, and fly the laſcivious act of generation; ſo that this intellectual perfection would occaſion the loſs of the human ſpecies. For which reaſon God determined to put ſome moderate diviſion between the feminine ſenſual part, and the maſculine intellectuul part, to the end that (68) Senſuality might draw the Intellect to certain corporeal deſires and acts, neceſſary for the corporeal ſupport of the individual, and for the ſucceſſion of the ſpe-

(63) Leon Hebreu, Philoſophie d'Amour, Dial. III. pag. m. 616.

(64) Ibid. pag. 618.

(65) Ibid. pag. 619.

(66) Ibid. pag. 620.

(67) Ibid. pag. 621.

(68) Ibid. pag. 622.

part, and a fœminine part. The explications of this Writer are not very proper to juſtify Divine Providence with regard to the fall of Adam, and are not very different from the opinion of thoſe who imagine that the firſt ſin was an act of laſcivious love. See the Remark [I]. While we are condemning theſe unbelieving Doctors, let us not ſpare a Wit of the Romiſh Communion, by nation a Frenchman. He made a Sonnet which has been printed, and which, to ſay no worſe of it, is extremely profane [K]. It would cies. And this is the meaning of the Text, when it ſays, It is not good that man ſhould be alone, let us make him an help before, or overagainſt him, that is to ſay, that the ſenſual feminine part ſhould not be ſo perfectly obedient to the intellectual as never to make any reſiſtance, but ſhould draw it in ſome meaſure to corporeal things, for the help of the individual being, and of the ſpecies. As to the ſleep which fell on Adam, during which God took from him a rib to form Eve out of, our Author pretends the meaning of it is (69) that the primary intellectual watching, and the ardent contemplation of Adam was interrupted, and that the intellect began to incline to the corporeal part, as a huſband to his wife, and to have a moderate care of the ſupport thereof, as a part of itſelf, and of the ſucceſſion of its like, for the ſupport of the ſpecies: ſo that the diviſion between the maſculine moiety, and the feminine, was made for a good and neceſſary end: and afterwards followed the reſiſtance of the feminine matter, and the inclination of the maſculine intellect towards it, with an immoderate purſuit of corporeal neceſſity; and it was no longer tempered by Reaſon, as it ought to have been, and as the Creator intended; but the intellect yielding and ſubmitting to matter, by plunging itſelf too deeply in ſenſuality, the ſin of man followed thereupon. And this is what the Hiſtory denotes, when it ſays that the ſerpent deceived the woman, bidding her to eat of the forbidden tree of knowledge of good and evil: becauſe, when they ſhould eat of it, their eyes would open, and they would become like Gods, knowing good and evil. Which the woman ſeeing, and that the Tree was good for food, beautiful and delightful, and of deſirable knowledge, ſhe eat of the fruit, and made her huſband to eat of it with her, and then their eyes were opened, and they knew that they were naked: and they ſewed fig leaves together, and made themſelves aprons. The ſerpent is the carnal appetite, which firſt incites and deceives the corporeal feminine part, when he finds her any way divided from the intellect her huſband, and reſiſting his ſtrict laws, to the end that ſhe may ſink into the mire of carnal delights, and may be blinded by the acquiſition of ſuperfluous riches (which is the tree of knowledge of good and evil, for the two reaſons I have mentioned) ſhewing her that thereby their eyes will be opened; that is to ſay, that they will know many things of the like nature with thoſe which he ſhews them in the tree of good and evil, and which they knew not before: to wit, ſeveral wiles and particulars relating to laſciviouſneſs and avarice, which before they minded not. And he tells them, that they ſhould become like unto Gods in that reſpect, that is, in opulent generation: for as God is intelligent, and the heavens are the productive cauſes of creatures inferior to them, ſo Man, by means of continual carnal meditations, would at length procreate a numerous race. In this caſe the corporeal feminine part not only refuſed to be governed, as was juſt, by her intellectual huſband; but drew him into the mire of corporeal things, eating with him of the fruit of the forbidden tree: and immediately their eyes were opened; not their intellectual eyes, for theſe were rather cloſed, but thoſe of the corporeal fancy, regarding carnal and laſcivious acts: and yet they knew they were naked; that is, they knew the diſobedience of carnal acts to the intellect; and therefore they endeavoured to cover their genital parts, as ſhameful, and rebellious to reaſon and wiſdom.

(69) Ibid. pag. 623.

Two things may be cenſured in this doctrine of Leo Hebræus. The firſt is, that he ſays plainly enough that the firſt ſin of Eve was an act of incontinence, from whence it follows that the fruit of the tree, which ſhe made her huſband eat, was nothing but her exciting him to enjoy her. In the ſecond place, this Author attributes to God a conduct moſt unworthy of the ſupreme perfection. He ſuppoſes that the joining of the two ſexes in the firſt man was a ſtate of immortality, and intellectual life, which excluded the unhappy power of ſinning, and yet that God ſoon overturned this ſtate, to remedy two inconveniences, viz. man's neglecting his body too much, and his abſtaining from the carnal acts whence generations flow. God foreſaw theſe two diſorders; wherefore he ſeparated what he had joined. Would it not have been better, might one ſay to this falſe Doctor, to have formed the two ſexes apart, than to unite them, and ſoon after to divide them? Was he obliged to make a piece of work, whoſe defects would require it to be immediately undone? And if God foreſaw theſe two conſequences of the conjunction, did he not likewiſe foreſee the conſequences of the ſeparation? Did he not foreſee that the two ſexes becoming ſubject to ſenſuality would be hurried into irregularities by the force of pleaſure? Were not theſe inconveniencies worſe than the other two, and did they not at leaſt require a remedy? Methinks this conduct reſembles that of thoſe Judges, who being unwilling either to ſet a priſoner formally at liberty, or to keep him in priſon, gratify him with the benefit of the laxior cuſtodia, or elſe underhand order the Jailor to furniſh him with opportunities to make his eſcape. The feminine part during its conjunction with the maſculine was under ſo good a guard that it could not deviate from its duty; it is let looſe therefore, and put into a condition of uſing and abuſing its liberty. What ſhould we think of a Phyſician, who ſhould employ the Ure, Seca, apply cauſtics, and make inciſions, to cure thoſe who were not ſufficiently addicted to ſenſual pleaſures, and who ſhould not cure thoſe who were too much addicted to them; who ſhould expel the contempt of wine, and leave drunkenneſs at quiet (70)? We muſt therefore reject the Hypotheſes of this Jewiſh Author as abominable.

(70) That is, who ſhould oppoſe it by palliating remedies only, which he knows, and foreſees would prove uſeleſs.

[K] A Wit . . . made a prophane Sonnet.] It is eaſy to perceive that I mean the famous Sonnet of Sarraſin, Quand Adam vit cette jeune beauté. The concluſion of it is not only too ſatyrical againſt the fair ſex, but profane even to impiety.

Cher Charleval, alors en vérité,
Je croy qu'il fut une femme fidelle;
Mais comme quoy ne l'auroit-elle eſté,
Elle n'avoit qu'un ſeul homme avec elle.
Or en cela nous nous trompons dous deux,
Car, bien qu'Adam fût jeune & vigoureux,
Bien fait de corps & d'eſprit agréable,
Elle aima mieux, pour s'en faire conter,
Preſter l'oreille aux fleurets du Diable,
Que d'eſtre femme & ne pas coqueter (71).

(71) Sarraſin, Poeſies, pag. 61. ed. Paris, 1658, in 12mo.

That is,

" Dear Charleval, then indeed I believe there was " one faithful wife: for how could ſhe be otherwiſe, " when ſhe had but one man with her? Yet herein " we are both miſtaken: for tho' Adam was young " and vigorous, well made in his perſon, and agree- " able in converſation, ſhe had rather give ear to the " courtſhip of the Devil himſelf than be a woman " and not play the coquet."

Jealousy is the chief reaſon which induces men to call all women Coquets.

One would think that Sarraſin wrote this in a violent fit of jealouſy, and when he had juſt heard that his miſtreſs had ſhewn great civility to ſome young ſparks who praiſed her; for this is one of the caprices of love. A man is never more diſpoſed to rail at women in general than when he knows that ſhe who loves him, and whom he loves, liſtens with pleaſure to the amorous diſcours of others; that ſhe voluntarily engages in a particular converſation, that ſhe is very merry where he is abſent, &c. He would have a woman, as ſoon as ever ſhe is engaged in an amour with him, to look down with contempt on all other men, to reject all their courtſhip with diſdain, and to become, with regard to them, ill humoured, rude, untractable, and brutiſh; and when he ſees quite the contrary, as frequently happens, he is provoked, and vents his paſſion with ſo little juſtice, that all the fair ſex muſt ſuffer for it. He inveighs againſt women in general: he accuſes them of being coquets eſſentially: and if he ſhould then be writing a Treatiſe of Logic, and would be in vain for him to plead the privileges of Poetry; that would be a frivolous excuſe: the juſt licence of Poets does not extend ſo far; and how many caſes are there, where their maxims againſt Morality, and the Faith, may be lawfully condemned according to the judicial forms of the Inquiſition? See the Remark [I] of the Article GARASSE. Another Wit, an Italian by nation, and a noble Venetian, in a word, the celebrated Loredano, has deſerved cenſure for not having ſufficiently conſulted decency with regard to the honour of Eve; for he ſuppoſes that after ſhe had been driven out of Paradiſe with her huſband ſhe exhorted him to render her conjugal benevolence, in purſuance of the Order which God had given them to increaſe and multiply (r). Decorum required that Adam ſhould be ſuppoſed to make the firſt advance. There are ſome other things to be blamed in Loredano [L]. A German Writer has been infinitely more favourable to the firſt of women: he thinks the ſin of Adam was greater than that of Eve, and that come to the chapter of Univerſals, he would aſſign Coquetry for the proprium quarto modo of the female ſex, for that property quæ convenit omni, ſoli, & ſemper ſubjecto, & cum eo reciprocatur. He would be very far from this injuſtice were he not in love; for he would ſee nothing to be condemned in the pleaſure they take to be flattered and courted, and in their civil and courteous manner of anſwering a compliment. Nay, he is not ſo unjuſt when he is deeply in love, and his miſtreſs is a coquet only to him; it is jealouſy, therefore, which makes him rail thus, and incites him to aſperſe, not only his unfaithful, or pretended unfaithful, miſtreſs, but all women in general, as if coquettry was inſeparable from them. What can be more fantaſtical and blind than the caprice of theſe jealous gallants? They cannot even endure that their miſtreſs ſhould ſhew any complaiſance which betrays fondneſs to their huſbands. Here is one of their complaints on this head.

(r) See the Remark [L].

Je penſerois n'être pas malheureux,
Si la beauté dont je ſuis amoureux
Pouvoit enfin ſe tenir ſatisfaite,
De mille amans avec un favori:
Mais j'enrage que la coquette
Aime encor juſqu'à ſon mari (72).

That is,

(72) Buſſi Rabutin, Hiſtoire amoureuſe des Gaules.

" I ſhould not think my ſelf unhappy, if the beauty
" whom I adore would be ſatisfied with a thouſand
" lovers, and a favourite beſides: but I loſe all pati-
" ence to find the coquet loves her very huſband."

[L] There are ſome other things to be blamed in Loredano.] I conſider here only his work intitled The Life of Adam: it is a Book which has been tranſlated from Italian into French; and this Tranſlation, done from an eighth edition printed at Venice by Valvaſenſe (73), was publiſhed at Paris in the year 1695 †, and ſoon after reprinted at Amſterdam. You may ſee in the Mercure Galant for the month of December in the ſame year a very good Critique on that Writing (74). Mr. Baſnage de Beauval has wittily criticized it in his month of March 1696 (75). One cannot ſpeak worſe of ſuch a Book than it deſerves, nor forgive the Author the liberty he has taken to introduce in a ſubject of this kind ſo many romantic inventions, ſo oppoſite to gravity, and ſo fit for a comic Hiſtory. Let us conſider only ſome of the thoughts which relate to Eve. The Author aſſerts (76) that it was an effect of God's goodneſs towards Adam, to ſuffer him to ſleep at that time (77), well knowing that in a little time he would loſe his reſt in his wife's company.... Adam being indued with the ſpirit of Prophecy, continues he, might foreſee the evils which the production of Eve would cauſe to all mankind; ſo that God perhaps caſt him into that ſleep leſt he ſhould oppoſe the creation of his wife.... Does it not ſeem that God, by creating no more than one wife for Adam, gave men to underſtand that they ought to be contented with ſingle marriage? but perhaps he did it for another reaſon: namely, becauſe he would not multiply his troubles, by giving him many wives, there being commonly nothing more capable of exerciſing a man's patience, and diſturbing his quiet, than the cares of matrimony (78). He ſuppoſes (79) Eve was ſo beautiful that Adam was upon the point of worſhipping her as a Deity (80). No Romance contains a more paſſionate declaration of love than that which Adam makes here (81). The Author finds no incident more proper to prevent the conſequence of the tranſports, with which the firſt man expreſſed the tenderneſs of his heart, than to feign that God himſelf came to interrupt their converſation (82). Adam warned his wife not to touch that fatal fruit which would bring death into the world (83). " This prohibition made Eve curious; for it is awak-
" ing the curioſity of a woman to forbid her any thing.
" The prohibition excites and inflames her deſires,
" which are generally violent for things permitted,
" but inſatiable for thoſe which are forbidden. Hur" ried away therefore by that impatience which dug
" the grave of their happineſs, ſhe left Adam, to en" joy without witneſs, and without reproach, the
" ſight of a fruit which ſhe eſteemed the moſt exqui-
" ſite of all, becauſe it was forbidden (84)." This paſſes not without a moral Reflection, which teaches women to keep always under the eye of their huſbands. " The farther a woman departs from her huſband, the " nearer ſhe approaches to her deſtruction: while ſhe
" is ſeparated from him, ſhe is in danger of being
" loſt; becauſe ſhe furniſhes opportunity, and inſpires
" every one with the boldneſs to lay ſnares for her.
" A woman when alone is expoſed to the temptation
" even of a ſerpent. The moon is eclipſed, when ſhe
" is too near the Sun, but the woman, on the " contrary, ſuffers fatal eclipſes in her chaſtity, when
" ſhe is at a diſtance from her huſband (85)." Let us omit the compliments which the Author ſuppoſes the ſerpent in the form of a young virgin made to Eve; but let us obſerve that he pretends ſhe inſerted a lie in her anſwer (86), and that ſhe had recourſe to ſighs, to tears, to careſſes, and to paſſionate kiſſes (87), in order to prevail on Adam to eat the apple ſhe offered him. Could you ever gueſs at the employment Loredano has aſſigned to God? In the mean while, ſays he (88), God walked in the garden, and took the cool air of the weſtern breezes, when towards the evening they blew ſomewhat freſher. This action of the divine Majeſty ſufficiently teſtified the uneaſineſs which the ſin of man gave him; ſince to moderate the heat of his juſt indignation, he ſeemed to beg the ſuccour of thoſe winds which are always temperate. A Pagan Poet would not be excuſable if he had ſaid ſuch a thing of Jupiter: but let us leave this, ſince we have promiſed to take notice only of what concerns the wife of Adam.

(82) Ibid. pag. 47.
(83) Ibid. pag. 49.
(84) Ibid. pag. 50.
(85) Ibid. pag. 51.
(86) Ibid. pag. 58.
(87) Ibid. pag. 71.
(88) Ibid. pag. 77.

The Author ſuppoſes (89) that ſhe ſtrove to eaſe the afflictions of her huſband, who ſought from time to time ſome conſolation in the arms of his wife, and that ſhe reminded him that God had commanded them to multiply, adviſing him to take care not to tranſgreſs that command. Let us endeavour, ſaid ſhe to him (90), to recover, by means of a fruitful poſterity, what we have loſt. A weak and ſlight conſolation for ſuch great calamities! and yet a neceſſary one, ſince God has ſo ordained it. Let us take care not to diſobey him a ſecond time: our diſobedience would be without excuſe; it would diſguſt the divine mercy, and we ſhould be for ever the objects of his too juſt indignation. Let us follow the will of Heaven, in procuring the propagation of all mankind. It is the way to vanquiſh death, which muſt one day triumph over our fleſh, ſince we ſhall live, in deſpight of him, in the perſons of our children, and our grand-children, and in the memory of our poſterity. I do not ſay we ought therefore entirely to dry up our tears. My ſorrow for having offended my God ſhall end but with my life; and my heart, which muſt quit it the laſt, ſhall live no longer than my grief. But we ought to take care not to irritate by a freſh offence that God who has treated

(89) Ibid. pag. 109.
(90) Ibid. pag. 110.

(73) Preface to the French Tranſlation.

† It had before been tranſlated into Engliſh, which tranſlation was publiſhed in the year 1679. ADD. REM.

(74) See the Remark [A] of the Article VALERIUS.

(75) Article IV, pag. 327, &c.

(76) Loredano, Vie d'Adam, pag. 37, 38. Edit. Amſt. 1696.

(77) That is, when Eve was made.

(78) Lored. Vie d'Adam, pag. 41.

(79) Ibid. pag. 42.

(80) Ibid. pag. 44.

(81) Ibid. pag. 45.

that God did not expel her from Paradiſe; but that Adam alone ſuffered that puniſhment. We ſhall ſee whereon he grounds his opinion [M].

treated us ſo favourably; this would be as impious as it muſt be dangerous to us. Adam anſwered her, ſmiling, I ſhall not be apprehenſive for the future leſt your company ſhould be fatal to me, ſince you perſuade me only to what is good. . . . . It is juſt to give ſome relaxation to our woes, and ſome little relief to our ſenſes overwhelmed with the weight of our affliction, and to people the world in obedience to our God. Then adding careſſes to his words, he abandoned his ſoul to pleaſure, and forgot, for a while, in the arms of his wife, the fatal ſubject of his grief. If after Abel's death the father and mother engaged themſelves in continency, it was Adam who firſt bound himſelf to it by oath, without having conſulted his wife (91). This is ordering matters as in the old Romances, wherein the Heroines made the firſt advances (92); but it would have been better to have conformed to the modern Romances, and the temper of the Jewiſh Nation, which required great reſerve on the woman's part in demanding her conjugal due; for if ſhe demanded it ſo loud that her female neighbours could hear the converſation turned on ſuch ſubjects, ſhe might be divorced (93).

(91) Loredano, Vie d'Adam, pag. 141.

(92) See the Remark [C] of the Article LONGUS.

(93) Eadem Maimon. c. 24. § 12. & Ammud Golah, ſeu Liber præceptorum parvus, ubi in gloſſa additur: ſi fuerit exigens debitum conjugale à marito ſuo voce clara, ita ut ejus vicinæ audire potuerint eam loquentem de re iſtâ. Polygam. triumphatrix, pag. 56. col. 1.

[M] We ſhall ſee whereon he grounds his opinion.] He is ſo far from ſuppoſing, as Loredano does, that Eve was excited by the prohibition to wiſh for the forbidden fruit, that he ſuppoſes (94), on the contrary, that the ſerpent tempted her before ſhe thought of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. He adds, I, that ſhe ſuffered herſelf to be perſuaded that ſhe had not well underſtood her huſband's meaning, or that her huſband had been deceived by ſome falſe report. II, That believing it was not true that God had given ſuch prohibition, ſhe eat of the fruit; and that her fault conſiſted in taking a precipitate reſolution in an affair of ſo great conſequence, and without conſulting her huſband. III, That having ſinned through ignorance (95), tho' it was not an invincible ignorance, ſhe committed a leſs heinous crime than Adam; for his was voluntary and againſt conſcience. IV, That Eve did not neceſſarily incur the penalty of eternal death; for God's decree only imported that man ſhould die, if he ſinned againſt his conſcience, ſi ſciens prudenſque peccaſſet (96). V, That tho' God might have inflicted death on Eve without injuſtice, yet he reſolved, ſo great is his mercy towards his works, to let her live, ſince ſhe had not ſinned maliciouſly. VI, That being exempted from the puniſhment contained in God's decree, ſhe might retain all the prerogatives of her former condition (97), except thoſe which were not conſiſtent with the infirmities to which God condemned her. VII, That ſhe retained in particular the prerogative of bringing forth children who had a right to eternal happineſs, on condition of obeying the new Adam. VIII, That as mankind was to proceed from Adam and Eve, Adam was preſerved alive only becauſe his preſervation was neceſſary for the procreation of children. IX, That it was by accident, therefore, that the ſentence of death was not executed on him (98); but that otherwiſe he was more ſeverely puniſhed than his wife. X, That ſhe (99) was not driven out of Paradiſe, as he was; but was only obliged to leave it to find out Adam in caſes of neceſſity: and that it was with a full privilege of returning thither again. XI. That the children of Adam and Eve were ſubject to eternal death, not as proceeding from Eve, but as proceeding from Adam (100). Theſe are nearly the particulars which relate to Eve in that work. Thoſe who would ſee the author's proofs and deſign, and the conſequences which he draws from theſe new thoughts, will do well to have recourſe to his Book. It cannot be objected to him, as it may to Loredano, that he has transgreſſed decency in ſuppoſing that Eve went to find out her huſband; for it was thro' pure neceſſity, ſince it was not poſſible for Adam to enter the terreſtrial Paradiſe again. And beſides, it is very likely, that if this Writer was aſked, Did Adam's wife make uſe of the right which had been preſerved to her of continuing in the garden of Eden? he would anſwer, No, What ſhould ſhe have done there alone? She would ſoon have been tired of it: the moſt charming landſcapes, the moſt delicious gardens, do not pleaſe a woman who finds there no ſociety, no ſort of company. Solitude in the fineſt place in the world is extremely burdenſome, unleſs one is a Philoſopher, and of a contemplative or meditative diſpoſition. It is to be believed, therefore, that as well on account of her perſonal intereſt, as becauſe reaſon required it, Eve would have preferred the cottage of her exiled huſband to the abode of the terreſtrial Paradiſe. The garden of Eden to her was wherever Adam pitched his tents (101). There it was her duty to fix, that ſhe might be a help to him, according to the end of her creation, and might ſhare with him all the cares of his family. See the Margin (102).

(94) See the Book intitled, Cogitationes novæ de primo & ſecundo Adamo examini Eruditorum compendioſe propoſitæ, printed at Amſterdam, apud Eleutherium Aſpidium, Anno Domini 1700, in 8vo, at the 8th page.

(95) Ibid. pag. 10, 12.

(96) Ibid. pag. 15.

(97) Ibid. pag. 16.

(98) Ibid. pag. 18.

(99) Ibid. pag. 19, 20.

(100) Ibid. pag. 23. See alſo pag. 60, 65, 140, &c.

(101) Apply hereto what has been ſaid of Camillus, Tarpeia ſede peruſta Gallorum facibus, Veioſque habitante Camillo, Illic Roma fuit. i. e. "When Gallic "flames the "burning City "felt, "At Veii "Rome with "her Camillus "dwelt." Lucan. Pharſal. lib. 5. ver. 27.

(102) Note the Author ſuppoſes that Adam dwelt very near the terreſtrial Paradiſe, and that by God's order.

☞EVELYN (JOHN), a very learned Writer in the ſeventeenth Century, deſcended of a good family [A], was ſecond ſon of Richard Evelyn of Wotton in Surrey Eſq; [B], and born at Wotton in Surrey October the 31ſt (a) 1620. He was educated at the Free-ſchool at Lewes in Suſſex (b), and became a Gentleman Commoner of Baliol College in the Univerſity of Oxford in the beginning of the year 1637, where he continued about three years in the ſtudies of Logic and Philoſophy. Thence he removed to the Middle Temple, where he reſided till the breaking out of the civil wars. In 1644, he, by the expreſs leave of King Charles I. under his own hand dated at Oxford, travelled ſeven years into the politer countries of Europe (c), and in his return

(a) Natural Hiſtory and Antiquities of the County of Surrey. Begun in the year 1673, by John Aubrey Eſq; and continued to the preſent time. Illuſtrated with proper Sculptures. In five Volumes. Vol. 4. pag. 117. London 1718, in 8vo. Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 941, ſays the 21ſt of October.

(b) Natural Hiſtory &c. ubi ſupra.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

[A] Deſcended of a good family.] He tells us himſelf (1), that there were of his name both in France and Italy, written Ivelyn, Avelin; and that he found in old Deeds, Avelyn alias Evelyn. That one of the name was taken priſoner at the battle of Agincourt. When the Ducheſs of Orleans, ſays he, came to Dover to ſee the King, one of our name (whoſe Family derives itſelf from Luſignanus, King of Cyprus) claimed relation to us. We have in our Family a tradition of a great ſum of money, that had been given for the ranſom of a French Lord, with which a great eſtate was purchaſed. He likewiſe obſerves, that his family had not been at Wotton in Surrey (purchaſed of one Owen, a great rich man) above 160 years. "My great grandfather, con-"tinues he, came from Long Ditton (the ſeat now of "Sir Edward Evelyn) where we had been long be-"fore; and to Long Ditton from Harrow on the Hill, "and many years before that from Evelyn near Tower "Caſtle in Shropſhire," at what time there tranſmi-"grated alſo (as I have been told) the Onſlow's and "Hatton's from ſeats and places of thoſe names yet "there."

(1) See Note (1) pag. 116, 117, vol. 4. of the Natural Hiſtory and Antiquities of Surrey, &c.

[B] Second ſon of Richard Evelyn of Wotton in Surrey Eſq;] This Gentleman was youngeſt ſon of George Evelyn Eſq;, who purchaſed the Eſtate at Wotton in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and by two wives had ſixteen ſons and eight daughters; four of which ſons lived to be men, and made families, and from one of them, by his mother, was deſcended Evelyn Pierpoint, Duke of Kingſton. Richard, the youngeſt ſon, to whom his father left this eſtate, increaſed it very much by his marriage with Eleanor Stanfield, daughter and heireſs of John Stanfield of the Cliff near Lewes in Suſſex, and by his own good management (2). He dying December 20th 1640 (3) was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon George, who was ſeveral times Knight of the Shire for Surrey, and dying in 1699 at eighty three years of age, without male-iſſue ſurviving, left the greateſt part of his eſtate to his brother John, of whom we treat in this article.

(2) Ibid. pag. 115, 116.

(3) See his Epitaph, ibid. pag. 127, 128.

turn through France in 1647 married the ſole daughter and heireſs of Sir Richard Brown Bart. then Reſident for King Charles II at the Court of France (d). He ſettled afterwards at Says-Court in Deptford, the ſeat of his father-in-law, which he very much improved by his ſkill in Gardening and Planting (e). After the Reſtoration he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society, being one of the firſt of thoſe Gentlemen, who earlieſt met for the eſtabliſhment of that Society (f). He was likewiſe one of the Commiſſioners for the taking care of the ſick and wounded ſeamen in both the Dutch wars, having in the firſt Sir Thomas Clifford, afterwards Lord Treaſurer, for his Collegue; and was afterwards appointed one of the Council of Trade and Plantations (g). In the year 1667 he, by his intereſt obtained of the Lord Henry Howard, that the Arundelian Marbles ſtanding in the garden belonging to Arundel Houſe without Temple-Bar, ſhould be given to the Univerſity of Oxford [C], for which Mr. Evelyn had the thanks of the Univerſity ſent to him by the Delegates thereof (h); and July 15, 1669 had the Degree of Doctor of Civil Law conferred upon him (i). In December 1685 he with Viſcount Tiviot and Col. Robert Philips were conſtituted by his Majeſty Commiſſioners of the Privy Seal during the abſence of Henry Earl of Clarendon, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; and this office they enjoyed till March the 11th 1686, when Henry Lord Arundel of Wardour was ſworn in Lord Privy-Seal (k). In the reign of King William he was Treaſurer of Greenwich Hoſpital in Kent (l). He was a conſiderable benefactor to the Royal Society, giving to it the Tables of Veins and Arteries, which he had brought from Padua, and procuring for it the Arundel Library by his intereſt with the Lord Henry Howard, afterwards Duke of Norfolk, whoſe grandfather, the Earl of Arundel, the great Collector of Pictures and Antiquities, he had been well acquainted with in Italy (m). Our Author publiſhed ſeveral Works [D]. Mr. Wood tells us, that he was an ingenious and polite perſon, (d) Natural Hiſtory, &c. pag. 117.

(e) Ibid. pag. 118.

(f) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(g) Natural Hiſtory, &c. of Surrey, pag. 118.

(b) Wood.

(i) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 180.

(k) Idem, Athen. Oxon. col. 942.

(l) Natural Hiſtory &c. of Surrey, pag. 118.

(m) Ibid. pag. 120, 121, 122.

[C] Obtained of the Lord Henry Howard, that the Arundelian Marbles . . . ſhould be given to the Univerſity of Oxford.] Theſe marbles had been collected at a great expence from different parts of the world by Thomas Earl of Arundel, grandfather to the Lord Henry Howard, and placed by him in his garden at Arundel Houſe. They were afterwards fixed on the outward wall of Archbiſhop Sheldon's Theatre in Oxford, and marked with the letter H, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of Selden, which are mark'd with S; and the following inſcription is placed under the arms of the Howards (4). Æternæ Memoriæ excellentiſſimi Dni. Domini HENRICI HOWARD de Caſtle-Reiſing, Fratris & Hæredis THOMÆ HOWARD, Ducis Norfolciæ, a proſapiâ regiâ primi Angliæ Ducis, Comitis Arundeliæ, & primi Comitis Angliæ, Comitis Surreiæ, Domini & Baronis de Howard, Domini & Baronis Mowbray, Seagrave Brewes de Gower, Fitz Allan Clun Oſwaldſtree Maltrevers, & Greyſtoke, ad Muley Urſhed Marocienſem Imperatorem Legati. Ob Marmora hæc Arundelianorum nomine per totum Orbem celeberrima, Avi ſui THOMÆ Arundeliæ Comitis, ſupremi Angliæ Mareſcalli, ſummique Artium liberalium patroni, ſumptibus & ſollicitudine ingentibus, ab Ottomanicâ Barbarie vindicata, & in Palatium gentilitium Londini pridem traducta, ab ipſo dein donata, gratabunda poſuit UNIVERSITAS OXONIENSIS.

(4) See Wood, Hiſtoria & Antiquit. Univerſitatis Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 28.

[D] Our Author publiſhed ſeveral Works.] The State of France. London 1652 in 8vo. A Character of England, as it was lately preſented in a Letter to a Nobleman of France; with Reflections upon Gallus Caſtratus, 3d edit. London 1659 in 16mo (*). An Apology for the Royal Party: written in a Letter to a Perſon of the late Council of State; with a touch at the pretended Plea of the Army. London 1659, third Edit. in two ſheets in 4to (5). A Panegyric at his Majeſty Charles II his Coronation. London 1661, fol. (6). Fumifugium, or the Inconveniencys of the Air and Smoak of London diſſipated: together with ſome remedies humbly propoſed by J. E. Eſq; to his ſacred Majeſty and the Parliament now aſſembled. Publiſh'd by his Majeſty's Command. London 1661 in five ſheets in 4to. Tyrannus, or the Mode: In a Diſcourſe of Sumptuary Laws. London 1661 in 8vo. Sculptura; or the Hiſtory and Art of Calcography and engraving in Copper; with an ample enumeration of the moſt renowned Maſters and their Works. To which is annexed a new Manner of Engraving or Mezzo Tinto, communicated by his Highneſs Prince Rupert to the Author of this Treatiſe. London 1662 in 8vo. Sylva: or a Diſcourſe of Foreſt-Trees, and the Propagation of Timber in his Majeſty's Dominions, &c. To which is annexed Pomona, or an Appendix concerning Fruit-Trees, in relation to Cyder, &c. London 1679 fol. 3d ed. The 1ſt was publiſh'd in 1664, the 2d in 1669. Mr. Joſeph Glanvill ſpeaks of this work in the following terms (7). "Another excellent Vertuoſo of the "ſame Aſſembly (8), Mr. John Evelyn, hath very "conſiderably advanced the Hiſtory of Fruit and Fo- "reſt Trees by his Sylva and Pomona; and greater "things are expected from his preparations for Elyſi- "um Britannicum, a noble deſign now under his hands. "And certainly the inquiſitive world is much in- "debted to this generous Gentleman for his very inge- "nious performances in this kind, as alſo for thoſe "others of Sculpture, Picture, Architecture, and the like "practical, uſeful things, with which he hath enrich- "ed it." Public Employment and an active Life preferred to ſolitude in a Reply to a late ingenious Eſſay of a contrary title. London 1667 in 8vo. Kalendarium hortenſe: or the Gardiners Almanac, directing what he is to do monthly throughout the year, and what Fruits and Flowers are in prime. London in 8vo. This Book is dedicated to Abraham Cowley Eſq; and was printed at leaſt ſeven times before the year 1684, with many uſeful additions by the Author. Navigation and Commerce, their Original and Progreſs; containing a ſuccinct Account of Traffic in general, its Benefits and Improvements; of Diſcoveries, Wars and Conflicts at Sea, from the Original of Navigation to this Day, with ſpecial regard to the Engliſh Nation; their ſeveral Voyages and Expeditions, to the Beginning of our late Difference with Holland; in which his Majeſties title to the Dominion of the Sea is aſſerted againſt the novel and later Pretenders. By J. Evelyn Eſq; S. R. S. London 1674 in 8vo. This Treatiſe he dedicated to the King, as "a tribute, ſays he, the moſt due, and "the moſt becoming my relation to your Majeſty's "ſervice of any that I could deviſe, ſince your Ma- "jeſty has been pleaſed among ſo many noble and "illuſtrious perſons to name me of the Council of your "Commerce and Plantations." Terra: A Philoſophical Diſcourſe of the Earth relating to the Improvement of of it for Vegetation and the Propagation of Plants, &c. London 1676 in 8vo and 1679 in fol. There is an Account of this Book in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (9). A Letter to one of the Secretaries of the Royal Society, concerning the damage done to his gardens by the preceding Winter: dated at Sayes Court in Deptford 14th of April 1684, and printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (10). Mundus Muliebris; or the Ladies Dreſſing-Room unlock'd, and her Toilette ſpread. In Burleſque. Together with the Fop-Dictionary, compiled for the uſe of the Fair-Sex. London 1690 in 4to. Numiſmata: A Diſcourſe of Medals, antient and modern; together with ſome account of Heads and Effigies of illuſtrious and famous Perſons in Sculps and Taille-Douce, of whom we have no medals extant; and of the Uſes to be derived from them. To which is added a Digreſſion concerning Phyſiognomy. By J. Evelyn; S. R. S. London 1697 in fol. Acetaria: A Diſcourſe of Sallets, by J. E.

(*) Natural Hiſtory &c. of Surrey, pag. 119.

(5) Wood, col. 942.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Plus Ultra: or the Progreſs and Advancement of Knowledge ſince the Days of Ariſtotle, cap. 10. pag. 73, 74. edit. London 1668, in 8vo.

(8) The Royal Society.

(9) Num. 119. pag. 454.

(10) Num. 158.

(n) Athen. Oxon. col. 442.

perſon, affecting a private and ſtudious life (n). Dr. Burnet (o) ſtiles him a "moſt inge- "nious and virtuous Gentleman;" and informs us, that he was not "ſatisfied to have "advanced the knowledge of this age by his moſt uſeful and ſucceſsful labours about "planting, and divers other ways; but was ready to contribute every thing in his power "to (o) Hiſtory of the Reformation of the Church of England, Part 2. B. 3. pag. 417.

J. E. S. R. S. Author of the Kalendarium. London 1699 in 8vo. He hath likewiſe tranſlated ſeveral Books into Engliſh. I. Of Liberty and Servitude. London 1649 in 12mo. II. An Eſſay on the firſt Book of Titus Lucretius Carus de Rerum Natura, interpreted and made into Engliſh Verſe by J. Evelyn Eſq; London 1656 in 8vo. The Frontiſpiece was the deſign of Mary his wife. Mr. Waller wrote commendatory Verſes on this Tranſlation, printed among his Poems. III. The French Gardiner, inſtructing how to cultivate all ſorts of Fruit-Trees and Herbs for the Garden; together with Directions to dry and conſerve them in their natural perfection &c. London 1658 in 12mo and reprinted ſeveral times after. In moſt of the Editions is added The Engliſh Vineyard vindicated, by John Roſe, Gardiner to his Majeſty King Charles II; with a Tract of the making and ordering of Wines in France. The 3d Edition of this French Gardiner, which was publiſhed in 1676, was illuſtrated with Sculptures. IV. The Golden Book of St. John Chryſoſtom concerning the Education of Children. Tranſlated out of the Greek by J. E. Eſq; London 1659 in 12mo. V. Inſtructions concerning erecting of a Library. London 1661 in 8vo. This piece was written by Gabriel Naudé. VI. A Parallel of the antient Architecture with the modern &c. London 1664, 2d edit. in fol. This was written in French by Roland Freart, Sieur de Cambray. There was another edition of this book at London 1706 in fol. VII. An Idea of the perfection of Painting; demonſtrated from the principles of Art, and by examples conformable to the Obſervations, which Pliny and Quintilian have made upon the moſt celebrated Pieces of the antient Painters, parallel'd with ſome works of the moſt famous modern Painters, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Julio Romano, and N. Pouſſin. Written in French by Roland Freart, Sieur de Cambray, and rendred Engliſh by J. E. Eſquire, Fellow of the Royal Society. London 1668 in 8vo. Mr. Evelyn dedicates this Tranſlation to Henry Howard of Norfolk, heir-apparent to that Dukedom; and the dedication is dated from Says-Court June the 24th 1668. In the preface he obſerves, that the reader will find in this diſcourſe (though ſomewhat verboſe, ſays he, according to the ſtyle of this overflowing Nation (11),) divers uſeful remarks, eſpecially, where the Author treats of Coſtúme, "which "we, ſays Mr. Evelyn, have interpreted Deco- "rum, as the neareſt expreſſion our language will "bear to it. And I was glad our Author had "reproved it in ſo many inſtances, becauſe it not "only grows daily more licentious, but even ridi- "culous and intolerable. But it is hoped this may "univerſally be reformed, when our modern workmen "ſhall conſider, that neither the exactneſs of their "deſign, nor ſkilfulneſs in colouring has been able "to defend their greateſt predeceſſors from juſt re- "proaches, who have been faulty in this particular. "I could exemplify in many others, whom our Au- "thor has omitted; and there is none but takes no- "tice what injury it has done the fame of ſome of "our beſt reputed Painters, and how indecorous it is "to introduce circumſtances wholly improper to the "uſages and genius of the places, where our Hiſtories "are ſuppoſed to have been acted." Mr. Evelyn then remarks, that this was not only the fault of Baſſano, who would be ever bringing in his wife, children, and ſervants, his dog and his cat, and very kitchen-ſtuff, after the Paduan mode, but of the great Titian himſelf, Georgion, Tintoret, and the reſt; as Paulo Veróneſe is obſerved alſo to have done in his ſtory of Pharaoh's daughter drawing Moſes out of the river, attended with a guard of Swiſſes. Malvogius likewiſe in a picture, then in the King's Gallery at Whitehall, not only repreſents our firſt parents with navels upon their bellies, but has placed an artificial ſtone-fountain carved with imagery in the midſt of his Paradiſe. Nor does that excellent and learned Painter Rubens eſcape without cenſure, not only for making moſt of his figures of the ſhapes of brawny Flemings, but for other Sphalmata and circumſtances of the like nature; though in ſome he has acquitted himſelf to admiration in the due obſervation of Coſtúme, particularly in his crucifixes, &c. Raphael Urbino was doubtleſs one of the firſt, who reformed theſe inadvertencies; but it was more conſpicuous in his latter, than in his former pieces. As for Michael Angelo, continues Mr. Evelyn, though I heartily conſent with our Critic in reproving that almoſt idolatrous veneration of his works, who had certainly prodigiouſly abuſed the Art, not only in the table this diſcourſe arraigns him for, but ſeveral more which I have ſeen; yet I conceive he might have omitted ſome of thoſe imbittered reproaches he has reviled him with, who doubtleſs was one of the greateſt maſters of his time; and (however he might ſucceed as to the decorum) was hardly exceeded for what he performed in Sculpture and the Statuary Art by many even of the Antients themſelves, and haply by none of the Moderns; witneſs his Moſes, Chriſtus in Gremio, and ſeveral other figures at Rome; to ſay nothing of his talent in Architecture, and the obligation the world has to his memory, for recovering many of its moſt uſeful ornaments and members out of the neglected fragments which lay ſo long buried, and for vindicating that antique and magnificent manner of building from the trifling of Goths and Barbarians. Mr. Evelyn then obſerves, that the next uſual reproach of Painting has been the want of judgment in Perſpective, and bringing more into Hiſtory than is juſtifiable upon one aſpect, without turning the eye to each figure in particular, and multiplying the points of ſight; which is an error, into which even Monſieur Freart (for all the pains he has taken to magnify that celebrated deciſion of Paris) has failed in. For the knowing in that art eaſily perceive, that even Raphael himſelf has not ſo exactly obſerved it, ſince inſtead of one (as Monſieur Freart takes it to be, and as indeed it ought to have been) there are no leſs than four or five, as du Boſſe hath well conſidered in his Treatiſe of the Converted Painter; where by the way alſo he judiciouſly numbers amongſt the faults againſt Coſtúme, thoſe landſkips, groteſque figures, &c. which we frequently find (abroad eſpecially, for in our country we have few or none of thoſe graceful ſupplements of ſteeples) painted horizontally and vertically on the vaults and ceilings of cupolas; ſince we have no examples for it from the Antients, who allowed no more than a frett to the moſt magnificent and coſtly ones which they erected. But would you know from whence this univerſal caution in moſt of their works proceeded, and that the beſt of our modern Painters and Architects have ſucceeded better than others of that profeſſion; it muſt be conſidered, that they were learned Men, good Hiſtorians, and generally ſkilled in the beſt Antiquities. Such were Raphael, and doubtleſs his ſcholar Julio; and if Polydore arrived not to the glory of letters, he yet attained to a rare habit of the antient guſto, as may be interpreted from moſt of his deſigns and paintings. Leon Baptiſt Alberti was ſkilled in all the politer parts of learning to a prodigy, and has written divers curious things in the Latin tongue. We know that of later times Rubens was a perſon univerſally ſtudied, as may be ſeen in ſeveral Latin Epiſtles of his to the greateſt ſcholars of his age. And Nicholas Pouſſin, the Frenchman, who is ſo much celebrated, and ſo deſervedly, did, it ſeems, arrive to this culture, by his indefatigable induſtry; "as the preſent famous Statu- "ary, Bernini, now living, ſays Mr. Evelyn, has "done to ſo univerſal a maſtery, that not many years "ſince he is reported to have built a Theatre at "Rome, for the adornment whereof he not only cut "the figures, and painted the ſcenes, but wrote the "play, and compoſed the muſic, which was all in "recitativo. And I am perſuaded that all this is "not yet by far ſo much as that miracle and orna- "ment of our age and country Dr. Chriſtopher Wren "were able to perform, if he were ſo diſpoſed and "ſo encouraged, becauſe he is maſter of ſo many ad- "mirable advantages beyond them. I alledge theſe "examples partly to incite, and partly to ſhew the (11) France.

" to perfect other men's endeavours." Mr. Cowley, who was a very intimate friend of our Author, addreſſed his Eſſay, intitled, The Garden, to him [E]. He died at London February the 27th $170\frac{5}{6}$, in the eighty ſixth year of his age, and was interred at Wotton, where a monument is erected to him (p). We ſhall give ſome account of his Hiſtory of Chalcography [F]. By his wife Mary, who died February 9, 1708 in the ſeventy fourth

(p) See his Epitaph in the Natural Hiſtory &c. of Surrey, pag. 131.

" dignity and vaſt comprehenſion of this rare art; " and that for a man to arrive to its utmoſt perfec- " tion he ſhould be almoſt as univerſal as the Orator " in Cicero, and the Architect in Vitruvius. But cer- " tainly ſome tincture in Hiſtory, the Optics, and " Anatomy are abſolutely requiſite, and more (in the " opinion of our Author) than to be a ſteady deſigner, " and ſkilled in the tempering and applying of co- " lours, which amongſt moſt of our modern work- " men go now for the only accompliſhment of a " Painter." VIII. The Hiſtory of the three late famous Impoſtors, viz. Padre Ottomano, pretended ſon and heir to the late Grand Seignior; Mahomet Bei, a pretended Prince of the Ottoman family, but in truth a Walachian counterfeit; and Sabbatai Sevai, the ſuppoſed Meſſiah of the Jews in the year 1666; with a brief Account of the ground and occaſion of the preſent War between the Turk and the Venetian: Together with the Cauſe of the final Extirpation, Deſtruction, and Exile of the Jews out of the Empire of Perſia. London 1669 in 8vo. IX. Monſieur de la Quintinye's Treatiſe of Orange-Trees, with the raiſing of Melons, omitted in the French edition. Made Engliſh by John Evelyn Eſq; This is printed at the end of Monſieur de la Quintinye's Compleat Gardiner. London 1693 in fol. X. Μυστήριον τῆς Ἀνομίας; that is, another Part of the Myſtery of Jeſuitiſm; or the new Hereſy of the Jeſuits publickly maintained at Paris in the College of Clermont the 12th of December 1661, declared to all the Biſhops of France, according to the copy printed at Paris. Together with the imaginary hereſy in three Letters; with divers other particulars relating to this abominable myſtery. Never before publiſhed in Engliſh. London 1664 in 8vo. Our Author likewiſe, when he came to Paris in 1649, etched five ſeveral proſpects of places, which he had drawn on the ſpot between Rome and Naples, to which he prefixed alſo a frontiſpiece, intitled, Locorum aliquot inſignium & celeberrimorum inter Romam & Neapolin jacentium ὑποδειξις & Exemplaria Domino Domino Thomæ Henſhaw Anglo, omnium eximiarum & præclariſſimarum Artium Cultori ac Propugnatori maximo & συνοπψαμένῳ αὐτῷ (non propter operis pretium, ſed ut ſingulare Amoris ſui Teſtimonium exhibeat) prima has ἀδοκιμασίας Aqua forti excuſas & inſculptas Jo. Evelynus Delineator D. D. C. Q. R. Hoare excud. I. Tres Tabernæ, ſive Appii Forum celebre illud in ſacris Literis. Act. 28. II. Terracini, olim Anxuris Promontorium. III. Proſpectus verſus Neapolin a Monte Veſuvio. IV. Montis Veſuvii juxta Neapolin externa Facies. V. Montis Veſuvii Fauces & Vorago, ſive Barathrum internum. He etched alſo a view of his own ſeat at Wotton, and another of Putney in Surrey.

[E] Mr. Cowley, who was a very intimate friend of our Author, addreſſed his Eſſay, intitled, The Garden, to him.] In this Eſſay he takes notice of Mr. Evelyn's having dedicated to him his Kalendarium Hortenſe, the moſt uſeful book, ſays Mr. Cowley, that has been written in that kind, and which is to laſt as long as months and years. Mr. Cowley then proceeds thus. " Among many other arts and excellencies which you " enjoy, I am glad to find this favourite of mine the " moſt predominant; that you chooſe this for your " wife, though you have hundreds of other arts for " your concubines. Though you know them, and " beget ſons upon them all (to which you are rich " enough to allow great legacies) yet the iſſue of this " ſeems to be deſigned by you to the main of the " eſtate. You have taken moſt pleaſure in it, and " beſtowed moſt charges upon its education. And I " doubt not to ſee that book, which you are pleaſed " to promiſe to the world, and of which you have " given us a large earneſt in your Calendar, as ac- " compliſhed as any thing can be expected from an " extraordinary wit, and no ordinary expence, and a " long experience. I know no body that poſſeſſes " more private happineſs than you do in your gar- " den, and yet no man who makes his happineſs more " publick by a free communication of the art and " knowledge of it to others. All that my ſelf am " able yet to do is only to recommend to mankind " the ſearch of that felicity, which you inſtruct them " how to find and to enjoy.

" Happy art thou, whom God does bleſs
" With the full choice of thine own happineſs;
" And happier yet, becauſe thou'rt bleſt
" With prudence how to chooſe the beſt.
" In books and gardens thou haſt plac'd aright
" (Things which thou well doſt underſtand;
" And both doſt make with thy laborious hand)
" Thy noble, innocent delight:
" And in thy virtuous wife, where thou again doſt meet
" Both pleaſures more refin'd and ſweet:
" The faireſt garden in her looks,
" And in her mind the wiſeſt books.
" O who would change theſe ſoft, yet ſolid joys
" For empty ſhows and ſenſeleſs noiſe,
" And all which rank ambition breeds,
" Which ſeem ſuch beauteous flowers, and are ſuch pois'nous weeds?"

[F] We ſhall give ſome account of his Hiſtory of Chalcography.] In the dedication to Mr. Robert Boyle, dated at Says-Court April the 5th 1662, he obſerves that he wrote this Treatiſe at the reiterated inſtances of that Gentleman. The firſt chapter is Of Sculpture, how derived and diſtinguiſhed, with the Styles and Inſtruments belonging to it. The ſecond chapter is Of the Original of Sculpture in general. The third is " Of the Reputation and Progreſs of " Sculpture among the Greeks and Romans down to " the middle ages; with ſome pretenſions to the in- " vention of copper-cuts and their impreſſions." The fourth is " Of the Invention and Progreſs of Chalco- " graphy in particular; together with an ample enu- " meration of the moſt renowned maſters and their " works." The fifth is " Of Drawing and Deſign " previous to the Art of Chalcography, and of the " Uſe of Pictures in order to the education of chil- " dren." The ſixth is " Of the new way of engrav- " ing or Mezzo Tinto, invented and communicated by " his Highneſs Prince Rupert." In the ſecond chapter our Author obſerves, that Letters, and conſequently Sculpture, were long before the Flood, Suidas aſcribing both Letters and all the reſt of the Sciences to Adam; τάυτα πάντα ἐυρήματα &c. After the Flood, as he ſuppoſes, there were but few who make any conſiderable queſtion, that it might not be propagated by Noah to his poſterity; though ſome admit of none before Moſes. " But what then ſhall we think of " that book of the wars of the Lord, which this ſa- " cred Author mentions, Num. xxi? not to inſiſt " upon the lxxxviiith and cixth Pſalms, by many " aſcribed to ſome of the Patriarchs his predeceſſors. " Mercurius Triſmegiſtus three hundred years after " the Flood, and long before Moſes engraved his ſe- " cret and myſterious things in ſtone, as himſelf re- " ports, reforming what had been depraved by the " wicked Cham; ſome in letters, ſome in figures, " and enigmatical characters; ſuch happly, as were " thoſe contained in the magnificent and ſtupendous " obeliſks erected by Miſra, the firſt Egyptian Pha- " raoh, which being at leaſt four hundred years be- " fore Moſes (as the moſt indefatigable Kircher has " computed) does greatly preſage their antiquity to " have been before that holy Prophet. But not to put " too much ſtreſs upon ſuperannuated tradition, this we " are ſure of is of faith, and without controverſy, that " in Moſes we have the Tables of Stone, engraven by the " finger of God himſelf, where the command is expreſs, " even againſt the abuſe of this very art, as well as an " inſtance of the idolatry atteſting that of Sculpture: " Thou fourth year of her age, he had five ſons and three daughters, of whom only one daughter Suſanna, married to William Draper of Adſcomb in Surry Eſq; ſurvived him, the other two dying in the flower of their age; and all the ſons very young, except one named John, who became a Gentleman Commoner of Trinity College in Oxford in Eaſter-Term 1668, aged thirteen years, and was afterwards one of the Commiſſioners of the Revenue in Ireland. He tranſlated into Engliſh Plutarch's Life of Alexander, publiſhed in the Tranſlation

Exod. xx. " Thou ſhalt not make to thyſelf any graven image. " But this, which is indeed the firſt writing that we " have Scripture to vouch for, does yet preſuppoſe en- " graving to have been of much greater antiquity. " What elſe were the Teraphim, what the Penates " ſtolen by Rachel? The Idols of Terah? or the E- " gyptian? &c. But we forbear to expatiate, only " that which is by Ben Syrac ſomewhere in Eccleſiaſti- " cus delivered, that the original of idolatry was from " images to preſerve the memory of the dead, as in See Sap. c. xiv. " proceſs of time by the flatterers of great men it was " turn'd to be an object of adoration, plainly infers " Graving to have been elder than Idolatry." But now, continues our Author, to recover its eſteem again beyond all prejudice (however by others abuſed, as indeed many of the beſt things have been;) it was, Exod. xxxi. we know, imputed for a ſpiritual talent in Bezaleel and Aholiab, who made Intaglias to adorn the High-Prieſt's Pectoral. And we have ſaid how the Egyptians reverenced it, as ſeeming to have uſed it before Letters; or rather their Hieroglyphics (importing ſacred ſculpture) were thoſe elements, by which they tranſmitted to poſterity what they eſteemed moſt worthy of record, and not (as ſome have imagined) wrap'd up in thoſe enigmatical Figures the ſecrets of their arts both divine and ſecular; for Lucanus, lib. iii.

Nondum flumineas Memphis contexere biblos
Noverat, & Saxis tantum volucriſque feræque,
Sculptaque ſervabant magicas animalia linguas:

Whence Tacitus calls them antiquiſſima monumenta memoriæ humanæ impreſſa ſaxis. Such as were alſo the Horapollinis notæ, and all thoſe other venerable antiquities of this nature tranſported to Rome out of Egypt in no leſs than two and forty prodigious obeliſcs, interpreted by the induſtrious Kircher. Suidas attributes the Invention to the Father of the Faithful; others to Theut or Hermes; ſome to Cadmus and the Phenicians. Bibliander will have Letters and Sculpture from Adam; Joſephus from Henoch; Philo from Abraham; Euſebius from Moſes; Cyprian from Saturn, where by the way, becauſe it is ſaid he did Literas imprimere, Petrus Calaber, who calls himſelf Pomponius Lætus, abſurdly deduces, that even the Voſſius in Art. Hiſt. Typographical Art was known in the age of this Hero. But thence it deſcended to the Egyptians by Miſraim, and ſo was communicated to the Perſians, Medes, and Aſſyrians, thence to the Greeks, and laſtly to the Romans, from whom it was derived to us, as Peter Crinitus in his 17th Book de honeſtâ Diſciplinâ out of a very ancient manuſcript Bibliothecæ Septimianæ ſeems to deduce, and thus ſums them up together:

Moyſes primus Hebraicus exaravit literas.
Mente Phœnices ſagaci condiderunt Atticas.
Quas Latini ſcriptitamus, condidit Nicoſtrata:
Abraham Syras, & idem repperit Chaldaicas:
Iſis arte non minor protulit Egyptiacas.
Gulfila promſit Getarum quas videmus literas.

Now ſhould all this but relate to the ſeveral characters only, it ſhall yet ſerve our purpoſe; ſince whoever was the Inventor of Letters, was alſo doubtleſs the father of Sculpture, as is apparent, if not by the columns erected by Seth (one whereof Angelus Roccha in his Bibliotheca Vaticana preſumes to have been of braſs,) by ſeveral other inſtances; the writing with ink, paper, or parchment, being altogether a novelty in compariſon with the more ancient forms and materials, ſuch as were the ſlit-ſtones or ſlates, which ſucceeded the ſtately marbles, and preceded the thinner leaves of bark and tables of wood, which from the German Bucher ſignifying the Fagus or Beech-Tree, (whoſe fruit does ſtill with us retain the name of Buch-maſt) were called Books, to whatever voluble or folding matter applied. For before the invention of paper they uſed the leaves of palms, as Varro de Sibylla; then the rinds of trees; afterwards ſheets of lead, linnen, wax, and ivory, as Vopiſcus tells us. They wrote in ſilk among the Perſians and Chineſe; and laſtly were invented parchment and paper. But whether in all theſe, or whatever the ſubject were (ſome few later excepted) it was ſtill by inſculping, ſcarifying, and making a kind of inciſion into it, eſpecially intending to conſign to poſterity their laws divine and human, Roman, Egyptian, or Hebrew: for ſo of old,

——Verba minantia fixo Metamorph. lib. 1.
Ære ligabantur;

according to the Poet. Thus were the Hieronicæ preſerved in the Temple of Olympian Jove, and the Roman Conſuls in the Capital; and as by thoſe innumerable Inſcriptions of irrefragable and undeniable Antiquities does appear. We have already computed how probable it is, that Sculpture was in uſe in Egypt ſomewhat before, or at leaſt as ſoon as the Patriarch Abraham went thither. But the leſs diſcerning Greeks, who received it from the Egyptians, could tell us of no writings of theirs extant before Homer, if we will give ear to Joſephus before that of Tatian, a learned Aſſyrian, and contemporary with Juſtin Martyr, where he mentions no leſs than ſeventeen Greek Writers more ancient than the Homer. Οὐκ Ὁμήρου μόνου πρεσβύτερος ἐστιν ὁ Μωσῆς ἔτι δὲ τοῦ πρὸ αὐτοῦ συγγραφέων, Αἴνου, Φιλάμμωνος, Θαμύριδος, Ἀμφίονος, Μουσαίου, Ὀρφέως, Δημοδόκου, Φημίου, Σιβύλλης, Ἐπιμενίδου τοῦ Κρητὸς, ὅσις εἰς τὴν Σπάρτην ἀφίκετο, Ἀριστέου τοῦ Προκοννησίου τοῦ τὰ Ἀριμασπία συγγράψαντος, Ἀσβόλου τε τοῦ Κινταύρου καὶ Ἰσάτιδος, Δρυμῶνός τε καὶ Ἑυμήλου τοῦ Κυπρίου, καὶ Ὤρου τοῦ Σαμίου, καὶ Προσαντίδου τοῦ Ἀθηναίου &c. There are alſo enumerated the names of twenty Argive Kings from Inachus to Agamemnon, which ſtrongly infers the means of recording by ſculpture and writing to have been very ancient. For ſo we read that the Poems of Heſiod were ingraven in lead. Ariſtotle mentions Daphne a certain Devotreſs of Apollo; Sabinus, and Diodorus many others. But when, or whoever it were, thence, as we obſerved, it travelled into Greece, that Theatre of Arts, where it ſoon arrived to the ſupremeſt height of perfection, when being applied to the forming of figures, it was celebrated by all the witty men of thoſe and the ſucceeding Ages. Homer Iliad. tells us of the engraving in the ſhield of Achilles; Heſiod of that of Hercules; not to mention the ſculptures upon the Chariot of the Sun deſcribed by the Poet, becauſe it is altogether fictitious, tho' extremely Metamorphoſ. ingenious, and whence perhaps they might have their lib. 2. Vehicula Cælata mentioned by Q. Curtius. But whether now, ſays Mr. Evelyn, theſe antient and famous pieces were hollow, like thoſe of our Burine, or the work of our chiſſel and repair'd emboſsments, might ſeem a difficulty to reſolve from the frequent interpretations we attributed to the verb in the former chapter, if what we have here atteſted concerning the Antiquity of Letters, and conſequently of flat Inciſions, pronounce for its preeminence, however this may appear to the more judicious. Add to it, that both Plaſtica (whatever others may fancy) unleſs we will aſcend to the divine Figulation of the firſt breathing Statue, that was ever formed, (and with Pliny derive it to be before, and the Mother of Sculpture) and the Anaglyptic Art, (not produced in the world till about the time of Belus, and the beginning of Gentiliſm) were not till long after the uſe of Letters, if Enoch's Prophecy were not preſerved by unwritten Tradition, and the former Apocryphal Monuments have no other foundation than the wit of the Rabbins, which we can by no means aſſent to in the general. " Beſides if " we apply it to Intaglia's in Stone-Seals, and the like, " for having been almoſt coevous with rings, (what " was elſe the ſignet, which Judah left with his daugh- " ter Tamar?) it queſtionleſs derives its original be- " fore any Hiſtory at preſent extant in the world, di-

Tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives by ſeveral Hands. Rapin's Four Books of Gardens, London 1673, in 8vo. The Hiſtory of the Grand Viſiers, Mahomet, and Achmet Coprogli, of the three laſt Grand Seigniors, their Sultana's and chief Favourites, with the moſt ſecret intrigues of the Seraglio, London 1677 in 8vo; and was Author of ſome copies of Verſes publiſhed in Dryden's Miſcellanies. He died March the 24th $169\frac{8}{9}$, in the forty fifth year of his age, leaving a daughter Elizabeth, and a ſon John, who ſucceeded to his grandfather's eſtate at Deptford and Wotton, and on the 30th of July 1713 was created a Baronet, and is at preſent one of the Commiſſioners of the Cuſtoms, and Fellow of the Royal Society, and Vice-Preſident of the Society of Antiquaries at London.

" vine or human, was committed to writing: of " which he who has a thirſt to ſatisfy his curioſity " farther, may conſult Gorlæus, or Fortun. Licetus de " Annulis Antiquorum; where alſo concerning their " ſculpture, firſt in iron, then in gold, other metals " and ſtones; and of which might very much be " added, both touching their dignity, ſignification, " and how they came at length to be worn ſo univer- " ſally. Something we might here likewiſe inſert of " their conſtellated Figures, or Taliſmans, long ſince " engraven upon certain inſtants and periods of the Sun's " ingreſs into ſuch and ſuch particular ſigns of the Zo- " diac, treated of by Francis Rueus the Phyſician, " Tralianus, & inſtar omnium by the learned Gaffarel " at large; but we haſten to that which follows." In the fourth chapter our Author tells us, that the art of engraving and working off from plates of copper, which we call prints, was not yet appearing, or born with us, till about the year 1490. In the ſixth chapter, wherein he diſcourſes Of the new way of Engraving, or Mezzo-Tinto, invented, and communicated by his Highneſs Prince Rupert, he obſerves, that his Highneſs did indulge him the liberty of publiſhing the whole Manner and Addreſs of this new way of engraving; but when I had well conſider'd it, ſays he, (ſo much having been already expreſſed, which may ſuffice to give the hint to all ingenious perſons how it is to be performed) I did not think it neceſſary, that an art ſo curious, and as yet ſo little vulgar, (and which indeed does not ſucceed where the workman is not an accompliſh'd Deſigner, and has a competent talent in painting likewiſe) was to be proſtituted at ſo cheap a rate, as the more naked deſcribing of it here would too ſoon have expoſed it to. Upon theſe conſiderations then it is, that we leave it thus ænigmatical; and yet that this may appear no diſingenuous rodomontade in me, or invidious excuſe, I profeſs myſelf to be always moſt ready (ſub ſigillo, and by his Highneſs's permiſſion) to gratify any curious and worthy perſon with as full and perfect a demonſtration of the entire art, as my talent and addreſs will reach to; if what I am now preparing to be reſerved in the Archives of the Royal Society concerning it, be not ſufficiently inſtructive. We have now in our hands, communicated to us by the very learned Richard Middleton Maſſey, M. D. and F. R. S. an original manuſcript written by Mr. Evelyn, and deſigned for the Royal Society, and intitled, Prince Rupert's new Way of Engraving, communicated by his Highneſs to Mr. Evelyn. In the margin is this note: This I prepared to be regiſtred in the Royal Society, but I have not yet given it in, ſo as it ſtill continues a ſecret. In this manuſcript he firſt deſcribes the two Inſtruments employed in this new manner of engraving, viz. the Hatcher, and the Style; and then proceeds to explain the method of uſing it. He concludes with the following words: " This invention, or new man- " ner of Chalcography, was the reſult of chance, and " improved by a German Soldier, who eſpying ſome " ſcrape on the barrill of his muſquet, and being of " an ingenious ſpirit, refined upon it, till it produced " the effects you have ſeene, and which indeede is " for the delicacy thereof much ſuperiour to any " invention extant of this art, for the imitation " of thoſe maſterly drawings, and (as the Ita- " lians call it) that morbidezza expreſſed in the beſt " of their deſignes. I have had the honour to be the " firſt of the Engliſh, to whom it has bin yet com- " municated, and by a ſpecial indulgence of his High- " neſs (who with his owne hands was pleaſed to di- " rect me) with permiſſion to publiſh it to the world; " but I have eſteemed it a thing ſo curious, that I " thought it would be to profane it, before I had firſt " offered it to this illuſtrious Society. There is another " way of engraving by rowelling a plate with an in- " ſtrument made like that, which our Scriveners and " Clearks uſe to direct their rulers by on parchment; " only the poynts are thicker ſett into the rowell. " And when the plate is ſufficiently freckled with the " frequent reciprocation of it upon the poliſh'd ſurface " ſo as to render the ground darke enough, it is to be " abated with the Style, and treated as we have alrea- " dy deſcribed. Of this ſort I have ſeene a head of " the Queen Chriſtina, grav'd (if I miſtake not) as " big as the life, but not comparable to the Mezzo- " Tinto of Prince Rupert ſo deſervedly celebrated by " J. Evelyn."

T.

EUGENIUS IV, created Pope the third of March 1431, was of a Plebeian family in Venice (a) and ſon to Angelo Condelmerio, but not nephew to Pope Gregory XII [A], as is ſaid in Moreri. He was a Celeſtine Friar, when he was brought to Rome by this Pope's nephew (b). This nephew was alſo a Celeſtine Friar, and a Canon of the Congregation of St. George in Alga. The brother-monk whom he brought to Rome, ſoon ingratiated himſelf with Gregory XII, who appointed him his Treaſurer, afterwards Biſhop of Sienna, and at laſt Cardinal Martin V gave him the Legateſhip of the Picentine, and afterwards that of Bologna. This Cardinal diſcharged his office with great ability, and ſucceeded Martin V (c). I ſhall not expatiate on the particulars of his actions, which may be ſeen in Moreri, but will content myſelf with relating certain things omitted by him, and which ought abſolutely to have been inſerted in his Dictionary. Eugenius opened

(a) Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Ex eodem, ibid.

[A] Not nephew to Pope Gregory XII.] De la Rochepozai, in his Nomenclator Cardinalium (1), Spondanus in his Annals of the Church (2), and a numberleſs multitude of Writers more, aſſert, that Eugenius IV, was ſon to the ſiſter of Gregory XII. I fancy they are miſtaken, and for this reaſon; neither Platina nor Volaterranus declare him to be ſuch; and could not have been ignorant of this circumſtance had it been true; not to mention that Platina's ſilence is attended with ſuch circumſtances, that it amounts to a poſitive proof. This Author relates that Anthony Corario, nephew to Gregory XII, carried to Rome Gabriel Condelmerio, who was of the ſame religious Order with him (3), and with whom he had been very intimate ever ſince his youth: Romam iturus Gabrielem Condelmerium (that is Eugenius IV) qui ejuſmodi profeſſionis erat, quicum ab ineunte ætate familiariter vixerat, ſecum aliquandiu recuſantem duxit (4). With ſuch circumſtances, is it poſſible for any Author not to ſay, that ſuch a one is nephew of ſuch an one? And it is to be obſerved that Platina, blending together the riſe of theſe two men, calls, on every occaſion, Anthony Corario the Pope's nephew, but never beſtows it on the other. Some unattentive, heedleſs reader, may have been deceived by this; and not have diſtinguiſhed the circumſtances belonging to Corario, from thoſe which relate to Condelmerio; he may have miſtaken the latter for the nephew to Pope Gregory XII; after which Hiſtorians may have followed one another, without enquiring farther into this circumſtance.

(1) At pag. 73.

(2) Ad ann. 1408, num. 6; & ad annum 1431, num. 4.

(3) i. e. Celeſtine.

(4) Platina, in Eugenio IV, folio m. 307.

opened his Pontificate by an action which was attended with ill conſequences. He liſtened to ſome informers, who told him that Martin V, fired by an inſatiable ſpirit of avarice, had amaſſed great treaſures. He cauſed to be ſeized, at the inſtigation of thoſe people, Oddo Poccio, Vice-Chamberlain to Martin; but he commanded Stephen Colonna, General of his troops, to bring Poccio before him with as much privacy as poſſible, and not to expoſe him to ſhame; but this order was not obſerved. Oddo's houſe was plundered by the ſoldiers, and he himſelf was dragged, like a felon, to the Pope's palace, in ſight of the whole City. Eugenius was greatly offended at this, and threatened Stephen Colonna, who thereupon fled for refuge to the Prince of Paleſtrina's palace, and there perſuaded him to drive the Pope from his throne; he declaring that if this were not done, the whole family of the Colonna's would be in danger of being ruined. The Prince believing what he heard, and pitying the friends of Martin V, who had been treated very injuriouſly, reſolved to poſſeſs himſelf of Rome. Accordingly he ſeized on the Appian Gate, and advanced as far as St. Mark's Church, without committing the leaſt violence, or meeting with the leaſt reſiſtance: but there he was forced to fight with the ſoldiers of Eugenius, ſeconded by a great number of the inhabitants. A ſharp engagement enſued, and many were killed on each ſide. The Prince of Paleſtrina was obliged to retire, but he afterwards exerciſed hoſtilities of every kind. The Pope took repriſals on the Colonna's and their adherents. He fell ſick; whether it were that he had been poiſoned, or from the ſorrows that ſo grievous a war had brought upon him. He therefore turned his thoughts wholly to peace; and having concluded it by the negotiation of Angelotto Foſco, a Roman Citizen (d), he recovered his health (e). This happened a little before the Emperor Sigiſmund went into Italy. The Pope concluded a treaty with that Emperor; received him with great magnificence in Rome, and there crowned him (f). Some time after he was expoſed to a dreadful misfortune, which was no leſs than a complete revolution [B]; the Romans took up arms, and he could ſcarce ſecure himſelf by flight from their fury. But they were not able to maintain that liberty which this revolution gave them, and were very ſeverely puniſhed. Eugenius died the 22d of February 1447, at ſixty four years of age (g). His Pontificate continued ſixteen years wanting a few days, and was a true ſeries of war; for, abſtracted from the very warm eccleſiaſtical diſputes in which this Pope engaged with the council of Baſil, he was embroiled in all the wars of Italy. He excited the King of Hungary to take up arms againſt the Turks, and the Dauphin againſt the Swiſs (h). He was ſo much the more accountable for the fatal effects of the former of theſe two wars, as he had ſent a Cardinal-Legate into Hungary, who excited the King to infringe a treaty of peace that had been ſolemnly concluded with the Port (i). The reflection he made on his fate is remarkable [C]; and a proof

(d) Ex eodem Platina, ibid.

(e) Nauclerus, Generat. 48. folio m. 934.

(f) Anno 1433.

(g) Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV, Volaterr. lib. 22. pag. m. 815. ſays he was but 63 years of age.

(h) Platina, ibid.

(i) See Æneas Sylvius's 81ſt Letter.

[B] He was expoſed to a dreadful misfortune, which was no leſs than a complete Revolution.] Philip Duke of Milan, being exaſperated at the Pope, made an incurſion into the territories of Rome. The cavalry he ſent thither, was commanded by Nicholas Fortebrachio, a renowned Captain, who had quitted the Pope's ſervice in great diſguſt: for having demanded his pay, Eugenius anſwered, that he ought to think he had been amply payed, by the ſpoils he had taken in the plunder of ſome towns. Exaſperated at this anſwer, he ſought another maſter; and being employed by Duke Philip againſt this Pope, he made ſuch dreadful havock in the places adjacent to Rome, that the whole City was in the utmoſt conſternation; and the Pope himſelf was in doubt, for ſome time, whither to retire. The people uſed to go to him in crouds, to complain about the loſſes they had ſuſtained; but as he then was in an ill ſtate of health, and did not know which way to turn himſelf, he uſed to refer every one to the Cardinal his nephew and chamberlain, an idle and voluptuous man, who returned no other anſwer but this to thoſe who told him that they had loſt their cattle; You put too great hopes in your cattle; the Venetians lead a much more agreeable life without them (5). But the people were ſo much exaſperated at this anſwer, that they cried aloud, to arms! Liberty! They removed from their employments all the Magiſtrates who had been appointed by Eugenius; filled them with others, and ſeized the Cardinal his nephew. The Pope being reduced to ſuch extremities, aſſumed a Monk's diſguiſe, and went on board a veſſel, in order to fly to Oſtia, where he arrived happily, notwithſtanding the volleys of ſtones and arrows that were diſcharged at him, and after this went to Florence (6). According to ſome Writers (7), he was confined in St. Mary's church on the other ſide of the Tyber; but having eluded his keepers, he got into a fiſher-boat, and went down the river as far as Oſtia; the Romans ſhooting vollies of arrows at him. Volaterranus (8) adds, that the Romans poſſeſſed themſelves of the Capitol and Caſtle of St. Angelo. However, I believe he ſays too much; for Platina, followed in this by a great number of Writers, declares that the caſtle of St. Angelo was not taken. But be this as it will, the Romans did not long enjoy this liberty; the Pope's authority was reſtored there, in his abſence, by John Vitelleſchi, Patriarch of Alexandria, who employed the utmoſt ſeverity againſt the mutineers. The revolution here ſpoken of, happened in June 1434. It is ſo very remarkable a one, and ſo many Authors (9) have ſpoken of it, that I wonder how Moreri came to omit it. He might have copied it from Spondanus's Annals (10). Ambroſio de Camaldoli mentioned it in his Hodœporicon; and it was not omitted by Abbé de la Roque, when he gave the extract of this work (11).

[C] The reflection he made on his fate is remarkable.] As he was going to breathe his laſt, he turned towards the Friars who ſurrounded him; and, with a voice interrupted by ſighs, declared that it would have been much better for his ſalvation, had he never been Cardinal or Pope. Hic (Eugenius) cum eſſet morti proximus, apud Raynaldum anno M. CCCCXLVII aliquid dixiſſe memoriæ proditur, quod niſi pœnitentiam oſtendat, certè mihi terrorem injicit: Verba ſunt; Cumque à religioſis viris cinctus eſſet, interpuncta ſuſpiriis voce, verſoque ad eos vultu dixiſſe fertur: O Gabriel, quantò magis conduxiſſet animæ tuæ ſaluti, ut nunquam Cardinalatum, nec Pontificatum obtinuiſſes, ſed in tuo monaſterio religioſam diſciplinam coluiſſes! Hæc ex vitæ Eugenii auctore, qui tunc claruit, & à Raynaldo laudatur (12). i. e. "This Eugenius, being ready "to breathe his laſt, is reported by Raynaldus, anno "1447, to have employed an expreſſion, which, in "caſe it did not ſhew his repentance, does certainly "fill me with terror. His words are theſe: Being "ſurrounded by a company of Monks, he, with a voice "broken by ſighs, and his face turned towards the people round him, ſpoke as follows: O Gabriel, how "much better would it have been for thy ſoul's health, "hadſt thou never been raiſed to the purple or pontificate, "but continued a religious life in thy monaſtery! Theſe "particulars are cited from the Author of Eugenius's "life, who flouriſhed at that time, and is applauded "by Raynaldus."

(5) Eos nimiam ſpem in pecoribus collocaſſe: Venetos quidem ſine gregibus & jumentis longe urbaniorem vitam ducere. Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV, folio 310.

(6) Ex Platina, in Eugenio IV, folio 310.

(7) Volaterr. lib. 22. pag. 814.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Blondus, St. Antonin, Platina, Volaterran, Nauclerus.

(10) Ad ann. 1434. num. 4.

(11) See the Journal des Savans of March 2, 1682, pag. 79. Dutch edit.

(12) Launoius, Epiſt. ultima, Part 1 pag. 82. edit. Cantabrig.

a proof that thoſe who poſſeſs the higheſt dignities, find them to be meer vanity. I muſt not omit to ſhew that he was not entirely devoted to military actions, he affected to perform in perſon, and with great ſplendor, ſome religious ceremonies, and to employ himſelf in the beautifying and reformation of ſome churches in Rome [D]. He was a handſome man; had a venerable aſpect; and always held his eyes downwards whenever he appeared in public (k). He never drank wine; and obſerved, with regard to his own perſon, the rules of frugality, though great magnificence was ſeen in his palace (l). He was no ſcholar, but loved and encouraged learned men [E]. It was under his Pontificate that the Cardinals began to keep packs of hounds; to build fine ſtables, and abandon themſelves to luxury in their furniture and entertainments [F].

(k) Vir aſpectu inſignis & veneratione dignus. Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV. Vultu alioqui decoro, ac venerabili, oculos in publico nunquam attollebat, ut à parente meo qui eum ſequebatur accepi. Volaterr. lib. xxii. pag. 815.

(l) Splendidus in victu familiæ, parcus in ſuo, & à vino ita alienus ut abſtemius meritò vocaretur. Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV.

[D] He affected to perform in perſon, and with great ſplendor, ſome religious ceremonies; and to employ himſelf in the beautifying and reformation of ſome Churches in Rome.] This appeared when Nicholas Tolentin was canonized, and St. Sylveſter's mitre was carried from Avignon to Rome. Read the following words of Platina, and you will there find likewiſe that that he drove the ſecular Canons from the Church of St. John of Lateran, and ſettled Canons regular in their ſtead. Interea vero Eugenius, ne rembellicam ſolum curare videretur, Nicolaum Tollentinatem Ordinis Sancti Auguſtini miraculis clarum in Sanctos referens: à ſancto Petro cum omni clero ſupplicando ad ſanctum Auguſtinum profectus ſolennia ipſe celebrat, aſtante populo Romano Cardinaliumque omnium cœtu: præterea vero pulſis omnino è ſancto Joanne Laterano canonicis ſecularibus admiſſiſque tantummodo regularibus: & porticum illam extruxit quæ ab eccleſia ad ſancta ſanctorum; & clauſtrum ubi ſacerdotes habitarent reſtituit: auxit & picturam templi à Martino antea inchoatam. Præterea vero ſancti Sylveſtri mitram Romam Avenione delatam ipſemet è Vaticano ad Lateranum detulit magna cum veneratione & litania ſacerdotum omnium populique Romani (13).

(13) Platina, in Vita Eugenii IV. folio 320 verſo.

[E] He was no ſcholar, but loved and encouraged learned men.] According to Platina, he ſpoke with more gravity than eloquence. He had but little erudition; was well verſed in Hiſtory (14), was extremely liberal to all men, and eſpecially to the learned. He delighted in their converſation; Leonardo Aretino, Carlo Aretino, Poggio, Auriſpa, Blondus and George Trapezuntius being his Secretaries. He is ſaid to have written a great number of Books; but the catalogue that is given of them (15) includes ſo many pieces written by his Secretaries, that the ſame judgment ought to be formed of all the reſt. The remark I have made againſt Ghilini (16), may have place on this occaſion.

(14) Gravis in dicendo potius quam eloquens; modicæ literaturæ; multæ cognitionis, hiſtoriæ præſertim. Idem, ibid. folio 321.

(15) See the Nomenclator Cardinalium, pag. 74, and the Bibliotheca Pontificia of Father Jacob, pag. 65, & ſeq.

(16) In the Article CHARLES V, remark [C].

[F] It was in his Pontificate that the Cardinals began to abandon themſelves to luxury in their furniture and entertainments.] A remarkable circumſtance is, that the Cardinal who began this innovation had been a Phyſician. Read the following words of Volaterranus. Ludovicum Patriarcham Aquileienſem, cum exercitu Florentinis auxilio miſit (Eugenius IV) qui tunc ad Anglare oppidum à Picinino duce copiarum Philippi vicecomitis oppugnabantur; ex quo victoria potiti ſunt. Hic Ludovicus patria Paduanus; arte medicus; ob ſua merita pugnæ, in ſenatum aſcitus, tantos ſibi ſpiritus aſſumpſerat, immemor generis, ut primum ſit auſus cardinalium, canes equoſque alere: conviviorum, lautitiæque, ac ſupellectilis plus quàm illi ordini par erat, ſplendorem introducere (17). i. e. "Eugenius IV ſent "Lewis, Patriarch of Aquileia, with an army to ſuc- "cour the Florentines, who at that time were beſieged "in the town of Anglara, by Picininus, General of Phi- "lip's troops; by which means they gained the vic- "tory. This Lewis who was a native of Padua and "a Phyſician, being promoted, on account of his ſer- "vices done in the field, to the dignity of a Senator, "grew ſo proud, that, forgetful of his birth, he was "the firſt Cardinal who preſumed to keep horſes and "hounds; and to introduce magnificence in feaſting, "furniture, and equipage, more than became that "Order."

(17) Volaterran. lib. 22. pag. 815.

☞EUGENE (PRINCE). See Houſe of SAVOY.

EUPHRATES, a diſciple of Plato, was in ſuch prodigious favour with Perdiccas King of Macedon, that he was as much monarch as he. He was a wicked man, and an informer; and he excluded, from Perdiccas's table, all perſons who were not ſkilled in Geometry or Philoſophy [A]. Parmenio put him to death in the reign of Philip, ſucceſſor to Perdiccas (a).

(a) Extracted from Athenæus, lib. 11, ſub finem, 508.

[A] He excluded, from Perdiccas's table, all perſons who were not ſkilled in Geometry or Philoſophy.] A Court which, like that of Macedon, at the time we are now ſpeaking of, was but juſt emerging out of ignorance, doubtleſs look'd upon this condition as a kind of tyranny; for if the Profeſſors who wrote the following words over the doors of their Schools, Οὐδεὶς ἀγεωμέτρητος εἰσίτω; i. e. "Let no one who is igno- "rant of Geometry enter here," required very hard preliminaries; what muſt Perdiccas's Courtiers think, when they ſaw that their admiſſion to the King's table depended on ſuch a Law? Had nothing been inſiſted on but a ſlight knowledge of the Poets and Hiſtorians, this condition might have been fulfilled; but Euphrates required the gueſts to be Geometricians or Philoſophers; now for theſe two characters, and eſpecially the former, very few have a reliſh, even among thoſe who apply themſelves to the ſciences.

☞EVREMOND (CHARLES DE SAINT DENIS, Lord of Saint) was born at St. Denis le Guaſt, within three leagues of Coutance in Lower Normandy, on the firſt of April 1613, and was ſon of Charles de St. Denis by Charlotte de Rouville, both of them of the beſt families in Normandy. Being one of the younger ſons, he was deſigned for the gown, and at nine years of age was ſent to Paris to be educated a ſcholar. He was entered in the ſecond form of the College of Clermont, and continued there four years, during which he went through Grammar learning and Rhetorick. He went next to the Univerſity of Caen, in order to ſtudy Philoſophy, and having continued there one year returned to Paris, where he purſued the ſame ſtudy one year longer in the College of Harcourt. As ſoon as he had gone through Philoſophy, and learned his exerciſes, he began the ſtudy of the Law; but whether his relations had then other views, or his genius inclined him to arms, he quitted that ſtudy, after he had followed it ſomewhat more than a year, and was made an Enſign before he was full ſixteen years of age. After he had ſerved two or three campaigns he obtained a Lieutenant's Commiſſion, and had a company of foot given him after the ſiege of Landrecy in 1637 (a). A military life did not hinder him from cultivating Philoſophy and the Belles Lettres at his leiſure hours;

(a) Life of Monſieur de St. Evremond. By Mr. Des Maizeaux, F. R. S. prefixed to the Works of Monſ. de St. Evremond, pag. 2, 3, 4. 2d edit. London 1728, in 8vo.

hours [A]; and he ſignalized himſelf by his politeneſs and wit as much as by his bravery. He was at the ſiege of Arras in 1640, and the year following obtained a poſt in the horſe, which gave him freſh opportunities of diſtinguiſhing himſelf. The Duke of Enguien was ſo charmed with his converſation, that he made him Lieutenant of his Guards, that he might have him conſtantly near him [B]. In 1643 after the campaign of Rocroy, he wrote a kind of Satyr againſt the French Academy, which was publiſhed in 1650 [C]. He made the campaign of Fribourg in 1644; and the next year received a dangerous wound in the knee at the battle of Nortlingen (b). After the taking of Furnes in 1646 the Duke of Enguien pitched upon him to carry the news of it to the Court; and having at the ſame time opened to him his deſign of beſieging Dunkirk, charged him to propoſe it to Cardinal Mazarin, and to ſettle with him all that was neceſſary for the execution of ſo great an undertaking. Monſieur de St. Evremond was ſo dextrous in the management of this affair, that he made the prime Miniſter conſent to all that the Duke deſired (c). Some time after this he wrote two or three little pieces, upon occaſion of ſome diſcourſe which had paſſed between him and his friends [D]. In 1648

(b) Ibid. pag. 4—10.

(c) Ibid. pag. 11, 12.

[A] A military life did not hinder him from cultivating Philoſophy . . . at his leiſure hours.] With regard to Philoſophy, it ſoon fared with him, as it commonly does with perſons, who, in a riper age, bethink themſelves of making uſe of their reaſon. He examined whether his maſters had given him a true inſight into the nature of things; but the farther he purſued his inquiries, the more he was ſenſible of the vanity of their pretences; what they had often laid down to him for moſt evident truth, ſcarce appearing to him within the verge of probability. When I had reach'd, ſays he of himſelf (1), the period of man's age, which fits the underſtanding for the purſuit of knowledge, I had a curioſity to comprehend the nature of things; and ſoon preſumed that I had attained to it. The leaſt proof ſeemed to me a demonſtration, and a probability paſſed for a truth: nor can I expreſs with what contempt I look'd down upon thoſe, whom I thought ignorant of thoſe things, which I flatter'd myſelf I knew perfectly well. At length, when age and experience, which unhappily never comes before it, put me upon ſerious reflections, I began to lay aſide the ſtudy of a ſcience always conteſted, and about which the greateſt men ever had different ſentiments. I knew from the univerſal conſent of Nations, that Plato, Ariſtotle, Zeno, and Epicurus, were the Luminaries of their age; and yet there was nothing ſo contrary as their opinions. Three thouſand years after, I found them equally diſputed; ſticklers on all ſides, but nothing of certainty or ſecurity on any. In the midſt of theſe meditations, which inſenſibly undeceived me, I had the curioſity to ſee Gaſſendus, the moſt knowing, and the leaſt preſuming of all Philoſophers. After ſeveral long converſations, wherein he communicated to me all that can be attained by reaſon, he lamented, that nature had given ſo large a ſcope to our curioſity, and ſuch narrow limits to our knowledge; adding, he did not ſay this to mortify the preſumption of others, or to make a falſe oſtentation of his own humility, which ſavours of downright hypocriſy; that perhaps he was not ignorant of what judgment might be made of many things; but that he durſt not be poſitive he was thoroughly acquainted with the moſt inconſiderable. Upon this, adds M. de St. Evremond, a Science, which I already ſuſpected, appeared too vain for me to be a ſlave to it any longer. I broke off all commerce with it, and began to admire how it was poſſible for a wiſe man to ſpend his life in unprofitable inquiries. Theſe were our Author's thoughts about the barren ſpeculations of Philoſophy: but he entertained a far different opinion of the ſtudy of the Law; which he judged to be not only uſeful, but even neceſſary for a Gentleman, and ever delighted in cultivating it (2).

(1) Jugemen ſur les Sciences où un honnête homme peut s'occuper.

(2) See his Diſcourſe addreſſed to the Mareſchal de Crequi.

[B] The Duke of Enguien was ſo charmed with his converſation, that he made him Lieutenant of his guards, that he might have him conſtantly near him.] That young Prince had a great penetration, and a moſt accurate judgment; was a great lover of Literature; and, upon the death of Cardinal Richelieu, deſigned by ſeveral Members of the French Academy for their Protector (3). Reading was one of his moſt agreeable amuſements; and as he always deſired to have the company of M. de St. Evremond at his Lectures, the latter made it his buſineſs to delight and inſtruct him at the ſame time. Being ſenſible, that Princes, whoſe time is precious, ought not to ſtudy after the common method of other men, when he read any paſſages out of ancient Hiſtorians, he left to Grammarians the ſcrupulous explanation of words and phraſes, and bent his whole application to the unfolding and clearing the meaning of the Authors; making reflections on the juſtneſs and beauty of their thoughts; obſerving the ſkill, with which they repreſent great men, and the nice differences they mark in their characters. In ſhort, he laboured to give a true notion of the ſtate of affairs, and to penetrate into the different views of the great perſonages of thoſe times (4). And indeed this is the method, as Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves (5), which not only Princes, but all perſons of quality, who are arrived at the age of diſcernment and reflection, ought to follow in the reading of antient Authors; tho' it muſt be confeſſed at the ſame time, that it is no eaſy matter for them to find men capable of clearing up all thoſe things. Commentators would in ſome meaſure make up that defect, had they turned their views that way; but whether they were not equal to the taſk, or imagined it to be foreign to their province, there is nothing like it in their writings. Mr. de St. Evremond has very well remark'd their imperfections in one of his pieces (6): "I have ſeen within "a few years, ſays he, abundance of criticks, and "but few good judges. Now I do not affect that ſort "of learned men, who rack their brains to reſtore a "paſſage, which is not the more agreeable to us by "the reſtitution. They make a myſtery of knowing "what they might as well be ignorant of, and are "abſolute ſtrangers to what is really worth knowing. "For want of having nice ſentiments and thoughts, "it is impoſſible for them to enter into the delicacy "of the one, or the fineneſs of the other. They "may ſucceed well enough in expounding Grammarians, who applied themſelves to the ſame ſtudy, "and whoſe genius was the ſame; but they can never hit the ſentiment of a polite well-bred man "among the ancients, becauſe theirs is diametrically "oppoſite to it. In hiſtory, they neither know men "nor affairs: they lay the whole ſtreſs on Chronology; and they prefer the date of a Conſul's death "to his character, and the tranſactions of his Conſulſhip. Tully, with them, will never be any more "than an Oration-maker; or Cæſar than a Writer of "Commentaries: the Conſul and the General eſcape "their notice; the ſpirit that animates their works "is unperceived; and the principal matters, which "they treat of, unknown."

(3) Hiſtoire de l'Académie Françoiſ depuis ſon établiſſement juſqu'à 1652. Par M. Peliſſon, pag. 174, 175. edit. de Paris 1730.

(4) Life of Monſieur de St. Evremond. By Mr. Des Maizeaux, F. R. S. prefix'd to the Works of Mr. de St. Evremond, pag. 7, 8. 2d edit. London 1728, in 8vo.

(5) Ibid. pag. 8.

(6) Diſcourſe addreſſed to the Mareſchal de Crequi.

[C] In 1643, after the campaign of Rocroy, he wrote a kind of Satyr againſt the French Academy, which was publiſhed in 1650.] It was printed with the title of, Comedie des Academiſtes pour la Reformation de la Langue Françoiſe. It was handed about a long while in manuſcript, and, as it generally happens on the like occaſions, every body aſſumed the liberty either of adding to it, or ſtriking out of it what he thought fit; ſo that when it appeared in print, M. de St. Evremond ſcarce knew it to be his. However Monſr. Peliſſon (7) expreſſes ſome eſteem of it, and declares, that this piece, "tho' written without either art or rule, and deſerving the name more of a farce than a Comedy, "is not without wit, and there are very humorous paſſages in it." Mr. Des Maizeaux has publiſhed a correct copy of it in the Collection of our Author's Works.

(7) Hiſt. de l'Académie Françoiſe, pag. 62.

[D] Some time after this he wrote two or three little

1648 he loſt the poſt which he had near the Prince of Condé [E], which was the Duke of Enguien's title after his father's death; and the year following went into Normandy to ſee his family. The Duke of Longueville, who had declared againſt Cardinal Mazarin, uſed all endeavours to engage Monſieur de St. Evremond in his party, offering him the command of his artillery, which he refuſed, as he tells us himſelf in a ſatirical piece, intitled, The Duke of Longueville's Retreat to his Government of Normandy; which the Cardinal was ſo extremely pleaſed with, that in his laſt ſickneſs he ſeveral times engaged M. de St. Evremond to read it to him. In 1650 he followed the Court to Havre de Grace, in company with the Duke de Candale; in which journey he had a long converſation with that Lord, which he afterwards ſet down in writing, and in which he joined to the judicious counſels which he gave his friend, the characters of the courtiers, with whom he had the greateſt intimacy (d). The civil war breaking out in 1652, and the King being acquainted with his merit and bravery, and knowing that he had conſtantly refuſed to ſide with thoſe againſt the Court, made him a Mareſchal de Camp, or Major-General, as appears by his Commiſſion dated September 16, 1652, and the next day gave him a warrant for a penſion of three thouſand livres a year (e). He ſerved under the Duke of Candale in the war of Guienne; but upon the reduction of that Province was committed priſoner to the Baſtile by means of Cardinal Mazarin [F], where he continued two or three months. In 1654 he ſerved in Flanders (f). In 1657 he fought a duel with the Marquis de Fore; and notwithſtanding all poſſible care was taken to keep it ſecret, the Court had notice of it, which obliged Mr. de St. Evremond to retire into the country, till his friends had obtained his pardon (g). It was probably during this retirement that he wrote his Diſcourſe on Pleaſures [G]. In 1659 he ſerved in Flanders till the ſuſpenſion of arms was agreed on between France and Spain (h); and afterwards accompanied Cardinal Mazarin, when he went to conclude the peace with Don Luis de Haro, the King of Spain's firſt Miniſter. He had promiſed the Marquis de Crequi, afterwards

(d) Ibid. pag. 15, 16.

(e) Ibid. pag. 17.

(f) Ibid. pag. 18.

(g) Ibid. pag. 20.

(h) It began May 8, 1659, and was continued till the concluſion of the peace the 7th of Nov. following.

pieces, upon occaſion of ſome diſcourſes, which had paſſed between him and his friends.] They were reflections upon the following maxims, That man, who is deſirous to know all things, knows not himſelf: That we ought to deſpiſe fortune, and not care for the Court: That a man ought never to be wanting to his friends. Theſe three pieces were printed at Paris in 1668, but ſtrangely altered. M. de St. Evremond has reſtored the two firſt, which are publiſhed by Mr. Des Maizeaux amongſt his works. He obſerves in the firſt of theſe pieces, that the Author of Nature would not allow us to be well acquainted with ourſelves; and that while we covet to know every thing, we are reduced to the fatal neceſſity of being ignorant of what we are. He maintains, that "no man was ever convinced by reaſon, either that the ſoul is certainly immortal, or "that it is really annihilated with the body." He ſhews, that the moſt knowing Philoſophers, as Socrates, Plato, Epicurus, Ariſtotle, Seneca, and even Solomon, the greateſt of all Kings, and the wiſeſt of all men, could never ſatisfy themſelves on this head; and from the contrariety of their opinions he concludes, that unleſs faith ſubjects our reaſon, we paſs our lives between belief and unbelief, in endeavouring to perſuade, while we are unable to convince ourſelves. It belongs, ſays he, to God alone to make Martyrs; and to engage us by his promiſe to lay down the life we enjoy, for another, which we know nothing of. For a man to pretend to convince himſelf of the immortality of the ſoul by reaſon, is to diſtruſt the aſſurance God has given us of it; and is, in ſome meaſure, renouncing the only thing, by which we may be certain of it.

[E] In 1648 he loſt the poſt, which he had near the Prince of Condé.] The occaſion of it was as follows. That Prince took great delight in finding out the ridicule of mankind, and often ſhut himſelf up with the Count de Mioſſens and M. de St. Evremond, to ſhare that pleaſure with them. One day after theſe two Gentlemen had a converſation of this nature, Mr. de St. Evremond chanced unawares to aſk the Count de Mioſſens, whether he thought that his Highneſs, who was ſo fond of ſpying out the ridicule of others, had no ridicule himſelf? and they agreed, that the very affectation of ſearching out the ridicule of others, ſubjected him to a ridicule of a peculiar ſtamp. This was ſo pleaſant a thought, that they could not reſiſt the temptation of making merry upon it with their friends; of which the Prince being informed, ſoon ſhewed his reſentment. He took from M. de St. Evremond the Lieutenancy of his Guards, and would have no farther correſpondence with the Count de Mioſſens. However, it is probable, that he would have reſtored them both to his favour, if affairs had not taken a new turn. The war at Paris was juſt begun; and the Prince having declared againſt the Court, at laſt withdrew into the Low-Countries, where he was made Generaliſſimo of the King of Spain's armies. When he returned into France, after the Pyrenean Treaty, M. de St. Evremond went to wait upon him, and he received him very graciouſly. He even offered him his protection; and afterwards, on ſeveral occaſions, gave him aſſurances of his affection and eſteem (8).

(8) Life of St. Evremond, pag. 13, 14.

[F] Committed priſoner to the Baſtille by means of Cardinal Mazarin.] Some jeſts, which were paſſed on the Cardinal in a company, where M. de St. Evremond was, and in which he had no greater ſhare than the reſt, were the pretence of his confinement. But the true reaſon of it was this; when they talked of an accommodation with Guienne, the Cardinal deſired, that the application ſhould be made to the creatures he had in the party of the Princes. But the Duke of Candale thought it better to treat with the friends of the Biſhop of Agen, who had turned out the Duke d'Epernon, rightly foreſeeing, that as they were the ſtrongeſt, their opinions would draw in the reſt, which happened accordingly. This want of deference touched the Cardinal to the quick; who concluding that M. de St. Evremond had given this counſel to the Duke of Candale, he reſolved to puniſh him for it. However, when M. de St. Evremond went to return him thanks after his enlargement, the Cardinal told him very obligingly, That he was perſuaded of his innocence; but that a man in his ſtation was forced to hearken to ſo many reports, that it was very difficult for him to diſtinguiſh truth from falſhood, and not do injuſtice ſometimes to an honeſt man (9).

(9) Ibid. pag. 17, 18.

[G] It was probably during this retirement, that he wrote his Diſcourſe on Pleaſures.] In this Diſcourſe he obſerves firſt, "that if a man intends to live happy, "he muſt make few reflections upon life, and often be "abſent, as it were, from himſelf; and amidſt the "diverſions, which exterior objects furniſh him with, "ſteal from the knowledge of his own miſeries." He adds, that we ſhould not contemplate too much on death; not that we ſhould never think of it; he believes it next to impoſſible not to make ſome reflections upon a thing ſo natural; and that it would be a kind of effeminacy to be always afraid to think of it: only he would not have a man make it his particular ſtudy, which he ſays is an employment of the mind too inconſiſtent with life. After this he conſiders how a man muſt manage pleaſures, in order to render them more quick and laſting; and concludes with obſerving the advantages which true Chriſtians have over the Followers of Epicurus and Ariſtippus.

afterwards Marſhal of France, to give him a particular account of the whole negotiation; and therefore as ſoon as the peace was ſigned, he wrote a long letter to the Marquis, in which he ſhewed, that the Cardinal had ſacrificed the honour and welfare of France to his own private intereſt, and raillied him in a very ſatirical manner. This letter falling afterwards into the hands of the Cardinal's creatures, ſome time after his death, it was repreſented as a State-crime, and he was obliged to fly to Holland [H], where he arrived in 1661. He had too many friends in England, (whither he had taken a tour the year before with the Count de Soiſſons, who had been ſent over by the King of France to compliment King Charles II upon his reſtoration,) to make any long ſtay in Holland, and therefore paſſed over to England, where he was received with great reſpect (i), and admitted into an intimate friendſhip with ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, eſpecially the Duke of Buckingham and the Lord d'Aubigny [I]. Here he wrote ſeveral pieces, which with the reſt of his Works have been ſeveral times printed [K]. In 1665 he was ſeized with vapours,

(i) Life of Mr. de St. Evremond, pag. 28, 29.

[H] This Letter falling afterwards into the hands of the Cardinal's creatures.] The affair happen'd in this manner. The King ſet out for Britany ſome days before Monſieur Fouquet was arreſted; and M. de St. Evremond being one of thoſe named for the journey, he left in the hands of Madam du Pleſſis-Belliere, mother to the Marchioneſs de Crequi, a ſtrong box, with money, notes, and ſeveral letters. As ſoon as Monſieur Fouquet was arreſted, (which was on the 5th of September 1661) they were not contented with ſeizing all his papers, but likewiſe clapped a ſeal on what they found at the houſes of all ſuch as were thought to be his confidents; and did not fail making a viſit to the Lady du Pleſſis-Belliere, who was too great a friend to the Superintendant to be forgotten. There they ſeized Mr. de St. Evremond's ſtrong box, and the letter relating to the Pyrenean treaty, which had been communicated to none but the Mareſchal de Clerimbaut, and two or three other perſons. Meſſieurs le Tellier and Colbert, who were the Cardinal's creatures, pretending a grateful veneration for the memory of their benefactor, read the letter to the King, and left no ſtone unturned to exaſperate him againſt M. de St. Evremond. They put his Majeſty in mind of the great zeal which his Eminence had ever ſhewn for his intereſt, and the ſervices which he had done the ſtate in the worſt of times. They added, that the invectives of M. de St. Evremond reflected on the regency of the Queen-Mother, and even on the King's reign, ſince his Majeſty had thought fit to purſue the Cardinal's ſcheme and maxims. And in ſhort, they told him the danger of allowing private men to judge of ſtate-affairs according to their caprice, and with impunity to cenſure the conduct of Miniſters. Nor did they fail to make an handle of the friendly correſpondence which M. de St. Evremond held with the Superintendant, whoſe ruin had been reſolved on. Theſe inſinuations made an impreſſion on the King, who ordered M. de St. Evremond to be committed to the Baſtille. It happened that he was gone to ſee the Mareſchal de Clerimbaut in the country, not ſuſpecting what had paſſed. But M. de Gourville hearing that orders were iſſued to apprehend him, and knowing that he was returning with the Mareſchal to Paris, ſent a man poſt to advertiſe him of it, who overtook him in the foreſt of Orleans; and upon M. de Gourville's advice retired into Normandy. After having lain hid there for ſome time, he went privately to the frontiers of the Kingdom, and at laſt reſolved to go to Holland, where he arrived about the end of the year 1661 (10).

(10) Ibid. pag. 26, 27, 28.

[I] Admitted into an intimate friendſhip with ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, eſpecially the Duke of Buckingham, and the Lord d'Aubigny.] He courted the correſpondence of perſons the moſt eminent for learning in England. He often converſed with Sir Kenelm Digby and Mr. Hobbes, but more eſpecially with Mr. Cowley and Mr. Waller. The Duke of Buckingham and the Lord d'Aubigny, and M. de St. Evremond were together almoſt every day, and their converſation was often upon Theatrical performances. M. de St. Evremond not underſtanding the Engliſh tongue, thoſe Gentlemen acquainted him with the beſt dramatic pieces compoſed in that language; of which he retained ſo clear an idea that forty years after he remembred them very diſtinctly. The reading of them furniſhed him with the reflections which he has made upon the Engliſh Tragedies and Comedies in ſome of his Works (11). It was this ſort of amuſement too, which gave them occaſion to write the Comedy of Le pretendu Politique (12) or Sir Politick Would-be, towards which each of them clubbed part of the characters, which M. de St. Evremond reduced to form (13).

(11) Vol. 2. pag. 157 and 168. of the Engliſh Tranſlation.

(12) See the French edition of his Works, vol. 2. Amſterdam 1726, in 12mo.

[K] Several pieces, which with the reſt of his works have been ſeveral times printed.] We ſhall give ſome account of ſeveral of his writings, and the occaſions of writing them. When Queen Chriſtina of Sweden came to Paris in 1656, ſhe was the ſubject of all converſation; there was no other talk but about her abdication, learning, and behaviour, which produced various comments, and ſometimes very pleaſant ſcenes. Such, for inſtance, was the diſpute which aroſe one day between the Count du Bautru, the Commander de Jars, and the Biſhop of Mans, three great originals in their way. M. de St. Evremond, who was witneſs to their diſpute, thought it ſo remarkable that he made a narrative of it, and ſent it to the Count d' Olonne (14). The diſpute between the Jeſuits and Janſeniſts making a great noiſe in the world about the year 1663, our Author having one day related to the Lord d'Aubigny the converſation he had with Father Canaye about the animoſity between both parties, the Lord d'Aubigny was charmed with the Jeſuit's frankneſs, and to ſhew that there was as much candor among the Janſeniſts as among the Fathers of the Society, he gave him the character of the Janſeniſts, and diſcloſed to him the whole ſecret of their cabal. M. de St. Evremond committed this converſation to writing, and it is printed next to that, which the Mareſchal d'Hocquincourt had with Father Canaye (15). About that time, one of his friends aſking him, what ſciences he thought it was convenient for a Gentleman to apply himſelf to; he ſent him a ſhort diſcourſe, wherein he reduces them to morals, politics, and the Belles Lettres (16). "The firſt, ſays he, has a relation to "reaſon, the ſecond to ſociety, and the third to converſation. The one teaches us to govern our paſſions; "by the other we are inſtructed in affairs of ſtate, and "how to regulate our conduct in good or ill fortune; the laſt poliſhes the mind, and inſpires what "is delicate and agreeable." The Reflections upon the different Genius of the Roman People (17), which our Author wrote afterwards, have merited univerſal applauſe, and obtained a ſort of preference to all his other works. He begins them with remarks on the fabulous original of the Romans, and the genius of that people under the firſt Kings. He ſpeaks afterwards of the genius of the antient Romans, in the beginning of the Republic, and in their firſt wars. He confutes Livy, who thought that the firſt Romans would have vanquiſhed Alexander the Great, if he had made war againſt them; and ſhews, that the Conſuls at that time had not by far ſo good troops, nor ſo great ſkill in the military art, as that Conqueror. He deſcribes the genius of the Romans, when Pyrrhus waged war againſt them; he treats of the 1ſt and 2d Punic wars; of the genius of the Romans towards the end of the latter; and laſtly, of the government of Auguſtus and Tiberius, their genius, and that of the Romans, who lived under the reign of thoſe two Princes. M. de St. Evremond has treated of thoſe things like one, who perfectly knew mankind, as well as affairs civil and military. He has entered ſo far into the genius of thoſe antient Romans; ſo artfully unravelled the different motives that actuated them; and ſo well penetrated into the private views of their leaders, that Mr. Des Maizeaux is of opinion (18), that nothing better has yet

(13) Life of St. Evremond, pag. 40, 41.

(14) Vol. 1. pag. 36. of the Engliſh Tranſlation.

(15) Ibid. vol. 1. pag. 176.

(16) Ibid. pag. 49.

(17) Ibid. pag. 55, & ſeqq.

(18) Life of St. Evremond, pag. 45.

vapours, which caſt him into a ſort of melancholy, and weakened him very much; upon which he was adviſed to go to Holland, where he viſited ſome learned men, and celebrated Philoſophers, who were then at the Hague, particularly Heinſius, Voſſius, and yet appeared on the Roman Hiſtory. But one half of this Work was unfortunately loſt. The vacuum in it was filled up by the conteſt of Gracchus with the Senate; by reflections on the genius of the Roman people, when Jugurtha ſeized the Kingdom of Numidia; on the ſordid intereſt, which was then predominant, and on the infamous character of the Romans, who were firſt employed in that affair. Then came the picture of Scaurus; the war managed by Metellus, his character, and that of Jugurtha; and ſome ſtrokes on the pride of the Nobility. Next followed the character of Marius, with ſome reflections on the arrogance of that Conſul. He there deſcribed the genius of the people, who had aſſumed a tyrannical ſuperiority over the Senate, which went near to prove fatal to the commonwealth. He gave after that the character of Sylla, and ſhewed how he freed the Senate, and oppreſſed the people; and then ſpoke of Pompey and Sertorius. He afterwards repreſented the State of Rome, and the genius of the Romans, at the time of Cataline's conſpiracy, whoſe character he deſcribed with that of Clodius and Cicero, and mentioned the baniſhment of the latter; ſhewing the State of Rome, when the government was divided between Pompey, Cæſar, and Craſſus. In the laſt place he laid open the motives of the Civil War between Pompey and Cæſar; drew the characters of thoſe great men; ſhewed how the Senate was affected to Pompey, and the people to Cæſar; diſcovered the ſentiments of the former concerning the Republic, and how his power was eſtabliſhed to the prejudice of liberty, and repreſented Cæſar's gradual advancement towards abſolute power. M. de St. Evremond had treated of all theſe great ſubjects; but this part of his labour is loſt, and he would never take the trouble to recal it to mind, and write it over again. This is the account of Mr. Des Maizeaux (19); and we are informed likewiſe in an advertiſement at the end of Chap. VIII. of our Author's Reflections, that he having reſolved to go over into Holland in 1665, left his papers in the cuſtody of his good friend Mr. Waller; but upon his return to London in 1670, found that moſt of them were loſt during the great plague; and among the reſt Chap. IX, X, XI, XII, XIII, XIV, XV, of the Reflections on the different genius of the Roman People, with part of Chap. VIII. relating to the conteſt of Gracchus with the Senate. He alſo wrote about the ſame time his Judgment upon Cæſar and Alexander (20), wherein he compares thoſe two heroes with reſpect to their birth, manners, qualities of mind, actions, and conduct. This, ſays Monſr. le Clerc (21), is a piece full of good ſenſe and penetration. In 1664 he wrote his Judgment upon Seneca, Plutarch, and Petronius (22); in which he obſerves, that Petronius's love for pleaſures "did not render him an enemy to buſineſs; that he had the "merit of a governor in his government of Bithynia, "and the virtue of a Conſul in his Conſulſhip." He does not forget Petronius's death, which he takes to be the moſt glorious of antiquity, and ſhews, that it has ſomething more great and noble in it, than either that of Cato or Socrates. Petronius, ſays he, leaves us nothing at his death but an image of life; no action, no word, no circumſtance ſhews the perplexity of a dying man: it is with him properly, that to die, is to ceaſe to live. Mr. Addiſon (23) has made ſome animadverſions upon this paſſage of our Author, and having obſerved, that "the end of a man's life is often compared to "the winding up of a well written Play, where the "principal perſons ſtill act in character, whatever the "fate is, which they undergo;" tells us, that there is ſcarce a great perſon in the Grecian or Roman Hiſtory, whoſe death has not been remarked upon by ſome Writer or other, and cenſured or applauded according to the genius or principles of the perſon, who has deſcanted on it. Monſieur de St. Evremont is very particular in ſetting forth the conſtancy and courage of Petronius Arbiter during his laſt moments, and thinks he diſcovers in them a greater firmneſs of mind and reſolution than in the death of Seneca, Cato, or Socrates. There is no queſtion but this polite Author's affectation of appearing ſingular in his remarks, and making diſcoveries, which had eſcaped the obſervation of others, threw him into this courſe of reflection. It was Petronius his merit, that he died in the ſame gaiety of temper, in which he lived; but as his life was altogether looſe and diſſolute, the indifference which he ſhewed at the cloſe of it is to be looked upon as a piece of natural careleſſneſs and levity, rather than fortitude. The reſolution of Socrates proceeded from very different motives, the conſciouſneſs of a well ſpent life, and the proſpect of a happy eternity. If the ingenious Author abovementioned was ſo pleaſed with gaiety of humour in a dying man, he might have found a much nobler inſtance of it in our countryman Sir Thomas More. In 1666, upon occaſion of Mr. Greatrak's pretending to cure diſeaſes by touching the patients only, our Author wrote a Novel, intitled, Le Prophete Irlandois, or the Iriſh Prophet, in which he ridicules the credulity of the people, and the ſpirit of ſuperſtition. He diverted himſelf alſo with drawing the picture of a woman who never was, nor will ever be found, or rather in giving the character of an accompliſhed perſon; and he obſerves, "that he did not attempt to "ſeek ſuch a perſon amongſt men, becauſe there is "always wanting in their converſation a certain ſweet-"neſs, which we meet with in that of women; and "that he thought it more poſſible to find the ſtrongeſt "and ſoundeſt reaſon of men in a woman, than thoſe "charms and endearments, which are ſo natural to "women in a man." The converſations which he had with Iſaac Voſſius, gave him the thought of writing down ſome Obſervations, which he had made on Saluſt and Tacitus (24), which he addreſſed to that great man, whom he called his Learned Friend. He wrote likewiſe during his reſidence in Holland a Diſſertation on Monſr. Racine's Tragedy, called Alexander the Great (25); and in England he compoſed three little diſcourſes on ſordid and baſe intereſt; on pure and ſolid virtue; and the thoughts of a Gentleman, who keeps a medium, and draws from both what ought to enter into civil intercourſe (26). The Mareſchal de Crequi having aſked him what frame his mind was in, and what he thought of things in his old age, he ſent him a diſcourſe containing reflections on the different tempers of a man's mind according to his different ſtages of life; on the reading and choice of Books; on Poetry; on ſome Spaniſh, Italian, and French Authors; on converſation; on literature; the knowledge of law; on ingratitude; and on religion. Of all the Works of M. de St. Evremond, there is none, in which he has painted himſelf more to the life than in this. It ſhews him at one view a Courtier, a man of letters, a Philoſopher, a Divine; and diſcovers a fine genius, and delicate taſte, and a nice diſcernment (28). Madam Queroualle, afterwards Ducheſs of Portſmouth, coming over to England in 1671, M. de St. Evremond ſent her a Problem in imitation of the Spaniards (29), in which he puts the queſtion, "which of the two is moſt injurious to the well-be-"ing of the fair ſex, either to abandon themſelves "wholly to their inclinations, or to follow all the "dictates of virtue;" and "whether their indulging "their paſſions is attended with more misfortunes than "they are deprived of pleaſures by a conſtraint." In 1672 he wrote ſome Reflections on the ancient and modern Tragedy (30), and on the characters of Tragedy (31). In 1673 he compoſed a diſcourſe upon the French Hiſtorians (32); which was followed by his Reflections upon the French Tranſlators (33). The Ducheſs of Mazarin coming over to England about the end of the year 1675, and the Prince of Monaco becoming a paſſionate admirer of her, our Author ſoon obſerved that ſhe was not inſenſible; and as he was privy to the myſtery of the Ducheſs's journey hither, and even ſomewhat concerned in it, he omitted nothing to prevent ſo fatal an amour, and addreſſed to her a little diſcourſe on Friendſhip (34). The converſations held at that Lady's Houſe gave occaſion to ſeveral of our Author's Works; ſuch as his Defence of ſome Plays of M. Corneille (35); his Reflections on the French, Spaniſh, Italian, and Engliſh Tragedies and Comedies, and on Opera's; his Comedy of the Opera; his Diſſertation on the word Vaſt; and ſeveral others. In 1680 he compoſed

(19) Ibid. pag. 45, 46.

(20) Vol. 1. pag. 135 of the Engliſh Tranſlation.

(21) Biblioth. choiſie, tom. 9. pag. 326.

(22) Vol. 1. pag. 153. of the Engliſh Tranſlation.

(23) Spectator, num. 349. vol. 5.

(24) Vol. 1. pag. 224. of the Engliſh Tranſlation.

(25) Ibid. pag. 232.

(26) Vol. 2. pag. 34.

(27) Ibid. pag. 53, &c.

(28) Des Maizeaux, Life of M. de St. Evremond, pag. 73.

(29) Vol. 2. pag. 91.

(30) Ibid. pag. 101.

(31) Ibid. pag. 112.

(32) Ibid. pag. 126.

(33) Ibid. pag. 144.

(34) Ibid. pag. 202.

(35) Ibid. pag. 227.

(k) Ibid. pag. 54, 55, 56.

and Spinoſa (k). He afterwards reſolved to ſee Flanders, and ſpent ſome time at Breda, where the peace was negotiating between England and Holland; and went thence to Spaw and Bruſſels; and in his return to the Hague paſſed through Liege, where he became acquainted with Mr. Sluſius, a Canon of St. Lambert, famous for his knowledge of the (l) Ibid. pag. 61.

Law and the Mathematics (l). He had no other thoughts than quietly to paſs the remainder of his days in Holland, when Sir William Temple delivered to him Letters from the Earl of Arlington, informing him that King Charles deſired his return to England. Hereupon he croſſed the ſea once more, and the King gave him a penſion of three hundred pounds a year. However he could not forget his own country; and he made ſeveral attempts to procure leave to return, but in vain. After the peace of Nimeguen in 1679, he wrote an Epiſtle in verſe to the King of France, in which he indirectly aſked leave to return to his native country, but it proved ineffectual. Upon the death of King Charles in 1685 he loſt his penſion, and as he could not rely on the affection of King James II, though that Prince had ſhewn himſelf extremely kind to him, he deſired his friends to renew their endeavours to procure his return. The Mareſchal de Crequi adviſed him to write to the King, and promiſed to deliver his letter; but it had no more effect than the former (m). In 1686 the Earl of Sunderland propoſed to King James to create for M. de St. Evremond a place of Secretary of the Cabinet, whoſe province ſhould be to write the King's private letters to the foreign Princes. The King approved the motion; but M. de St. Evremond thought it did not become him to accept ſuch an office.

(m) Ibid. pag. 120, 121.

(36) Ibid. pag. 261.

poſed a little Piece (36), in which he enquires into the reaſon why the greateſt men of antiquity, ſuch as Alcibiades, Ageſilaus, Scipio, and Julius Cæſar, were ſo little addicted to the fair ſex, whilſt that wiſe and learned King Solomon was inſenſible to all other charms. The Ducheſs of Mazarin cauſed this Piece to be printed at London in 1681, and maliciouſly intitled it, Friendſhip without Friendſhip, dedicated to the Earl of St. Albans. About the year 1683 he wrote Obſervations upon the Taſte and Judgment of the French (37). The Ducheſs of Mazarin having recovered her health after a great fit of ſickneſs in 1684, ſaid one day ſmiling, that ſhe would be glad to know, what people would ſay of her after her death? This was ſufficient to engage M. de St. Evremond to write her Panegyrick under the title of a Funeral Oration (38). This Piece was followed by two little Diſcourſes on Religion; in the firſt of which (39) he ſhews the unhappy ſtate of thoſe who live in doubt, the advantages of ſincere Devotees; and the various judgments which are paſſed on thoſe who leave the world for a retired life. In the other Piece (40) he ſhews, that Devotion is our laſt Love; and that a converted ſinner generally intermixes the idea of his worn out paſſions with the moſt tender ſentiments of his Devotion. In a Letter, which he then wrote to a Lady who deſigned to turn devout (41), he diſcovers the motives which generally induce women to turn devout, and the ſecret ſprings which animate their devotion. Then he gives advice to his friend to direct her conduct in the new ſtate, which ſhe was going to enter into. About the year 1685 he wrote reflections on the Poems of the Antients, and on the Wonderful which is found in them (42); and a little Diſcourſe (43), in which, after having acknowledged, that of all the opinions of the Philoſophers concerning the ſovereign good, none appears to him ſo rational as that of Epicurus, who makes it to conſiſt in voluptuouſneſs or pleaſure; he adds, that it is, however, no eaſy matter to determine what he meant by the word Voluptuouſneſs, ſuch is the variety of opinions amongſt the Antients about the morals of that Philoſopher. But our Author is of opinion, that Epicurus was a very wiſe Philoſopher, who, according to different times and occaſions, loved voluptuouſneſs in repoſe, or voluptuouſneſs in motion; and that this difference of voluptuouſneſs occaſioned the various reputation which that Philoſopher has undergone. The Diſcourſe, which he compoſed in 1686 on Retirement (54), contains ſeveral reflections on the ordinary defects of old men, and on the reaſons, which ought to induce them to leave the world. In 1688 he wrote a letter to Dr. le Fevre, a famous Phyſician at London, in which he gives his Judgment on the ſeveral Accounts of Siam by the Chevalier de Chaumont, Father Tachard, and the Abbot de Choiſi (45), and alſo on Confucius; and a little Piece upon the Mareſchal de Turenne (46). He reviſed likewiſe the Parallel between the Prince of Condé and the Mareſchal de Turenne, which he had rough-drawn in Holland (47). In 1692, upon occaſion of the diſpute, which aroſe in France about the preference of the ancients to the moderns, he wrote a little piece on that ſubject (48), and a copy of Verſes, wherein he maintains, that with regard to philoſophy, wit, and gallantry the moderns excell the antients (49). The Ducheſs of Mazarin falling ſick in 1693, our Author wrote a Dialogue in verſe (50) between the old man, that is himſelf, and death; which, as was very well obſerved (51), "is an imitation of the Prologue of the "Alceſtis in Euripides; tho' it ſurpaſſes its original "by the delicacy of the turn, and the nice ſatyr that "runs thro' it. The queſtion is, whether any body "will die for the Ducheſs of Mazarin? And this "gives the Author occaſion to muſter up all the friends "of both ſexes, of the illuſtrious ſick Lady; that is "to ſay, almoſt the whole Court of England. Their "characters are touched with a maſterly hand." But Father Niceron (52) complains of the verſification as very rough, and obſerves, that our Author ſhould have been confined to write only in proſe. In 1695 our Author being included in the tax, which the Parliament had laid on batchelors, took occaſion from thence to write a copy of verſes full of fire and gaiety (53). In 1696 his Anſwer to the pleading of M. Herard Advocate in the Grand Council, or rather to the Invective or Libel, which the Duke of Mazarin cauſed to be printed againſt his Lady the Ducheſs, was printed at London. There was a Preface written by Mr. John Dubourdieu, containing an Encomium on the Ducheſs; but M. de St. Evremond thought it too long, and abridged it. There have been ſeveral Editions of our Author's works, but almoſt all of them very incorrect; but the firſt authentic Edition, was publiſhed by Dr. Peter Silveſtre and Monſr. Des Maizeaux at London 1705 in two volumes in 4to; and was reprinted at Amſterdam 1706 in five volumes in 12mo, to which is added, Mélange curieux des meilleurs pieces attribuées à M. de Saint Evremond, & de pluſieurs autres Ouvrages rares ou nouveaux. Amſterdam 1706 in 12mo, two volumes. To this is prefixed the Life of M. de St. Evremond by Mr. Des Maizeaux. Theſe Editions have been reprinted in France; but are all eclipſed by the fourth Edition revûe, corrigée & augmentée, & enrichie de figures par Bernard Picart le Romain. Amſterdam 1726 in 12mo, five volumes, together with Mélange curieux, troiſiéme Edition, où l'on a retranché pluſieurs pieces pour en ajoûter de plus intereſſantes, two Vol. in 12mo. The Life of M. de St. Evremond is more exact than in the former Editions; the Author having carefully reviſed it. Several of M. de St. Evremond's pieces had been tranſlated into Engliſh, tho' very incorrectly; but we have an accurate Tranſlation of the whole publiſhed by Mr. Des Maizeaux, the ſecond Edition of which was printed at London 1728 in three volumes in 8vo under the following title: The Works of Monſr. de St. Evremond, made Engliſh from the French Original: with the Life of the Author by Mr. Des Maizeaux, F. R. S. To which are added The Memoirs of the Ducheſs of Mazarin, &c. The ſecond Edition, corrected and enlarged. The Preface of Mr. Des Maizeaux is dated at London July 5th, 1728.

(37) Ibib. pag. 303.

(38) Ibid. pag. 310.

(39) Ibid. pag. 333.

(40) Ibid. pag. 337.

(41) Ibid. pag. 340.

(42) Ibid. pag. 344.

(43) Ibid. pag. 363.

(44) Ibid. pag. 370.

(45) Ibid. pag. 403.

(46) Vol. 3. pag. 1.

(47) Ibid. pag. 11.

(48) Vol. 2. pag. 417.

(49) See the Works of M de St. Evremond in French.

(50) See the ſaid Works in French.

(51) Mémoires pour l'Hiſt. des Sciences & des beaux Arts. Janv. 1706, pag. 30, 31.

(52) Mémoires pour ſervir a l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 7. pag. 181. edit. de Paris 1729.

(53) See the French edition of his Works.

(n) Ibid. pag. 126.

fice (n). The Revolution, which raiſed the Prince of Orange to the Throne of Great Britain, was advantageous to him. That Prince had been very kind to him in Holland, and when he came to be King of England, gave him very ſubſtantial marks of his favour. He often took him into his parties of pleaſure, and loved to converſe with him, and to hear him talk of the great Captains whom he had ſeen in France, and of the military tranſactions to which he had been witneſs. M. de St. Evremond thought of nothing but ending his days in peace in England, when he received letters from the Count de Grammont, acquainting him that the King of France had declared, that he might return, and ſhould be well received. But he returned for anſwer, that the infirmities almoſt inſeparable from old age would not permit him to undertake ſuch a journey, and to leave a country where he lived very agreeably. In 1697 he wrote a little piece againſt the Abbot Renaudot on the ſubject of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary. June 22, 1699 he ſuſtained an irreparable loſs by the death of the Ducheſs of Mazarin, with whom he had lived in the moſt unreſerved friendſhip (o). In September 1703 he was ſeized with a ſtrangury, of which he died [L] the 9th of that month, aged ninety years, five months, and twenty days, and was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where a monument is erected to his memory [M]. We ſhall give his character in the Note [N].

(o) Ibid. pag. 144, 145.

EURYDICE

[L] Of which he died.] Mr. Bayle tells us in his Letters (54), that it is publicly known, that he uſed no aſſiſtance either of Prieſt or Miniſter to prepare himſelf for death; and that it is ſaid, that the Envoy from the Court of Florence offered to ſend to him an Eccleſiaſtic, or actually ſent one, who aſking him, whether he would be reconciled, he anſwered, With all my heart, I would fain be reconciled to my ſtomach, which no longer performs its uſual functions. "I have "ſeen verſes, continues Mr. Bayle, which he wrote fifteen days before his death; and his only regret "was, that he was reduced to boiled meats, and could "no longer digeſt partridges and pheaſants." Monſr. Deſlandes likewiſe informs us (55), that our Author was more affected with the death of the Ducheſs of Mazarin, than with his own; for he ſhewed no regret for life, tho' for above fifty years he had made the purſuit of pleaſure his principal ſtudy. He leap'd blindfold (to uſe Montaigne's expreſſion) into eternity, without viewing or reflecting upon it. In his laſt ſickneſs, what he lamented moſt, was the loſs of his appetite; and I have been informed, that one about him, having aſk'd him, whether he ſhould bring him a Prieſt to reconcile him with —— I loſt my ſtomach, ſaid M. de St. Evremond, interrupting him, I'd fain be reconciled with it.

(54) Letter 234.

(55) A Philological Eſſay: or Reflections on the Death of Free-Thinkers: with the Characters of the moſt eminent Perſons of both Sexes, antient and modern, that died pleaſantly and unconcerned. By Monſ. D——— of the Royal Academy of Sciences in France, and Author of the Poetæ ruſticantis Literarum Otium. Tranſlated from the French by Mr. B——— with Additions both by the Author, now in London, and the Tranſlator. pag. 82. edit. London 1713 in 8vo.

[M] Where a monument is erected to his memory.] His Buſto is placed over his Epitaph, which is engraven on a white marble-ſtone, affixed to the wall over-againſt the place, where his body lies, and is as follows:

CAROLUS DE ST. DENIS DNS DE ST. EVREMOND
Nobili genere in Normannia ortus,
A prima Juventute
Militiæ nomen dedit:
Et per varia munera
Ad Caſtrorum Mareſcalli gradum evectus
Condæo, Turennio,
Aliiſq; claris belli ducibus
Fidem ſuam & fortitudinem
Non ſemel probavit.
Relictâ patriâ Hollandiam,
Deinde a Carolo II. accitus Angliam
Venit.
Philoſophiam & humaniores Litteras
Feliciter excoluit.
Gallicam Linguam
Cum ſolutâ tum numeris aſtricta oratione
Expolivit, adornavit, locupletavit.
Apud potentiſs. Angliæ Reges benevolent. & favorem,
Apud Proceres gratiam & familiaritatem,
Apud omnes laudem & applauſum
Meruit.
Nonaginta annis major obiit
Die IX Septembris MDCCIII.

Viro clariſſimo
Inter præſtantiores
Ævi ſui Scriptores
Semper memorando
Amici mœrentes
P. P.

[N] We ſhall give his character in the note.] He drew this character of himſelf in the year 1696. "He "is Philoſopher, ſays he in a Letter to Count de Gram- "mont, equally remote from ſuperſtition and impie- "ty; a voluptuary, who has no leſs averſion for de- "bauchery, than inclination for pleaſure; one, who "never felt the preſſure of indigence, who was never "acquainted with plenty. He lives in a condition "deſpiſed by thoſe who have every thing, envied by "thoſe who have nothing, reliſhed by thoſe who "make their reaſon the foundation of their happineſs. "When he was young, he hated profuſeneſs, being "perſuaded that wealth is neceſſary for the conveni- "ences of a long life: now he is old, he can hardly "endure thriftineſs, being of opinion, that want is lit- "tle to be dreaded, when a man has but little time "left to be miſerable. He is well pleaſed with na- "ture, and does not complain of fortune. He hates "vice, is indulgent to frailties, and laments misfor- "tunes. He ſearches not after the failings of men "with deſign to expoſe them; he only finds out their "ridicule for his own diverſion: he has a ſecret plea- "ſure in perceiving this himſelf; he would have yet "a greater in diſcovering it to others, were he not "check'd by diſcretion." Life, in his opinion, is too ſhort to read all ſorts of books, and to burthen one's memory with a multitude of things at the expence of one's judgment: he does not apply himſelf to the moſt learned writings, in order to acquire knowledge, but the moſt rational, to fortify his reaſon. Sometimes he chooſes the moſt delicate, to render his own taſte ſo; ſometimes the moſt agreeable, to give the ſame turn to his own genius. It remains, that I deſcribe him ſuch as he is in friendſhip and in religion. In friendſhip, he is more conſtant than a Philoſopher, and more ſincere than a young man of good nature without experience. As to Religion,

Juſtice and charity ſupply the place
Of rigid penance and a formal face.
His piety, without inflicted pains,
Flows eaſy, and auſterity diſdains.
God is the only Object of his care,
Whoſe goodneſs leaves no room for black deſpair:
Within the boſom of kind Providence,
He places his repoſe, his bliſs, and ſure defence.

Mr. Des Maizeaux tells us (56), that his behaviour was civil and engaging, his converſation lively and pleaſant, his repartees quick and happy; that he read well, and had an happy manner of telling a ſtory. He had a ſtrong inclination to Satyr; and the ridicule which he obſerved in mankind, made him merry; and he loved to expoſe it by fine raillery, or by an ingenious irony. But he grew more indulgent towards the latter end of his life. His humour was ever gay; which was ſo far from declining in the latter part of his life, that it ſeemed to gather freſh ſtrength. Tho' he did not pretend to over-rigid morals, yet he had all the qualities of a man of honour. He was juſt, generous, and grateful, and full of goodneſs and humanity. He always profeſſed the Roman Catholic Religion; and in his ordinary converſation, he never let fall any looſe or licentious expreſſion againſt Religion, and could not bear, that any body ſhould droll upon it, which, ſaid he, bare decency, and the re-

(56) Life of M. de St. Evremond, pag. 154, & ſeq.

EURYDICE, wife to Amyntas King of Macedon, brought him four children, three ſons, viz. Alexander, Perdiccas, and Philip father to Alexander the Great, and a daughter named Euryone. That Queen was a moſt deteſtable woman, ſhe falling ſo diſtractedly in love with her ſon-in-law, that, in order to marry him, ſhe promiſed to raiſe him to the throne, and to murther her huſband [A]. This execrable conſpiracy would have been put in execution, had not Euryone informed the King of Eurydice's adultery and her wicked deſigns. The King, though convinced of his wife's crimes, nevertheleſs pardoned her, out of love for the children ſhe had brought him. After his death, his ſon Alexander ſucceeded him, but did not live long; for Eurydice, fired with luſt and ambition, got him murthered; as alſo Perdiccas her ſecond ſon, who aſcended the throne after the death of Alexander (a). The Hiſtorians that are extant go no farther; and do not inform us what became of her, nor whether ſhe was puniſhed for her barbarous actions. There are even ſome Hiſtorians who, without taking notice of her, aſcribe to other cauſes the death of the two Princes who ſwayed the ſcepter ſucceſſively after Amyntas, which is ſomewhat ſtrange [B]. I ſhall take notice of an incident we find in the Orations of Æſchines [C], and ſhall criticiſe Biſſelius the Jeſuit [D]. I am to obſerve that (a) Extracted from Juſtin, lib. 7. cap. 4, 5.

gard due to one's Fellow-Citizens will never ſuffer. His writings ſhew, that he had learning; but his learning was polite and ſuitable to a perſon of his profeſſion and quality. The hiſtory of men of learning and their works pleaſed him very much, and ſometimes he made them the ſubject of his converſation. He was a paſſionate lover of Muſic; and having ſome ſkill in the compoſition, he ſet the Idylles, Prologues, and pieces, which were ſung at the Ducheſs of Mazarin's (57); tho' as to Symphonies, he left that part to be performed by the Sieur Paiſible, or ſome other able Muſician. He had blue, lively, and ſparkling eyes, a large forehead, thick eye-brows, an handſome mouth, and a ſneering ſmile, an agreeable and ingenious phyſiognomy. Twenty years before his death, a wen grew between his eye-brows, which, in time, encreaſed to a conſiderable bigneſs. He once deſigned to have it cut off; but as it was no ways troubleſome to him, and he little regarded that kind of deformity, Dr. le Fevre adviſed him to let it alone, leſt ſuch an operation ſhould be attended with dangerous ſymptoms in a man of his age. He would often make merry with himſelf on account of his wen, his great leather-cap, and grey-hair, which he choſe to wear rather than a peruke. H.

(57) See the Works of M. de St. Evremond, in French.

[A] She falling ſo diſtractedly in love with her ſon-in-law, that in order to marry him, ſhe promiſed to raiſe him to the throne, and to murther her huſband.] Here follow Juſtin's words, which inform us of theſe horrid particulars. Inſidiis Eurydices uxoris, quæ nuptias generi pacta, occidendum virum, regnumque adultero tradendum ſuſceperat, occupatus fuiſſet (Amyntas) ni filia pellicatum matris & ſceleris conſilia prodidiſſet (1).

(1) Juſtin, lib. 7. cap. 4.

[B] Which is ſomewhat ſtrange.] Juſtin's hiſtory, as tranſmitted to us, is the epitome of an univerſal hiſtory, which Trogus Pompeius had written at large. There is no doubt but that the actions of Eurydice were there expreſſed in a much greater detail than we now find them in Juſtin; and eſpecially we may be perſuaded, that Trogus Pompeius had borrowed his account of this ſubject from good Authors. Wherefore then ſhould Diodorus Siculus not take any notice of this Queen? Why does he relate that Alexander the eldeſt ſon to Amyntas, and his ſucceſſor (2), was killed by Ptolomy Alorites his brother (3), and that three years after (4) this Ptolomy was treated after the ſame manner by Perdiccas (5)? Had he not read the ſame Authors which Trogus Pompeius had conſulted? In caſe he did not peruſe them, we may blame him for his negligence; and if he did read them, we may aſſert, that he ought not to have ſuppreſſed the particulars relating to Eurydice. It would be in vain for him to anſwer, that it appeared to him ill grounded; for we ſhould anſwer, that he ought at leaſt to have ſaid, that ſhe had been unjuſtly accuſed of putting her ſons to death. To pretend that he knew very well that ſhe was guilty, but did not care to mention this in his hiſtory, is no ways probable; for what reaſons could have induced him to ſpare the memory of a Queen who had been dead ſo many years, and whoſe poſterity were all extinct?

(2) Diod. Sicul. lib. 16. cap. 2. pag. m. 736.

(3) Idem, lib. 15. cap. 71. pag. m. 712, ad ann. 1. Olymp. 103.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Idem, lib. 16. cap. 2.

[C] I ſhall take notice of an incident we find in the Orations of Æſchines.] Had we no other particulars of Eurydice but this, we ſhould have her memory in great veneration. The orator in queſtion informs us that this Queen, after the death of Alexander her eldeſt ſon, was involved in a very perplexing affair. Pauſanias who had been ſent into baniſhment, took hold of this conjuncture; and having the diſpoſal of ſome Grecian forces, and ſeveral friends in Macedon, he reſolved to ſeize upon the Kingdom. Eurydice ſaw him ſoon take ſome towns; and ſhe found very little fidelity among her friends. Her ſubjects were divided into factions, and a very great number ſeemed to favour Pauſanias. Being reduced to this extremity, ſhe ſent for Iphicrates the Athenian General, who was not far from Amphipolis, and putting her ſon Perdiccas in his arms, and her ſon Philip on his knees, ſhe recalled to his memory that he was their brother by adoption, and that there had always ſubſiſted a ſtrong friendſhip between the late King Amyntas and the Republic of Athens; and therefore earneſtly conjured him from theſe conſiderations, to exert himſelf for them, for her, and for the Kingdom. Iphicrates was moved to ſuch compaſſion by her entreaties, that he repulſed Pauſanias (6). Eurydice would have appeared in the moſt amiable light, had no other incidents relating to her been tranſmitted to poſterity; but when we call to mind the particulars related by Juſtin, we are no ways inclined to applaud her conduct in the affair of Iphicrates. The moſt ambitious mother that ever lived, a mother of a ſoul black enough to ſacrifice the lives of her children to her ambition, might have done the very ſame thing as Eurydice; for ſhe had the worſt to fear from Pauſanias.

(6) Extracted from Æſchines's Oration de falſa Legatione, pag. m. 250. See alſo Cornelius Nepos, in Vita Iphicratis, cap. 3.

[D] I ſhall criticize Biſſelius the Jeſuit.] He declares without reſtriction, that Diodorus Siculus acts unfaithfully in taking no notice of the parricides which Eurydice committed: this is the ſenſe of the following words, Diodorus .... perpetuus Eurydices parricidiorum diſſimulator (7). I do not object to him, that we cannot conceive what ſhould prompt this hiſtorian to diſſemble: I ſhall content my ſelf with ſaying, that he ought to have adhered to his firſt cenſure; ſhould not have varied; ſhould not have refuted it by vague and undeterminate expreſſions. Qui Diodorus, ſays he in another place (8), incertum qua cauſa ſtudiove, de ſcelere ac parricidiis Euridices altum ſilet. i. e. "It "is uncertain from what motives, or in what views "Diodorus is ſo profoundly ſilent, with regard to the "crimes and parricides of Eurydice." He adds a particular that is ſtill more worthy of cenſure. Et è contrario, in Perdiccam verbis claris culpam detorquet necati hujus Ptolemæi, quin & necis Alexandri prædeceſſoris: quando ſic loquitur, ſimili fraude ſublatus eſt e Perdicca Ptolemæus (qua fraude ſcilicet Alexander quum paullo ſuperius dixerat, dolo interemptum: nec addit ab Eurydice. i. e. "But on the contrary, he evi- "dently charges Perdiccas with the murther of Ptolemy "as likewiſe of Alexander his predeceſſor; he writing "as follows, Ptolomy was diſpatched by Perdiccas, in "the ſame treacherous manner as had been practiſed "with regard to Alexander, whom he declared a little "before to have been treacherouſly ſlain; but had not ſaid "by Eurydice." But this Author is miſtaken. Diodorus does not pretend in any manner to charge Perdiccas with the treaſon which brought Alexander to his

(7) Joannes Biſſelius, illuſtrium Ruinarum Decade IV. pag. m. 1118.

(8) Idem, ibid. pag. 1287.

(b) Strabo, lib. 7. pag. 226.

that Arabeus, Prince of the Lynceſtæ, deſcended from the Bacchiadæ, was grandfather, by the mother's ſide, to our Eurydice (b).

(9) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 15. cap. 71.
(10) In chap. 2. of book 16.
(11) Biſſelius, Illuſt. Ruinar. pag. 1287.

end; he imputes it only to Ptolemy Alorites, as is evident from a paſſage of the fifteenth book (9). Had Father Biſſelius known this paſſage in Diodorus, he would not have ſpoke as he has done; he would have known that this Author meant no more than this (10), viz. that Perdiccas deprived Ptolemy Alorites of his life by a treacherous act reſembling that which Ptolemy had employed, in order to kill Alexander. This ſhews how neceſſary it is for a perſon to know what an Author ſays in different parts of his Works. Beſides, what was Biſſelius (11) thinking of, when he cited Guthberlet, an Author of yeſterday, to prove that this Alexander reigned but one year, and Ptolemy Alorites three years? Ought he not to have proved theſe things by Diodorus Siculus (12)?

(12) Diod. Siculus, lib. 15. cap. 60, 71.

(a) Cyna, daughter of Philip, was mother to Eurydice. See the Prolegomena of Freinſhemius on Quint. Curtius, cap. 5.

EURYDICE, daughter to Amyntas, the ſon of that Perdiccas King of Macedon who was brother of Philip father to Alexander the Great, married her uncle (a) Arideus, natural ſon of the ſame Philip. It is univerſally known, that this Aridæus was declared King of Macedon after Alexander's death (b). He was not poſſeſſed of qualities proper for the ſupporting of the regal dignity, and eſpecially in troubleſome times as were thoſe of his reign. Accordingly it may be affirmed that he was rather a titular than a real Monarch. Eurydice his Queen concerned herſelf more with the adminiſtration than he did (c), particularly when Olympias, Alexander's mother was to be oppoſed; for ſhe on that occaſion was more jealous of the regal authority, than if a man had been her competitor for it (d). She placed great confidence in Caſſander, and ordered Antigonus and Polyperchon to reſign to him the command of the forces, for which reaſon he obeyed her well in all things (e). She had the ill fortune to be deſerted by her ſoldiers, at her endeavouring to hinder Olympias from returning into Macedon (f). By this deſertion Arideus fell immediately into Olympias's hands (g); and Eurydice his Queen having fled to Amphipolis, was taken priſoner there very ſoon after [A]. Olympias impriſoned them both in a dungeon, where they were treated with great inhumanity; and when ſhe ſaw that the Athenians murmured at her cruelty, ſhe cauſed ſome Thracians to murther Arideus, ſix years and a half after Alexander's death. This rigour could not bridle Eurydice's tongue; for which reaſon Olympias, exaſperated at her priſoner for boaſting on all occaſions that ſhe had the only right to the crown, reſolved not to let her live any longer. Accordingly ſhe ſent her a ſword, a halter, and a cup of hemlock juice, and commanded her to die by which of them ſhe pleaſed. Eurydice, without ſhedding a tear, or deſponding ever ſo little, took the girdle and ſtrangled herſelf with it; after beſeeching the Gods that ſuch preſents might be ſent to Olympias (h). After the latter was dead, Caſſander ſolemnized the funeral obſequies of Arideus and Eurydice in a royal manner (i).

(c) Juſtin. lib. 7. cap. 5. (b) Quint. Curtius, lib. 10. cap. 7. Juſtin, lib. 13. cap. 3. (c) See Juſtin. lib. 14. cap. 5. (d) See Juſtin. ibid.

(e) Quo beneficio devinctus Caſſander, nihil non ex arbitrio muliebris audaciæ gerit. Idem, ibid.

(f) Juſtin, lib. 14. cap. 5.

(g) Diod. Sicul. lib. 19. cap. 11.

(h) Extracted from Diodorus Siculus, ibid.

(i) Idem Diodorus, lib. 19. cap. 52.

[A] Was taken priſoner there very ſoon after.] It is related in the Supplement to Moreri, that ſhe was taken priſoner in a battle, which is not true. I ſhall not take notice of the reſt of the inaccuracies and omiſſions, for theſe the reader may diſcover, by comparing the two articles together. I will only obſerve, that our Eurydice's father was not Amyntas III (1). It is a query whether he ever was a King; and in caſe he was not, he ſhould not have been diſtinguiſhed by a numerical epithet; if he was a King, he ſhould be called Amyntas IV. The circumſtance which makes the uncertainty is, that Juſtin (2) ſays that Perdiccas left a ſon a minor, of whom Philip was guardian for ſome time. I ſhall not obſerve to my readers, that if, on one ſide, women are generally more tender than men; it is certain, on the other, that thoſe who are fired with a ſpirit of cruelty and ambition, go greater lengths than men in thoſe two vices. Optimi corruptio peſſima. It is much worſe when thoſe are joined by laſciviouſneſs; for then they will not ſpare the lives of their huſbands, nor thoſe of their children, of which the other Eurydice (3) is an example.

(1) He is thus computed in the Supplement to Moreri.

(2) Juſtin, lib. 7. cap. 5.

(3) Of the preceding Article.

(a) Plutarch. de Liberis educandis, in fine, pag. 14.

(b) It conſiſts of four Greek verſes.

EURYDICE, an Illyrian Lady. Plutarch applauds her, and propoſes Eurydice as a pattern, becauſe that, although ſhe was of a barbarous country, and advanced in years, ſhe applied herſelf to ſtudy, that ſhe might be enabled to educate her children (a). She conſecrated to the Muſes an inſcription wherein this circumſtance was taken notice of (b), and which Plutarch has preſerved (c). We find in it, that there was in Illyricum, a city called Hierapolis (d), of which Geographers make no mention. One of the Commentators on Plutarch has committed ſome miſtakes [A].

(c) Plutarch, ibid. ut ſupra.

(d) See the Remark.

(1) Page 404.

(2) Pag. 405.

(3) It would be to no purpoſe to quote thoſe Authors, who ſeem to ſay that Orpheus reigned.

[A] One of the Commentators on Plutarch has committed ſome miſtakes.] This was Peter Weſthuſius, Rector of the College at Hamburg. His book printed in that city, anno 1665, is intitled Plutarchi Chæronenſis de puerorum educatione Libellus analyſi logica, grammatica, ethica, politica, & hiſtorica illuſtratus. We there find (1), that the Eurydice in queſtion was a Queen, and a little after (2) the wife of Orpheus. But theſe two qualities do not agree with each other (3); and beſides, Orpheus's wife had no occaſion to inſtruct her children, for their father who was a very good ſcholar would have eaſed her of that trouble. Had he died before her, my obſervation would be falſe, but it is well known that ſhe died young before her huſband (4). The Commentator aſſerts (5), but without any proof, that ſhe was born in Illyricum. What does he mean by obſerving, that Hierapolis a city of Aſia, was ſituated oppoſite to Laodicea? Is this Hierapolis hinted at in the following words of Plutarch. Εὐρυδίκη Ἱεραπολῖτις, Eurydice Hierapolitana? Is it not an Illyrian woman who ſpeaks? He ought to have endeavoured to diſcover this city of the Illyrians, or have ſaid that it was unknown to Geographers.

(4) Virg. Georg. lib. 4. ver. 458. calls her puella.

(5) Pag. 405.

EURIPIDES, one of the Greek Poets who excelled in Tragedy, was born the firſt year of the ſeventy fifth Olympiad, in the iſland of Salamis, whither his parents were retired.

retired [A], a little before Xerxes entered Attica. There is a diſpute concerning their quality or condition [B], ſome declaring them to have been of a noble, and others of a Plebeian family. By a certain Oracle's being miſunderſtood, Euripides was brought up in the ſame manner as thoſe whom the Greeks deſigned for Athletæ or Wreſtlers [C]; but [A] He was born . . . in the iſland of Salamis, whither his parents had retired] Euripides's father was called Mneſarchus. He was an Athenian, of the Oenoide tribe; and of the borough or people (1) called Phyle. This I find in the life of Euripides, written by the learned Mr. Barnes, and prefixed to his excellent Edition of this Poet. But other learned men (2) aſſert, Euripides was born in Phlya, of the Ptolemaid Tribe (3). But I had rather ſay, that it was the birth place of Mneſarchus, Euripides's father; and declare expreſly, that our Poet was born in Salamis. Tanaquil Faber ſhould rather have written thus, than to ſay, that he was born in Phlya, a Borough of Attica (4). I am ſenſible that Clito, Euripides's mother, was delivered of him at Salamis by accident, I mean, becauſe ſhe was forced to retire thither with ſeveral other Athenians, when the city of Athens was deſerted upon Xerxes's invaſion. I alſo know, that this is a very good reaſon to aſſert that Euripides is an Athenian, and of the ſame country with his father. But after all, we are deſirous of knowing the birth-place of illuſtrious men; and therefore it is not enough to inform us of the native place of their parents, on ſuch occaſions as theſe, when children are born, either in the flight of their mothers, or whilſt they are on a journey. Clito was big with Euripides when ſhe left Athens with her huſband, and fled to Salamis (5). She was delivered on the very day that the Greeks triumphed over the King of Perſia's fleet near that iſland (6); and ſome are of opinion this child which Clito brought into the world was called Euripides (7), becauſe this victory was gained near the Euripus. This Etymology does not agree with Suidas, he mentioning two Euripides's different from, and older than our Poet. They both were Tragic Writers, and one was the other's nephew. Add to this, that mention is made of an Athenian Captain, called Xenophon, the ſon of Euripides, in the ſecond year of the Peloponneſian war. Thucydides who ſpeaks of him (8), would in all probability have added, that this Euripides was the Poet, had it been he. But his ſilence makes me believe that Mr. Barnes (9) is in the wrong, in ſuppoſing that this Xenophon was ſon to our Euripides.

[B] There is a diſpute concerning their quality or condition.] Some relate that Mneſarchus, the father of Euripides, was a Bœotian, who in all probability, had ſuffered in his own country the puniſhment inflicted on bankrupts (10). It was cuſtomary in ſome parts of Bœotia, to carry perſons who did not pay their debts into the place of public reſort, where they were commanded to ſit down, and to throw a buſhel, which was a mark of infamy. With regard to Clito the wife of Mneſarchus, it is pretended ſhe was an herb-woman; an opinion founded not only on the authority of a comic Poet, (a profeſſed Libeller,) but alſo on that of an Hiſtorian. The comic Writer I mean is Ariſtophanes (11). The Hiſtorian's name is mentioned in the following paſſage of Chapter XX, Book XV of Aulus Gellius. Euripidi Poetæ matrem Theopompus agreſtia olera vendentem victum quæſiſſe dicit. i. e. "Theopompus relates, that the mother of Euripides "the Poet, got a livelihood by ſelling greens." Add to this the teſtimony of Valerius Maximus: Quam matrem Euripides aut quem patrem Demoſthenes habuerit, ipſorum quoque ſeculo ignotum fuit: alterius autem matrem olera, alterius patrem cultellos venditaſſe omnium pene doctorum literæ loquuntur (12). i. e. "The mother "of Euripides and the father of Demoſthenes, were "not known even to the people of the age in which "they lived: but moſt Authors agree in this, viz. "that the former ſold herbs, and the latter knives." Suidas does not ſay any thing particularly concerning Mneſarchus's birth; but declares that Euripides's mother was not an herb-woman, ſhe being (ſays he) of a very noble extraction, as is proved by Philocorus. Οὐκ ἀληθὲς ᾗ ὡς λαχανέπωλις ἦν ἡ μήτηρ αὐτῷ. κ᾽ ἡδ᾽ τὰν σφέδρα εὐγενῶν ἐτύγχανεν ὡς ἀποδείκνυσι Φιλόχορος. He confeſſes that Mneſarchus and his wife fled into Bœotia, and afterwards lived in Attica. This leaves a bad impreſſion rather than a good one, and confirms in ſome meaſure what is related by Stobæus. It is to be obſerved that Ariſtophanes, to add the greater virulence to his ſatyr, ſuppoſes that Euripides's mother ſold only very bad herbs. Hæc eſt (ſcandix) quam Ariſtophanes Euripidi Poëtæ objicit joculariter, matrem ejus ne olus quidem legitimum venditaſſe, ſed ſcandicem (13). i. e. "This is the (Scandix) wild Chervile, concerning "which Ariſtophanes banters Euripides the Poet, as "tho' his mother had not vended good herbs, but wild "Chervile." The Notes of Father Hardouin inform us of the particular place where Ariſtophanes has thrown out this jeſt; as alſo what is obſerved by the Scholiaſt, and other things. He cites the IVth Scene of Act II of the Comedy, entitled, Acharnenſes, pag. 394. He alſo might have quoted the ſame Poet in Equitibus, Act I, Sc. I, pag. 289; and in Cerealibus, pag. 786 G, and page 790 F. Mr. Drelincourt informed me of this.

[C] By a certain oracle's being miſunderſtood, Euripides was brought up in the ſame manner as thoſe whom the Greeks deſigned for Athletæ or Wreſtlers.] Was it true, as Mr. Barnes pretends, that the oracle of Apollo was conſulted on Euripides's fate, whilſt Clito was big with him (14), it would be probable enough that ſhe was not an herb-woman; for the huſband of ſuch a woman would hardly have taken it into his head to importune the Oracle of Apollo, concerning the fate of a child that was not yet born. I do not ſay the ſame with reſpect to a child of ſix or ſeven years of age. Such a one might give ſuch ſingular marks of a noble genius or great courage, that his father, in whatever ſtation of life he might be, might be vaſtly impatient to know what would be the deſtiny of ſo promiſing a child. So that whilſt we are ignorant of the time in which the Oracle relating to our Euripides, was pronounced; we cannot conclude any thing in favour of his nobility, and againſt thoſe who declare him to be ſon to an herb-woman. Now it is certain that we know nothing concerning this æra. The mother (15), whom Mr. Barnes quotes, does not ſay a word about it; he obſerving only that the Oracle made the following anſwer.

Ἔσαι σοι κῦρος Μνησαρχίδη, ὃν τινα πάντες
Ἄνθρωποι τίσουσι, καὶ ἐς κλέος ἔσθλὸν ὀρούσει,
Καὶ σταφέων ἱερῶν γλυκερὴν χάριν ἀμφιβάλλεται.

That is,

"A ſon, to thee Mneſarchus, fate ſhall give;
"To all exalted honours he ſhall riſe;
"And, the fam'd verdant crown ſhall grace his "temples.

He might have animadverted better on this oracle than he has done; and I am ſurprized that ſince he profeſſedly endeavoured to prove the Divinity of Apollo an impoſture, he yet ſhould take no notice of the untruth contained in theſe three Greek verſes. A man muſt be very fond of chicane, not to own that this Oracle promiſes the crowns which were won in the Olympic, Pythian and other Games. Now we do not read (16), that Euripides won this ſort of crown; the very firſt time he offered to diſpute for them, he was ſent back (17). It perhaps will be ſaid, that Euripides won the crown in poetical conteſts. I will anſwer, that he gained but few; that his glory ſhould be very inconſiderable ſhould it be meaſured from thence (18); and that after all dramatic triumphs ought not to have been promiſed in this manner. Apollo might therefore be reproached with having been miſtaken: and we may ſay farther, viz. that he beſtowed the epithet ſacred on crowns which did not deſerve it (19). When therefore I declare, in the text of this article, that the Oracle was miſinterpreted, I do not pretend to ſay, but that the moſt natural ſenſe poſſible was given to the expreſſion; all I pretend is, that they miſtook in not rightly apprehending the ill-expreſſed intention of him who had ſpoke. Mneſarchus therefore was not in the wrong for promiſing himſelf that his ſon would one

(1) In Greek Δῆμος, a kind of diviſion in Athen.

(2) Spon, Voyage de Grece, tom. 2. pag. m. 478.

(3) Spon, ibid. pag. 477 obſerves, that Stephanus and other Authors place Phlya under the Cecropian Tribe; but he himſelf, on the authority of a Marble, and on Heſychius, places it under the Ptolemaid.

(4) Le Fevre, Lives of the Greek Poets, pag. 97.

(5) Suidas in Εὐριπίδης, and Manuel Moſchopulus, in Vita Euripidis.

(6) Idem. ibid. Heſychius illuſtrius, in Εὐριπίδης, & Thom. Magiſter, in Vita Euripidis.

(7) Joſua Barteſius, in Vita Euripidis Editioni Cantabrigienſi 1694 præfixa, num. 3.

(8) Lib. 2.

(9) In Vita Euripidis, pag. 24.

(10) Stobæus, in Sermone περὶ νόμων, folio 293, apud Barneſium, ibid. pag. 4.

(11) Ὑπὸ Εὐριπίδου τοῦ τῆς λαχανοπωλητρίας. Ab Euripide filio olerum venditricis, Ariſtoph. in Theſmophoriaſ, pag. m. 772. Ἀργία γαρ ἡμᾶς ὦ γυναῖκες δρᾶ κακά. Ἀτ ἐν ἀγρίοισι λαχάνοις αὐτὸς τραφείς. Agreſtibus enim nos, ô mulieres, afficit malis, utpote inter agreſtia olera ipſe enutritus. Idem, ibid. pag. 776. Aulus Gell. lib. 15. cap. 20. relates theſe verſes.

(12) Val. Max. lib. 3. cap. 4.

(13) Plin. lib. 22. cap. 22. pag. m. 203, 204.

(14) Quum adhuc Clito mater illum in utero gereret, conſulenti de eo oraculum patri hoc reſponſum dedit Apollo. Barneſ. in Vita Euripidis, num. 3. We ſhall ſee below, that Aulus Gellius ſays, that ſome Chaldeans made this prediction after Euripides's birth.

(15) Oenomaus, apud Euſebium de Præpar. Evang. lib. 5. cap. 33. pag. m. 227.

(16) See Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 10.

(17) See Aulus Gellius below, citation (20). He ſays nevertheleſs, that Euripides, after this refuſal, diſputed for the prize, and won it in leſs famous combats.

(18) See the remark [I].

(19) It is on this that Oenomaus's criticiſm turns, apud Euſebium, Præparat. Evangel. lib. 5. cap. 33. pag. 228.

but he afterwards ſhewed that he was better qualified for other things. He learnt Rhetoric under Prodicus, Morality under Socrates [D], and natural Philoſophy under Anaxagoras; but finding that the laſt mentioned was perſecuted, becauſe he dogmatized againſt the popular opinion, he abandoned Philoſophy, and applied himſelf to dramatic Poetry (a). He was then eighteen (b). However, the reader is not to ſuppoſe, that he therefore afterwards laid aſide the ſtudies of Morality and Phyſics, his works ſhewing that he did not [E]. He wrote a great number of Tragedies, which were greatly eſteemed, both in his day be a great Athleta, but Apollo for foretelling it him. Be this as it will, Mneſarchus brought up his ſon in this view. Here follows an Author who aſcribes this prediction only to Fortune-tellers, Aſtrologers, and in a word, Chaldeans. Patri autem ejus (Euripidis) nato illo reſponſum eſt à Chaldæis, eum puerum, quum adoleviſſet, victorem in certaminibus fore. Id ei puero fatum eſſe. Pater interpretatus athletam debere eſſe, roborato exercitatoque filii ſui corpore, Olympiam certaturum eum inter athletas pueros deduxit. Ac primo quidem in certamen per ambiguam ætatem receptus non eſt. Poſt Eleuſinio & Theſæo certamine pugnavit, & coronatus eſt. Mox, à corporis cura ad excolendi animi ſtudium tranſgreſſus, auditor fuit phyſici Anaxagoræ & Prodici rhetoris, in morali autem philoſophia Socratis, tragœdiam ſcribere natus annos duodevingti adortus eſt (20). i. e. " Euripides being born, his father was anſwered by the " Chaldeans, that this boy, when he ſhould be come " to years of maturity, would conquer in the games; " and that this was his fate. His father interpreting " this, as tho' his ſon would be a champion; having " ſtrengthned and exerciſed his body, carried him to " Olympia to contend among the young Athletæ. He " was refuſed at firſt, becauſe his age was doubted: " He after ſome time was admitted a combatant, and " crowned in the games of Theſeus and of Ceres. " But afterwards leaving the care of his body, and " applying himſelf to the improvement of his mind, " he frequented the lectures of Anaxagoras the natu- " ral Philoſopher, of Prodicus the Rhetorician, and of " Socrates the moral Philoſopher. He firſt began to " write Tragedy at eighteen years of age."

(a) Suidas in Εὐριπίδης. Manuel Moſchopulus, in Vita Euripidis. See alſo Aulus Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 20.

(b) Aul. Gellius, ibid.

(20) Aulus Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 20.

[D] He learnt . . Morality under Socrates.] I have quoted thoſe who ſay this: but I ought to obſerve here, that it is very probable they were miſtaken; for Socrates was near thirteen years younger than Euripides. Notwithſtanding this difference of age, the younger of theſe two great men, when he came to years of maturity, might have been admitted to the intimacy and friendſhip of the elder, and have improved by his learned converſation; but this is not what we call going through a courſe of Morality under a Profeſſor; the being his ſcholar or diſciple. I can eaſily believe with Mr. Barnes, that Socrates improved greatly by Euripides's converſation. Haud bene temporum rationes conſiderârunt, ſays he (21), qui Socratem Euripidis in Moralibus magiſtrum affirmant, ipſo nempe diſcipulo duodecim fere annis juniorem. Videtur potius is ex Euripide multa hauſiſſe, quem & apud Platonem haud raro laudare deprehenditur. That is, " Thoſe, ſays he, do not duly conſider the circum- " ſtances of time, who affirm that Socrates inſtructed " Euripides in Morality; the maſter being almoſt " twelve years younger than the ſcholar. Socrates " ſeems rather to have borrowed many things from " Euripides, whom he frequently applauds, and that " in Plato." I would not queſtion the truth of what we read in Diogenes Laertius (22), viz. that Socrates aſſiſted Euripides in compoſing his Tragedies; and this being taken for granted, I ſhould not be ſurprized to hear, that Socrates went very ſeldom to the play-houſe, except when ſome of Euripides's Plays were acted. Ὁ δὲ Σωκράτης σπάνιον μὲν ἐπιφοίτα τοῖς θεάτροις εἴποτε δὲ Εὐριπίδης ὁ τῆς τραγῳδίας ποιητὴς ἠγωνίζετο καινοῖς τραγῳδοῖς, τότε γε ἀφικνεῖτο. καὶ Πειραιοῖ δὲ ἀγωνιζομένῳ τῷ Εὐριπίδῃ καὶ ἐκεῖ κατῄει. ἔχαιρε γὰρ τῷ ἀνδρὶ, δηλονότι διά τε τὴν σοφίαν αὐτοῦ, καὶ τὴν ἐν τοῖς μέτροις ἀρετήν (23). i. e. " Socrates ſeldom came to the theatre, except when " Euripides the Tragic Writer contended with the " new Tragedians; for he uſually was preſent on " thoſe occaſions. And when Euripides contended in " the Piræeus, he likewiſe went thither: for he loved " the man, both on account of his wiſdom, and the " beauty and excellency of his Poems." I ſhould not wonder at this, were I perſuaded that the Philoſopher had no ſhare in the compoſitions of the Poet; there being ſo many beautiful moral touches in the Tragedies of Euripides, that they could not but charm Socrates. Euripides has been called the Stage-Philoſopher, σκηνικὸς φιλόσοφος (24). ὁ ἐπὶ τῆς σκηνῆς φιλόσοφος (25). By the way, Father Schottus ſhould not have attempted to prove, by Diogenes Laertius, that Euripides made choice of Socrates for his maſter, after Anaxagoras's condemnation. Anaxagoræ præceptore capitis damnato ad Socratem ſe in Academiam contulit, non intelligendi modo, ſed & dicendi magiſtrum ea tempeſtate optimum. Ita enim Laertius Diogenes (26). i. e. " Anaxagoras his Præceptor being ſentenced to death, " he entred into the ſchool of Socrates, who was " look'd upon, not only as the greateſt Reaſoner at " that time, but likewiſe as the greateſt Orator; for " thus ſays Diogenes Laertius." I ſhall not cite the long paſſage, which Father Schottus had added to theſe words. I only ſay, that the only circumſtance this paſſage of Diogenes Laertius informs us of is, that it was thought Socrates aſſiſted Euripides in the compoſition of his Tragedies; and that, after Anaxagoras's condemnation, he was the diſciple of Archelaus. The great miſtake of the Jeſuit is, his having applied to Euripides what Diogenes Laertius ſays of Socrates; for it is of the latter it is to be underſtood, that after Anaxagoras's condemnation he went to the Lectures of Archelaus. This miſtake of Schottus is blended with many others. He did not know that Euripides, ſeeing the danger in which Anaxagoras was, abandoned Philoſophy, and devoted himſelf to the Stage, and not to Socrates the Philoſopher. He did not know that Euripides was then but eighteen. Judge then whether Socrates, who was much younger than Euripides, could be the ableſt Profeſſor at that Age. It was Plato, not he, who taught in the Academy. Clemens Alexandrinus (27) and Euſebius (28) have erred with many others, they thinking that Euripides had been Socrates's diſciple.

(21) Barnes, in Vita Euripidis, num. 13. ſub finem.

(22) Lib. 2. in Socrate, init.

(23) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 13.

(24) Origenes contra Celſum, lib. 3. pag. 214. See the following Remark.

(25) Clem. Alexand, Stromat. lib. 5. pag. 581. [C].

(26) Schott. Nodor. Ciceroni-anor. lib. 2. cap. 15.

(27) Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 60. A.

[E] His works ſhewing that he did not.] They abound with moral aphoriſms, as was obſerved in the preceding remark. They likewiſe include many tenets in Phyſicks. See Diodorus Siculus (29), who has twice quoted the opinion of this Poet, with regard to things relating to Natural Philoſophy. But nothing is a better proof of Euripides's application to this ſcience, than the pains he took to find out the opinions of Heraclitus. This Philoſopher hid his writings in the temple of Diana; and thought they would one day be taken from thence, and publiſhed as a myſterious work. But Euripides prevented the effect of theſe hopes, he going aſſiduouſly to Diana's temple, and there, by dint of reading over often the pieces which Heraclitus had depoſited there, got them by heart, and publiſhed them to the world. I read this ſtory in Tatian; for as to Diogenes Laertius, he indeed ſays (30), that our Poet was more deſirous of recovering Heraclitus's works than Socrates, ſince it was he who procured Socrates a peruſal of them; but he does not take notice of this diligent attendance in Diana's temple. Here follow Tatian's words (31): Οὔτ' ἂν ἐπαινέσαιμι καταχρύψαντα τὴν ποίησιν ἐν τῷ τῆς Ἀρτέμιδος ναῷ (32), μυσηριωδῶς ὅπως ὕστερον ἡ τούτου ἔκδοσις γένηται. καὶ γὰρ οἷς μέλον ἐστὶ περὶ τούτων, φασὶν Εὐριπίδην τὸν τραγῳδοποιὸν κατιόντα, καὶ ἀναγινώσκοντα διὰ μνήμης κατ' ὀλίγον τὸ Ἡρακλείτου σκοτεινὸν σπουδαίως παραδεδυκέναι. i. e. " Nor can I commend his hiding his Po- " ems in Diana's temple, in order that they might after- " wards be publiſhed as a myſtery. For the perſons who " are entruſted with the care of theſe things, give out, " that Euripides the Tragic Writer uſed to go fre- " quently thither; and by often reading over theſe " hidden remains of Heraclitus, fixed them deep in " his memory." I add what many have obſerved (33), viz. that Euripides ſhewed, by many paſſages in his Tragedies, that he followed the opinions of Anaxagoras his maſter. I before obſerved, that he was called

(28) De Præparat. Evangel. lib. 5. cap. 32. pag. 227, A.

(29) Lib. 1. cap. 7, and 38.

(30) Lib. 2. in Socrate, num. 22.

(31) Orat. contra Græcos, pag. 143 (B).

(32) Diog. Laertius of this, Book 9. num. 6. Menage ibid. obſerves againſt Cuper; that Clemens Alexandrinus has not ſpoke of this.

(33) See Caſaubon. and Menag. in Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 10.

his life-time and after his death; and we can ſpecify very good judges, who conſider him as the beſt of all the tragic Poets [F]. Thoſe who imagine that the reaſon why the Roman Poets made very little mention of him was, becauſe the ſyllables which compoſed his name, were not of a quantity proper for Latin verſe [G], gave a conjecture with ſome led the Stage-Philoſopher. Origen, Clemens Alexandrinus (34), and Euſebius (35), declare this. Vitruvius, whom I ought to have named before them, aſſerts this expreſly: Euripides auditor Anaxagoræ, quem philoſophum Athenienſes ſcenicum appellaverunt (36). i. e. "Euripides, who was called the Stage-Philoſopher by "the Athenians, was Anaxagoras's Scholar." I do not believe, tho' this is aſſured by Menage (37), that Athenæus and Diodorus Siculus aſſerted it alſo.

[F] Good Judges . . . conſider him as the beſt of all the Tragic Poets.] I obſerved elſewhere (38), that the Criticks are divided with regard to beſtowing of the palm, whether on Æſchylus, Sophocles or Euripides. Each of theſe Poets has his admirers, and ſome judges will not give their opinion on this occaſion. Quintilian ſeems to have been one of the latter; and yet it is eaſy to perceive that, on the whole, he gives the ſuperiority to Euripides. Here follow his words (39): Longe clarius (quam Æſchylus) illuſtraverunt hoc opus Sophocles atque Euripides: quorum in diſpari dicendi via uter ſit Poëta melior, inter plurimos quæritur. Idque ego ſanè quoniam ad præſentem materiam nihil pertinet, injudicatum relinquo. Illud quidem nemo non fateatur neceſſe eſt, iis qui ſe ad agendum comparant, utiliorem longè Euripidem fore. Namque is in ſermone (quod ipſum reprehendunt, quibus gravitas & cothurnus & ſonus Sophoclis videtur eſſe ſublimior) magis accedit oratorio generi; & ſententiis denſus; & in iis quæ à ſapientibus tradita ſunt, penè ipſis par; & in dicendo ac reſpondendo cuilibet eorum qui fuerunt in foro diſerti, comparandus. In affectibus verò cùm omnibus mirus, tum in iis qui miſeratione conſtant, facilè præcipuus. Hunc & admiratus maximè eſt (ut ſæpe teſtatur) & ſecutus, quanquam in opere diverſo, Menander. i. e. "Sophocles and Euripides "have far excelled Æſchylus in this kind. Many "people make it a queſtion, which of theſe two "Poets, in their different manner, deſerves the preference; but as this bears no relation to what I am "now writing upon, I ſhall leave it undetermined. "However, there is no one but muſt own, that Euripides will be of much more uſe to thoſe who are "intended for public buſineſs. For his diction (which is "cenſured by ſuch as think there is more ſublimity "in the grave, majeſtic and ſonorous ſtyle of Sophocles) comes nearer to that of an Orator. He likewiſe abounds with moral reflections; and is almoſt "equal to the Sages, when he treats on the ſame ſubjects with them. In his manner of reaſoning and "replying, he may be put in parallel with the moſt "renowned Orators at the Bar. He charms all when "he attempts to raiſe the paſſions; and when he "would raiſe pity, he is inimitable. Alexander, as "this Poet frequently teſtifies, admired him prodigiouſly; and imitated him, tho' in a different kind "of writing." Barnes has collected (40) a great many Elogiums which the moſt learned men among the ancients have beſtowed on Euripides. Peruſe him, and you will find, that if this Poet has not equalled Sophocles in majeſty and ſublimity, he has compenſated for this with ſo many other perfections, that he may aſpire to the firſt rank. We ſhall ſoon ſee that this was pronounced by an Oracle. The admirers of Sophocles boaſt of the judgment of Lucian, they relating, that he weighed the verſes of Sophocles and thoſe of Euripides in a pair of ſcales; and found that thoſe of the former were heavier than thoſe of the latter, and conſequently more excellent, as true gold is weightier than that which is counterfeit. Lucianus ſophiſta, qui auctore Lanctantio nec Diis nec hominibus pepercit unquam, in librili ſuſpendit carmina tragicorum poetarum, Sophoclis ſcilicet & Euripidis, comminiſciturque Sophoclis verſus tanquam plus gravitatis habentes terram petere, Euripidis vero veluti leviores ad cœlum tendere, tanquam in tragico ſcribendi genere Sophocles ſit Euripidi præferendus. Nec mirum igitur ſi Virgilius ait,

Sola Sophoclæo tua carmina digna cothurno,

Hoc eſt gravi & exacto plus habente medullæ quam corticis, gravitatis quam levitatis (41). Barnes ſought for this in Lucian to no purpoſe (42); and, however this be, he pretends that this author's intention was not underſtood, he thinking it more favourable to Euripides than to Sophocles. He is of opinion, that Lucian had an eye to what we read in Homer (43) concerning the fate of Achilles and that of Hector, which were put into the ſcales of Jupiter: that of Achilles, as being predominant, mounted towards heaven, and that of Hector ſunk towards the earth. I conjecture that Lucian has been miſtaken for Ariſtophanes (44). It is this comick Poet (45), who ſuppoſes that Bacchus, putting into a pair of ſcales a verſe of Euripides againſt one of Æſchylus, found that that of Æſchylus was ever heavieſt. Now it is certain, that the deſign of Ariſtophanes in this piece is to ſhew, that the firſt rank among the Tragic Poets was due to Æſchylus, and the ſecond to Sophocles. This I obſerve againſt the explication of Mr. Barnes.

[G] The ſyllables of his name were not of a quantity proper for Latin verſe.] Floridus Sabinus, in his Anſwer to Beroaldus, who had ſlander'd Euripides, employs the following obſervation among others (46): Cumque Virgilius Sophoclem nominavit, hoc nempe verſu,

Sola Sophoclæo tua carmina digna cothurno,

Non ideo factum reor quod eum Euripidi anteponere voluerit, ſed quia id nomen heroïco metro melius conveniret Cui & ſimile eſt Propertianum illud ad Linceum poetam,

Deſine & Æſchyleo componere verba cothurno,

Non Æſchylum ſcilicet quaſi aliis præſtantiorem nominavit Propertius, quem (*) rudem in pleriſque & incompoſitum fuiſſe ſcimus, ut cujus Fabulas in certamen correctas deferre poſterioribus Poëtis permiſerint Athenienſes, ſed quod ab ejus nomine deductum nomen verſu recte clauderetur. An cùm Horatius de Romano populo ſic inquit:

Serus enim Græcis admovit lumina chartis,
Et poſt Punica bella quietus quærere cœpit,
Quid Sophocles, quid Theſpis & Æſchylus utile ferrent †.

An idcirco Euripidem non nominavit, quod vel Theſpi eum vel Æſchylo duxerit poſtponendum? Hoc ne ipſe quidem Beroaldus per ſomnium affirmaret.

That is,

"Altho' Virgil mentioned Sophocles in the following "verſe,

"Thy Poems, worthy Sophocles alone,

"I do not believe that he wrote in this manner, as "though he preferred him to Euripides, but becauſe "that name ſuited better with heroic verſe; to which "the line of Propertius to Lynceus the Poet reſembles "very much,

"O ceaſe to copy Æſchyl's lofty ſtrains,

"Propertius did not therefore mention Æſchylus, as "excelling other tragic Poets, for we know him to "have been generally rude and incorrect, ſince the "Athenians ſuffered ſucceeding Poets to bring his pieces, when corrected, to the conteſt, but becauſe a "word derived from his name would fill up the verſe "exactly. When Horace ſpeaks as follows of the "Romans,

"Till Carthage ruin'd, ſhe grew ſoft in peace,
"And then enquir'd what mighty Sophocles,
"What Æſchylus, what Theſpis taught the age,
"What good, what profit did commend the ſtage,
Creech.

"did he therefore forbear to mention Euripides, be"cauſe he thought him inferior both to Theſpis and "Æſchylus;

(34) See the preceding remark, citation (25).

(35) Præp. Evangel. lib. 10. cap. ult. pag. 504.

(36) Vitruv. lib. 8. in Præfat.

(37) In Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. num. 10.

(38) In the Article ÆSCHYLUS, Remark [K].

(39) Inſtitut. Orat. lib. 10. cap. 1. pag. m. 468, 469.

(40) In Vita Euripidis, num. 20, 21.

(41) Johan. Baptiſta Pius, Annotat. Poſterior. cap. 28. apud Barneſ. in Vita Euripidis, pag. 19. Thomas Stanleius, Comment. in Æſchyl. folio 701. and Lilius Gyrald. Poet. Hiſt. Dialog. 7. are alſo cited by Barnes, ibid.

(42) I don't believe that this is mentioned by Lucian. Mr. Drelincourt tells me in a letter, that it may be boldly affirmed, that Lucian has ſaid nothing of this matter.

(43) Iliad 10. ver. 212.

(44) Cœlius Rhodig. lib. 24. cap. 10. gave, probably, occaſion to this miſtake.

(45) In Ranis, Act. 5. Scen. 3.

(46) Franc. Floridus Sabinus, Lectionum ſubciſivar. lib. 2. cap. 13. apud Barneſ. in Vita Eurip. pag. 17.

* Ita Quintil. Inſtitut. Oratoriar. lib. 10. cap. 1.

† II Epiſt. 1. ver. 161.

ſome probability. His verſes were of very great ſervice to the Athenian ſoldiers in Sicily [H], which ſhews that his compoſitions were prodigiouſly applauded, and yet they ſeldom won the prize [I]. The emulation, and at laſt the enmity which broke out between " Æſchylus? Beroaldus himſelf though aſleep, would " not make ſuch an aſſertion." Barnes adopts the following reaſon. Quod autem Virgilius, ſays he (47), tanto elogio Sophoclem ornet, Euripidem vero ne nominet quidem, id non tam illius judicio tribuendum (nam & ſæpe eum imitatus eſt, ut in (†) annotationibus oſtendimus) quam legum metricarum neceſſitati, quandoquidem, ut ſupra diximus, Euripides apud Latinos ut & apud Græcos ſit vox minus apta verſui Heroico. i. e. " Although Virgil beſtows ſo great an elogium on " Sophocles, and does not mention Euripides, this " muſt not be aſcribed ſo much to his own judgment " or opinion, (for he has often imitated him as I have " ſhewn in the notes,) as to the reſtraint which the " laws of verſe put him under; ſince, as I obſerved " above, the word Euripides does not ſuit well with " heroick verſe either in Greek or Latin." Even the God of Poetry, Apollo of Delphos was obliged to ſubmit to the laws of quantity; he not finding any other expedient, when he was to name Euripides, than to lay aſide Hexameters, and to anſwer in Iambicks: ſo that had he been able to write Hexameter verſes only, he muſt have been forced to ſuppreſs the definitive ſentence, which ſettled the precedency between three illuſtrious perſonages (48). Nec abſonum prorſus erit in hac controverſia Pythii Apollinis judicium audire qui Chærephonti Tragico Poëtæ de amico ſuo Socrate conſulenti hoc oraculum traditur dediſſe (49): i. e. " Nor " will it be improper in the preſent controverſy, to " take notice of the anſwer made by the Pythian " God to Chærephon the Tragic Poet, when he con- " ſulted him about his friend Socrates.

Σοφὸς Σοφοκλῆς, σοφώτερός γ' Εὐριπίδης, Ἀνθρώπων δ' ἁπάντων Σωκράτης σοφώτατος.

i. e. " Sophocles is wiſe, Euripides is ſtill more ſo, but " the wiſeſt of all men is Socrates." Gyraldi is ſurprized that the Prieſteſs of Delphos ſhould employ Iambicks for this anſwer and not Hexameters, as was her uſual cuſtom (50). But ſhe was ſaid to deviate from cuſtoms, ſince neceſſity has no law; both the names Euripides and Socrates are quite unfit for heroic verſe; and neither Apollo himſelf, nor the whole choir of the Muſes would be able to adjuſt them to it. Nec mirari debuit Lilius Gyraldus ‡ Pythiam Sacerdotem, ïambico jam trimetro reſpondiſſe cum heroico ſolita eſſet oracula reddere: nomina enim certe Socrates & Euripides heroico verſui aptare nec ipſe potuit Apollo, nec Muſæ ipſæ (51). Let any one ſay after this, that it is of no importance to have one name rather than another (52). Here we ſee Euripides, who perhaps, was more admired by Virgil, and the reſt of the Poets in Auguſtus's court, than Sophocles: here we ſee him, I ſay, diveſted of that advantage, becauſe they could not introduce his name in their Hexameters; and on this account Poets were forced to immortalize to his prejudice thoſe who were judged inferior to him; but the laws of Proſody were againſt them. There is one of thoſe conflicts between rhyme and reaſon which De Boileau has ſo well deſcribed (53). Horace being to name a little city of Italy, could not do it, but was forced to point it out by certain characteriſticks. It was called Equotutium, a word that could not be introduced in an Hexameter verſe.

Quattuor hinc rapimur viginti & millia rhedis
Manſuri oppidulo, quod verſu dicere non eſt,
Signis perfacile eſt (54).

" Thence four and twenty miles in four hours time,
" To a ſmall place whoſe name won't ſtand in rhyme:
" But yet by ſigns 'tis very eas'ly known:
Creech.

It is ſometimes a happineſs to have a name that cannot be ſubjected to the laws of Poetry (55).

[H] His verſes were of very great ſervice to the Athenian ſoldiers in Sicily.] The Athenian army under the command of Nicias, ſuffered all the calamities which ill fortune can poſſibly reduce men to. The victors made a moſt cruel advantage of their victories: but although they treated the Athenian ſoldiers with ſo much inhumanity, they yet were extremely kind to all ſuch as could repeat any of Euripides's verſes. Several who, after having eſcaped from the field of battle, did not know what courſe to take, and wandered about from place to place, found a ſupport by ſinging the verſes of this Poet. They gained a livelihood this way, people uſing to give them victuals and drink as a recompenſe for thoſe ſongs. Τότε γοῦν φασὶ τῶν σωθέντων οἴκαδε συχνοὺς ἀσπασάσθαι τὸν Εὐριπίδην φιλοφρόνως, καὶ διηγεῖσθαι τοὺς μὲν, ὅτι δουλεύοντες ἀφείθησαν, ἐκδιδάξαντες ὅσα τῶν ἐκείνου ποιημάτων ἐμέμνητο, τοὺς δ' ὅτι πλανώμενοι μετὰ τὴν μάχην, τροφῆς καὶ ὕδατος μετέλαβον τῶν μελῶν ἄσαντες. Plures autem tunc commemorant, qui ſoſpites domum reverſi ſunt, Euripidem benignè ſalutaviſſe, ac prædicaſſe alios fuiſſe ſe manumiſſos, quòd quæ ipſius carmina tenuerant memoria, illos ea docuiſſent, alios palantes poſt pugnam fuiſſe cibo & potu adjutos, quum verſus illius canerent (56). i. e. " We are told " that many who returned ſafe to their country, " kindly ſaluted Euripides, declaring that they had " been reſtored to their liberty, for teaching their vic- " tors ſuch verſes of Euripides as they remembered; " and that others who roamed up and down, had " meat and drink given them, in return for ſinging " his verſes." It was doubtleſs a very great pleaſure to Euripides, to ſee many of thoſe unhappy men come to his houſe, to return their thanks, becauſe his verſes had ſaved their lives and procured them their liberty. The Sicilians gave another illuſtrious teſtimony of the eſteem they had for Euripides. A Caunian veſſel being chaſed by pirates, endeavoured to ſhelter itſelf in ſome haven in Sicily, but could not obtain leave to do this, till it was known that ſome perſons on board that ſhip, could repeat ſome verſes of Euripides (57). I muſt not omit obſerving, that they were aſked if they could repeat any of them by heart. This ſingle queſtion implies more than I am able to expreſs. I will here cite a paſſage from Tanaquil Faber (58). " Euripides muſt have been extremely " affected, to ſee every day one of thoſe unhappy " creatures come and thank him as their deliverer; " and tell him, that his verſes had changed their ſad " fate, and been of greater ſervice to them, than if " they had a paſſport ſigned by the five Ephori, and " the two Kings of Lacedæmon (59). Euripides muſt " therefore have been a great and a glorious Poet; but " what ſhall we ſay of the Sicilians of that age; muſt " they not have been very worthy people? The miſ- " fortune is, ſo excellent an example has not been fol- " lowed; and at this time of day ſuch relations would " be looked upon, in France and Spain, as ſo many " tales of antient Greece, which are always called " lyes.

[I] His compoſitions ſeldom won the prize.] Only five Tragedies out of the ſeventy five written by him, gained it. This we are told by Varro. Euripidem quoque M. Varro ait cùm quinque & ſeptuaginta tragœdias ſcripſerit, in quinque ſolis viciſſe, cùm eum ſæpe vincerent aliqui Poetæ ignaviſſimi (60). Moſt of thoſe who conquered Euripides were wretched Poetaſters as Varro obſerves. This is not to be wondered at, for at that time cabal (61) perhaps more than in the preſent age, pronounced the fate of compoſitions; and the baſeſt arts were employed, in order to procure the favour of the Judges. See Ælian's indignation (62), becauſe one Xenocles a Poet of no merit, was preferred to Euripides in a conteſt of four pieces againſt four, at the ſolemnization of the eightieth Olympiad. Some may think that there are two miſtakes in theſe words of Varro; as ſome Authors declare that Euripides compoſed ninety two Tragedies, and was fifteen times victorious (63). Barnes gives us the title of eighty four pieces of that Author. Thus Varro is convicted of falſhood in one of theſe articles. With regard to the other, ſome criticks read quindecim fifteen inſtead of quinque five in Aulus Gellius (64): their reaſon is, that the Greek Authors relate that Euripides won the prize

(47) In Vita Euripidis, pag. 19.

(†) Hecub. 992. Oreſt. ver. 1134. Phœniſſ. ver. 18, &c.

(48) Barneſ. pag. 20.

(49) Suidas, in Voce Σοφὸς.

(50) Barnes, pag. 20, obſerves that this Prieſteſs did not always anſwer in hexameters. Quinimo fallitur vir doctus quod putet Pythiam nonniſi heroïcis uti ſolitam, nam ut cætera taceam, extat etiamnum apud Pauſaniam oraculum Delphicum ïambico metro ab ipſa Pythia datum Tiſidi Meſſenio. He puts in the margin, Quare Anton. van Dalen hunc errorem errat cum aliis.

‡ Poët. Hiſtor. Dialog. 7. folio 271.

(51) Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 20.

(52) See the article BALZAC (John Lewis Guez of) remark [A].

(53) In his 2d Satyr. Add to this the following exclamation of Meſſieurs de Port-Royal: How many People has rhime obliged to tell untruths! Art de Penſer, Part 3. chap. 19. pag. m. 366.

(54) Horat. Sat. 5. lib. 1. ver. 86.

(55) See above, the end of the remark [C] of the article BALESDENS.

(56) Plut in Nicia, ſub finem, pag. 542 [C].

(57) Idem, ibid.

(58) Vie des Poëtes Grecs, pag. 96.

(59) Gylippus, General of the Lacedæmonians had defeated the Athenians in Sicily.

(60) Aul. Gellius, lib. 17. cap. 4.

(61) Menander à Philemone nequaquam pari ſcriptore in certaminibus comœdiarum ambitu, gratiaque & factionibus ſæpenumero vincebatur. i. e. " Menander was " often over- " come, in the " poetical con- " teſts, by Phi- " lemon, who " was a far infe- " rior writer; " but he got the " better of him " by mean arti- " fices and the " favour of a " cabal."

(62) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 8.

(63) Thom. Magiſter ſays this, in Vita Euripidis.

(64) Iſaacus Caſaubonus in A Gellio pro quinque legit quindecim, quoniam Græci, inquit, ſcriptores teſtantur Euripidem νίκας τιθέναι πεντεκαίδεκα. Barneſ. pag. 26.

between him and the great Sophocles [K], made him perhaps leſs uneaſy than the taunts of Ariſtophanes, who took a pleaſure in abuſing him in his Comedies. It is thought that the chief reaſon which prompted him to retire to the court of Archelaus King of Macedon, was, to ſee the comic Poets divert the Athenians at his coſt (c). There are ſeveral Parts in his Tragedies againſt women; and it cannot be denied but that he took a pleaſure in railing againſt the fair ſex, whence the name of Woman-hater (d) was given him [L]. He nevertheleſs married [M]; not only before he had experienced in his own family, prize fifteen times. But this is a weak reaſon, ſince Suidas and Moſchopulus both Grecians, ſpeak only of five victories. Their authority is as good as that of Thomas Magiſter who reckons up fifteen.

(c) Thomas Magiſter, in ejus vita.

(d) Μισογύνης.

[K] The enmity which broke out between him and the great Sophocles.] It was almoſt impoſſible for two ſuch great Poets, who aſpired to the ſame glory, to love one another. Athenæus relates certain particulars with regard to their quarrel, which are no ways honourable to them (65). If Euripides wrote the letters which are aſcribed to him, Sophocles and he muſt have been very good friends. Barnes (66) who attributes thoſe letters to Euripides, pretends that thoſe two Poets were a conſiderable time at variance, but at laſt became good friends. Sophocles diſcovered a great eſteem for Euripides, when he heard of his death. He cauſed a Tragedy to be repreſented, wherein he himſelf appeared in a mourning habit, and made his actors take off their crowns (67). However, this is a very ambiguous proof of friendſhip and ſorrow. Two great men who aſpire to the ſame glory, that is, to bereave each other of the palm, have a greater eſteem inwardly for each other, than they would have, but they cannot love one another. Whichſoever of them happens to die firſt, the ſurvivor ſhall be the firſt that offers up incenſe to him. He then heartily applauds and honours him; he is freed from the thorns of competition; and he does juſtice with a good grace to the merit of the deceaſed, becauſe he has the pleaſure to dread him no longer. Add to this, that he would prejudice himſelf very much in the opinion of the public, were he not to be affected at the loſs that had been ſuſtained, as he would appear too jealous.

(65) Athen. lib. 13. pag 604.

(66) In Vita Euripid. pag. 27.

(67) Thom. Magiſter, in Vita Eurip.

[L] The name of woman-hater was given him.] Suidas and Moſchopulus aſſure that this was given him, becauſe of his authority and inſenſibility (68). Σκυθρωπὸς ἦ τὸ εἶδος ἦν, καὶ ἀμιξὴς καὶ φεύγων τὰς συνουσίας, ὅθεν καὶ μισογύνης ἐδοξάσθη. i. e. "He was of a melancholy diſpoſition, and ſhunned all commerce "with the fair ſex, whence he was called the wo-"man-hater." He never laughed, and had no inclination for thoſe pleaſures which may be ſhared with women. This therefore gave occaſion to this epithet. If afterwards he levelled an hundred common places againſt the women in his Tragedies, and took a pleaſure in diſplaying with ſeverity, the ill qualities of ſome under general deſcriptions; this only confirmed him in the poſſeſſion of this title; and we are not to doubt, as his evil ſtar directed him ill in the hymeneal choice, but that this perſonal and domeſtic reaſon heightened his ſpleen, and ſuggeſted ſatyrical ideas. Mulieres fere omnes in majorem modum exoſus fuiſſe dicitur, ſive quod natura abhorruit à mulierum cœtu, ſive quòd duas ſimul uxores habuerat, quum id decreto ab Athenienſibus facto jus eſſet; quarum matrimonii pertædebat (69). i. e. "It is related that he entertained a "ſtrong averſion to women, either from a na-"tural antipathy to their company, or becauſe he "had two wives together, (this being allowed by a "decree of the Athenians) and was heartily tired of "both." But then nothing can be falſer than to aſſert, that having left his country, becauſe of the ſhame which his two wives brought upon him, he conceived a hatred againſt the fair ſex in general, and ſatyrized them all for the faults committed by a few. This is undeniably refuted, by ſhewing that he did not leave his country till a little before his death; and after that the Athenian ſtage had reſounded a multitude of times with his invectives againſt women. Hac ignominia motus Euripides in Macedoniam ſe contuliſſe dicitur, & perpetuo in omne genus mulieres odio exarſiſſe, ſuarum nimirum uxorum adulterarum gratia. Sed pace Grammaticaſticorum liceat dicere, quod & probaturus ſum, aliud huic nomini originem & cauſam dari. Euripides enim non modo quia tot ſceleſtas mulieres, tot veneficas, tot adulteras, & viricidas & inceſtas in ſcenam induxerit, verum etiam quod tot aculeatis omnem illum ſexum conſo-

(68) See the Greek verſes cited by Aulus Gellius, chap. 20. book 15.

(69) Aulus Gell. lib. 15. cap. 20.

deret ſententiis, apud veteres Μισογύνης audiebat . . . . . & plures certe, ſi non omnes illius Tragœdiæ in quibus tantopere mulieres perſtringit, actæ erant antequam ad iter in Macedoniam animum applicaret (70). i. e. "It (70) Barneſ. "is ſaid that Euripides, being ſtrongly affected with pag. 19. "this ignominy, retired into Macedonia, and enter-"tained a perpetual averſion to the whole female ſex, "becauſe of the adulterous practices of his wives. "But with ſubmiſſion to theſe little criticks, let me "ſay what I ſhall prove, viz. that this name was "owing to another cauſe. Euripides was not ſo much "called a woman-hater, for bringing on the ſtage ſo "many wicked women, ſo many ſorcereſſes, adulte-"reſſes, murthers of their huſbands, and inceſtuous "males; but for having ſatyrized ſo very ſeverely "the whole female ſex . . . . beſides, it is certain that "the greateſt part, if not all of his Tragedies, in "which he inveighs ſo ſeverely againſt women, were "acted before he ſo much as thought of going into "Macedonia." It muſt be particularly obſerved, that as Euripides introduced ſome very wicked women into his Tragedies, he has alſo introduced heroines, and has ſpoke honourably of the ſex on many occaſions. But ſtill this did not wipe off the ſtain; the remembrance of injuries eraſes that of kindneſſes. Here follows Barnes's Latin. Quamquam idem cum res ferret haud minus honorificis fœminas teſtimoniis ornaverit, plurimas Heroïnas ob virtutem eximias fabulis ſuis populo exhibendo, ut oſtendimus plus ſemel in annotationibus noſtris (*), manſit tamen affixum Poëtæ vocabulum, quia plus mordent paucæ offenſiunculæ, quam multa beneficia (71). We muſt alſo remember that Ariſtophanes, upon pretence of defending the fair ſex againſt Euripides, has abuſed them more than this tragic Poet has done. I allude to the Comedy in which Euripides ſuppoſes, (71) Ibid. that the women brought an action againſt Euripides. Fatendum eſt in Theſmophoriazuſis non tam Euripidem, adverſus quem Drama illud inſtitutum putatur, quam totum fœmineum genus hunc Comicum perſtringere videri, peculiari ſibi cavillandi charactere uſum, & quaſi genio ſuo obſecundatum. Dum enim Euripidem à mulieribus condemnatum fingit, quod de iis male eſſet in ſuis tragœdiis locutus, multò plura iſtius ſexus flagitia in unica illa comœdia profert, quàm in omnibus ſuis Tragœdiis Euripides unquam memoraverit, atque ita Euripidem accuſando abſolvit, mulieres vero laudando excuſandoque maxime denigrat (72). i. e. "We muſt confeſs that in (72) Barneſ. pag. "the Theſmophoriazuſæ, the comic Poet does not ſeem 4. "ſo much to laſh Euripides, (againſt whom that play "ſeems to be levelled) as the whole female ſex; he "therein giving a looſe to his peculiar fondneſs for "cenſuring; and obeying as it were the impulſe of "his genius. For whilſt he ſuppoſes that Euripides "was condemned by the women, becauſe he had "ſpoke ill of them in his Tragedies; he vents more "enormous particulars againſt the whole ſex in that "ſingle Comedy, than Euripides had done in all his "Tragedies. Thus by accuſing Euripides, he acquits "him; and by applauding and apologizing for the "fair ſex, he blackens their characters the more." But we will now quote a Writer, who ſaid more ill of women in three words, than Euripides did in fifty Tragedies. Weigh well the following anſwer of Sophocles. Being aſked one day why he introduced good and virtuous women in his Tragedies, whilſt thoſe of Euripides were very bad: Euripides, replied he, repreſents them as they are, and I as they ſhould be. Fertur Sophocles non nihil de hac quæſtione haud minus in fœminas aculeatum ſtrinxiſſe; interrogatus enim quando quidem Euripidis perſonæ mulieres malæ eſſent, cur ipſius è contra forent bonæ. Αὐτὸς μὲν ἔφη ποιεῖν, οἵας δεῖ, Εὐριπίδης δὲ οἵαι εἰσὶν (73). I am to obſerve that (73) Ibid. pag. Ariſtotle relates in general, and without a diſtinction 17. of ſex, that Sophocles uſed to ſay, I repreſent perſons as they ought to be, and Euripides as they are (74). (74) Ariſtot. de Poët. cap. 25. pag. m. 518. E.

(*) Ad Troad. ver. 651, & Menalipp. ver. 54. Proteſilaum, ver. 5, &c.

[M] He nevertheleſs married.] This very man, who ſhunned ſo induſtriouſly the amorous congreſs (75), grew

(75) Φεύγων τὰς συνουσίας. Suidas, in Εὐριπίδης.

family, the truth of his dramatic common places, but likewiſe after that the diſorderly life of his firſt wife had forced him to divorce her. His ſecond wife was as diſſolute, at leaſt, as his firſt (e). I cannot ſay with which of theſe two it was that he found one of his own actors; but it is very probable that it was with the laſt, becauſe we are told that the diſgrace this brought upon him, and the frequent jeers of the comic Poets on that account, obliged him to leave Athens (f). Some Authors ſay, that Euripides deſiring to make uſe of the permiſſion which men were allowed in Athens, viz. of marrying two wives, took two together, but made ſo ill a choice, that they quite wore out his patience, and raiſed in him an averſion to the whole ſex (g). But however this be, he met with a very gracious reception from King Archelaus, this Prince loving learned men, and inviting them to his court by his great munificence. He raiſed Euripides to very high honours [N]. The advanced age of Euripides, and the chaſtity which many writers aſcribe to him, ſhould prevent our believing too lightly the adventures which it is ſaid befell him in Macedon [O]. He there came to an unhappy end. Euripides was walking

(e) Suidas, in Εὐριπίδης, Manuel Moſchopulus, Thomas Magiſter, in Vita Euripidis.

(f) Φωράσας δὲ τὸν αὐτῆ ὑποκριτὴν Κηφισοφῶντα ἐπὶ τῇ γυναικὶ, καὶ τὴν ἐντεῦθεν μὴ φέρων αἰσχύνην, σκωπτόμενος ὑπὸ τῶν Κωμῳδοποιῶν ἀφεὶς τὴν Ἀθήνησι διατριβὴν εἰς Μακεδονίαν ἀπῆρε.

(g) Aulus Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 20.

grew tractable betimes and married at twenty three years of age (76), in order to preſerve his chaſtity, which he idolized ſo much. Ut caſtitati quam unice colebat melius conſuleret (77). The woman he married was named Chœrina (78), and he had three ſons by her. After divorcing her he married another whoſe name I know not. The Writer who drew up the Index to Dalechamp's Athenæus ſays, that Euripides loſt in one day, his wife, two ſons and a daughter, and refers us to page 60, where nothing like this is found: but we find in page 61, that Euripides going to Icaria, wrote an Epigram on a diſaſter that happened at a peaſant's houſe, where a woman with her two ſons and a daughter died by eating of muſhrooms. Judge from this inſtance, what hazards thoſe run who rely on Index-makers. If Athenæus were to be credited, we ſhould not entertain a very favourable idea of Euripides's chaſtity. He aſſures us that this Poet was very fond of the fair ſex (79); and that Sophocles hearing ſome perſon ſay that Euripides bore a mortal hatred to them; I own he does, replied Sophocles, in his Tragedies; but he is paſſionately fond of them in bed. Ἰφάνωρις γοῦν ἐν ἱστορικοῖς ὑπομνήμασί φησι φάτνης, εἰπόντος Σοφοκλεῖ τινὸς ὅτι μισογύνης ἐστὶν Εὐριπίδης, ἔνγε ταῖς τραγῳδίαις ἔφη ὁ Σοφοκλῆς ἐπεὶ, ἔνγε τῇ κλίνῃ φιλογύνης (10). Stobæus (81) relates the ſame circumſtance which he borrows from Serinus's books. See the Remark [R]. I have cited the paſſage of Aulus Gellius which informs us that Euripides had two wives at the ſame time. It is the XXth Chapter of Book XV.

(76) This is Barnes's conjecture, pag. 24.

(77) Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 24.

(78) Suidas, in Εὐριπίδης.

(79) Φιλογύνης δ' ἦν καὶ Εὐριπίδης ὁ ποιητὴς. Athen. lib. 13. pag. 557. See alſo pag. 603.

(80) Athen. lib. 13. pag. 557.

(81) Sermone de Intemperantia.

[N] Archelaus . . . . raiſed Euripides to very high honours.] He made him his Prime Miniſter, if Solinus may be credited. Hic Archelaus in tantum literarum mire amator fuit, ut Euripidi tragico Conſiliorum ſummam concrederet: cujus ſuprema non contentus proſequi ſumptu funeris, crines tonſus eſt, & mœrorem quem animo conceperat vultu publicavit (82). i. e. "This Archelaus was ſo paſſionately fond of learning, that "he entruſted Euripides the tragic Poet with the ſu"preme adminiſtration of affairs; and not contented "with ſolemnizing his funeral obſequies, he alſo cut "his hair; and ſhewed by his outward ſorrow, how "deeply he was afflicted in his mind." Thomas Magiſter ſays much the ſame with this tho' not ſo expreſly. Ab illo (Archelao) honeſtiſſime ſuſceptus eſt, honoribuſque auctus ad ſummam dignitatem pervenit (83). Can we find a more expreſs mark of a high eſteem, than the behaviour of Archelaus towards a man who had affronted Euripides? This man's name was Decamnichus, who one day reproached our Poet by telling him that he had a ſtinking breath. The Poet was not at a loſs for a reply, and aſcribed a glorious cauſe to this defect, I mean, the fidelity with which he had kept the ſecrets that he had been entruſted with. Εὐριπίδης ὀνειδίζοντος αὐτῷ τίνος, ὅτι τὸ στόμα δυσῶδες ἦν, πολλὰ γὰρ, εἶπεν αὐτῷ ἀπόῤῥητα ἐγκατέσπη (84). i. e. "Euripides being reproached by a certain man with hav"ing a ſtinking breath, replied, that this might ve"ry well be, ſince ſo many ſecrets had rotted in it." But Archelaus not thinking the Poet ſufficiently revenged by this anſwer, delivered up Decamnichus to him, in order that he might expiate for the affront by being ſoundly laſhed. It is related that Euripides made uſe of the King's permiſſion, which cannot be doubted if we will give credit to Ariſtotle, who ſays as follows. Τῆς Ἀρχελάου δ' ἐπιθέσεως Δεκάμνιχος ἡγεμὼν ἐγένετο παροξύνων τοὺς ἐπιθεμένους πρῶτος. αἴτιον δ' τῆς ὀργῆς ὅτι, αὐτὸν ἐξέδωκε μαστιγῶσαι Εὐριπίδῃ τῷ ποιητῇ· ὁ δ' Εὐριπίδης ἐχα-

(82) Solin. cap. 9. pag. m. 26.

(83) Thom. Magiſter, in Vita Eurip.

(84) Stobæus, Serm. 39. περὶ ἀπορρήτων.

λέπαινεν εἰπόντός τι αὐτῷ εἰς δυσωδίαν τῷ στόματος (85): i. e. "Decamnichus was at the head of the conſpi"racy formed againſt Archelaus, he being the firſt "who excited and exaſperated thoſe who murdered "that Prince. The cauſe of his rage was, Archelaus "having delivered him up to Euripides to be ſcourged; "and the cauſe of Euripides's anger was, Decamni"chus having ſaid ſomething concerning the diſagreea"bleneſs of his breath." Barnes would not have us give credit to Ariſtotle, and for this reaſon, becauſe Archelaus was not murthered till ſix years after Euripides's death (86). But this reaſon is no ways convincing to me; and it is eaſy to conceive that the Poet's death ſhould not have extinguiſhed Decamnichus's reſentment againſt the King. Notwithſtanding it be ſuppoſed (tho' Ariſtotle does not ſay ſo) that Decamnichus brought the unhappy Euripides to his end; it nevertheleſs may be very probable, that the reſentment of this man againſt the Prince, who had ſubjected him to ſo great an affront, preſerved its whole vigour; and prompted him to embrace opportunities for revenging it, which preſented themſelves ſix years after. We ſhall ſee below (87) whether he brought Euripides to his end.

(85) Ariſtot. lib. 5. de Republica, cap. 10. pag. m. 305, F.

(86) Barneſ. in Vita Euripidis, num. 30. ſub fin.

(87) In the remark [R], where he is not named among thoſe who are accuſed of bringing that Poet to his end.

I muſt not omit that Archelaus gave our Poet a golden cup, and at the ſame time beſtowed a very honourable elogium on him. This Prince having refuſed it to the man who had begged it, ſent it to Euripides and ſaid to the other: "Thou art fit to "aſk, but unworthy to receive; but as for Euripides, "he deſerves to receive without aſking." Σὺ μὲν (εἰπὲ) αἰτεῖν ἐπιτήδειος εἶ κ᾽ μὴ λαμβάνειν. οὗτος δ᾽ λαμβάνειν κ᾽ μὴ αἰτῶν (88).

(88) Plut. de vitioſo Pudore, pag. 531, D.

(89) Dionyſ. Byzantinus, in Anthologia, lib. 3. folio 274.

(90) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 13. cap. 4.

[O] We ſhould not believe too lightly the adventures which it is ſaid befell him in Macedon.] He was ſeventy two years of age when he went to the Macedonian Court, and it has always been confeſſed, that he was never inclined to criminal amours, Σκοτίης Κυπρίδος ἀλλότριος (89). However this be, let us give the Reader what is related of him. It is ſaid (90), that in a banquet which the King of Macedon made for his friends, Euripides having intoxicated himſelf with wines fell a kiſſing the Poet Agatho who ſat next to him, and was about forty years old; and that the King aſking whether Agatho ſeemed in his eye, ſtill amiable, he replied: By Jove he appears to me perfectly amiable; for the autumn of handſome perſons has ſomething lovely in it. Ναὶ μὰ Δία ὦ γὸ μοιόν τὸ ἔαρ τῶν καλῶν κάλλιστον, ἀλλὰ κ᾽ τὸ μετόπωρον (91). Plutarch pretends, that Archelaus ſaid this by way of excuſing Euripides, for kiſſing a man who was of ſo mature an age (92); but in other places (93), he aſcribes this thought to Euripides; ſo true it is, that he made the ſame ſtory ſerve at pleaſure to different uſes. He ſometimes fathered it upon one, at other times upon another. He employed it oppoſite ways, and even made alterations in it as he judged neceſſary (94). Neque enim inuſitatum Plutarcho eaſdem res & ſententias aliquando narrando variare, aliquando diverſis authoribus tribuere, non memoria lapſus, ſed ut in rem ſuam quam præſens ornat, torqueat (95). The learned Scheferus did not know the variations which Plutarch has made with regard to the autumn of handſome perſons, and imagines that Plutarch has always aſcribed that thought to Archelaus; and nevertheleſs in one of the paſſages cited by him (96), it is manifeſt that Euripides pronounced this ſaying, on account of his kiſſing Agatho. See Cœlius Rhodiginus (97) who cenſured a tranſlator of Plutarch, for ſo falſly

(91) Idem, ibid.

(92) Plutarch in Apophth. pag. 177, A.

(93) Idem, in Vita Alcibiad. pag. 192, A; and in Amatorio, pag. 770, C.

(94) See the remark [M] of the article ACHILLES, between the citations (137) and (138).

(95) Barneſ. in Vita Euripidis, pag. 30.

(96) Scheffer. in Ælian. lib. 13. cap. 4. cites Plutarch in Amatorio it is there that the ſaying is aſcribed to Euripides, and in Apophth. Lacon. This is not found in the Apophthegms of the Lacedæmonians.

(97) Antiq. Lect. lib. 24. cap. 7.

walking in a wood, and in deep meditation according to his uſual cuſtom. The intenſeneſs of his reflections doubtleſs carried him too far; he meeting in a ſolitary place, with the hounds of Archelaus, who was then hunting, was torn to pieces by thoſe curſed animals. Archelaus buried him with great magnificence [P], but the Athenians were ſo much afflicted at his death, that the whole city went into mourning (b). One of his friends named Philemon, was ſo affected at this, that he declared, as ſome relate, could he be perſuaded that the dead preſerve a ſenſe of things, he would hang himſelf, in order to enjoy the ſight of Euripides [Q]. This great Poet was near ſeventy five when he left the world. The circumſtances of his death are variouſly related [R]. He never falſly interpreting that paſſage in the life of Alcibiades, where this ſaying of Euripides is related. But the adventure of this banquet is not the worſt fault of this Poet. It is related that (98) he had a paſſion for Agatho, and that he wrote the Tragedy of Chryſippus, merely out of complaiſance to him. It is ſaid that he was engaged in a very ſcandalous intrigue with Archelaus's minion; and that it was on his going to meet him in the night time, that he was met by ſome women who tore him to pieces. Others relate, that he was going to meet the wife of Nicodemus the Arethuſian. Οἱ δὲ, ἰσόρησαν ἐχ ὑπὸ κυνῶν ἀλλ' ὑπὸ γυναικῶν νύκταρ διασπασθῆναι, πορευόμενον ἀνῃ πρὸς Κρατερὸν τὸν ἐρώμενον Ἀρχελάου, ϗ ἦ σχεῖν αὐτὸν ϗ περὶ τὰς τοιαύτας ἔρωτας. οἱ δὲ, πρὸς τὴν γαμετὴν Νικοδήμου τοῦ Ἀρεθουσίου (99). These are the particulars I hinted at in the text of this Remark.

(b) Thomas Magiſter, in Vita Euripidis.

(98) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 21.

(99) Suidas, in Εὐριπίδης.

[P] Archelaus buried him with great magnificence.] Doubtleſs the following words of an Epitaph on Euripides, Ἀλλ' ἔμολες Πελλαῖον ὑπ' ἠρίον. i. e. "Thy bo-"dy is buried in Pellæan earth," gave occaſion to Barnes to ſay, that the King of Macedon would have our Poet buried in his capital city. Deſignaverat inter Macedonicorum regum tumulos Euripidem reponere, atque ita paulo poſt in urbe Pella quam nonnulli Berœam putant, Macedoniæ metropoli nobile illi extructum ſepulchrum (100). i. e. "He deſigned to inter the re-"mains of Euripides, among the tombs of the Ma-"cedonian Monarchs; and therefore a little after raiſ-"ed a moſt noble monument to his memory, in the "city of Pella, which ſome ſuppoſe to be Berœa, the "capital of Macedon." See above the paſſage of Solinus (101), and add to it the following of Aulus Gellius which ſhews at one and the ſame time the veneration which the Athenians and Macedonians had for Euripides. The Athenians ſent Embaſſadors to Macedonia, in order to have his bones, but were not allowed to take them away. Sepulchrum autem ejus & memoriam Macedones eo dignati ſunt honore, ut in gloriæ quoque loco prædicarent ὅποτέ σον μνῆμα Εὐριπίδης ἄλιτο πᾶν, quod egregius poëta morte obita ſepultus in eorum terra foret. Quamobrem cum legati ad eos ab Athenienſibus miſſi petiſſent, ut oſſa Athenas in terram illius patriam permitterent tranſferri, maximo conſenſu Macedones in ea re deneganda perſtiterunt (102). It appears by a paſſage in Vitruvius (103), that Euripides's tomb was in the open field, at the confluence of two little rivers, whoſe waters were very different, the one being mortal, and the other ſo good, that travellers uſed to delight to dine on its banks. Now could this have been ſaid, had Euripides's tomb been in the Capitol of Macedon? And in this caſe, would not Vitruvius and Pliny (104) have pointed out more exactly the ſituation of theſe two rivers? Would they not have obſerved, that they either flowed by, or very near, to the city of Pella? And would Plutarch have ſaid, that this Poet was buried near Arethuſa (105)? A thunder-bolt fell on the tomb of this Poet, which was look'd upon as a glorious accident, the like having never happened to any one but Lycurgus: Ὥστε ἀπολόγημα ϗ μαρτύριον μέγα εἶναι τοῖς ἀγαπῶσιν τὸν Εὐριπίδην, τὸ μόνῳ συμπεσεῖν αὐτῷ μετὰ τελευτὴν, ϗ γενέσθαι ἃ τῷ θεοφιλεστάτῳ ϗ ὁσιωτάτῳ πρότερον συνέπεσε (106). i. e. "What follows affords a "ſtrong proof and teſtimony of Euripides's merit, to thoſe "who admire it, viz. that a thing happened to him "after death, which before had happened only to a moſt "excellent man, and dear to the Gods." The Athenians not being able to get his bones, erected a moſt noble Cenotaphium or honorary tomb to his memory (107), which was ſtanding in Pauſanias's time. Thoſe who affirm, that the Argives alſo raiſed one in his honour are groſly miſtaken. Cœlius Rhodiginus, & ab eo deceptus Lilius Giraldus, aliud Euripidis ſepulchrum memorat in medio Argivorum foro; & Palinthum nuncupatum ex Strabone refert; ſed optandum eſt ut inter tot lectiones antiquas nullos novos errores proſeminaret Cœlii incuria, nam Strabo (108) hoc ſepulchrum Danai fuiſſe ait, quanquam eodem loci Euripidem authorem laudat (109). i. e. "Coelius Rhodiginus, and Lilius Giraldus who "was led into a miſtake by him, take notice of an-"other ſepulchre of Euripides, raiſed in the middle "of the Forum at Argos, and declares it to be called "Pallinthum by Strabo; but it were to be wiſhed that, "among ſo many ancient readings, Rhodiginus may "not, for want of care, have interſperſed new miſ-"takes; for Strabo ſays that this was Danaus's "tomb, tho' he applauds Euripides in the ſame place."

(100) Citation (82).

(101) Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 32.

(102) Aul. Gell. lib. 15. cap. 20.

(103) Lib. 8. cap. 3. pag. m. 163.

(104) Lib. 31. cap. 2. ſub fin.

(105) Plut. in Lycurgo, ſub fin. pag. 59.

(106) Plut. ibid.

(107) Pauſanias, lib. 1. pag. 2.

(108) Lib. 8. pag. 256.

(109) Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 33. He quotes Cœlius Rhodiginus, Antiq. Lect. lib. 23. cap. 10. and Gyraldus, Poët. Hiſt. Dial. 7. folio 268. I do not find this in my edition of Rhodiginus, of Frankfort 1666, in the place pointed out. He ſhould have cited lib. 24. cap. 10.

[Q] Philemon . . . declared . . . he would hang himſelf, in order to enjoy the ſight of Euripides.] The verſes of this tender, but a little too unbelieving friend, deſerve to be quoted. Tantopere autem Philemon eum adamavit, ut hæc de eo dicere non dubitaverit:

Εἰ ταῖς ἀληθείαισιν οἱ τεθνηκότες
Αἴσθησιν εἶχον ἄνδρες, ὡς φασίν τινες,
Ἀπηγξάμην ἂν, ὡς ἰδεῖν Εὐριπίδην (110).

That is,

"Philemon had ſo much fondneſs for him, that he "did not ſcruple to ſay the following words,

"If the deceas'd have ſenſe, as ſome pretend,
"I, with a halter, ſoon would end my life,
"That thy dear ſight (my friend) I might enjoy.

(110) Thom. Magiſt. in Vita Euripidis.

[R] The circumſtances of his death are variouſly related.] The reader may have obſerved in the Text of this article, that the King being in a party of hunting, ſome hounds fell upon Euripides as he was meditating in a wood (111), and tore him to pieces. This is extracted from Thomas Magiſter's life of this Poet. See alſo Diodorus Siculus, Chap. CIII of Book XIII. According to other Writers theſe hounds did not ruſh accidentally upon Euripides, but that they were purpoſely let out upon him; and that this was by the baſe artifices of two Poets (112), jealous of his glory, who, with a ſum of money, bribed the Keeper of the King's hounds to do this (113). Valerius Maximus ſays only this, viz. that Euripides having ſupp'd with the King, and going home, was ſo cruelly bit by the dogs that he died (114). Aulus Gellius declares expreſly, that this baſe turn was done him by an envious man. Is cum in Macedonia apud Archelaum regem eſſet utereturque eo rex familiariter, rediens nocte ab ejus cœna canibus à quodam æmulo immiſſis dilaceratus eſt, & ex his vulneribus mors ſecuta eſt (115). I ſhall not repeat what I have already touch'd upon in the remark [O], viz. that it was ſaid, that going to ſee ſome man or woman at an undue hour, upon an ill deſign, he was met by ſome women who knock'd out his brains. But I may very properly introduce, in this place, the reflection of Tanaquil Faber. Others would have perſuaded the world, ſays he (116), that he had been torn to pieces by women, to revenge the honour of their ſex, againſt whom he had always declaimed. But it is very probable that this hiſtory was copied from the fable of Orpheus.

(111) Ἐπειδὴ ϗ τινὲς ἄλλως φρονοῦντες ἔτυχεν.

(112) Arideus the Macedonian, and Cratevas, a Theſſalian.

(113) Suidas, in Εὐριπίδης, and Manuel Moſchopul. in Vita Euripidis.

(114) Val. Maxim. lib. 9. cap. 12. Ext. 4.

(115) Aul. Gellius, lib. 15. cap. 20.

(116) Vie des Poëtes Grecs, pag. m. 98, 99.

I will conclude this remark with a little piece of learning which is furniſhed us by Eraſmus (117). There was in Macedon a village which was called the village of the Thracians, becauſe it was inhabited by the people of that country. One of Archelaus's dogs happening to ſtray into that village, was there ſacrificed, and fed upon, according to the cuſtom of the inhabitants. This coming to the King's ear, he ſentenced them to pay a talent, by way of fine: but being unable (117) On the proverb Κυνὸς Νίκην. Canis vindictam. Adagior. Chil. 1. Cent. 7. num. 47. pag. m. 245.

never was with Plato in Egypt [S], notwithſtanding the aſſertion of * Tanaquil Faber. There are now extant but twenty Tragedies writ by him, though he had compoſed ninety two (i). He took a pleaſure in interſperſing his dramatick pieces with a great number of moral reflexions [T]; on which occaſion he drew his own character; he being a man of great gravity and ſeverity in his conduct, and regardleſs of pleaſures. He uſed to ſhut himſelf up in a gloomy cave, and there compoſe his works [U]. However, all Euripides's

* Mr. le Fevre.

(i) Suidas, who relates this, ſays alſo that, according to others, he wrote but 75. Mr. Barnes found the titles of 84 Tragedies of Euripides. See his edition, pag. 55.

able to do this, they beſought Euripides to get it remitted, which by his favour it was. But he was puniſhed for it ſome time after, being killed by the King's dogs in a foreſt (118); and people were perſuaded that the dogs who killed him, ſprung from him whom the Thracians had ſlaughtered. This gave riſe to a proverb (119) among the Macedonians. Here follows another piece of learning of the ſame Eraſmus. He pretends (120), that the proverb Promeri canes owes its original to a revenge which Promerus, an Officer of Archelaus's, took for an ill turn which Euripides had done him. He let looſe his dogs upon him, which tore him to pieces. Eraſmus has forgot to tell us, what Stephanus Byzantinus ſays on this ſubject. The ill fated Euripides was very much worried by dogs in a part of Macedonia called Bermiſcus. He did not die immediately, but never recovered after having been bit ſo grievouſly by them. Βερμίσκος· χωρίον Μακεδονίας· ἐν ᾧ κυνοσπάρακτος γέγονεν Εὐριπίδης . . ἐκ δὲ τῶν ἡγημάτων ἀῤῥωστήσαντα τὸν ἀποθανεῖν. Bormiſcus, oppidum (regiuncula, according to Berkelius) Macedoniæ, ubi à canibus diſcerptus fuit Euripides . . . ex morſibus verò quum ægrotaret, aiunt obiiſſe. I don't doubt but that the verſes 597 and 598 of Ovid's Ibis, on which de Boiſſieu had no remark to make, hint at the tragical end of our Poet.

(118) Cum Euripides in ſylvas quadam ſolus eſſet, & Archelaus à venatu reverteretur, canes Euripidem cinctum diſcerpſerunt devoraruntque. Eraſm. Adagior. Chil. 1. Cent. 7. num. 47. He ſhould not have ſaid that they devoured him; this being refuted by what we have ſaid concerning Euripides's tomb.

(119) See above, citation (117).

(120) Chil. 2. Cent. 7. num. 88. pag. 56. Apoſtolius ſays the ſame thing, in general terms, Cent. 16. num. 70.

Utque cothurnatum vatem tutela Dianæ
Dilaniet vigilum te quoque turba canum.

That is,

"May'ſt thou be torn to pieces by curſt dogs,
"As fam'd Euripides was by Diana's.

[S] He never was with Plato in Egypt.] Authors are not agreed upon the year of Plato's birth, but we may fix it very ſafely to the 88th or 89th Olympiad. I would not adviſe any perſon to contradict Mr. Barnes, who aſſerts (121), that Plato was but ſeventeen when Euripides went into Macedon; and but twenty, when Euripides died. How abſurd is it to ſay, as Diogenes Laertius has done, that Euripides accompanied Plato in his voyage to Egypt (122)! Had they gone thither together, it would have been juſt and decent to have placed Euripides, then a venerable old man, as the leader; and Plato, at that time a very young man, following him as a diſciple; much after the ſame manner as young Engliſh Lords, and young Counts of the Empire, travel over the Alps with tutors! But to leave this incongruous abſurdity, viz. the aſſerting that Plato and Euripides travelled together into Egypt. Euripides left Athens, teized to death with the ſatyrical taunts and jeſts of the comic Poets; and went, being about ſeventy two years of age, to Archelaus's Court. It is very certain, that his journey into Egypt is not poſterior to that of Macedonia: his journey muſt therefore have been a mere chimæra, or muſt have preceded the ſeventy ſecond year of Euripides. Now it cannot be denied but that this Poet, during the five or ſix years which preceded the journey into Macedon, lived in his native country. He exhibited Oreſtes at ſixty nine years of age (123). He received in Athens, at ſixty ſeven years old (124), the thanks of thoſe who had ſaved their lives in Sicily, by repeating his verſes. Is it natural to imagine, that he ſhould attempt to go into Egypt at ſeventy years of age? And if this abſurdity will go down with ſome, I would aſk, how it could be poſſible for Plato, then not twenty, to accompany him into Egypt, ſince he did not go thither till after (125) the death of Socrates (126), which happened ſome years after that of Euripides; he, in a word, who did not undertake to go into Egypt till after he had ſeen Italy (127), and who did not leave Athens till he was twenty years old (128)? Tho' Diogenes Laertius ſhould ſwear to the journey in queſtion, he would not deſerve to be credited againſt the clear and ſolid reaſons which are brought from Chronology. With much more reaſon ought ſuch a fable to be rejected, ſince he relates it only from hearſay: and yet we ſee Joſeph Scaliger, Tanaquil Faber, and Menage, ſtrongly perſuaded that Plato and Euripides went together into Egypt. I don't pretend to excuſe Diogenes Laertius; for when a hearſay is evidently falſe, a Writer ought not to publiſh it without contradicting it at the ſame time. Laertius furniſhes me with a proof againſt his hearſay. He obſerves that Euripides fell ſick in Egypt, and that the Prieſts cured him by ſea-medicines; which made him ſay ſome time after,

Θάλασσα κλύζει πάντα τ' ἀνθρώπων κακά.

That is,

"The Ocean every human ill removes."

It is the 1193d verſe of the Tragedy of Iphigenia in Tauris, which was prior to the ſixty ninth year of Euripides, ſince that the Tragedy of Oreſtes, which he exhibited at ſixty nine years of age, was the laſt piece written by him in Athens (129). His journey into Egypt muſt therefore have neceſſarily been prior to his ſixty ninth year, and thus Plato muſt have gone into Egypt before he was fourteen years of age, which is abſurd. The learned men of England (130) were not ſo eaſily impoſed upon as thoſe of France, and did not ſay, like the great Scaliger: Plato, Eudoxus, Euripides, profectionis in Ægyptum ſocii planetarum curſum ab Ægyptiis didicere; & primi omnium Græcorum populares ſuos id docuerunt, Plato quidem in Timæo, Eudoxus ἐν ἐνόπτρῳ, Euripides in Thyeſte. Verba ſunt magni Scaligeri in Notis ad Sphæram Manilii (131). i. e. "Plato, Eudoxus and Euripides went together into Egypt; "learnt the courſe of the Stars from the people of that "country; and were the firſt among the Greeks who "inſtructed their countrymen in this. Plato in his "Timæus, Eudoxus in his ἐνόπτρον, Euripides in his "Thyeſtes. Such are the great Scaliger's words, in "his Notes on Manilius's Sphere." They don't ſay as Tanaquil Faber (132), that Euripides, after having learnt Rhetoric from Prodicus, went into Egypt with Plato, there to enjoy the converſation of the Prieſts of that Country, who in that age were a little more renowned for their learning than the Prieſts of Spain or Italy. There was an interval of above thirty years between Euripides's learning Rhetoric and the birth of Plato. This circumſtance aggravates Tanaquil Faber's error.

(121) In Vita Euripid. pag. 27.

(122) Οὗ φασι καὶ Εὐριπίδην αὐτῷ συναπολωλεκέναι. Diogen. Laert. lib. 3. in Platone, num. 6.

(123) Barneſ. pag. 28. ex Scholiaſt. Eurip. & Joan. Meurſio.

(124) Barneſ. ibid.

(125) Diog. Laert. in Platone, num. 6.

(126) See the remark [DD].

(127) Diog. Laert. in Platone, num. 6. Cicero 5. de Finibus, ſays the contrary; but as Apuleius obſerves that Plato went twice into Italy, and the ſecond time after the journey into Egypt, it is eaſy to reconcile Cicero with Hermodorus in Diogenes Laertius.

(128) Diogen. Laert. in Platone, num. 6.

[T] He took a pleaſure in interſperſing his dramatic pieces with a great number of moral reflections.] There is no occaſion of proving this; and we need but read ſuch of his compoſitions as have been handed down to us. But any who is deſirous of having vouchers for this, may join to the paſſage cited below from Quintilian (133), the following words of Cicero (134): Cui (Euripidi) tu quantum credas neſcio: ego certe ſingulos ejus verſus ſingula ejus teſtimonia puto. In Cicero's opinion, every verſe, of Euripides was a maxim or ſentence. Are we to wonder after this, that this illuſtrious Orator ſhould have read this Poet, in order to prepare himſelf for death? It has been obſerved (135) that the aſſaſſins who purſued and killed him, found him reading the Medea of Euripides in his litter. Now as the beſt things ſpoil a Book if they are not managed with diſcretion, the Criticks had perhaps great reaſon to cenſure in this Poet, his a little too frequent uſe of philoſophical Aphoriſms. It has been obſerved particularly, that his Hecuba aſſumes to exceſs, and often unſeaſonably, the character of a Philoſopher. Τὸν Εὐριπίδην καταμεμφόμεθα ὅτι παρὰ καιρὸν αὐτῷ ἐκυβὴ φιλοσοφεῖ (136).

(129) Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 30.

(130) See Barneſ. ibid. pag. 27.

(131) Menagius ad Diog. Laertium, lib. 3. num. 6. pag. 140. Since he cites this without cenſuring it, he is guilty of the ſame error with Scaliger, and that of Tanaquil Faber.

(132) Vie des Poetes, pag. 97.

(133) Remark [F] citation (39)

(134) Epiſt. 8. lib. 16. ad Famil.

(135) Ptolemæus Hephæſt. lib. 5. variæ Hiſtor. apud Photium, pag. m. 485.

[U] He uſed to ſhut himſelf in a gloomy cave, and there compoſe his works.] It was in the iſland of Salamis. Aulus Gellius had the curioſity to go into it.

(136) Theo, in Progymnaſmatis, cap. 1. pag. 4.

Philochorus

Euripides's maxims were not good. He gave one with regard to the ſanctity of an oath [X], which was thought ſo unguarded, that he was called to account for it. On another occaſion he dogmatized ſo gravely in favour of avaricious men, that the whole audience were ſhocked at it [Y]. Another time ſuch offence was taken at the two firſt verſes of his Menalippus, which ſeemed to doubt the exiſtence of the greateſt of all the Gods [Z], that he (137) Lib. 15. cap. 20. Philochorus refert, ſays he (137), in inſula Salamine ſpeluncam eſſe tetram & horridam, quam nos vidimus, in qua Euripides tragœdias ſcriptitavit.

[X] He gave out one maxim, with regard to the ſanctity of an oath.] He introduces Hippolytus guarded with a diſtinction, when he is reminded of his oath.

Ἡ γλωσσ' ὀμώμοχ', ἡ δὲ φρὴν ἀνώμοτος (138).

That is,

" My tongue has ſworn it, but not ſo my mind (139).

(138) It is the 612th verſe of Hippolitus.

(132) See Balzac's Prince, num. 262, pag. m. 191.

This is directly the ſophiſtry, or rather the treachery of mental reſervations. One Hygiænon could not bear this verſe; he impeached Euripides of impiety, as teaching and defending perjury. The Poet demanded to be tried by his proper Judges, appealing to the juriſdiction of thoſe Judges appointed to decide all diſputes relating to the Theatre; and ſaid that he had given, or was ready to give, an account of his faith and doctrine before that Tribunal, and that he ought to have been impeached there, and not in the uſual Courts. Ἔφη γὰρ αὐτὸν ἀδικεῖν τὰς ἐκ τῦ Διονυσιακῦ ἀγῶνος· κρίσεις εἰς τὰ δικαστήρια ἄγουλα· ἐκεῖ γὰρ αὐτὸν δεδωκέναι λόγον ἢ δώσειν εἰ βούλεται κατηγορεῖν (140). Ariſtotle, who informs us of this circumſtance, leaves us there: he does not tell us either the conſequences or reſult of this proſecution; his ſubject not ſuffering him to expatiate on it. But if Euripides extricated himſelf by appealing from court to court, and had only ſpecious arguments to offer in his own favour, it muſt be confeſſed that his cauſe was not a very good one, and that his friends and admirers have pleaded it better than he did himſelf. I do not include Cicero among his advocates; for he did not take the pains to prove, that Hippolytus's diſtinction was within the limits of the rule which he (Cicero) had juſt before laid down; but contented himſelf with giving, in general, that diſtinction, with an adverb of applauſe: Non falſum jurare perjurare eſt, ſays he (141), ſed quod ex animi tui ſententia juraris, ſicut verbis concipitur more noſtro, id non facere perjurium eſt. Scitè enim Euripides,

(140) Ariſtotel. Rhetor. lib. 3. cap. 15. pag. m. 464.

(141) Cicero, Officior. lib. 3. cap. 29.

Juravi lingua, mentem injuratam gero.

i. e. " To ſwear falſly is not always perjury; but " ſhould a perſon ſwear at his own choice, to do a " thing, and according to the form in which it is " taken by us; in that caſe to not perform it would " be perjury. Euripides therefore ſaid juſtly,

" My mind was free, altho' my tongue had ſworn."

The Scholiaſt on Euripides has explained this much better, he thinking that the Poet's thought is as follows. Hippolytus did not underſtand what the affair was, when he was made to ſwear; things had been diſguiſed to him; he had ſincerely underſtood them in a certain manner, and had ſworn according to the ſtate of the queſtion, as he underſtood it. After this he was ſhewn the affair in another light, and it was pretended that he had bound himſelf by an oath. Euripides anſwered, that it was never his intention to ſwear in ſuch a manner, and therefore, that his tongue only had ſworn. Methinks here is a caſe very different from equivocations and mental reſervations. Hippolytus, upon this ſuppoſition, ought to enjoy the prerogatives of ignorance, which clear a man at Law. Si certum eſt eum qui juravit, aliquod factum ſuppoſuiſſe, quod revera ſe ita non habeat, ac niſi id credidiſſet non fuiſſe juraturum, non obligabit juramentum (142). But nevertheleſs, Euripides's maxim in general is a very bad one, ſince there is no kind of perjury but might be excuſed that way. May not thoſe who employ equivocations ſay, that their tongue and heart did not agree; that the latter ſwore, but the former did not ſo? Barnes, to juſtify Euripides, obſerves (143), among other particulars, that Hippolytus choſe to die rather than to violate this verbal oath.

(142) Grotius, de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. 2. cap. 13. num. 4. In the Note he applies his maxim to Hippolytus.

(143) In Vita Eurip. pag. 22.

[Y] He dogmatized ſo gravely in favour of avaricious men, that the whole audience were ſhock'd at it.] The audience would have driven the actor from the ſtage, had not Euripides himſelf come upon it, and beſought them to have a little patience, by aſſuring that they would ſoon ſee the unhappy end of the miſer, whoſe maxims had ſo ſtrongly diſguſted the audience. We are obliged to Seneca for this particular. He gives in Latin verſe the maxims of this miſer, and afterwards adds: Cum hi noviſſimi verſus in tragœdia Euripidis pronunciati eſſent, totus populus ad ejiciendum & actorem & carmen conſurrexit uno impetu: donec Euripides in medium ipſe proſiluit, petens, ut expectarent, viderentque quem admirator auri exitum faceret. Dabat in illa fabula pœnas Bellerophontes, quas in ſua quiſque dat. Nulla enim avaritia ſine pœna eſt, quamvis ſatis ſit ipſa pœnarum (144). Juſtice obliges us to be ſatisfied with this kind of apology. The ſame Poet employs it for his Ixion. Some perſons cenſuring him for exhibiting ſo wicked and impious a man on the ſtage; " Obſerve, ſays he, how I ſhall fix him to a wheel before he leaves it: Ὥσπερ ὁ Εὐριπίδης ἐιπεῖν λέγεται πρὸς τὸς τὸν Ἰξίονα λοιδορᾶνλας ὡς ἀσεβῆ καὶ μιαφὸν. Οὐ μέν τοι πρότερον αὐτὸν ἐκ τῆς σκηνῆς ἐξήγαγον τῷ τροχῷ προσηλῶσαι (145). This was the beſt thing in Tragedies; perſecuted virtue triumphed at laſt in it, and the wicked were brought to condign puniſhment; but nevertheleſs there was reaſon to fear, that certain examples and certain ſpeeches would become infectious. See how Ariſtophanes (146) reproaches Euripides on account of his Phædra. It is to be obſerved, that the two charges againſt Euripides are confounded in the Menagiana, it being there aſſerted (147) that the five judges appointed by the Athenians to ſettle the conteſts which might ariſe with regard to the Theatre . . . having (148) one day ſummoned Euripides to appear, to anſwer with regard to a verſe in one of his Tragedies, wherein he made the Actor ſay, that he had ſworn with his tongue and not with his mind; Euripides defended himſelf by ſaying, that they muſt wait till the Play was ended, and that they then would ſee this Actor broke on the wheel.

(144) Senec. Epiſt. 115. pag. m. 452.

(145) Plutarch. de audiendis Poetis, pag. 19.

(146) In Ranis, Act. 4. Sc. 2. pag. m. 243.

(147) Menagiana, pag. m. 119.

(148) Ibid. pag. 120.

[Z] Such offence was taken at the two firſt verſes of his Menalippus . . . that he was forced to change them.] This is proved by Plutarch. I ſhall relate his words at length, becauſe they ſhew us what ſtreſs the Heathens laid on tradition (149), when the exiſtence of a Deity was to be proved. Plutarch confeſſes plainly enough, that it would be dangerous not to adhere ſtrongly to this proof; and that it would be difficult to find out more certain ones. The Philoſophers of this Age are not reduced to ſuch a ſtrait: they give very evident proofs, and much more demonſtrative than it is poſſible for tradition to be. But let us hear Plutarch (150). " Thou ſeemeſt to me to ſtart a great " and bold queſtion, or rather, to move a point, which " we ought not to touch upon in any manner; I mean, " the opinion and belief which we entertain of the " Gods, by requiring a proof and reaſon for each of " them. For the ancient faith and belief concerning " them, which we received from our forefathers, in " this country, ought to ſuffice us; it not being poſſible for us to imagine to ourſelves a better or more " evident proof.

(149) See Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, num. 137.

(150) Plutarch. in Amatorio, pag. 756.

" Surely the ſubtleſt wits, earth e'er produc'd,
" Could never reach the depths of heavenly wiſ-
" dom.

" So that tradition being the common baſis of all " Religion; ſhould the authority and belief of it, " tranſmitted from one generation to another, be " ſhaken and moved in a ſingle point, it becomes ſuſpicious and doubtful in all the reſt. Thou may'ſt " remember to have heard how Euripides was hiſſed " and inſulted, on account of the beginning of his " Tragedy of Menalippus, which was as follows,

" O Jupiter,

he was forced to change them. He has ſometimes vented impious propoſitions, whereupon ſome declared him to be an Atheiſt [AA]. I ſhall not examine this point; and ſhall only obſerve in general, that it is abſurd to aſcribe to the Author of a Tragedy the ſentiments he puts into the mouths of his Actors [BB]. The manner in which Euripides received the hints of the people, with reſpect to the correction of a paſſage in his Tragedies; and the anſwer he made to a Poet, who boaſted that he could compoſe with eaſe, are capable of a good or ill conſtruction [CC]. He is accuſed of ſlandering Medea out of

" O Jupiter, for nought I know of thee,
" Except thy name. ———

" He was extremely fond of this Tragedy, as being " very ſublime and exquiſitely well writ; but the peo" ple murmured ſo much, and made ſuch a tumult,
" that he changed the verſes in manner following, as
" they now ſtand.

" O Jove, how well this mighty name
" Suits thy divinity!

[AA] Some declared him to have been an Atheiſt.] Plutarch among the antients, and Sir Thomas Brown (151) among the moderns, have given Euripides this character. See the remark [H] of the article CRITIAS. Ariſtophanes ſays a thing, which recalls to my memory the fear that certain people had in Epheſus, with regard to the Preachers of the Goſpel (152). He introduces (153) a widow who had gained a livelihood by vending holy noſegays; but, ſaid ſhe, ſince Euripides, by his impious verſes, has perſuaded men that there are no Gods, I have little or no cuſtom. It is to be particularly obſerved that the Heathen Deities were ſo ridiculous, that a man might juſtly laugh at them without being an Atheiſt in any manner. The paſſage of Euripides quoted by Clemens Alexandrinus does therefore prove nothing; I mean that where this Poet ſays, that were the Gods ſummoned to give an account of their adulteries, Neptune and Jupiter himſelf would be forced to quit their temples in execution of the ſentence that ſhould be pronounced againſt them: but, continued, I do not believe that matters will ever be carried to ſuch lengths (154): Ἤδη δὲ ἐν Ἰόνι τῷ δράματι γυμνῇ τῇ κεφαλῇ ἐγκυκλεῖ τῷ θεάτρῳ τὰς Θεάς.

Πῶς ἦν δίκαιον, τὰς νόμους ὑμᾶς βροτοῖς
Γράψαντας, αὐτὰς ἀδικίας ὀφλισκάνειν;
Εἰ, δ' ἐ γὰρ ἔσαι, τῷ λόγῳ δὲ χρήσομαι·
Δίκας βιαίων δώσετ' ἀνθρώποις γάμων,
Σὺ κἠ Ποσειδῶν, Ζεὺς θ' ὃς ὑφανῦ κρατεῖ,
Ναὰς τίνοντες ἀδικίαν κενώσετε.

That is,

" He now introduced in the Tragedy entitled Ion,
" the Gods bareheaded.

" Does it ſeem juſt, for you to break thoſe Laws,
" Which you yourſelves to human creatures gave?
" But ſhould that happen, (which, ſure, hardly can,)
" That you, for all your rapes, ſhould give account;
" Then Neptune, thou, and Jove the Lord of all,
" Would leave your deſolated temples."

Father Thomaſſin (155) has reaſoned juſtly on the contradiction which is found in the conduct of the Heathens. They worſhipped in the temples, the ſame Deities which were ridiculed with impunity on the Stage.

I muſt take notice of a great error of Theophilus Raynaud. He ſays that Euripides the Atheiſt attacked Anaxagoras the Philoſopher on the doctrine of the Unity of God (156); and he cites the VIth Chapter of Book XIVth of Euſebius's Præparatio Evangelica. He ſhould have quoted the XVIth Chapter; but this would not have mended the matter; for here follows what Euſebius has ſaid, where he epitomizes the relation which Plutarch has made of the opinion of the antients concerning the Nature of God. Euripides, not daring to expreſs his thought from his apprehenſion of the Areopagus, inſinuated it, by introducing Siſyphus who denied that there were any Gods. Plutarch afterwards brings Anaxagoras, as the firſt who entertained orthodox ſentiments with regard to the Deity. This is what we are told by Euſebius (157).

[BB] It is abſurd to aſcribe to the Author of a Tragedy, the ſentiments he puts into the mouths of his Actors.] Barnes obſerves that Euripides, to ſupport the character of Siſyphus, was obliged to make him reaſon as an Atheiſt, and therefore that Plutarch had no reaſon to diſcover there the artifices of an author; the artifice, I ſay, of publiſhing with ſafety, his own thoughts under another's name (158). Miror autem plurimum quid tanto viro perſuaſerit hæc vafre ab Euripide dicta ſub Siſyphi perſona, & poëtæ ipſius eſſe ſenſus, cum nemo unquam extitit noſtro poeta pientior, ut ex innumeris ejus locis colligi poteſt, & Siſyphi characterem maxime decuit impie loqui; ut obſervavimus ad Bellerophont (159). Verſ. 8. i. e. " I wonder very much what it was " could make ſo great a man believe, that Euripides " had delivered his ſentiments craftily in the perſon of " Siſyphus; and that this ſhould be our tragic Poet's " opinion, ſince no man ever had a deeper ſenſe of " religion than Euripides, as is manifeſt from num- " berleſs paſſages in his Works: And it very juſtly " ſuited the character of Siſyphus to ſpeak impiouſly, " as I obſerved on Bellerophon." Grotius ſays judiciouſly (160). Multa in tragœdiis ſunt non ex poëtæ ſenſu dicta, ſed congruenter perſonæ quæ loquens inducitur. i. e. " There are many particulars in tragedies, " which the Poet does not deliver as his own thoughts, " but which ſuit the character of the perſon who is " brought upon the ſtage." See the Chimere de la cabale de Rotterdam démontrée (161); and what is ſaid in the Remark [Q] of the article ERASMUS.

[CC] Two things . . . . are capable of a good or ill conſtruction.] One evening the Athenians deſiring Euripides to ſuppreſs a certain paſſage in one of his Tragedies, he came upon the ſtage and ſaid to the audience, I do not write in order to learn of you, but to be your maſter. He one day complained to the Poet Alceſtis, that in the three laſt days, he had been able to write but three verſes, tho' he had laboured with all his might. The other anſwered with an air of the higheſt vanity, that he had wrote an hundred with the utmoſt eaſe. Says Euripides: there is this difference between my verſes and yours: mine will ſurvive thro' the whole round of eternity, but yours will quite diſappear in three days. Valerius Maximus has given a favourable interpretation to all this, he not perceiving the leaſt ſign of oſtentation in it, and only that juſt confidence which a great man ought to have in his own merit. He even aſſerts, that with regard to the firſt particular, the Athenians formed the ſame judgment of it as he did. Nec Euripides quidem Athenis, ſays he (162), arrogans viſus eſt, cum poſtulante populo, ut ex tragœdia quandam ſententiam tolleret, progreſſus in ſcenam, dixit: Se, ut eum doceret, non ut ab eo diſceret, fabulas componere ſolere. Laudanda profecto fiducia eſt, quæ æſtimationem ſui certo pondere examinat, tantum ſibi arrogans, quantum à contemptu & inſolentia diſtare ſatis eſt. Itaque etiam quod Alceſtidi tragico poetæ reſpondit, probabile; apud quem cum quereretur, quòd eo triduo non ultra tres verſus maximo impenſo labore deducere potuiſſet, atque is ſe centum perfacilè ſcripſiſſe gloriaretur: Sed hoc, inquit, intereſt, quod tui in triduum tantummodo, mei verò in omne tempus ſufficient. Alterius enim fœcundi curſus ſcripta intra primas memoriæ metas corruerunt, alterius cunctante ſtylo elucubratum opus per omne ævi tempus plenis gloriæ velis feretur. No man is obliged to ſubmit his own opinion to the judgment of this Latin Author, nor to believe on his ſingle affirmation, that the haughty and rude declaration of Euripides was favourably received by the Athenians. We are therefore not to wonder that Gyraldi, guided by his own judgment, looked upon theſe anſwers of the Greek Poet as expreſſive of too much ſelf-love and pride. He is only to blame for aſſerting, that the Latin Author cited them as a mark of pride. This at leaſt is the error with which Barnes has reproached him (163); after which he makes the following

(151) Relig. Medici, Sect. 46. See Notas in eum locum

(152) Acts of the Apoſtles, chap. 19. ver. 24, & ſeq.

(153) In Theſmophoriaſ. pag. m. 777.

(154) Clem. Alexandrin. Admonit. ad Gentes, pag. 50.

(155) Methode de lire chrétiennement les Poetes, tom. 1. pag. 173.

(156) Quin etiam Euſeb. 14. Præpar. cap. 6. refert Anaxagoram ab Euripide Athen idcirco impugnatum. Theoph. Raynaud. Theol. Natur. Diſtinct. 5. num. 155. pag. m. 525.

(157) Euſeb. Præpar. lib. 14. cap. 16. pag. 753.

(158) Barneſ. Not. in Euripid. Siſyph. Fragm. pag. 492.

(159) The fragments of this Tragedy contain the ſpeech of a man who expreſly denies a Providence, upon pretence that wicked men are richer than the good and virtuous.

(160) In Præfat. ad Excerpt. apud Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 22.

(161) In the Preface, pag. 110.

EURIPIDES compoſed verſes with difficulty.

(162) Val. Max. lib. 3. cap. 7. Ext. num. 1.

(163) Lilius Gyraldus incogitanter nimis dixit quod poetam noſtrum arrogantem & ſuperbum Valerius Maximus prodat, quum tamen nobilis is author in eo capite & loco quem Gyraldus deſignat, nihil omnino tale, imo plane contrarium ſtatuat. Barn. in Vita Euripid. pag. 20.

of complaiſance for the Corinthians [DD]. It is not true that there was any tacit reproach in his Palamedes, with regard to the death of Socrates [EE]. I am ſurprized that ſo few Authors ſhould take notice of a particular mentioned by Euſebius [FF]. Moreri has committed ſome very groſs blunders [GG]. The beſt Edition of Euripides, is lowing reflection on the latter part of the paſſage of Valerius Maximus: Vere hæc quidem Valerius, nam quum hodie ne tres quidem verſus nedum unicus ullus ex innumeris jactabundi iſtius poetæ extemporanei verſibus ſupereſſe videatur, ſed neque ullum illorum veſtigium ad Valerii ætatem perduravit, ad quam tamen omnia Euripidis opera ſalva & integra permanſerunt, etiam poſt Valerii tempora jam mille & octingentos annos ſuperſunt plures iſtius fabulæ integræ quam omnes Æſchyli, Sophoclis, & Ariſtophanis tragœdiæ & comœdiæ ſimul ſumptæ. i. e. "Valerius had cauſe to ſay this, ſince "there are not three verſes, nor ſo much as one of that "boaſting Poet, extant at this time; nor did the leaſt "traces of them deſcend to the age in which Valerius lived: tho' all the compoſitions of Euripides "were tranſmitted ſafe and entire to it; nay, eighteen hundred years ſince Valerius's time, there are "ſtill extant more entire Dramatic Pieces of this Poet, "than all the Tragedies and Comedies of Æſchylus, "Sophocles and Ariſtophanes put together." Methinks two things might be cenſured in the abovementioned paſſage. The one is, that as Valerius Maximus lived under Tiberius, it could not be ſaid in 1694, that he flouriſhed eighteen hundred years ago. The other is, that there are extant, ſeven of Æſchylus's Tragedies, as many of Sophocles's, and eleven Comedies of Ariſtophanes. Now all theſe added together amount to above twenty, the number of Euripides's Tragedies which have been tranſmitted to us.

[DD] He is accuſed of ſlandering Medea, out of complaiſance for the Corinthians.] We are told that Medea's children were killed by the Corinthians; and that theſe, a long time after, prevailed with Euripides to give out, that ſhe herſelf had killed them. It is added, that by means of the great reputation of this Poet, fiction got the better of truth (164; and that the city of Corinth diſcharged itſelf of the infamy of its crime, on the memory of innocent Medea. The Author I cite, aſſerts, that Euripides was prevailed upon to transfer this ſlander, merely at the requeſt of the Corinthians? but others affirm that it coſt them five talents. They gave this ſum to Euripides, if Parmeniſcus may be credited (165). Several Authors ſay, that Medea did not kill her children; but that, on the contrary, not having an opportunity to carry them with her when ſhe fled from Corinth, ſhe ſecured them in a temple, hoping they would there find an inviolable aſylum, but that the Corinthians murthered them in it (166). It is alledged (167), in juſtification of Euripides, that he was not the firſt who charged Medea with murthering her children, ſince Carcinus (168) introduces her pleading her cauſe againſt thoſe who reproached her with this crime; and that Apollodorus (169) ſays poſitively, that ſhe killed the two ſons ſhe had by Jaſon. Of theſe two witneſſes the firſt only can be of uſe; the laſt having lived 250 years after Euripides. As for Carcinus, he lived before our Poet, and had a ſon, Xenocles by name, who diſputed for the palm in Tragedy, againſt Euripides (170).

[EE] It is not true, that there was any tacit reproach in his Palamedes, with regard to the death of Socrates.] The moſt uniform opinion of Authors with regard to the age of Euripides is, that he was born the firſt year of the 75th Olympiad, and lived about 75 years. His death therefore muſt be fixed under the 93d Olympiad, as Suidas has done. Now it is certain, that Socrates did not die till the 95th Olympiad; and therefore Euripides could not reproach the Athenians with putting this Philoſopher to death. The Reader muſt obſerve, that Diodorus Siculus having ſaid that Apollodorus fixed Euripides's death to the ſame year with that of Sophocles, that is, the third year of the 93d Olympiad, adds, that according to others, Euripides had been tore to pieces by dogs in Macedonia, ſome time before (171). I alſo intreat the Reader to take notice of the following words of Tanaquil Faber (172); I am very well aſſured that Ariſtophanes exhibited his Comedy intitled the Frogs, in this ſame Olympiad 92; and that he ſpeaks in that Play, of Eupides, as of a man who was dead. Samuel Petit (173) pretends to prove that this play was exhibited the third year of the 93d Olpmpiad, which is ſufficient for my purpoſe. I add that the anonymous writer, who has given us the deſcription of the Olympiads, fixes to the 91ſt Olympiad, the conteſt between Euripides and Xenocles, on which occaſion the Palamedes was one of the four dramatick pieces given in by Euripides (174). Add to this, the authority of Philocorus, who had written a Life apart of Euripides (175). He ſays in expreſs terms, that Socrates's execution happened after the death of this great Poet (176); and yet writers have ventured to declare, and this many ages ſince, that Euripides drew tears from all the ſpectators, by introducing two verſes in his Palamedes, hinting at Socrates's death. Ὅθεν λοιπὸν ἐκέλευσαν μηδένα δημοσίᾳ, οἷον ἐν κοινῷ θεάτρῳ, λέγειν περὶ Σωκράτους. ἀμέλει λέγεταί τι τοιοῦτον, ὡς ὅτι Εὐριπίδου βουλομένου εἰπεῖν περὶ αὐτοῦ, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο, ἀναπλάσασθαι Παλαμήδην, ἵνα διὰ τούτου σχοίη καιρὸν καὶ αἰνίξασθαι εἰς τὸν Σωκράτην, καὶ εἰς τοὺς Ἀθηναίους ἐκάνετε τὸν Ἕλληνων τὸν ἄριστον, ὃ ἐστιν, ἐφονεύσατε. καὶ νοῆσαν, τὸ θέατρον ἅπαν ἐδάκρυσε, διότι περὶ Σωκράτους ἡνίττετο (177). i. e. "Hence they commanded, that thenceforward, "no one ſhould ſpeak publickly, or on the ſtage, concerning Socrates, but yet it is related that this was "done; for Euripides, deſirous of ſaying ſomething "about him, and being afraid at the ſame time of "doing it, wrote his Palamedes, in order that under "this character, he might have an opportunity of "glancing at Socrates's death, and at the conduct of "the Athenians, in the following words. Ye have "murthered, ye have murthered, the beſt man among "the Greeks. The audience perceiving that theſe "words were meant of Socrates, burſt all into tears." Diogenes Laertius (178) has related in few words, the moſt conſiderable part of this falſe incident. Several of the moſt learned men among the Moderns (179) have received it as true.

By the true date of Euripides's death, Cœlius Rhodiginus may be convicted of a notorious falſhood. He ſays (180), that the Play of Cockals contained a number which roſe to forty, and was called Euripides; and gives this reaſon for it, viz. that Euripides was one of the forty Magiſtrates ſettled in Athens after the expulſion of the thirty tyrants. But how could he be one of thoſe forty, ſince he died before Lyſander had ſeized upon Athens. Charles Stephens, Lloyd and Hofman have adopted this whole error of Rhodiginus.

[FF] I am ſurprized that ſo few Authors ſhould take notice of a particular mentioned by Euſebius.] It muſt be imagined, one might conclude from thence, that Euripides had an apartment in the citadel of Athens, and a penſion from the publick. I will quote Oenomaus's words, on which the Learned may make what Commentary they pleaſe. Εἰ μὲν δὴ ὁ κρότος ἱκανὸς κριτὴς, καὶ ἡ ἐν Ἀκροπόλει τράπεζα, ἐδὲν ἔτι λέγω, βλέπων ἐν Ἀκροπόλει δειπνοῦντα τὸν Εὐριπίδην, καὶ τὸν Ἀθηναίων ἅμα καὶ τὸν Μακεδόνων δῆμον ἐπιψοφοῦντα. i. e. "If therefore theſe "applauſes, or his being allowed a table in the citadel are proper authorities on this occaſion, I have "nothing farther to add: for I my ſelf have known "Euripides to ſup in the citadel, and to have received "the applauſes both of the Athenians and Macedonians."

[GG] Moreri has committed ſome very groſs blunders.] I. He ſhould not have ſaid, that our Poet was called the tragic Philoſopher, but the ſtage Philoſopher. II. Inſtead of aſſuring that he was born in Phlia (182), he ſhould have ſaid in the iſland of Salamis. III. Since he was born the firſt year of the 75th Olympiad, it is abſurd to ſay, that he lived in that Olympiad: for ſuch an expreſſion is employed to denote the time in which a man is moſt eminent. IV. I have already obſerved (183) the error of thoſe who ſend him into Egypt with Plato. V. And who obſerve in particular, that he went thither after he had finiſhed his courſe of Rhetorick. VI. It would be very difficult to prove, that Decamnichus brought Euripides to his end. The Authors who have preſerved the names of thoſe who are accuſed of ſetting the dogs upon him, do not once name this Decamnichus, and I therefore wonder why

(164) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 5. cap. 21.

(165) Apud Scholiaſten Euripidis, in Medeam, ver. 9. Barnes aſſerts, pag. 15. that Plutarch, in the Life of Alexander, ſays the ſame thing, copying it from Parmeniſcus. I have not met with this in Plutarch.

(166) Parmeniſcus and Didymus, apud Scholiaſten. Euripid. ibid. ver. 273. Didymus quotes Creophylus. See Ælian, Var. Hiſt. lib. 5. cap. 21. and Apollodorus, Bibliotth. lib. 1.

(167) Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 15.

(168) Apud Ariſtotel. Rhetor. lib. 2. cap. 23. pag. 447.

(169) Bibliotb. lib. 1.

(170) Barneſ. in Vita Euripid. pag. 15.

(171) Diod. Sicul. lib. 13. cap. 103. pag. m. 554.

(172) Vie des Poet. Grecs, pag. 85.

173) Miſcell. b. 1. cap. 14.

(174) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 8. where we muſt read ἐννεκοσῶν and not ἕκτην, and then it will be found the 91ſt Olympiad. See Schefferus in hunc locum Æliani.

(175) Suidas in Φιλόκορος.

(176) Apud Diogen. Laert. lib. 2. in Socrate, num. 44.

(177) Anonymus in Argumento Orationis Iſocratis cui titulus Buſiris, pag. m. 322.

(178) Lib. 2. in Socrate, num. 44.

(179) Daniel Heinſius, among others, in Dedicat. Tragœd. Senecæ, apud Barneſ. pag. 15.

(180) Antiq. Lection. lib. 20. cap. 27. pag. m. 1135. Barnes, pag. 23. has cenſured this blunder, which he aſcribes, not only to Rhodiginus, but alſo to Euſtathius in Homer, folio 1289, lin. 61.

(181) Oenomaus, apud Euſebium, de Præparat. Evangel. lib. 5. cap. 23. pag. 228.

(182) See the remark [A].

(183) In the note [S].

is that of Joſhua Barnes of Cambridge, printed anno 1694, in folio [HH].

Tanaquil Faber fixed only on that name. VII. Be this as it will, the vengeance which Decamnichus took on Euripides ſhould not have been placed after Archelaus's death. Tanaquil Faber took care not to fall into this error; had Moreri been a faithful Copyiſt, he would have done the ſame thing; for it is certain that Euripides died ſome years before this Prince. VIII. To ſay that Euripides died at about 75 years of age, in the 93*d Olympiad, after having ſaid that he lived in the* 75*th Olympiad*, betrays an ignorance of even the rudiments of his Profeſſion and thoſe of Arithmetick. The worſt hiſtorians will never ſay that a man who lives in the 75th Olympiad, that is, who is then in his flouriſhing ſtate, and who dies in the 93d Olympiad, dies at about 75 years of age. Such a man muſt have lived a whole Century at leaſt. IX. He ought not to have ſaid, that this Poet retired, after the year 338 of Rome, to the court of Archelaus King of Macedon: for ſince he was obliged to ſay, that Euripides died the year 348 of Rome, he engaged himſelf to aſſert, that he ſpent about ten years in the Macedonian Court, a falſity which is condemned by all Authors, ſince they declare that Euripides reſided but about three years in Archelaus's court. And we have ſeen (184), that at 69 years of age he exhibited his Oreſtes at Athens. X. The citation of Diodorus Siculus l. 13, and that of Aulus Gellius l. 11. c. 4, are quite unneceſſary.

(184) The remark [S] citation (123), above.

[HH] The beſt Edition of Euripides, is that of Joſhua Barnes of Cambridge, printed anno 1694, in folio.] This Editor added Scholia to it, and all the fragments he could meet with. He has illuſtrated many things by very learned notes, and prefixed a Life of Euripides abounding with erudition.

(185) Geſner. in Biblioth. folio 229, verſo.

I muſt ſpeak a word or two of ſome of the preceding Editions. Geſner (185) obſerves, that the firſt Edition of eighteen Tragedies of Euripides is that of Aldus Manutius at Venice. It is in Greek only, and he does not ſpecify either the year or the ſize of it. I know from another hand, that Aldus printed this Poet without a Latin verſion, anno 1503, in 8°. Hervagius reprinted this edition at Baſil, anno 1537, in 8°; as alſo in 1544, and 1551 (186), A literal Latin verſion was added to it in the Edition at Baſil, printed by Robert Winter anno 1541 (187). The Tranſlator diſguiſed his true name under that of Dorotheus Camillus (188). John Oporinus printed an Edition of Euripides in folio, anno 1562, both in Greek and Latin, which includes the notes and prefaces of Gaſpar Stiblinus, the Prolegomena of James Micyllus, and ſome remarks of John Brodæus. Plantin's Edition in 16°, printed at Antwerp anno 1571, has one advantage which was wanting in the preceding ones; the verſes are diſtinguiſhed, and every one is placed in its proper line, according to its due length and meaſure. This diviſion was made by William Canterus. Paul Stephens publiſhed Euripides both in Greek and Latin, with the antient Scholiaſt, and the Commentaries of Brodæus, Canterus, Stiblinus and Portus, anno 1602, in 4to. The edition I make uſe of, was printed at Heidelberg; for Jerom Commelinus, 1597, 8vo. It is in Greek and Latin, and the verſes are ranged in the order in which Canterus placed them. The Tranſlation was reviſed by Æmilius Portus; and, to the nineteen Tragedies of Euripides, the beginning of the twentieth intitled Danae was added. Some Tragedies tranſlated by different hands, have been printed ſeparately. Four (189) were printed at Antwerp, in 1581, and tranſlated into Latin verſe by Ratallerus. Eraſmus tranſlated in Iambicks the Hecuba and Iphigenia in Tauris, and this verſion was printed at Venice, by Aldus, anno 1507, in 8vo. Florens Chriſtianus tranſlated the Andromache and the Cyclops in Latin verſe.

(186) See the Catalogue of Nicholas Heinſius's Library, Part. 2. pag. 118.

(187) Geſner. Biblioth. folio, 229, verſo.

(188) Idem, ibid.

(189) Viz. Phœniſſæ, Hippolytus, Coronatus, and Andromacha.

EUROPA, the daughter of Agenor (a) King of Tyre. The Poets have feigned, that Jupiter aſſumed the ſhape of a bull, in order to ſteal that Princeſs, and that he carried her into the iſland of Crete (b), where he had three ſons by her. Thoſe writers who endeavour to reduce as near as poſſible, the fables of Poets to hiſtorical truths, relate that Taurus, General of the forces of Aſterius King of Crete, having taken the city of Tyre, and plundered it, carried off a great number of female priſoners, and among the reſt Europa the King's daughter [A]. She married Aſterius, who having no children by her, adopted thoſe which ſhe had had by her Gallant [B]. It was pretended that Jupiter enjoyed her the firſt time, under a Plane-Tree [C], which from that time had a very

(a) According to others, ſhe was daughter of Phœnix. Apollodor. lib. 3. init.

(b) See Ovid's Metam. lib. 2. Fab. 13. ver. 835, & ſeq.

[A] Taurus, General of the forces . . . carried off . . . Europa the King's daughter.] I have followed Meurſius's ſentiment, although I have ſeen it corroborated only by the teſtimony of Tzetzes (1), and though a great number of Authors aſſert, that Taurus was King of Crete. This title is beſtowed upon him by the Chronicum Alexandrinum, Euſtathius and Cedrenus (2). Be this as it will, whether Taurus was King of Crete or General of the forces of that Monarch, he waged war with Agenor, diſpoſſeſſed him of the city of Tyre, of Europa his daughter &c. (3). He was born in Gnoſſus a city of Crete (4), and built the city of Gortys in this iſland (5). He called it by his mother's name.

(1) In Lycophronem, apud Meurſium in Creta, pag. 125.

(2) Apud Meurſium, ibid. pag. 251.

(3) Chro. Alexandrinum, Palæphatus, (cap. 16.) Euſtathius ad Dionyſ. Cedrenus, apud Meurſium, ibid.

(4) Palæphat. & Tzetzes, ibid.

(5) Chronic. Alexand. Euſtathius, Cedrenus, apud Meurſium, ibid.

[B] Aſterius . . . . having no children by her, adopted thoſe which ſhe had had by her gallant.] It is ſuſpected (6), and juſtly, that he was but a child when Europa was ſtole away by Jupiter. When he married her, ſhe was the mother of Minos, of Rhadamanthus, and of Sarpedon, three ſons whom ſhe had brought to Jupiter. Aſterius adopted them, and left his kingdom to Minos. This is what we find in Diodorus Siculus (7), and we meet with much the ſame in the third Book of Apollodorus. It is true indeed, that the Prince who married her is called Aſterion, and not Aſterius. In Euſebius's Chronicon, theſe three children are not the ſons of Jupiter and Europa, but of Aſterius and Europa; of Aſterius, I ſay, who married her after Jupiter had enjoyed her. According to St. Auſtin, Xanthus King of Crete carried off Europa, who brought him Rhadamanthus, Sarpedon and Minos. He owns that this Monarch was called by other names: Per eos annos, ſays he (8), à Rege Xantho Cretenſium, cujus apud alios aliud nomen invenimus, rapta perhibetur Europa, & inde geniti Rhadamanthus, Sarpedon & Minos, quos magis ex eadem muliere filios Jovis eſſe vulgatum eſt. Nonnus pretends that Jupiter, having got Europa with child, married her big as ſhe was, to a very rich man, viz. Aſterion.

(6) Meurſius, ibid. pag. 124.

(7) Diod. Sicul. lib. 4. cap. 62.

(8) Auguſt. de Civitat. Dei, lib. 18. cap. 12.

Καὶ ζαθέης ὠδῖνος ἐὴν ἐγκύμονα νύμφην
Κάλλιπεν Ἀσιρίωνι βαθυπλήτῳ παρακοίτῃ
Ζεὺς πόσις (9).

That is,

" Great Jove reſigned the Fair by him compreſſed,
" And big with heavenly ſeed, to rich Aſterion.

(9) Nonnus, Dionyſ. lib. 1. ver. 353.

This is very frequently the conduct of Kings: they marry to very rich men the ladies whom they have enjoyed as much as they pleaſed. Lycophron (10) inſinuates, that Europa was carried off for Aſterion's ſake.

(10) In Caſſandra, ver. 1300.

[C] It is pretended that Jupiter enjoyed her . . . under a Plane-Tree.] I believe that Theophraſtus and Pliny are the only ancient authors that can be cited. Eſt Gortynæ in inſula Creta, ſays Pliny (11), juxta fontem Platanus una, inſignis utriuſque linguæ monumentis, nunquam folia dimittens: ſtatimque ei Græciæ fabuloſitas ſuperfuit, Jovem ſub ea cum Europa concubuiſſe: ceu vero non alia ejuſdem generis eſſet in Cypro. Sed ex ea primum in ipſa Creta (ut eſt natura hominum novitatis avida) Platani ſatæ regeneravere vitium: quandoquidem commendatio arboris ejus non alia major eſt quam ſolem æſtate arcere, hyeme admittere. One might conclude very peculiar privilege, which was its preſerving its beautiful foliage all the year round. It is alſo related that Europa having loſt her virginity, went immediately and bathed in a certain water which had a marvelous property [D].

(11) Plin. lib. 12 cap. 1.

clude from the expreſſions of Theophraſtus, that Europa was on this tree when Jupiter dallied with her, the firſt time; and we are told that ſome medals favour this explication. Ἐν Κρήτῃ δὲ λέγεται Πλατάνου τινα εἶναι ἐν τῇ Γορτυναίᾳ πρὸς πηγῇ τινι ἣ ἐ φυλλοβολεῖ. μυθολογοῦσι δὲ ὡς ἐπὶ ταύτῃ ἐμίγη τῇ Εὐρώπῃ ὁ Ζεύς (12). But to wave this, let us conſider Pliny's words. I own I do not comprehend the whole force of them. He obſerves very ingeniouſly, that the fabulous Greeks did not go out of their character, when they ſaw a plane-tree of ſo very ſingular a nature, but immediately raiſed fictions on it; they ſuppoſing that the only reaſon why the tree in queſtion had been indulged this privilege was, becauſe it had bent its ſhade to the greateſt of the Gods, whilſt he was cropping a virgin flower. Pliny refutes this chimæra, by obſerving that here was another plane-tree in this iſland of Cyprus, which reſembled it exactly. So far every thing is very eaſy: but he adds, that people were deſirous of having ſlips from this plane tree, firſt, in various places of the iſland of Crete, and afterwards in Italy, and that the plane-trees which ſprung from the tree in queſtion, propagated the ill quality or defect; for the moſt valuable property of this tree is, its repelling the ſun-beams in ſummer, and admitting them in winter. Here is a thought in Pliny which appears very much confuſed to me. I ſuppoſe the reaſon of this is, becauſe I don't underſtand it; for it perhaps is very beautiful and witty. The moſt natural ſenſe I can find is this. All the plane-trees which ſprung from this had the ſame imperfection, viz. to never caſt their foliage: they were deprived of the chief perfection of which this ſort of trees boaſt, viz. that they had not the property to admit the rays of the ſun in winter, and to be impervious to them in the ſummer. But I find too great inconveniencies in ſuppoſing this to be the meaning of Pliny's words: firſt, that it is not probable there ever were in the iſland of Crete, and in Italy, ſeveral plane-trees which preſerved their verdure all the year round: ſecondly, that it does not ſeem to be a perfection in a plant, to ſhed its leaves in winter. Was not the laurel made the ſymbol of victory becauſe it does not enjoy this pretended perfection? Of what uſe can it be, for a tree not to be cloathed with leaves during the inclement ſeaſon of the year? Is it becauſe one may ſit under its branches without being deprived of the heat of the ſun? But what people are ſo ſtupid, as to go, in cold weather, and ſeat themſelves in the ſun, under a tree full of branches? Do we not look for a wall or a hedge which, on one ſide, may ſcreen us from the wind; and, on the other, may admit the ſolar beams? Doubtleſs du Pinet was ſenſible of this difficulty, but then, inſtead of attempting to clear it up, he paſſes it over. Here follows the Engliſh of his verſion. In Gortina, a city in the iſland of Crete, is ſeen another plane-tree, ſtanding near a very fine fountain, on which account it is very much celebrated both by the Greeks and Romans. For this plane tree is always green, in winter as well as ſummer: ſo that the Poets, who never ſuffer any thing to eſcape them, ſay that this was the plane-tree under which Jupiter got Princeſs Europa's maidenhead: as tho' there were no other plane-trees, of the ſame nature with this, in the iſland of Cyprus. But as mankind are always fond of novelty, the Cretans, deſirous of having ſome ſhoots from this plane-tree, replanted ſcyons of it in ſeveral places. And finding that theſe tranſplanted plane-trees only kept off the ſun's heat in ſummer, but ſhed their foliage in winter, they were confirmed in their opinion concerning the deflowring of Europa.

(12) Theophraſt. Hiſtor. Plantar. lib. 1. cap. 15. pag. m. 16. Ἐπὶ ταύτῃ. Here is father Hardouin's note, Ubi ἐπὶ ἀντὶ τοῦ ὑπὸ dictum: etſi arbori inſidere ipſi Europa videtur in numero ΓΟΡΤΥΝΙΩΝ apud Ant. Auguſt. Dial. 3. pag. 85. Harduin. in Plin. lib. 12. cap. 1. pag. 7. tom. 3.

[D] It is related that Europa, . . . went and bath'd in a certain water which had a marvelous property.] I have been forced to employ the word Water, becauſe the Authors who inform us of this incident, don't make uſe either of the word river, or that of fountain; and hence it is that the learned Meurſius ſpeaks of this water, at the end of the catalogue of rivers and fountains in the iſland of Crete. Et hi quidem fontes pariter fluviique in hac inſula memorantur, ſays he (13), præter quos & aqua fuit, cui ſi qui pluviæ tempore inſiderent, illi ſicci permanebant. Solion, de Flum. Ἐν Κρήτῃ ὀχετὸς ὕδατός ἐστιν, ὃν οἱ διαβαίνοντες, ὑοντος τοῦ Διὸς, ἄβροχοι διαβαίνουσιν, ἐφ' ὅσον ἐν τῷ ὀχετῷ εἰσιν. In Creta aquæ rivus eſt, quem qui tranſeunt, pluente Jove, ſicci tranſeunt, quamdiu quidem ſunt in rivo. Et Europa, poſt concubitum cum Jove, ea lota ferebatur. Antigonus Caryſtius, Hiſt. Mirab. cap. 129. Καὶ περὶ τοῦ κατὰ τὴν Κρήτην ὑδατίου, ᾧ οἱ ὑπερκαθίζοντες, ὅταν ὑετὸς ᾖ, διατελοῦσιν ἄβροχοι. παραδεδόαζι δὲ τοῖς Κρησὶν, ἀπ' ἐκείνου λελοῦσθαι τὴν Εὐρώπην, ἀπὸ τῆς τοῦ Διὸς μείξεως. Item de aqua in Creta, cui inſidentes, dum pluit, ſicci manent: ac tradi apud Cretenſes, eâ ſe Europam quondam abluiſſe, poſtquam cum Jove rem habuiſſet. As many of my readers do not underſtand Latin, I muſt inform ſuch of the privileges of this water, viz. that thoſe who went into it whilſt it rain'd, did not wet themſelves. The Authors cited by Meurſius do not ſay, that Jupiter granted this privilege in conſideration of the ſervice which this water had done Europa, or rather in conſideration of the honour which Europa had deigned to do this water; however, there is no doubt but that the inhabitants of Crete had recourſe to this cauſe. I am ſurprized that we are not told exactly the place where this water was; for ſince people knew where the plane-tree ſtood under which this amorous myſtery was ſolemnized (14), they ought to have known the place where Europa waſhed herſelf after the ſport was over. I conclude with obſerving, that Europa came into the iſland of Crete, by the mouth of the river which flowed to Gortys. Gortynam amnis Lethæus præterfluit: quo Europam tauri dorſo Gortynii ferunt vectitatam. i. e. "The river Lethe paſſes "by Gortyna, whither we are told Europa was car- "ried on a bull's back (15)."

(13) Meurſ. in Creta, pag. 92.

(14) Eſt Gortynæ in inſula Creta JUXTA FONTEM platanus una, &c. Plin. lib. 13. cap. 1. See above, the remark [C], citation (11).

(15) Solin. cap. 11.

☞EUSEBIUS, ſurnamed Pamphilus [A], Biſhop of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, and an eminent Chriſtian Writer in the fourth Century, was born in Paleſtine [B], about the latter end of the reign of Gallienus [C]. He was ordained Prieſt by Agapius, Biſhop of Cæſarea,

(1) Cave, Hiſt. Literar. pag. 111. edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1720. See likewiſe Suidas in Voce Εὐσέβιος, and Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiq. tom. 2. pag. 11. edit. de Paris 1693, in 4to.

(2) Hen. Valeſius de Vita & Scriptis Euſebii, prefixed to his edition of Euſebius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſt.

(3) De Vitâ Conſtantini, lib. 1.

(4) Ibid. lib. 2.

[A] Surnamed Pamphilus.] He was called ſo from his intimate friendſhip with Pamphilus the Martyr. Ab arctiſſimâ, quæ illi cum Pamphilo Martyre interceſſit, amicitiâ, Pamphili cognomen ſortitus eſt (1).

[B] Was born in Paleſtine.] All the ancients call him Euſebius of Paleſtine. And tho' he might have been called ſo from his being Biſhop of Cæſarea; yet it ſeems more probable, that he had that ſurname from his country (2). He tells us himſelf (3), that he was educated in Paleſtine, and ſaw Conſtantine there, whilſt he travelled thro' Paleſtine in the retinue of Dioletianus Auguſtus. And in another place (4), where he mentions a law of Conſtantine's, which he wrote to the people of Paleſtine in favour of the Chriſtians, he plainly diſcovers himſelf to be of that Country; for after he has recited the contents of that law, he adds, Theſe were the conſtitutions contained in the Emperor's firſt Edict to us. Τὸ μὲν δὴ πρῶτον ὡς ἡμᾶς καταπεμφθὲν βασιλέως γράμμα, ταῦτα διετάττετο. Dr. Cave (5) thinks it probable, that he was born at Cæſarea. We have no account who were his parents. Some have imagined, that he was related to Euſebius of Nicomedia, becauſe in a Letter of Arius to that Biſhop, Euſebius of Cæſarea is ſtiled his brother. We cannot tell likewiſe who were his maſters. In his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (6) he tells us, that he had heard Dorotheus the Eunuch, a Preſbyter of Antioch, explaining the Scriptures. From which Trithemius and others conclude, that he was a ſcholar of Dorotheus.

(5) Ubi ſupra.

(6) Lib. 7.

[C] About the latter end of the reign of Gallienus.] In his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (7) he tells us, that Dionyſius Biſhop of Alexandria lived in his time. Now ſince it is certain, that Dionyſius died in the twelfth year of the reign of Gallienus, Euſebius muſt of neceſſity

(7) Lib. 3. cap. 28.

Cæſarea, where he contracted an intimate friendſhip with Pamphilus one of the eminent Preſbyters of that church, who having founded a ſchool at Cæſarea, our author ſeems to have been firſt Maſter of it (a). Monſieur Du Pin aſſerts (b), that it was Euſebius who eſtabliſhed this ſchool. During the perſecution under the Emperor Diocleſian, he exhorted the Chriſtians at Cæſarea to ſuffer reſolutely for the Faith of Chriſt, and particularly aſſiſted his friend Pamphilus, who ſuffered martyrdom after two years impriſonment (c). In the time of the ſame perſecution, on account of ſome urgent buſineſs of the church, as it is probable, he went to Tyre (d), where he tells us (e) that he was an eye-witneſs of the glorious combats of the five Egyptian Martyrs. He was likewiſe in Egypt and Thebais, where he ſaw the admirable conſtancy of many Martyrs of both ſexes (f). He has been reproached with having offered incenſe to idols in this perſecution, in order to free himſelf from priſon; but this imputation is groundleſs [D]. When the perſecution was abated, and peace reſtored to the Church, he was elected Biſhop of Cæſarea in the room of Agapius in the year 313 or 314 [E]. He had afterwards a conſiderable ſhare in the conteſt relating to Arius, Prieſt of Alexandria, whoſe cauſe he, as well as ſeveral other Biſhops of Paleſtine, defended at firſt, being perſuaded that Arius had been unjuſtly perſecuted by Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria. He not only wrote to that Biſhop in favour of Arius, but likewiſe not being able to procure him to be reſtored, he permitted him and his followers to preſerve their rank, and to hold in their churches, the ordinary Aſſemblies of the Faithful on condition that they ſhould ſubmit to their Biſhop, and intreat him to reſtore them to communion. He aſſiſted at the Council of Nice in Bithynia, held in the year 325, and made a ſpeech to the Emperor Conſtantine, when he came to the Council, and was placed next him on the right hand. He at firſt refuſed to admit of the term Ὁμοούσιος Conſubſtantial in the Creed; but at length conſented, and ſubſcribed the Nicene Creed [F]. About the year 330 he was preſent at the Council of (a) Henr. Valeſius, de Vitâ & Scriptis Euſebii, prefixed to his edition of Euſebius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

(b) Nouvelle Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. tom. 2. pag. 1. edit. de Paris 1693, in 4to.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Valeſius, ubi ſupra.

(e) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 8. cap. 7.

(f) Ibid. cap. 9.

ceſſity have been born then, if his age fell in thoſe times, in which Dionyſius lived. The ſame may likewiſe be proved from the Vth Book of that Hiſtory, about the end of it, where ſpeaking concerning Artemon's hereſy, he writes that Paulus Samoſatenus had revived that hereſy in his age. And in the VIIth Book C. 26. relating thoſe things, which happened during the reign of Gallienus, before he begins his diſcourſe concerning the Hereſy and Condemnation of Paulus Samoſatenus; he has theſe words: Ἀλλὰ γὰρ ἤδη μετὰ τὴν περὶ τουτῶν ἱστορίαν, φέρε καὶ τὴν καθ' ἡμᾶς τοῖς μετέπειτα γνωρίζειν γενὰν οἵα τις ἦν, παραδῶμεν. i. e. "But now, after "an hiſtorical narration of theſe things, we will exhi- "bit to the knowledge of poſterity an account of our "own age." Dr. Cave (8) ſuppoſes, that he was born about the year 270; but Du Pin (9) is of opinion that it was about the year 264.

(8) Ubi ſupra.

(9) Tom. 2. pag. 371.

[D] He has been reproached with having offered incenſe to idols in this perſecution, in order to free himſelf from priſon; but this imputation is groundleſs.] This reproach was caſt upon him by Potamon, a Confeſſor, and Biſhop of Heraclea, at the Council of Tyre; for if we believe Epiphanius (10), that Biſhop ſeeing Euſebius ſitting in the Council, cried out, Is it fit, Euſebius, that you ſhould ſit, and that the innocent Athanaſius ſhould ſtand to be judged by you? Who can bear ſuch things as theſe? Tell me, were not you in priſon with me during the time of the perſecution? I loſt an eye in defence of the truth; but you are maimed in no part of your body, nor did you ſuffer martyrdom, but are whole and alive. By what means did you eſcape out of priſon? Unleſs you promiſed our perſecutors, that you would do the deteſtable thing (11), and perhaps have done it? Epiphanius adds, that Euſebius hearing this, roſe, and broke up the Aſſembly, ſaying, "If, when "you are out of your own country, you ſay ſuch "things againſt us, it is certain, that your accuſers "muſt be in the right; for if you exerciſe your tyran- "ny here, you will do it with much more aſſurance in "your own country." The Biſhops likewiſe of the Council of Alexandria affirm in their Letter, that Euſebius of Cæſarea had been accuſed by their Confeſſors of having ſacrificed to idols. Valeſius obſerves upon this (12), that it appears from the paſſage of Epiphanius above cited, that thoſe perſons are miſtaken, who relate that our Author had ſacrificed to idols, and that it was openly objected to him in the Council of Tyre; ſince Potamon did not charge him with ſacrificing to idols; but grounded his ſuſpicions on his being diſmiſſed out of priſon ſafe and whole. It is poſſible, that Euſebius might de diſcharged for ſome other reaſons than that mentioned by Potamon. And it would be judging very raſhly, as Du Pin obſerves (13), to accuſe a Biſhop of ſo great a crime upon a ſlight pretence. Beſides, ſays Dr. Cave (14), if he had actually ſacrificed, the diſcipline of the Church was then ſo rigid, that he would have been degraded from his orders, at leaſt he would never have been advanced to the Epiſcopal Dignity. Quid? quod ſi immolâſſet, ex rigida iſtius temporis Diſciplinâ, omni clericali gradu excidiſſet, certe ad ſuperiorem ordinem neutiquam promovendus.

(10) Hæreſ. 68.

(11) Τὸ ἀθέμιτον πρᾶξαι.

(12) De Vita & Scriptis Euſebii.

(13) Pag. 12.

(14) Pag. 112.

[E] He was elected Biſhop of Cæſarea in the room of Agapius in the year 313 or 314.] Baronius (15) and Blondel (16) place between Agapius and our Author, Agricolaus, whoſe name we read in the Subſcriptions of the Council of Ancyra held in the year 315. But theſe Subſcriptions appear to have but little authority and validity in them, ſince they do not occur in the Greek copies, or in the Latin Verſion of Dionyſius Exiguus (17). Beſides, Euſebius (18) reckoning up the Biſhops of the chief Sees, under whom the perſecution began and raged, concludes with Agapius Biſhop of Cæſarea, who, ſays he, took great pains in that perſecution for the good of his own Church. He muſt therefore neceſſarily have continued Biſhop till the end of that perſecution. Now Euſebius was elected Biſhop immediately after the perſecution; for he aſſiſted as Biſhop at the Dedication of the Church of Tyre, which was performed as ſoon as peace was reſtored to the Church, before Licinius had taken up arms againſt Conſtantine; which happened in the year 315. So that if there was one Agricolaus Biſhop of Cæſarea, he muſt have held the See a very ſhort time, and Euſebius muſt have been elected about the year 314.

(15) Annal. ad ann. 314.

(16) In Apolog. pro ſententia B. Hieronymi, cap. 19.

(17) Valeſius, ubi ſupra.

(18) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 7. cap. 32.

[F] He at firſt refuſed to admit of the term Ὁμοούσιος Conſubſtantial in the Creed; but at length conſented, and ſubſcribed the Nicene Creed.] Socrates (19) and Theodoret (20) inform us, that he long held out againſt the uſe of the word Conſubſtantial. He offered, as Monſr. le Clerc obſerves (21), another Confeſſion of Faith, wherein it was omitted, and the Son ſtiled only, God born of God, Light of Light, Life of Life, Only Son, Firſt-born of all creatures, Begotten of his Father before all Worlds. The Emperor approved of this Confeſſion of Faith, and exhorted the Fathers of the Council to follow it, only adding to it the word Conſubſtantial. Afterwards a Confeſſion was read, which had been drawn up with this word; and anathema's were added to it againſt thoſe, who ſhould uſe on this occaſion other terms than thoſe of the holy Scripture; which muſt be underſtood, ſays le Clerc, with an exception of thoſe, which the Council thought fit to conſecrate. This propoſition was particularly condemned, That the Son exiſted not before he was begotten. Euſebius and others requeſted (22), that the terms of the Creed and anathema's

(19) Hiſt. Eccl. lib. 1. cap. 8.

(20) Lib. 1. cap. 12.

(21) Biblioth. Univerſelle & Hiſtorique, tom. 10.

(22) Vide Euſebij Epiſtol. ad Cæſarienſ. apud Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 8.

of Antioch, in which Euſtathius Biſhop of that city was depoſed [G]; but though our Author conſented to his depoſition, and was choſen by the Biſhops and people to the See of Antioch in his room, he abſolutely refuſed it; and when the Biſhops wrote to Conſtantine to deſire him to oblige Euſebius to conſent to the election, he wrote alſo to the Emperor to requeſt him, that he would not urge him to accept of it; which Conſtantine readily granted, and commended his moderation. Euſebius conſtantly adhered to the party of Euſebius of Nicomedia, and aſſiſted at the Council of Tyre held in 335 againſt Athanaſius, and at the Aſſembly of Biſhops at Jeruſalem at the time of the dedication of the Church there; and was ſent by theſe Biſhops to the Emperor Conſtantine to defend what they had done againſt Athanaſius. It was then that he pronounced his Panegyric upon that Emperor, during the public rejoicings in the beginning of the thirtieth year of his reign, which was the laſt of his life. He did not long ſurvive Conſtantine, who was honoured with very particular marks of his eſteem [H], for he died about the year 338, according to Du Pin (g), or 340, according to Valeſius (b). He wrote ſeveral works full of uſeful learning [I]. Photius tells us (i), that his ſtyle is not agreeable nor polite, but

(g) Pag. 2.
(b) Ubi ſupra.
(i) Biblioth. Cod. 13.

thema's might be explained. It was ſaid, 1. That the words, Begotten, and not made, were uſed, becauſe the laſt words expreſs the production of creatures, to which the Son has no likeneſs, being of a ſubſtance far more excellent than they, begotten of the Father in an incomprehenſible manner. 2. As for the word Conſubſtantial, it is proper to the Son, not in the ſenſe wherein it is taken, when we ſpeak of bodies or mortal creatures, the Son being conſubſtantial with the Father, neither by a diviſion of the divine ſubſtance, of which he poſſeſſes a part, nor by any change of this ſame ſubſtance. The meaning of it is only this, that the Son has no reſemblance with the creatures, which he has made; but that he is in all things like to his Father, by whom he has been begotten; or that he is not of another hypoſtaſis or ſubſtance, but of that of the Father. 3. Thoſe were condemned, who ſaid, that the Son was not before he was born, ſince he exiſted before his corporal Birth, and even before his divine Generation, according to Conſtantine's argument; For before, ſaid he, that he was actually begotten, he was in power in his Father, in a manner unbegotten, the Father having been always Father, as he is always King and Saviour, and all things in power being eternally in the ſame condition (23). Le Clerc remarks, that this will perhaps ſeem pure Arianiſm, and a denial of the eternity of the Son; but that in the ſtyle of that time, to exiſt before the world, and to be eternal, is the ſame thing, ſince to prove his Eternity (24) this paſſage is cited, In the Beginning was the Word; and it ſufficed to ſhew, that he was begotten before there was any time. Athanaſius (25), who openly treats Euſebius as an Arian, alludes to one part of this paſſage, and draws thence a conſequence, which Euſebius undoubtedly would not have owned, which is, that the Arians believed that the Divinity of Chriſt did not exiſt before his corporal Birth. After theſe explications Euſebius ſubſcribed, as he himſelf teſtifies in the Letter above cited, although he had refuſed it the day before. The long and formal oppoſition which he had made to the word Conſubſtantial occaſioned a ſuſpicion, that there was ſome inſincerity in this ſubſcription.

(23) Theſe words of Euſebius's Letter are to be found only in Theodorit, Socrates having retrenched them.

(24) Vide Epiſt. Alexand. Epiſcopi Alexandrini apud Theodorit. lib. 1. cap. 4.

(25) Decret. Nicen. tom. 1. pag. 251. apud Le Clerc, ubi ſupra.

[G] In 330 he was preſent at the Council of Antioch in which Euſtathius Biſhop of that city was depoſed.] Euſtathius accuſing Euſebius, Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre, and Patrophilus of Scythopolis, of Arianiſm; and theſe Biſhops accuſing him on the other hand with Sabellianiſm; a Synod was aſſembled at Antioch, which conſiſted of Biſhops, who had ſigned the Nicene Creed only by force, among whom were Euſebius of Cæſarea, Euſebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nice, Theodotus of Laodicea in Syria, Narciſſus of Neronius, Aetius of Lydda, Alphæus of Apamea, and Theodorus of Sidon (26). As ſoon as they arrived at Antioch, a woman of ill fame preſented herſelf to them with a little child, which ſhe declared ſhe had by Euſtathius, and deſired them to do her juſtice againſt him, as refuſing to receive his child. Euſtathius made great proteſtations of his innocency; but the woman's oath being admitted, he was depoſed. Theodorit and Sozomen affirm, that the Arian Biſhops had ſuborned that woman, to have a pretence for depoſing of Euſtathius; but that the true cauſe of his being depoſed was his adherence to the Nicene Creed. Others ſay, that it was the pretended Sabellianiſm, of which he was accuſed; and ſome have contented themſelves with ſaying, that there were other accuſations, for which he was depoſed. Whereupon Socrates (27) makes this remarkable reflection: The Biſhops are wont to deal thus with all thoſe, whom they depoſe, accuſing and declaring them impious, without ſhewing wherein. Τοῦτο δὲ ἐπὶ πάντων εἰώθασι τῶν καθαιρεμένων ποιεῖν οἱ Ἐπίσκοποι, κατηγορεῖν μὲν ὡς ἀσεβεῖς λέγοντες, τὰς δὲ αἰτίας τῆς ἀσεβείας οὐ προσιθέντες.

(26) Socrat. lib. 1. cap. 24. Theodorit. lib. 1. cap. 21. Sozom. lib. 2. cap. 19.

(27) Ubi ſupra.

[H] Conſtantine honoured him with very particular marks of his eſteem.] Euſebius frequently received Letters from him, ſeveral of which are inſerted in our Author's Books; and he was often invited to the palace, and entertained at the Emperor's table, and honoured with his private diſcourſe (28). When Conſtantine wanted copies of the Scriptures for the uſe of thoſe Churches, which he had built at Conſtantinople, he committed the care of tranſcribing them to Euſebius, whom he knew to be well ſkilled in thoſe affairs (29). And when the latter dedicated to him his Book concerning Eaſter, he ordered it immediately to be tranſlated into Latin, and in a Letter to our Author deſired him to communicate as ſoon as poſſible to thoſe, who were ſtudious in ſacred matters, the other works of that nature, which he had then in hand (30).

(28) Valeſius, ubi ſupra.

(29) Euſeb. in Vitâ Conſtant. lib. 4. cap. 36.

(30) Ibid. lib. 4. cap. 34, 35.

[I] He wrote ſeveral works full of uſeful learning.] The works, which are ſtill extant, are as follow: I, Chronicon. It is divided into two parts. The firſt part, which is at preſent extremely mutilated, contains an Hiſtory of the Chaldeans, Aſſyrians, Medes, Perſians, Lydians, Jews, Egyptians, &c. from the creation of the world. In this part he has been greatly obliged to Africanus's Chronographia. In the ſecond part, which is called Canon Chronicus, he digeſts the Hiſtory of the ſeveral Nations according to the order of time. Both parts are carried down to the Vicennalia of Conſtantine, i. e. to the year 325, in which, not long before the Council of Nice, Dr. Cave (31) ſuppoſes this work to have been finiſhed. St. Jerom tranſlated both parts into Latin (32); but we have remaining of the verſion of the firſt part only ſome extracts containing the names of the Kings, printed with the Tranſlation of the ſecond part. Dr. Cave tells us (33), that St. Jerom has interpolated his verſion in ſeveral places, eſpecially with regard to the Roman Hiſtory. It was printed at Baſil, and afterwards publiſh'd more accurately by Arnauld de Pontac Biſhop of Bazas at Bourdeaux 1604. But no perſon ever undertook to collect the Greek Fragments of the original till Joſeph Scaliger publiſh'd them at Leyden in 1606 in fol. under the following title, Theſaurus Temporum, complectens Euſebii Pamphili Chronicon Latine, S. Hieronymo Interprete, cum ipſius Chronici Fragmentis Græcis ante hac non editis, & Autores omnes derelicta ab Euſebio continuantes. Edente Joſ. Juſto Scaligero, qui notas & caſtigationes in Euſebium, necnon Iſagogicorum Chronologiæ Canonum Libros tres adjecit. There was another Edition, in quâ Joſ. Scaligeri caſtigationes in Euſebium multo auctiores prodeunt, printed at Amſterdam 1658 in two volumes in fol. publiſhed by Alexander Morus. Du Pin tells us (34), "that this work "of Euſebius diſplays a prodigious extent of reading, "and a conſummate erudition. It is neceſſary to "have read an infinite number of Books and ancient "monuments in order to compile an Univerſal Hiſto"ry, and to have been maſter of a very clear under"ſtanding at the ſame time, in order to collect ſuch "a mul-

(31) Pag. 212.

(32) Du Pin, pag. 4 and 12.

(33) Pag. 113.

(34) Pag. 4, 5.

(k) In Auguſtinum de Civitate Dei, lib. 18. cap. 8.

but that he was a man of extenſive learning; and Ludovicus Vives (k) gives him the character of a perſon of infinite reading, and vaſt erudition. Du Pin obſerves (l), that he was one of the moſt learned men of antiquity, as his friends and enemies have equally acknowledged; and that it may be juſtly ſaid, that there is none among our Greek Writers

(l) Pag. 9.

" a multitude of facts, and diſpoſe them in their " proper order. This is an immenſe labour, which " is a ſtrong proof of the vaſt reading and prodigi- " ous memory of Euſebius. It muſt be owned in- " deed, that Africanus's Chronicle was of great " ſervice to him, and that he has copied that " Author throughout his whole work. However " he has corrected ſeveral of Africanus's miſtakes, " though he has fallen into others himſelf (35). " But it is almoſt impoſſible not to err on a " work of ſuch vaſt extent and difficulty as an " univerſal Chronicle. Miſtakes are excuſable in " a treatiſe of that kind, and they cannot hinder " it from deſerving to be eſteemed one of the " moſt uſeful works of all antiquity." Suidas (36) obſerves from Theodorus Lector, that Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus, who flouriſhed under Julian and Valens, compiled a Chronicle, in which he corrected the errors of Euſebius in point of Chronology. Χρονικὸν διορθώμενον τὸ σφάλμα Ευσεβίυ τῦ Παμφίλυ περὶ τῶν χρόνων. II. Præparationis Evangelicæ Libri XV. This work is addreſſed to Theodorus, who is ſuppoſed to be the Biſhop of Laodicea mentioned in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (37); and deſigned to diſpoſe men to receive the Chriſtian Religion. He endeavours in it to ſhew, that the Divinity of the Pagans is abſurd, and that of the Chriſtians agreeable to reaſon. He proves the firſt part of this propoſition in the firſt ſix Books, and the ſecond in the laſt nine. He begins with a general repreſentation of the Chriſtian Religion, and recommends it by ſhewing that it offers to mankind the higheſt happineſs, and leads them to virtue by teaching them to know and honour God. He urges then the prejudices in favour of this Religion, from the accompliſhment of Prophecies, the integrity of manners among Chriſtians, and the readineſs, with which the moſt uncultivated perſons comprehend the greateſt and moſt ſublime truths. Having thus diſpoſed the reader to be favourable to Chriſtianity, he proceeds to refute all other religions in the world, and to ſhew the falſhood of each of them, as well with regard to Hiſtory, as their pretended myſteries and profane morality. In the fourth Book he confutes the ſtrongeſt argument of the Pagans drawn from the predictions of their Oracles. He affirms that the Gods, whom they adore, are evil Genii or Dæmons, as the Philoſophers themſelves acknowledge. In the ſixth Book he attacks fate or neceſſity, and proves by a variety of arguments and teſtimonies, that man is entirely free. In the nine following Books he ſhews, that the Chriſtians were in the right to embrace the Theology of the Jews, ſince there was no other, which laid the ſolid foundations of real piety, and contained ſound and true notions. He proves this by an induction of the particular doctrines, as that it teaches the Immortality of the Soul, and the Worſhip of one God, the Author of the World; that it diſcovers to us the Word, the Son of God, and the Holy Ghoſt, who is to be honoured in the ſame manner as the Father and the Son; that there is no other ſcheme, which informs us that Angels are not to be adored as Deities, but honoured as the Miniſters of God, and gives us an account of the Fall of ſome of the Angels, and aſſures mankind that they are made in the image of God; in ſhort, that there is no other ſcheme, the doctrine of which is conformable to right reaſon. He cites then a long Fragment of a Treatiſe of Maximus, which ſhews that matter is not eternal. In the eighth Book he gives the Hiſtory of the Tranſlation of the Septuagint; and to evince the authority of the holy Scripture, he ſhews from the teſtimony of the Jews, that their law is myſtical and ſignificative. He afterwards recommends it from the ſanctity of the lives of thoſe, who embraced it; from the example of the Eſſenes, whoſe manner of life he deſcribes; and from the wiſdom of Philo. In the ninth Book he cites the teſtimonies of Pagans, who have ſpoken in favour of the Jewiſh Religion, and thoſe which prove the truth of the Hiſtory of Moſes. In the tenth he ſhews, that Plato and the Pagan Philoſophers took the greateſt part of what they have advanced, from the writings of Moſes. In the eleventh Book he ſhews in particular, that the doctrine of Plato is conformable to that of Moſes, and he compares ſeveral opinions of that Philoſopher with thoſe of the Jews. He continues this compariſon in the twelfth and thirteenth Books. But he obſerves likewiſe that this Philoſopher had errors, and that the Scripture only is exempt from error. In the fourteenth and fifteenth Books he cites the opinions of the Philoſophers; ſhews that they are contradictory; and often confutes them by one another; from whence he concludes, that the Chriſtians had reaſon to abandon the Theology of the Pagans, and embrace that of the Jews (38). Valeſius tells us (39), that this Book, as well as his Treatiſe De Demonſtratione Evangelicâ, was written before the Nicene Council, in regard they are expreſly cited in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which Valeſius affirms to have been written before that Council. But Dr. Cave is of opinion (40) that the Book De Præparatione Evangelicâ was written after that Council, undoubtedly after his Chronicon, ſince his Canones Chronici are expreſly cited in it. It was publiſhed with the Treatiſe De Demonſtratione Evangelicâ at Paris 1628 in 2 vol. in fol. with a new Verſion of the Book De Præparatione by the Jeſuit Francis Vigerus, and Donatus's Tranſlation of the Treatiſe De Demonſtratione. III. De Demonſtratione Evangelicâ. We have of this Work but ten Books extant of twenty, which he wrote. In the firſt Book he ſhews, that the Jewiſh Law was deſigned only for one nation, but the New Teſtament for all mankind; that the Patriarchs had no other Religion but that of the Chriſtians, ſince they adored the ſame God and the ſame Word, whom they honoured in the ſame manner as the Chriſtians, and lead the ſame life with them. In the ſecond he ſhews from the Prophecies, that the Meſſiah was to come into the world for the ſake of all men. In the third he proves that Chriſt is the Saviour of the world, and evinces againſt Unbelievers, that he was no Seducer, as his doctrine, miracles, and ſeveral other reaſons evidently prove. In the fourth he ſhews, that Chriſt is the ſon God; mentions the reaſons why he became man; explains the name of Chriſt, and cites ſeveral Prophecies, in which he was foretold under that name. In the following Books he introduces a great number of Prophecies to ſhew, that the coming of Chriſt, the time of his birth, the circumſtances of his life and paſſion, and in ſhort, every thing relating to him was foretold in the Books of the Old Teſtament. The Books which are ſtill extant, conclude with the words of Chriſt upon the croſs. In the ſubſequent Books he treated of the Prophecies relating to his death, burial, reſurrection, and aſcenſion, the eſtabliſhment of the church, and converſion of the Gentiles: but theſe Books are entirely loſt. This work was printed by Robert Stephens in Greek, in 1544, 1545, and publiſhed with the Treatiſe de Præparatione Evangelicâ by Vigerus at Paris 1628 in folio, two volumes. IV. Hiſtoriæ Eccleſiaſticæ Libri X. It contains the Hiſtory of the church from Chriſt to the death of Licinius the Elder, for a period of 324 years (41). Valeſius (42) tells us, that he wrote this after almoſt all his other works; and Dr. Cave obſerves (43), that it was written after the Nicene Council, ſince he mentions in it not only his Chronicon, but likewiſe his Treatiſe De Demonſtratione Evangelicâ. Nor is it any objection, that he makes no mention of that Council, ſince he declares that the laſt thing which he propoſed in writing that Hiſtory, was to ſhew how propitious our Saviour was at laſt in the ſettlement of his church; and he was unwilling to ſhew how much the happy ſtate of it, after its outward enemies were removed, was changed for the worſe by inteſtine conteſts among the Biſhops. Nec obſtat, quod nullam Concilii Nicæni mentionem faciat, cum ipſe teſtetur eorum, quæ ſibi in condendâ hac hiſtoriâ propoſuerit, id ultimum fuiſſe, ut oſtenderet, quam propitium ac benignum ſervatoris noſtri præſidium Eccleſiæ ſuæ demum effulſerit, nec fælicem rerum exitum, deletis jam externis hoſtibus, internis Epiſcoporum rixis deformare voluit. To this we may add the obſervation of Father Pagi (44), that the Writers of that age uſed to finiſh or publiſh

(35) See Scaliger's Prolegomena to his Theſaurus Temporum.

(36) In Voce Διόδωρος.

(37) Lib. 7. cap. 32.

(38) Du Pin, pag. 5, 6.

(39) Ubi ſupra.

(40) Pag. 113.

(41) Cave, pag. 113.

(42) Not. in lib. 1. cap. 2. Hiſt. Eccleſ.

(43) Ubi ſupra.

(44) Prolegom. ad Diſſert. Hypat. num. 33, 34, 35.

ters of ſo great an extent of reading. But the ſame Critic remarks, that he never applied himſelf to the poliſhing his works, and is very negligent in his ſtyle. Monſieur Le Clerc (m) repreſents him as an Arian, and obſerves, that he was always of the Arians ſide, and that St. Athanaſius and St. Jerom accuſe him of being of their opinion. "In "ſhort,

(m) Bibliotheque Univerſelle & Hiſtorique, tom. 10.

publiſh their Works at the Vicennalia of the Emperors, or other feſtivals of that kind; which remark he proves by many examples, and among the reſt by this Hiſtory and the Chronicles of Euſebius. In this Work our Author gives us an account of the ſucceſſions of Biſhops in the Sees of the chief cities of the world, and of the Eccleſiaſtical Writers, and their Works, with the Hiſtory of Hereſies. He deſcribes the perſecutions of the Martyrs; and mentions the conteſts relating to Church-Diſcipline, and in ſhort, every thing which regards the affairs of the Church. He does not write theſe things of himſelf and as an Hiſtorian, but almoſt every where cites the antient Authors or Monuments from whence he takes them, and makes long Extracts, which he inſerts in his Narration, in the ſame manner as is obſerved in Annals or Memoirs. This method of writing Hiſtory is indeed leſs agreeable but more uſeful than any other, and gives greater credit and weight to what is related. For when an Author mentions antient facts without citing the Authors from whom he takes them, we are not convinced as we are when he cites his Witneſſes; ſince in that caſe we cannot deny the truth of facts, which depend upon the authority of irreproachable evidences. But beſides this general reaſon, there is a particular one, which renders this method of writing obſerved by Euſebius of prodigious advantage, which is, that the greateſt part of the Authors and Monuments older than Euſebius having been loſt ſince his time; we are extremely obliged to him for preſerving in his Work the memory and conſiderable fragments of them. In ſhort, without this Work of Euſebius we ſhould ſcarce have any knowledge, either of the Hiſtory of the firſt ages of the church, or even of the Authors, who wrote at that time, or their Works, ſince he is the only Writer now extant, who gives an account of theſe particulars. For we may remark, that the Hiſtorians, who followed him, as Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodorit, began their Hiſtories where he concluded his, either ſuppoſing that he had collected every thing of importance, or knowing nothing of the Tranſlations of the firſt ages but through his means. Nicephorus Calliſtus, who undertook in the 14th Century to write a new Hiſtory, has introduced a great number of uncertain and fabulous ſtories, which are not taken from Euſebius, nor eſtabliſhed upon the authority of any antient Writer. "However, ſays Du Pin (44), it muſt be "owned that Euſebius's Hiſtory has not all the per- "fection which could be wiſhed; that it is not writ- "ten agreeably, nor always exact (45); that the Au- "thor is often too diffuſe upon things, which ought to "be ſlightly paſſed over; and on the other hand, too "conciſe in points which he ſhould have treated of "more fully: but notwithſtanding theſe defects it is a "very valuable Work." At the end of the 8th Book we find a ſmall Treatiſe of the Martyrs of Paleſtine, in which he deſcribes the martyrdom of thoſe, who ſuffered for the Faith of Chriſt in that Province. This has been erroneouſly confounded with the eighth Book of the Hiſtory; whereas it is a ſeparate Tract, which ſerves for a Supplement to that Book. Ruffinus was the firſt who tranſlated Euſebius's Hiſtory; but he took, according to his cuſtom, a great deal of liberty in the verſion of it. He entirely paſſed over the tenth Book, and added two others, which contain a Continuation of the Hiſtory to the death of Theodoſius. His Tranſlation is pure, neat, and even elegant, and repreſents the ſenſe of the Author in an agreeable manner, and ſometimes more faithfully than the Tranſlators who have followed him. It was of great advantage to the Latin Writers who have borrowed hence all that they have written or known of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the firſt ages. Muſculus undertook a new Tranſlation, in which he had pretty good ſucceſs. He has adhered very cloſely to the original, and tranſlated the text with great clearneſs and brevity; but he did not always underſtand his Author, and has committed many miſtakes in his verſion. Chriſtopherſon's Tranſlation is more elegant than that of Muſculus, and his ſtyle is more Ciceronian, but it is too diffuſe for an Hiſtory. He has corrected many errors of Muſculus, though his own performance is not exempt from miſtakes. At laſt the learned Henry Valeſius having remarked the defects of theſe Tranſlations, undertook a new one, which he has joined to the Greek Text, reviſed by four manuſcripts, and added notes full of erudition. His verſion has been highly approved of by the Learned, and has two qualities very rare, that it is literal and elegant at the ſame time. However the Critics have obſerved ſome faults in it. Robert Stephens publiſhed Euſebius's Hiſtory in Greek at Paris 1544. Muſculus's Tranſlation was printed at Baſil in 1554, and Chriſtopherſon's at Cologne and Baſil in 1570, at Paris in 1571, and with the corrections of Suffridus in 1581. The Original was likewiſe printed with Chriſtopherſon's Verſion at Geneva in 1612. Ruffinus's Tranſlation was printed at Rome in 1476 in folio, at Mantua in 1479, and at Haguenau in 1500. There is an old Edition printed without a date at Paris in 8vo by Renaut, and publiſhed by Godfrey Bouſſard Doctor of the Sorbonne, who has prefixed to it an excellent Preface addreſſed to Stephen Poncher, then Preſident of the Parliament at Paris. He obſerves in the Preface that Euſebius's Hiſtory tranſlated by Ruffinus had been printed before. Since that time there have been ſeveral Editions of Ruffinus's Verſion at different places in the years 1528, and 1544, at Lyons in 1523, and with all Euſebius's Works in 1542, 1559, and at Paris in 1541. Valeſius's Edition was printed at Paris in 1659 and 1671, and at Francfort in 1672. Monſieur Couſin tranſlated this Work into French, and Dr. Meredith Hanmer into Engliſh, and his Tranſlation was printed under this title, The antient Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories of the firſt ſix hundred years after Chriſt, originally written by Euſebius, Socrates, and Evagrius. London 1577, 1585, &c. in folio. The fifth Edition of this Tranſlation, to which were added Mr. Wye Saltonſtall's Verſion of Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine, and the two Orations ſubjoined thereto, was publiſhed in 1650. At laſt a new Tranſlation into Engliſh of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtories of Euſebius, Socrates, and Evagrius, with the Life of Conſtantine, by Euſebius, and Conſtantine's Oration to the Convention of the Saints, and Euſebius's Speech in praiſe of Conſtantine, together with Valeſius's Annotations &c. was printed at London 1683 in fol. V. Contra Hieroclem Liber. This Treatiſe was written againſt a book, which Hierocles wrote under the name of Philalethes againſt the Chriſtian Religion, in which, to render it ridiculous, he had compared Apollonius Tyanæus with Chriſt, affirming that the former had worked miracles as well as the latter, and was aſcended to heaven as well as he (46). Euſebius in his anſwer ſhews, that Apollonius was ſo far from deſerving to be compared with Chriſt, that he ought not even to be put upon an equal rank with the Philoſophers; and that Philoſtratus, who wrote his Hiſtory, is a Writer unworthy of credit, who contradicts himſelf every moment, who doubts even of the miracles, which he relates, and mentions a great many things evidently fabulous. At the end of this Treatiſe there is an obſervation of Euſebius againſt fate and neceſſity. Valeſius (47) tells us, that this Book was written by our Author while he was in Egypt. But Dr. Cave (48) thinks, that this is uncertain. It was printed with the Treatiſe De Præparatione Evangelicâ at Paris 1628 in folio, and at the end of Philoſtratus de Vitâ Apollonii. VI. Contra Marcellum Libri II. and De Eccleſiaſtica Theologiâ L. III. This Work is deſigned to confute Marcellus Biſhop of Ancyra, who was condemned for Sabellianiſm in the Synod at Conſtantinople in 336; and it was written at the deſire of that Synod. It was tranſlated into Latin by Dr. Richard Montague Biſhop of Chicheſter, and illuſtrated with notes, and ſubjoined to the Treatiſe De Præparatione Evangelica at Paris 1628 in folio. VII. Epiſtola ad Cæſarienſes de Fide Nicæna. It is extant in Socrates L. I. C. 8. and Theodorit L. I. C. 12. VIII. De Locis Hebraicis. It contains a Geographical Explication of all the countries, cities, and places mentioned in the Old Teſtament. It

(44) Pag. 4.

(45) See Du Pin, pag. 12.

(46) See Lactant. Inſtitut. lib. 5. cap. 2, 3, 4.

(47) De Vita & Scriptis Euſebii.

(48) Pag. 114.

" ſhort, ſays that Writer, it is ſcarce credible, that if he had been orthodox, he would have " ſo much favoured Arianiſm, and given his conſent to the depoſing of St. Athanaſius. " Yet Socrates (n) hath undertaken to juſtify him, by citing ſome paſſages, in which he " ſpeaks as the Orthodox did. And ſeveral modern Authors have attempted the ſame, " particularly Dr. Cave in the Life of Euſebius, which he hath written in Latin (o) and " Engliſh (p). This latter ſeems to have thought himſelf obliged to it by Chriſtian " charity, but others are of opinion, that Chriſtian charity, that is, the love which " we ought to have for all Chriſtians, ſhould oblige all Hiſtorians to mention " ſuch truths, as make no alteration in the ſtate of the dead, and are of great " uſe to the living, who thereby learn to form a true judgment of things. That " pretended charity, which extends itſelf only to the Fathers, who are looked upon " as (n) Lib. 2. cap. 21.

(o) In his Hiſtoria Literaria.

(p) In his Lives of the Fathers.

was tranſlated into Latin by St. Jerom, and enlarged and corrected by him. The Original with that Tranſlation and a new Verſion, and learned Notes was publiſhed by James Bonfrerius at Paris in 1631 and 1659. IX. Oratio de Laudibus Conſtantini. This Oration was pronounced in 335, in the Tricennalia of that Emperor. It is printed at the end of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. X. De Vita Conſtantini L. IV. This does not contain an accurate account of the life of Conſtantine, but a panegyric upon the moſt remarkable of his actions: and it is written in a florid and oratorical ſtyle. Some perſons have denied this to be of Euſebius's writing; but Dr. Cave (49) thinks their arguments ſo inconſiderable as not to deſerve to be particularly anſwered. It is ſubjoined to the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. XI. Expoſitio in Canticum Canticorum. It is publiſhed in Greek with Polychronius and Pſellus by Meurſius at Leyden 1617 in 4to; but it was not intirely written by Euſebius, but compiled partly out of his Writings, and partly out of thoſe of Athanaſius, Didymus, Nyſſen, Philo Carpathius, and others (50). XII. Vitæ Prophetarum. This is aſcribed to our Author in an antient Manuſcript, and publiſhed with the Commentaries of Procopius on Iſaiah in Greek and Latin by Curterius at Paris 1580 in folio. XIII. Canones ſacrorum Evangeliorum X. Theſe ten Tables exhibit an harmony of the Goſpels. The Tranſlation of them by St. Jerom is publiſhed among that Father's Works, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum. XIV. Apologiæ pro Origine Liber primus, tranſlated by Ruffinus, is publiſhed in St. Jerom's Works. St. Jerom tells us, that Euſebius was the ſole Author of the ſix Books of the Apology for Origen aſcribed to his friend Pamphilus; but it is evident from the teſtimony of Euſebius himſelf (51) and that of (52) Photius that he wrote the firſt five Books in conjunction with Pamphilus, and added the ſixth after the death of that Martyr. The Latin Tranſlation of the firſt Book of this work, (which is all that we have remaining of it) begins with an invective againſt thoſe, who caſt imputations upon Origen and his Writings; and then cites for his juſtification a conſiderable number of paſſages from his Works relating to the Trinity and Incarnation, the puniſhment of the damned, and the nature and ſtate of ſouls. St. Jerom charges Ruffinus with having altered in his Verſion thoſe paſſages which ſeemed to favour the opinion of the Arians with regard to the Divinity of the Son and Holy Ghoſt. Ruffinus does not defend himſelf from this reproach, but only pretends that theſe paſſages had been added. Some of the Books of this Apology contained the Life of Origen, and a Catalogue of his Writings, as appears from the teſtimony of St. Jerom and Photius (53). XV. Sermo in illud, Sero Sabbatorum. XVI. Sermo de Angelis ad monumentum viſis. Theſe two Sermons were publiſhed in Greek and Latin by Combefiſius Auctor. Nov. Tom I. p. 779. But theſe ſeem to be Extracts, rather than entire Diſcourſes (54). Beſides theſe Works there are ſeveral extant in Manuſcript, and not yet publiſhed; as, 1. Eclogarum Propheticarum de Chriſto L. IV. Lambecius tells us (55), that there is a Manuſcript of theſe Eclogæ in the Emperor's Library at Vienna. Dr. Cave (56) ſuppoſes them to be the ſame with the Eclogæ upon the Minor Prophets, which Alexander Barvoetius affirms to be extant in Bibliothecâ Scorialenſi. See Labbe's Nov. Bibl. MSS. (57). Lambecius, who promiſed to publiſh them in a Supplement to the Bibliotheca Patrum, in which he was engaged, but prevented by death, thinks them to be a part of our Author's Treatiſe De Demonſtratione Evangelicâ. For St. Jerom (58) aſſures us, that he wrote twenty Books upon that ſubject, of which ten only are publiſhed. 2. Commentarii in Iſaiam; which work Labbe tells us (59), is extant in ſeveral Libraries. 3. De triduo Sepulturæ Domini (60). 4. Expoſitio in illud, valde mane orto, &c. and De Angelis ad Sepulchrum Domini (61). In the Imperial Library at Vienna there is extant a Fragment of our Author's De Cognatione B. Virginis Deiparæ & Elizabethæ; his Interpretaio Diapſalmatis in Pſalterio; his Ὑποθέσεις εἰς τὰς ψαλμους, ſive Argumenta generalia & ſpecialia in omnes & ſingulos Pſalmos; and other pieces in Veteris & Novi Teſtamenti Cantica ſacrâ. The Hypotheſes Pſalmorum were publiſhed from an Alexandrian Manuſcript by Dr. Brian Walton in his Biblioth. Polyglott (62). Dr. Hody in his Preface to John Malela mentions a Chronology under the name of Euſebius, but obſerves it to be ſpurious. There is publiſhed likewiſe under his name a Chronological Series of Emperors at the end of Petavius's Edition of Nicephorus; but it appears to be only a ſhort Epitome collated from Euſebius, and continued down to the later Ages. The writings of Euſebius, which are loſt, are thus reckoned by Dr. Cave (63). 1. Several Books of his Treatiſe De Præparatione Evangelicâ. 2. De Demonſtratione Evangelicâ (64). 3. Thirty Books, according to Monſr. Le Clerc (65), or Twenty Five Books, according to Dr. Cave, againſt Porphyry; " which " in all probability, ſays le Clerc, are the greateſt loſs, " which we have ſuſtained with reſpect to the writings " of Euſebius; for we might have learned from them " the objections of the moſt learned Philoſophers of " his time, and the Anſwers of the moſt learned Bi- " ſhop of his Age." 4. Ad Stephanum de Evangeliorum Diſſonantiâ. 5. Five Books concerning the Coming of Chriſt. 6. In Pſalmos CL. Commentarii. Some Fragments of theſe Commentaries are extant in the Catena of the Fathers upon the Pſalms; and another Fragment is exhibited by Gelaſius (66). 7. A Commentary upon the firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians. This is mentioned by St. Jerom in his Epiſtle to Pammachius. 8. Eclogæ in totam Scripturam ſacram. See Theodorit. Hiſt. Eccleſ. L. 1. c. 16. 9. Of Topical Names, the firſt Book. 10. An Apology for Origen, in ſix Books, the firſt five of which he wrote in conjunction with Pamphilus in priſon, and added the ſixth himſelf. 11. Three Books of the Life of Pamphilus; which he mentions in the 11th chapter of his Book of the Martyrs of Paleſtine. 12. An Apology for himſelf, in two Books. See Photius, Cod. XIII. who tells us, that Euſebius wrote two other Books, which were different in ſome aſſertions, tho' they generally agreed in the ſenſe and ſtyle with the two former. Dr. Cave thinks (67), that by this is meant the Apologetic, which he wrote to clear himſelf from the imputation of Arianiſm; for Gelaſius Cyzicenus (68) mentions ſuch an Apologetic, which was ſent to all the orthodox Biſhops every where. 13. A Collection of ancient Martyrdoms. This contained eleven Books, if we may credit the Writer of the Acts of St. Sylveſter, publiſhed by Combefiſius. Bevarius (69) tells us, that this work is extant in Greek in the Library of the Eſcurial. But Dr. Cave is apprehenſive, that this manuſcript conſiſts only of the fabulous accounts of Metaphraſtes. Archbiſhop Uſher (70) ſuppoſes, that the Acts of the Martyrdom of St. Lucian, publiſhed by Surius under the 7th of January, were tranſcribed by Metaphraſtes out of this work. 14. A Deſcription of the Church of Jeruſalem. 15. Of the Feaſt of Eaſter. 16. Three Epiſtles; the firſt to Conſtantia, ſiſter of the Emperor Conſtantine; a fragment of which is extant in the ſixth Action of the ſecond Council of Nice. The ſecond is to Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria. A Fragment of it is extant in the place above cited. The third is addreſſed to a Biſhop named Euphration. We have a fragment

(49) Pag. 114.

(50) Idem, ibid.

(51) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 6. cap. 33.

(52) Biblioth. Cod. 118.

(53) Cod. 118.

(54) Cave, pag. 114.

(55) Comment. de Biblioth. Vindobonenſ. lib. 1. pag. 139, &c.

(56) Pag. 114.

(57) Supplem. 3. pag. 185.

(58) De Script. cap. 81.

(59) Pag. 22, 79, 184.

(60) Idem, pag. 184.

(61) Idem, pag. 273.

(62) Tom. 6. pag. 137.

(63) Pag. 114, 115.

(64) See Photius, Cod. 11, 12.

(65) Biblioth. Univerſelle, tom. 10.

(66) De Natur. lib. 2.

(67) Pag. 115.

(68) Hiſt. Conc. Nicæni, lib. 2. cap. 1.

(69) In Dextr. Chronic. ad ann. 308.

(70) Biblioth. Theol. MS. pag. 159. apud Cave, pag. 115.

" as orthodox, hath been the cauſe why we have in a manner only Panegyrics of the " Antients, wherein their defects are always ſuppreſſed, when they cannot be covered " with the maſk of ſome virtues." This paſſage occaſioned Dr. Cave to ſubjoin to the ſecond volume of his Hiſtoria Literaria a Diſſertation, intitled, De Euſebii Cæſarienſis Arianiſmo adverſus Joannem Clericum, in which he maintains that Euſebius was not an Arian. But Monſieur Le Clerc replied to him in the ſecond Letter of his Epiſtolæ Criticæ & Theologicæ (q). In this Letter he examines Euſebius's Epiſtle to the people of Cæſarea to excuſe his ſigning the Nicene Creed, though he had formerly profeſſed himſelf of Arius's opinion; and he affirms, that Euſebius explains that Creed like an Arian. He quotes likewiſe long paſſages out of the ſecond Council of Nice, to prove that they juſtly accuſed him of Arianiſm.

(q) Printed at Amſterdam 1700, in 8vo.

fragment of it in the Fifth Action of the ſecond Council of Nice, p. 365. 17 Ἀρχαιολογία, ſeu ἀρχαιολογικὴ ἱστορία, i. e. "An ancient Hiſtory," two fragments of which are extant in Anaſtaſius Sinaita (71). But perhaps this work is the ſame with his Chronicon or παντοδαπὴ ἱστορία. Anaſtaſius likewiſe frequently cites our Author's Book addreſſed to Marinus. Hebed Jeſu informs us (72), that there are extant in the Chaldee language the following Books of Euſebius, De ortu divino, De diſſonantiâ Evangeliorum, De figura mundi, Hiſtoria Martyrum Occidentalium ac eorum Panegyrica, Sermo de defectu Pluviæ, and Apologia pro Origine. Father Sirmond the Jeſuit publiſhed at Paris in 1643 in 8vo ſeveral Latin Homilies, which are aſcribed in two manuſcripts to Euſebius of Cæſarea, and which Valeſius frequently cites as the genuine writings of our Author. But Dr. Cave rather believes them to have been written by Euſebius of Emeſa, who lived towards the middle of the fourth Century. However Du Pin (73) and Caſimir Oudin (74) are of opinion, that they are the genuine performances of our Euſebius. T.

(71) Quæſt. 41 and 65.

(72) See Cave, pag. 115.

(73) Pag. 9.

(74) Commentar. de Script. & Scriptis Eccleſ. tom. 1. col. 313, edit. Francofurti 1722.

EUSTACHE (DAVID) a native of Dauphiné (a), and a Miniſter of the Proteſtant Church in Montpellier, publiſhed ſome ſermons and controverſial pieces [A], which gained him reputation. He aſſiſted at the national Synod of Loudun, as Deputy of the Province of Lower Languedoc, anno 1659, and was nominated by the Aſſembly, to carry the Letter written by them to his Majeſty. He made a ſpeech to this Monarch, who was then at Toulouſe, to the Queen Mother, and to Cardinal Mazarin, and acquitted himſelf worthily on that occaſion. He died ſome days after, and left only two daughters.

(a) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 94.

[A] He publiſhed ſome Sermons, and controverſial pieces.] He publiſhed, Les Remedes ſalutaires contre la ſeparation d'avec Dieu, in 1645. La victoire de la Foy. Une reponſe au pere Meynier Jeſuite, ſon Colloque avec Diſdier Barruel Curé d'Entraignes (1). This is what the Bibliotheque of Dauphiné ſays of him. To this I add, that David Euſtache wrote a Book divided into two parts, as an anſwer to the queſtion made to Proteſtants, viz. where was your Church before Luther? He publiſhed in 1660 an anonymous little piece entitled L'Orateur Tertulle convaincu. It is an anſwer to the Speech which it is ſuppoſed, the wiſe men of the pretended reformed (Proteſtant) Religion, had made to Queen Maria Thereſa at her entrance into the Kingdom, wherein they declared, that hearing ſhe had ſhewn great uneaſineſs, upon hearing that part of the ſubjects of the King her huſband were hereticks; they were come to leſſen that concern, by embracing her Majeſty's Religion; and that they had done this, after having found, by the teſtimony of their moſt eminent Writers, that people may be ſaved in the Romiſh Communion. Every one was perſuaded that this ſpeech was writ by Meynier the Jeſuit. He took great delight in that common topic; and carried it much farther ſome time after, in a work entitled by him Montauban juſtifié (2).

(1) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 94.

(2) See the Article MONTAUBAN, in the remark.

EXPERIENS (PHILIP CALLIMACHUS) was one of thoſe learned Italians who founded an Academy in the fifteenth Century, and aſſumed new names. He changed that of Geminianus (a) for Callimachus. Paul II was perſuaded that ſome great myſtery was concealed under it; he looking upon this Aſſembly of Learned Men as a gang of Conſpirators, threw them into priſon, and had them put to the torture with very great ſeverity (b). It was on this occaſion that Platina was treated with ſo much cruelty, as will be ſhown in his Article. Callimachus was looked upon as the Head of this Conſpiracy. It was to no purpoſe that Platina inſiſted on the incapacity of this man for ſuch an attempt [A], and the enmity that reigned between him and Callimachus, for he was treated

(a) He had this ſirname, becauſe he was born in Sangemini in Tuſcany.

(b) See Platina, in the Life of Paul II.

[A] It was to no purpoſe that Platina inſiſted on the incapacity of this man for ſuch an attempt.] Platina ſpeaks very contemptuouſly of Callimachus; and repreſents him as a man, with regard to the body as well as mind, unendued with the qualities requiſite in a conſpirator. He is an unweildy fellow, ſays he, who can ſcarce move himſelf; and, beſides, has loſt his ſight. Now I can ſcarce reconcile this with the favour which Callimachus enjoyed in the King of Poland's court, or with the intrigues which made him ſo odious to the Poles. It is not improbable that Platina might ſpeak as a Rhetorician and an enemy; I mean, that he inveighed againſt Callimachus, in order to refute the charge that was brought againſt himſelf, and becauſe he hated him. Reſpondeo me nunquam conſiliorum Callimachi participem fuiſſe, quippe cum inter nos ſimultas eſſet haud parva (1). i. e. " I anſwer that I never " joined in any enterprize with Callimachus, we hat- " ing each other." Spondanus (2) does not think it probable that a man of the character of Platina's Callimachus, could poſſibly have ingratiated himſelf ſo much in the King of Poland's Court. This I ſhall leave to the determination of my readers; and here follow Platina's words. Tum ego, cum viderem omnia armis & tumultu circumſonare, veritus ne quid gravius ob formidinem & iram in nos conſuleretur, rationes attuli quamobrem crederem Callimachum nil tale aliquid unquam moliturum nedum meditatum fuiſſe, qui cum conſilio, lingua, manu, ſolicitudine, opibus, copiis, clientelis, armis, pecuniis, oculis poſtremo careret. Cæculus enim & P. Lentulo ſomniculoſior, ac L. Craſſo ob adipem tardior (3). i. e. " When I ſaw that every one was up " in arms, and that tumult reigned univerſally, fear- " ing leſt we ſhould meet with ſtill more ſevere treat- " ment from the rage of the people, I gave my rea- " ſons why I believed Callimachus had never meditat- " ed, nor ever would engage in any ſuch attempt, he " having neither conduct, elocution, bravery, fore- " ſight, wealth, troops, patrons nor money; in a " word, that he was blind, that he was more drou- " ſy than P. Lentulus, and more unweildy than M. " Craſſus." I am ſurprized at one thing, which is, that Platina who names ſeveral of thoſe that were put to the torture for this conſpiracy, does not ſay whether Callimachus was one of them. Paul Jovius declares that he was one of them: Ipſe ante alios deſumpti Græci

(1) Platina, in Paulo II, folio m. 357, verſo.

(2) Spondan. ad ann. 1496, ſub fin.

(3) Platina, in Paulo II, folio 356, verſo.

treated as one of the Conſpirators. When theſe unhappy perſons had been ſufficiently tortured, and the whole chimera of their pretended plot diſcovered, they were releaſed. Callimachus left Italy in the greateſt rage, and withdrew to Poland, the Court of which was extremely diſguſted at the Pope's conduct (c). King Caſimir gave him an honourable reception, and made him Preceptor to his ſon Albert. He alſo ſent him upon ſeveral Embaſſies (d). Callimachus inſinuated himſelf to ſo much advantage in the mind of his diſciple, that he was in prodigious favour in his reign, a circumſtance which diſguſted the Poles to a very great degree, eſpecially after the battle they loſt in Moldavia. They imagined that Callimachus was the cauſe of this bloody defeat; and that he had counſelled the King to expoſe the greateſt part of the nobility to ſlaughter [B]; that he had adviſed this, I ſay, as the moſt effectual method for eſtabliſhing a deſpotic government in Poland. Callimachus was ſo alarmed at the indignation they conceived againſt him on this account, that, being afraid of appearing any more in public, he hid himſelf at a friend's houſe in a village, and died there. His friends did not dare to divulge his death, but dried his body by the heat of a ſtove, and depoſited it in a cheſt. King Albert being informed of this, cauſed it to be carried to Cracow, and buried it in the Church of the Trinity, and erected a brazen tomb over it (e). This we are told by Paulus Jovius [C], but the Poliſh Hiſtorians don't mention any ſuch incident. They aſſert that Callimachus died in peace at Cracow, the firſt of November 1496 (f), and was there honourably interred. Konig (g) falſly ſuppoſed, that Philip Callimachus and Callimachus Experiens were two Authors. Callimachus wrote ſome tolerable good Hiſtories [D].

(c) Jovi, Elogior. cap. 41.

(d) Spondan. Annal. ad ann. 1496, num. 6.

(e) Ex Jovio, Elogior. cap. 41.

(f) Not 1490, as in Moreri.

(g) In Biblioth. Vet. & Nova, pag. 155.

There

(4) Jovius, Elog. cap. 41. nominis reus tormentis & carcere pœnas daret (4). i. e. "He was condemned more eſpecially becauſe he had "aſſumed a Greek name; was put on the rack, and "thrown into priſon." Octavius Ferrarius may incline us to believe, that Callimachus was not impriſoned, tho' he aſſures the contrary (5), he obſerving, that Callimachus was not in Rome, when the news of the pretended conſpiracy was carried to the Pope. Nam cum falſo rumore delatus fuiſſet Callimachus umbraticus Vir, inermis & abdomine tardus, adverſus ſacrorum Regem conſpiraſſe, jamque multos aſſeclas habere, & ad urbem perdendam reſque immutandas feſtinare, iterum Platina in vincla conjectus eſt tanquam conjurationis conſcius (6). i. e. "A falſe report having pre-"vailed, viz. that Callimachus, who was an inconſi-"derable, weak, unweildy man, had engaged in a "conſpiracy againſt his Holineſs; that he had already "aſſembled a great number of followers, and was ad-"vancing in all haſte to deſtroy the city and ſubvert "the government; Platina was again impriſoned, as "being an accomplice." I am afraid that Ferrari has here given us a falſe relation. The reaſon of my ſuſpicion is, Platina's mentioning two falſe alarms at the ſame time: the one was, the pretended conſpiracy of Callimachus; the other a pretended inſurrection near Rome. It was juſt before reported, that Luke Totius (7), who had been driven out of Rome, and was retired to Naples, was coming back with many other exiles, whence the Pope was afraid of being oppreſſed both within and without. It is plain that the man who was ſaid to be advancing with all diligence, in order to deſtroy Rome, was not Callimachus; and conſequently it is very probable that Ferrari was miſtaken. The reader will form a better judgment of this, if he conſiders the following words of Platina. Nunciatur ei (Paulo) quoſdam adoleſcentes duce Callimacho in eum conſpiraſſe; cui præ timore vix reſpiranti, neſcio quo fato novus etiam terror additur. Advolat etiam quidam cognomento Philoſophus, homo facinoroſus & exul, qui vitam primo & reditum in patriam deprecatus nunciat, ac falſo quidem, Lucam Totium Romanum civem Neapoli exulantem, cum multis exulibus in nemoribus Veliterinis à ſe viſum, ac paulo poſt affuturum. Timere Paulus ac magis trepidare tum cœpit: veritus ne domi & foris opprimeretur (8). i. e. "Pope Paul being "informed, that ſome young people, headed by Cal-"limachus, had conſpired againſt him, was almoſt "dead with fear; and by ſome ill fate or other his "terror was increaſed. There flew to him alſo one, "a notoriouſly wicked fellow, who had been baniſh-"ed, and was ſirnamed the Philopher; who having "firſt ſued for life, and the liberty of returning to his "country, falſely declared, that he had ſeen in the "woods of Velitræ Lucas Totius a Roman Citizen, "baniſhed to Naples, with ſeveral more exiles; and "that he would ſoon reach the city. The Pope be-"gan then to be much more terrified, he fearing that he "ſhould be attacked both within and without." This is to ſay evidently, that, according to the falſe alarm, the danger which was apprehended from Callimachus was already in the city, and that it was Totius who was advancing towards it. Logicians make too great uſe of the art of diſtinguo, and the Orators don't employ it enough.

(5) Ea nominum novitate populorum paſtor offenſus, quaſi occultæ conſpirationis teſſera eſſet, Platinam & Callimachum tanquam impios & maleficos tormentis excruciavit. Octav. Ferrar. Proluſ. pag. 88.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) In other editions it is Tortius.

(8) Platina, in Paulo II, fol. 356.

[B] The Poets . . . imagined . . . that he had adviſed the King, to expoſe the greateſt part of the Nobility to ſlaughter.] Paul Jovius ſpeaks of this as an undoubted fact. Callimachus ab Alberto . . poſt Caſimiri patris interitum, ad ſummum familiaritatis atque potentiæ locum evectus eſt, tanta Polonorum conſternatione, odioque, ut eum tanquam impium, & Moldavicæ cladis authorem, tyrannidemque impotenti imperio exercendam Regi ſuaderet, aula extruſerint. Maligno enim judicio nobilitatem, quòd imperatæ pecuniæ, & ſuſcepto bello averſa eſſet, ſævo hoſti objectandam eſſe cenſuerat, ut nemo demum ſupereſſet, qui libertatis per manum traditæ jura tueretur (9). i. e. "Callimachus, after the demiſe of Caſimir, was "received by his ſon Albert into his moſt intimate fa-"miliarity, and raiſed to the higheſt degree of "power; which aſtoniſhed and exaſperated the "Poles to ſuch a degree, that they drove him from "court, as a wicked man, who had been the "cauſe of the ſlaughter in Moldavia, and had coun-"ſelled the King to govern with deſpotic ſway. For "he had moſt villanouſly adviſed the expoſing of the "Nobility to the fury of the enemy, becauſe they "had oppoſed the levying of money, and the engag-"ing in this war; in order that no one might be "left, to defend liberty and the laws." This is drawing this perſon's picture in very black colours; and any man who had a ſoul baſe enough to adviſe ſuch wicked attempts, might have done all that Paul II ſuſpected.

(9) Jovius, Elogior. cap. 41. pag. m. 97.

[C] This we are told by Paul Jovius.] It has been juſtly obſerved, that this Author is not ſufficient to counterbalance the Poliſh Writers; and that he delighted too much in collecting popular Traditions (10). Ejus obitum Jovius in Elogiis, ex vulgi fabulis, ut aſſolet, Vilnæ (11) in exilio contigiſſe refert: quem auctores Poloni, quibus magis credendum, placide Cracoviæ contigiſſe, & amplo funere honeſtatum eſſe aſſerunt. Voſſius (12) forms the ſame judgment of Paul Jovius.

(10) Spondan. ad annum, 1496, num. 6.

(11) Paul. Freherus has alſo read Vilnæ, but my edition of Paula Jovius, of Baſil 1561, ſays, ſemi-exul in villa Sarmatica apud veterem amicum occultatus fato ceſſit.

[D] He wrote ſome tolerable good Hiſtories.] His principal works are, a Relation of what the Venetians did to engage the Perſians and Tartars to declare war againſt the Turks; the Life of Attila; and the Hiſtory of Ladiſlaus King of Hungary, ſlain in the battle of Varnes. In this laſt Hiſtory, he has ſurpaſſed all who have ſet up for Hiſtorians ſince Tacitus's time. I give this only as the opinion of Paulus Jovius. Adeo eleganter ejus graviſſimi muneris leges impleviſſe exiſtimatur, ut omnes qui à Cornelio Tacito per tot ſecula id ſcribendi genus attigerint meo judicio ſuperarit (13). This Hiſtory of Ladiſlaus was written at the deſire of Matthias Hunniades, King of Hungary, who

(12) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 620.

(13) Jovius, Elog. cap. 41.

(b) He was successively Palatine, and Castellan of Cracow, and great Marshal of Poland. Johan. Mich. Brutus, vbi infra.

There is extant a letter of his, in which he complains, that the Diet of Petricow had resolved to deliver him up to the Pope; and where he assures, that his enemies could not have used him so cruelly, had Andrew Sborow (b) been present at that Diet (i). He relates this in a letter to a Polish Nobleman. Those Writers who, with la Popeliniere, should declare that he lived about the year 1552, would be grosly mistaken (k).

(i) Jo. Michael Brutus, Epist. lib. 4. pag. 456, edit. 1698.

(k) La Popelin. Hist. des Hist. pag. 480.

(14) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. pag. 619.

(15) Volaterran. lib. 7. cap. de Polonia, pag. m. 257.

who gave the Author a noble recompence for it (14).

Callimachus managed his affairs successfully in those cold countries. He went thither poor, and grew very rich: Ad hos Callimachus Geminianensis meus familiaris penetravit, ubi & literis & ingenii solertia ex paupere dives magnopere apud eos reges quibus erat dilectus ante hos annos decessit (15). i. e. "Callimachus, my "very intimate friend, got to these people; and "there, by his wit and erudition, he amassed a large "fortune, tho' he before was poor; and died some years "since, greatly beloved by the Monarchs under whom "he had served." See Martin Cromerus's History of Poland, Book XXX.

EYSENGREYN (MARTIN) in Latin Eisengreinius, a Doctor of Divinity in the sixteenth Century, published a great many books, a Catalogue of which is to be found in the Epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheque. You may see in Moreri, that he was born at Stutgard in the Dutchy of Wittenberg, and that he was Vice-Chancellor of the University of Ingolstad, and died in the year 1578. I add to all this, that he was of a very good family (a), and the son of a very honest man, and that he had been of the Protestant Religion (b). He had even declared in a printed book, that he was resolved constantly and unchangeably to persevere in it; he had dedicated it to Vergerio, to wish him joy that he had acknowledged the true Church, and left the party of Antichrist. Yet soon after he returned to the Church of Rome about the year 1560 (c), and shewed a great animosity against the Protestants. He attacked them in several writings, in which he treated controverted subjects with all the fury, and according to all the common topics of those times. George Liebler Professor of Physic in the University of Tubingen refuted one of his books [A]. I do not know whether our Author was a relation of WILLIAM EYSENGREIN, whom I have mentioned in another place [B].

(a) Georg. Liebletus, in Scholis ad Sermon. Mart. Eysengrenii de Puero Jesu. pag. 43.

(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 1.

(c) Idem, ibid.

[A] George Liebler . . . . refuted one of his books.] It is an Homily in High-Dutch upon the Gospel of the first Sunday after Epiphany. The subject is the Son of God's sitting in the midst of the Doctors in the Temple of Jerusalem. Liebler translated it into Latin, and published it with Scholiums in the year 1575 (1). He charges the Author with fatiguing the public with several indifferent pamphlets. Tu spreta mea fideli admonitione, hactenus multos parvos & pravos edidisti libellos, quos an quisquam hactenus responso dignatus sit haud scio. Mihi quidem cùm initio aliqui veniissent in manus, eisque respondere vellem, ita visi sunt indocti & inepti, ut chartarum tam turpiter contaminatarum vehementer me misereret, & omnino eorum lectione postea abstinerem. Sed cum infelici parta adeo fis fecundus, ut subinde nova monstra per abortum edas, &c. (2). i. e. "Despising my friendly admonition, you have pub"lished till this time a great many small but bad "books, which I do not know whether any person "yet vouchsafed to answer. As for me, when some "of them fell into my hands, and I designed to an"swer them, I found them so unlearned, and so silly, "that I thought it was a pity to waste paper so "shamefully, and I never read any of them since. "But since you are so fruitful in unlucky offsprings, "that you now and then miscarry of new monsters. "&c." He also charges him with writing a great many idle and insignificant words only with a design to render his works more voluminous. Neque enim mihi libet tuam imitari loquacitatem, qua nihil aliud agis, quam ut multas paginas frustra expleas, & magnos facias libros, in quibus res paucas benè & rectè doceas (3). He concludes with some observations upon an Homily, in which Eysengrein had explained Simeon's Prophecy concerning the child Jesus.

(1) At Tubingen in 4to; it contains 86 pages.

(2) Liebler, in Schol. in Sermon. Mart. Eysengreinii, pag. 1.

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 7.

[B] I do not know whether our Author was a relation of WILLIAM EYSENGREIN, whom I have mentioned in another place (4). He was a Canon of Spire where he was born, and contemporary with our Martin. He published in 1566 at Ingolstad a Work intitled, Centenarii XVI, continentes descriptionem rerum memorabilium in Ecclesia contra Matthiam Flacium Illyricum. "An account of the memorable things which happened "in the church against Flacius Illyricus." He had published in the year 1564 at Dillingen a Chronicon Spirense, Chronicle of Spire, a Work that abounds with falsities, as Christopher Lehman has observed in the Preface to his Annals of Spire (5).

(4) In the Remark [E] of the Article ILLYRICUS.

(5) See the Introductio ad Historiam Ecclesiasticam of Gaspar. Sagittarius, pag. 519.

EZEKIEL, one of the four greater Prophets whose writings made a part of the Old Testament, was the son of Buzi the Priest (a), and was descended from a High-priest (b). He was carried away to Babylon with King Jehoiachin, and he began to prophesy five years after (c), and continued so to do for twenty years (d). He was put to death by the person who commanded the Jews in that quarter, and being a worshipper of idols, could not bear that the Prophet should censure him for it (e). Ezekiel was buried in the grave of Sem [A], and there used to be a very great concourse of people at that tomb out of a principle of devotion. The Chaldeans one day were determined to cut all that devout multitude in pieces; but were taught by experience that Ezekiel was another Moses [B]. This

(a) Ezekiel, i. 3.

(b) Epiphanius, in Vita Ezechielis.

(c) Ezek. i. 2.

(d) Epiphan. in Vita Ezechielis.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(1) Epiphanius, (aut qui sub nomine Epiphanij scripsit Vitas Prophetarum) in Vita Ezechielis.

(2) Scriptor Itinerarij Hierosolymitani, apud Huet. Demonstrat. Evang. pag. 458, Ed. Lipsi. 1694.

(3) In Itinerario, pag. m. 78.

* Who was also called Jehoiachin.

[A] Ezekiel was buried in the grave of Sem.] The Author whom I cite (1) affirms that his tomb was yet to be seen, consisting of two caves; but an Author who lived in the reign of Constantine (2) relates that the sepulchre of Ezekiel was the same with that of Job, Jesse, and David, near Bethlehem. Benjamin the Jew (3) tells us that King Jechoniah * having been set at liberty, went with thirty five thousand Jews to build a magnificent dome over the tomb of Ezekiel, between the Chebar and the Euphrates. He pretends that Jechoniah and all those who had attended him were to be seen painted on the walls of the dome. The picture of Jechoniah was the first, and that of Ezekiel the last. We shall mention below what this Author reports concerning the pilgrimages and devotions which were performed at that monument.

[B] The Chaldeans . . . were taught by experience that Ezekiel was another Moses.] The Chaldeans were not without fear at the sight of such a concourse of Pilgrims; for which reason they resolved one day to put an end to the flocking of such numbers of devout people thither, by putting those to the sword who were then about the sepulchre. But the Prophet stayed the waters of the river, and when the Israelites had reached the opposite shore, he

This is what is to be found in the Life of this great Prophet aſcribed to S. Epiphanius, We there meet with ſome other miracles of the ſame Prophet. The Jews, fond of their ſuperſtitious and ridiculous whimſies, have told a hundred extraordinary things concerning his tomb [C]. Some of their Doctors have given out that in an Aſſembly of Rabbins, who were deliberating on the Book of his Prophecies, he was very near being excluded out he ſo ordered matters, that all the Chaldeans who durſt purſue them were drowned. He obtained for the ſame devotees, who were dying for hunger, a great multitude of fiſh. It is pretended that he was in his lifetime tranſported from Chaldea to Judea, in order to convince the unbelievers (4). If Abrabanel went on this, he might have ſaid that Ezekiel propheſied both in the Land of Canaan and in Chaldea; I ſay, he might have maintained it without fearing to be refuted in the manner Monſieur Huet has refuted him. Faceſſat etiam Abrabaniel qui Ezechielem & in terra Chanaan, & extra eam vaticinatum eſſe docet, cum quinto demum poſt deportationem ſuam anno futura prædicere agreſſus ſit (5). i. e. "Away alſo with Abrabanel, who aſſerts "that Ezekiel propheſied both in the Land of Canaan, "and out of it; whereas he firſt began to propheſy in "the fifth year after he had been carried away captive."

(4) Ex Epiphanio, in Vita Ezechielis.

(5) Huet. Demonſt. Evangel. pag. 458.

[C] The Jews have told a hundred extraordinary things concerning the tomb of Ezekiel.] Benjamin the Jew, who lived in the twelfth Century, aſſures us (6) that till that time this Prophet's tomb had been looked on as a holy place; that people came thither from the moſt diſtant countries to pray at it; that thoſe journies of devotion began with the year, and laſted till the feaſt of Expiation; that the chiefs of the Jewiſh nation failed not to ſet out from Bagdad, to go to that ſanctuary, and to cauſe tents to be erected for twelve miles round; that the Arabian Merchants went thither to hold a fair; that on the day of Expiation a great Book was expoſed to view, written by Ezekiel's own hand, and was read; and that ſince the time the Prophet himſelf had lighted a lamp over his ſepulchre, it had never been ſuffered to go out, for great care had been taken to ſupply it with oil and cotton whenever there was occaſion; that there was a very fine library there, to which all thoſe who died without children left their books; that even the ſons of the Mahometan Lords went thither to pray, ſo great an affection had they entertained for Ezekiel; that all the Arabs did the ſame; and that this holy place was ſo highly reverenced, on account of the bleſſed Ezekiel, that even in time of war, neither the Mahometans nor the Jews did hurt to any one there.

(6) In Itinerario, pag. 78, & ſeq.

(7) R. Petachias Ratisbonenſis. He lived in the 12th Century. His Travels were publiſhed in Hebrew and Latin by Wagenſeil, in 1687.

(8) Compare this with what is related of the Image of our Lady of Czeſtochow in Poland. Ladiſlaus, D. of Opolia, had a mind in the year 1328, to remove it into his Dutchy, but when it came to Clermont near Czeſtochow, it would not ſtir from that mountain, where it grew ſo heavy that he began to ſuſpect its will, which was afterwards revealed to him by a dream. He built a Church there. Le Laboureur, Voiage de la Reine de Pologne, Part 3. pag. 22. On Palm Sunday 1430, the Huſſites of Bohemia pillaged this temple . . . they carried the Image away towards Sileſia, but at 400 paces diſtance from the mountain, it fixed itſelf in ſuch a manner, that they could not draw it away tho' they did their utmoſt to do it by the help of freſh horſes. Ibid.

(9) The number of Jews which go thither is 60 or 80 thouſand. Peregrin. R. Petachiæ, apud Joh. Chriſtoph. Wagenſeilium, Exercitat. 4. pag. 179.

Another Rabbin (7) is going to tell us yet more wonderful things. A King of Babylon having a deſire to ſee the relics of the Prophet Ezekiel, that great performer of miracles, they told him it was not poſſible: as he is a ſaint, ſaid they, you cannot take him out of his grave; and becauſe this anſwer did not abate his longing, they deſired him to make a trial on the ſepulchre of Baruch, Ezekiel's diſciple. He gave orders, therefore, that Baruch ſhould be taken up; but all thoſe who offered to ſet their hand to it, fell down dead. By the advice of an Iſraelite, he commanded the Jews to dig him up. They prepared themſelves for the work by a faſt of three days, and accompliſhed it without any damage. The King, thinking it was too much for one place to have both the ſepulchre of Ezekiel, and that of Baruch, ordered the coffin of the latter to be removed elſewhere. When they had carried it a mile, the bearers had not the ſtrength to move a ſtep; and the horſes and mules they tried to make uſe of were as unable to ſtir (8). Rabbi Solomon thus explained the prodigy: this, ſaid he, is the place which the prophet chuſes for his ſepulchre. His interpretation was approved; and they erected in that place a fine monument to Baruch. What follows relates to the tomb of Ezekiel. It is in a wood, a day's, or half a day's journey from Bagdad, ſurrounded by a wall, and has a fine building erected over it. There is but one very little door in the wall, of which the Jews have the key: when they have a mind to enter by this door, they muſt creep on all four, it is ſo low; but at the feaſt of Tabernacles, on which day a prodigious concourſe of people flock thither (9), this door of its own accord grows wider and higher, ſo that perſons mounted on camels may paſs through. So ſoon as the feſtival is over, the door returns to its former ſize, and this in the ſight of all the people who are there preſent to bring their offerings to the tomb of Ezekiel. There are no evils againſt which they recommend themſelves more devoutly, or more frequently, to the interceſſion of this Prophet, than againſt barenneſs. A man who finds himſelf unfit for procreation, and a woman who finds herſelf unfit for conception, have uſually recourſe to vows at the tomb of this Prophet. They alſo make uſe of the ſame means to remove the barrenneſs of their cattle (10). A Prince who had a barren mare, and lived four days journey from this ſepulchre, engaged himſelf by a vow to conſecrate to the Prophet the foal which his mare ſhould bring forth, if ſhe happened to breed. The mare had a foal, which the Prince liked ſo well, that he kept it for himſelf; but the foal ran away, and went of his own accord towards the ſepulchre of Ezekiel; and the door in the wall immediately opened of itſelf, to let him in. The Prince not being able to find this foal, though he had him every were ſought after with the utmoſt diligence, imagined that he might perhaps find him at the Prophet's tomb; which thought was occaſioned by his vow. He found the foal there, and could never get him out, becauſe the door was too narrow to let him paſs; then, by the advice of a Jew, he laid ſome pieces of money on the tomb, and when he had laid down the value of the foal, the door enlarged itſelf to a ſufficient width (11). All the Iſhmaelites, who go to the ſepulchre of Mahomet, take that of Ezekiel in their way, and leave offerings there, making this prayer to him: My Lord Ezekiel, if I return in good health, I will give you ſuch or ſuch a thing (12). Thoſe who undertake a long journey depoſite their moſt valuable effects at this tomb, and ſay, My Lord Ezekiel, keep this precious depoſit for me till I return, and permit not any other than my heirs to touch it. Several of theſe depoſits have lain long enough to rot in the place. They alſo leave Books there: a man who ſhould offer to ſteal one of them, would be immediately ſtruck blind. This place is very richly adorned; thirty lamps are kept lighted there night and day. The money ariſing from the vows is employed in repairing the Synagogue, in marrying orphans, and in educating a great many poor ſcholars. The preſents and votive offerings are ſo numerous, that there are two hundred perſons appointed to take care of them by turn. Formerly there was a pillar of fire over the tomb of this Prophet; but ſome prophane perſons having once mixed with the eighty thouſand devout pilgrims aſſembled at the feaſt of Tabernacles, were the cauſe of the pillars diſappearing (13).

(10) Compare this with what is to be read in the Supplement to Dr. Burnet's Travels, pag. 192, of the cattle which are brought to be bleſt at Rome on St. Antony's day.

(11) Pauxillatim ſucceſſive eouſque argentum monumento ingeſſit quo ad pretium æquavit, & dilatata porta, pullus egreſſus eſt. Petach. Peregrin. pag. 180.

(12) Domine Ezechiel ſi (ſanus ſalvuſque) redivero, dabo tibi hoc aut illud. Ibid. pag. 181.

(13) Extracted from the Travels of Rabbi Petachias, pag. 181.

Here are fables enough; but this truth may certainly be inferred from them: that the invocation of ſaints has been long practiſed by the Jews; for, not to inſiſt on the other proofs, we here ſee Rabbi Petachias, who makes offerings and prayers to Ezekiel, and pretends they wrought a great miracle. Ipſe R. Petachias ad Ezechielis ſepulchrum ſe contulit, obryzum, ſive auri grana manibus ſecum afferens. Ea cum ex manibus forte fortuna excidiſſent, Domine Ezechiel, inquit, tui honoris cauſa excеſſi, (& ceu facere me par erat, dona mea quæ tibi litarem, mecum attuli.) Sed amiſi grana (aurea, huic rei deſtinata, improvide) & perierunt illa, nihilo minus ubicunque locorum jacent, tua ſunto. (Dixerat hæc) & mox conſpicit oculis ſuis, e longinquo, aliquid ſideris inſtar micare: cum gemmam eſſe ſuſpicaretur, eo ſe contulit, & rem ſcrutatus eſt, reperitque grana ſua aurea, ac proinde Ezechielis ſepulchro illa dedicavit (14). i. e. "R Petachias himſelf repaired to Ezekiel's ſe-"pulchre, carrying ſome grains of pure gold in his "hands; and they accidentally falling out of his "hands, he ſaid, my Lord Ezekiel, I came forth to "ſhew honour to thee, and, as was my duty, brought "my gifts with me, to preſent to thee. But I have care-"leſly loſt the grains of gold deſigned for this purpoſe, "and they are not to be found: nevertheleſs, where-"ever they lie, they are thine. No ſooner had he "ſaid this than he perceived at a diſtance ſomething "ſhining out of the Canon of Scripture [D]. It has been pretended that Pythagoras was his Diſciple [E]. The moſt learned and laborious Commentary on Ezekiel which has hitherto appeared is that of two Spaniſh Jeſuits (f), in three Volumes in folio. We muſt not confound this Prophet with EZEKIEL a Jewiſh Poet, of whoſe Writing we have a Greek Tragedy ſtill extant [F].

(14) Ibid. pag. 180, 181.

(f) Pradus and Villalpandus.

" ſhining like a ſtar; and thinking it to be a precious " ſtone, he went thither, and ſeeking for it found " his grains of gold, which he therefore dedicated to " the tomb of Ezekiel." Theſe fables would not be publiſhed among the Jews, if they thought the invocation of ſaints to be forbidden. The Proteſtants have reaſon to lament the ſhameful credulity of this people, and the impudence of their writers in publiſhing a hundred thouſand idle ſtories; but every one ought to learn, by what paſſes among his own party, that the declivity in this place is very ſlippery. How many things are there in the practice of Proteſtants at this day, which they would not have approved a hundred years ago? I am certain the Author of the Paſtoral Letters has publiſhed more falſe miracles than he ought to have done: but I am not leſs certain that accounts have been ſent him in writing of a great many more than are to be found in his Letters. Now conſider a little that excepting a very ſmall number of people, moſt of whom were Lay-men, no body has appeared to be ſhocked at this publiſhing of myſterious events. What a paſs ſhould we have been at by this time, if the predictions which the Author founded thereon had had any kind of ſucceſs? Generally ſpeaking, what a paſs ſhould we have now been at, if we were not kept in awe by the ſpirit of contradiction, on ſeeing how matters go in the Romiſh Communion?

REFLECTIONS on people's inclination to credulity.

[D] It has been given out that in an Aſſembly of Rabbins . . . he was very near being excluded out of the Canon of Scripture.] The Talmud contains a Treatiſe (15) wherein we read, that the Rabbins, conſidering there are in the Prophecies of Ezekiel ſome paſſages which ſeem contrary to the doctrine of Moſes, took it into deliberation whether it would not be proper to reject that Prophet's work. The votes being collected, ſentence of degradation was going to be pronounced, when one Ananias repreſented that he would undertake to reconcile the differences which were found between Moſes and Ezekiel: and as he furniſhed them on the ſpot with a method for reconciling thoſe differences which gave ſatisfaction, they let the Book of Ezekiel continue among the Canonical ones. See what anſwer Biſhop Huet (16) has given to this remark of Spinoza.

(15) It is that de Sabbatho. See Huetii, Demonſtrat. Evangel. pag. 462.

(16) Ubi ſupra.

[E] It has been pretended that Pythagoras was his diſciple.] They ground it on a paſſage of Clemens Alexandrinus; but this foundation is very weak, ſince that Father himſelf rejects what he mentions. Here are his words (17): Ἀλεξάνδρῳ δὲ ἐν τῷ περὶ Πυθαγορικῶν συμβόλων, Νασαράτῳ τῷ Ἀσσυρίῳ μαθητεῦσαι ἱστορεῖ τὸν Πυθαγόραν· ἰσχυρίζεται τοῦτον ἡγεῖταί τινες· οὐκ ἔστι δὲ, ὡς ὕστερα δηλωθήσεται. Alexander autem in libro de ſymbolis Pythagoricis refert Pythagoram fuiſſe diſcipulum Nazarati Aſſyrii, quidam eum exiſtimant Ezekielem, ſed non eſt ut oſtendetur poſtea. i. e. " Alexander, in his Book " of the Pythagoric Symbols, relates that Pytha- " goras was the diſciple of Nazaratus the Aſſyri- " an, whom ſome ſuppoſe to have been Ezekiel; " but he was not, as will appear hereafter." We ſhould excuſe thoſe (18) who imagine Clemens Alexandrinus's meaning to be that Pythagoras was Ezekiel, according to the opinion of ſome; for if we conſult the rules of Grammar only, this explication is as good as the other. All the Greek and Latin Books are full of theſe equivocal expreſſions: we find ſome periods in them wherein two or three perſons are mentioned, and afterwards a pronoun which may be equally referred to all the three. A Reader muſt divine, by repeated meditations on what goes before or what follows, to which of them it ought to relate. I think I have ſaid more than once that the French tongue, when the rules are rightly obſerved, is not ſubject to theſe inconveniences. But though we may excuſe thoſe who miſunderſtand this paſſage of Clemens Alexandrinus, it is certain that when the thread of the diſcourſe is maturely weighed, one plainly perceives that the word τοῦτον relates to Nazaratus, and not to Pythagoras. Sunt qui hæc Clementis verba ita interpretentur, quaſi Ezechielem non Zaratum, ſed Pythagoram haberi à quibuſdam voluerit, quod non ita eſſe cognoſcet, quiſquis locum totum attente luſtraverit (19).

(17) Clemens Alexand. Stromat. lib. 1. pag. 304.

(18) Father Rapin is one of them. Clemens Alexandrinus, ſays he, pag. m. 287. of the Compariſon of Plato and Ariſtotle, pretends that Pythagoras paſſed in the opinion of ſome of the Learned in his time for the Prophet Ezekiel, but without any foundation.

[F] There is an Ezekiel, a Jewiſh Poet, of whoſe writing we have a Greek Tragedy ſtill extant.] The Tragedy we have of his is intitled Ἐξαγωγὴ; and the ſubject of it is the Departure out of Egypt. They ſay he was one of the Interpreters concerned in the Bible of the Septuagint. Chronology allows it; for he is quoted by Authors who lived before the Chriſtian Æra, and who take no notice of his having been lately dead. Certe non Euſebium ſolum & Clementem Alexandrinum præceſſit ætate, ſed & Alexandrum Polyhiſtorem qui fuit L. Sullæ æqualis, & Demetrium Judæum qui ex ejus ſcriptis fragmenta depromit apud Euſebium. Vixiſſe autem Demetrium hunc inter Ptolemæos, Philopatora & Lathyrum, paulo poſt patefaciam (20). i. e. " He was " certainly not only more ancient than Euſebius, and " Clemens Alexandrinus, but even more ancient than " Alexander Polyhiſtor, who was contemporary with " L. Sylla, and than Demetrius the Jew, who pro- " duces ſome paſſages out of his Writings in Euſebius. " I ſhall make it appear a little lower that this De- " metrius lived between the two Ptolemy's, Philopa- " tor, and Lathyrus." I have juſt now read a particular in the Hamburg Journal which perſuades me that the Prophet Ezekiel, and the Poet Ezekiel, are not always diſtinguiſhed from one another. Here are the words of the Journaliſt (91). The example of the Greeks and Romans is not the only one by which this Author (22) pretends to ſhew the eſteem which the Ancients had for Dramatic Poems. He joins to it that of the Hebrews, who have not judged them contrary to the purity of God's worſhip, and who even thought they might make uſe of them to repreſent the moſt memorable events of their Hiſtory. To prove it he quotes the fragment of a Tragedy intitled, The Departure out of Egypt, which he attributes to Ezekiel. There are but few, in my opinion, who are acquainted with this fragment; and I own I had never heard it mentioned till now, not even by the late Mr. Fremond d'Ablancourt, who found Dramatic Poems every where throughout the Old Teſtament, and who had thence made himſelf a key for the explication of ſeveral difficult paſſages, and in particular of the Canticles and the Book of Pſalms (23). As I have not the Book of which the Journaliſt is here giving an Extract, I cannot ſay whether the Author has therein expreſſed himſelf ſo as to juſtify charging him with having aſcribed this Tragedy to the Prophet Ezekiel.

(19) Huet. Demonſtr. Evang. pag. 459. He reads in this Father not Ναζάρατος but Ζάρατος. See Selden, de Diis Syris, lib. 2. cap. 1.

(20) Idem Huet. ibid. pag. m. 99. He quotes Euſeb. de Præparat. Evangel. lib. 9. cap. 21. and Clem. Alexand. Stromat. lib. 1.

(22) He is a French Miniſter named Mr. Dartis, a man of wit, and Author of ſome very good Books.

(23) That is, the Author of the Diſſertation on the Condemnation of the Stage.

(23) Journal de Hambourg, for Octob. 1694. pag. 68, 69.

F.

FABRETTI (RAPHAEL), a very learned Antiquary in the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Urbino in Umbria of a noble family in 1619. After he had paſſed through his courſe of ſtudies at Cagli, a City in that Duchy, he returned to Urbino to accompliſh himſelf in the knowledge of the Law, in which he was admitted Doctor at eighteen years of age. At Rome he had an elder brother, named Stephen, who was an eminent Advocate, and whoſe example our Author following, went to Rome, and applied himſelf to the Bar, where he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf to ſuch advantage, that he was put in a way of advancing his fortune. Cardinal Imperiali entertained ſo great an eſteem for him, that he ſent him into Spain in order to negotiate ſeveral important and difficult affairs; which he did with ſuch ſucceſs, that the office of Procurator Fiſcal of the Nunciature of that Kingdom falling vacant, the Cardinal procured it for him. Fabretti continued thirteen years in Spain, where he was for ſome time Auditor General of the Nunciature. Theſe employments did not engage him ſo much, but that he found time to read the Antients, and apply himſelf to polite Literature. He returned to Rome with Cardinal Charles Bonelli, who had been Nuncio in Spain, and from his domeſtic became his moſt intimate friend; and in his return he ſaw whatever was curious in Spain, France, and Italy. Upon his return to Rome he was appointed Judge of the Appeals to the Capitol, which poſt he afterwards quitted for that of Auditor of the Legation of Urbino under the Cardinal Legate Charles Cerri. His reſidence in his own country gave him an opportunity of ſettling his private affairs, which had been greatly diſordered during his abſence. He continued there three years, which appeared very long to him, becauſe his inclination to Study and Antiquities made him wiſh to ſettle at Rome, where he might eaſily gratify his deſires in that way. He readily accepted therefore of the invitation of Cardinal Carpegna, the Pope's Vicar, who employed him in drawing up the Apoſtolical briefs, and other diſpatches belonging to his office, and in aſſiſting at the examination of thoſe who preſented themſelves for Orders, and gave him the inſpection of the Relics found at Rome and the parts adjacent. This laſt employment furniſhed him with frequent opportunities of gratifying his inclination for Antiquities of all kinds [A]. Pope Alexander VIII, whom our Author had ſerved for ſome time as Auditor, when the former was Cardinal, made him Secretary of the Memorials, when he was advanced to the Pontificate; and had a great eſteem for him, taking great pleaſure in his converſation, and gave him a Canonry of St. Laurence in Damaſo; from which he was preferred to another in the Vatican. It is not doubted that this Pope would have raiſed him to higher dignities, if he had not been cut off by death after he had held the See of Rome ſixteen months. Fabretti upon this retired from buſineſs, and applied himſelf entirely to his ſtudies, the fruits of which are ſeveral excellent works [B]. To prevent [A] This laſt employment furniſhed him with frequent opportunities of gratifying his inclination for antiquities of all kinds.] He went to ſearch antiquities in the country about Rome without any other companion than his horſe, and without any regard to the heat or inclemency of the weather. As he always made uſe of the ſame horſe, his friends gave that animal by way of jeſt the name of Marco Polo, the famous traveller, and ſaid that this horſe uſed to diſcover antient monuments by the ſmell, and ſtopp'd of himſelf immediately, when he came to any ruins of an old building. Fabretti was ſo well pleaſed with this name given to his horſe, that he made uſe of it to write a Letter to one of his friends in an ironical ſtrain, but full of learning, upon the ſtudy of Antiquity. This Letter was never printed (1).

(1) Dominico Riviera, Vite degli Arcadi, tom. 1.

[B] His works.] They are as follow: I. De Aquis & Aquæ-ductibus veteris Romæ Diſſertationes tres. Rome 1680 in 4to. There were in ancient Rome about twenty kinds of water, or rather rivulets, which were brought thither from diſtant places by means of aqueducts, and produced a great number of fountains. Theſe aqueducts were rank'd among the principal public ſtructures, on account not only of their uſefulneſs, but likewiſe their magnificence, and the ſtrength of their building. Fabretti's deſign in this work is to explain every thing which relates to theſe kinds of antiquity; and his Book may ſerve to give great light to Frontinus, who has treated of the Aqueducts of Rome as they were in his time, under the Emperor Trajan. Kuſter in his Bibliotheca Librorum novorum (2), publiſh'd under the name of L. Neocorus, tells us, that theſe Diſſertations of Fabretti contain a great many excellent obſervations, and a ſolid confutation of various miſtakes of learned men: in quibus multa præclarè obſervantur, variique doctorum virorum errores ſolidè refelluntur. They have been inſerted in the fourth volume of the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Romanarum congeſtus à Joh. Georgio Grævio. Acceſſerunt variæ & accuratæ tabulæ æneæ: printed at Utrecht 1697 in fol. II. De Columna Trajana Syntagma. Acceſſerunt Explicatio veteris Tabellæ Anaglyphæ Homeri Iliadem, atque ex Steſichoro, Archino, & Leſche Ilii excidium continentis, & emiſſarii Lacus Fucini Deſcriptio. Rome 1683 in fol. This Book contains ſeveral curious diſquiſitions concerning Antiquity. III. Faſithei ad Gronovium Apologema, in ejuſque Titivilitia, ſive de Tito Livio ſomnia, Animadverſiones. Naples 1686 in 4to. Our Author in this Book has diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Faſitheus, which is the Greek of his name Raphael, which in Hebrew is the ſame as ἴασις Θεοῦ, i. e. the medicine of God (3). This work is an anſwer to James Gronovius's Reſponſio ad Cavillationes R. Fabretti, printed at Leyden 1685 in 8vo. Fabretti had given occaſion to this diſpute by cenſuring in his Book de Aquis & Aquæductibus ſome corrections of Gronovius, and by that means drawn upon him an adverſary, who treated him without any ceremony in his anſwer. Fabretti replied to him in the ſame manner, tho' the point was of little importance, and turned only upon mere queſtions of Grammar. IV. Inſcriptionum antiquarum, quæ in ædibus paternis

(2) For April and May 1697, pag. 11. edit. Trajecti ad Rhenum 1697, in 12mo.

(3) Monſ. de la Monnoye, Obſervat. ſur Baillet, Jugem. des Savans, tom. 5. pag. 245. edit. Amſterd. 1725, in 4to.

prevent any interruption in these purſuits, he confined himſelf to a deſert part in the City of Rome; but foreigners did not fail to viſit him there, the greateſt part of whom contracted a friendſhip with him, which they afterwards preſerved by a correſpondence of Letters. Pope Innocent XII obliged him to quit his retirement, and made him Keeper of the Archives in the Caſtle of St. Angelo; a poſt, which is never given but to men of approved integrity, ſince he, who enjoys that place, is maſter of all the ſecrets of the Pope's temporal eſtate. All theſe different employments which he poſſeſſed, never interrupted his reſearches into Antiquity; and he collected enough to adorn his paternal houſe at Urbino, as well as that which he had built at Rome after the death of Pope Alexander VIII. Old age likewiſe and the infirmities incident to it could not divert him from his ſtudies, nor hinder him from labouring at the edition of his works, which he printed at his own houſe. He died January the 7th 1700, in the 80th year of his age. He had a lively genius, an eaſy conception, and an excellent memory; and having a ſtrong inclination for learning, he ſpared no pains to make himſelf a thorough maſter of it. His conſtitution was very weak in his youth; but it was confirmed afterwards, and from thirty years of age he enjoyed a perfect ſtate of health. He was a Member of the Academy of the Aſſorditi at Urbino, and the Arcadi at Rome (a).

(a) See his Elogium by Dominico Riviera in Vite degli Arcadi, tom. I.

paternis aſſervantur, Explicatio & Additamentum. Rome 1699 in fol. This work is divided into eight chapters. The firſt chapter treats de Titulis & Columbariis. For the better underſtanding of theſe terms, we muſt ſuppoſe, that the ancients, eſpecially thoſe of quality, had great monuments, which ſerved all thoſe, who were of the ſame family. Thoſe monuments or ſepulchres were divided into ſeveral niches like thoſe of a dove-houſe, whence the Latins took occaſion to call them Columbaria. In each nich were placed veſſels or urns, which contained the aſhes or bones of each particular perſon, whoſe name was written over them; and thoſe inſcriptions they called Tituli. Fabretti ſhews, that there never was any Decree among the Romans to burn the corps; and that ſince the time of the Dictator Sylla, who was the firſt whoſe body was burnt, the ancient practice of interring the dead was never totally diſuſed. The aſhes were put into veſſels which were called Ollæ; but before the aſhes were put into them, they were called Virgines. In this chapter our Author likewiſe proves, that the ancients by the words Livia Auguſti in their inſcriptions underſtood Auguſtus's wife, and not his daughter; and that all the Gladiators were not of a ſervile condition, but ſome of them of Equeſtrian Families. In the ſecond chapter he ſhews, that the name of Genii was ſometimes given to the Dii Manes, ſometimes to the ſouls of men, and ſometimes to thoſe middle powers, which were betwixt Gods and men. He proves alſo, that the city of Parma was antiently called Julia Chryſopolis. In the third chapter he obſerves, that the ancients in their inſcriptions put a point at the end of every word, but almoſt always at the end of every line, and ſometimes after each ſyllable. He inquires into the meaning of the word Aſcia in the ancient Inſcriptions, a term which, he ſays, he meets with ſcarce any where but in the Inſcriptions of the Gauls. In the fourth chapter he remarks, that the word Alumnus is never taken in an active, but in a paſſive ſenſe, in good Authors. In the ſeventh he obſerves, that the weights of the ancients were greater than thoſe of the moderns. In the eighth he affirms, that the veſſels of glaſs found near the tombs of the ancient Chriſtians were a ſign of their martyrdom; and that the red ſtains perceived upon them are ſome remains of the blood, which the faithful put into them. At the end of this Collection, he gives us an account of the corrections, which he had made in the Inſcriptions collected by Gruter, in two volumes; beſides an infinite number of other emendations ſcattered every where in this Book, upon divers Compilers of ancient Inſcriptions. Our Author had an admirable talent in decyphering the moſt difficult Inſcriptions, and diſcovered a method of making ſomething out of thoſe ancient Inſcriptions, which ſeemed entirely diſfigured, and the letters of which were effaced in ſuch a manner, as not to be diſcernible. He cleanſed the ſurface of the ſtone without touching thoſe places, where the letters had been engraved. He then laid upon it a piece of thick paper well moiſtened, and preſſed it with a ſpunge or wooden pin covered with linnen; by which means the paper enter'd into the cavity of the letters, and took up the duſt there, the traces of which diſcovered the letters, which had been formerly engraven there. Monſr. Baudelot (4) informs us of a ſecret very like this, in order to read upon medals thoſe letters, which are difficult to be decypher'd. V. A Letter to the Abbé Nicaiſe, containing an Inſcription remarkable for the elegance of its ſtyle, inſerted in the Journal des Savans of Decemb. 17th 1691. T.

(4) In his book De l'Utilite des Voyages.

FABRICIUS LUSCINUS (CAIUS) a Roman General, was as commendable for his honeſty and frugality [A] as for his courage, and gave remarkable proofs of all thoſe eminent qualities during the war with Pyrrhus. He was Conſul for the firſt time in the year 471 ſince the building of Rome, and gained (a) ſignal victories over the Samnites, the Brutii, and the Lucanians [B]. He cauſed the ſiege of Thurium to be raiſed, and got ſo conſiderable a booty, that after he had given the ſoldiers a very large ſhare of it, and had

(a) Dion. Hal. Excerpt. de Legat.

[A] He was commendable for his . . frugality.] He refuſed not only Pyrrhus's preſents, but alſo thoſe of the Samnites. The fact deſerves to be related at length (1). The Embaſſadors they ſent him having expatiated on the ſervices he had done their nation ſince the peace, deſired him to accept a large ſum of money, which they were order'd to offer him; eſpecially ſince he wanted a great many things neceſſary for the ornament of his houſe and table, and had not the attendants which his dignity and merit required. Hereupon Fabricius extended his hands from his ears to his eyes, then over his noſe, his mouth, his breaſt and ſo down to the lower part of his belly, and ſaid to the Embaſſadors, As long as I ſhall be able to command over all thoſe parts which I have touched, I ſhall want nothing. Since therefore I have not the leaſt occaſion for money, I will never accept it from them who I know do want it. All the plate he had was a ſilver cup and ſalt-ſeller, nor would he ſuffer that the Generals ſhould have more. Bellicoſos Imperatores plus quam pateram & ſalinum ex argento habere vetabat (2). He lived upon herbs which he cultivated and gathered himſelf (3).

(1) Julius Higinus, de vita rebuſque illuſtr. Virorum, lib. 6. apud A. Gellium, lib. 1. cap. 14. See alſo Val. Max. lib. 4. cap. 3.

(2) Plinius, lib. 33. cap. 12. See alſo Val. Max. lib. 4. cap. 4.

(3) Seneca, de Provid. cap. 3.

[B] He gained ſignal victories over the Samnites, the Brutii, and the Lucanians.] Sigonius (4) would not have groped in the dark as he has done upon this Conſulſhip, nor would he have aſſerted that Fabricius triumphed over the Tuſcans and the Gauls, if he had known what I have quoted from Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. He ought not to have placed under Fabricius's ſecond Conſulſhip what Valerius Maximus relates concerning the raiſing of the ſiege of Thurium (5), a circumſtance in which the Romans pretended that their God Mars fought viſibly for them (6). Compare this with the St. George of our Cruſades or Holy-Wars. This ſiege was raiſed under Fabricius's firſt Conſulſhip (7). The Citizens of Thurium erected a monument to their deliverer (8).

(4) Comment. in Faſt. ad ann. 471.

(5) Valer. Max. lib. 1. cap. 8. num. 6.

(6) Idem, ibid. Amm. Marcell. lib. 24. cap. 4.

(7) Ex Dionyſ. Halicarn.

(8) Plin. lib. 34. cap. 6. ſub fin.

had reſtored to the Citizens of Rome all that they had contributed towards the expence of the war, there were ſtill four hundred talents left, which were carried into the Exchequer the day of his triumph: he was the only perſon who kept nothing of thoſe rich ſpoils for himſelf. His Collegue in the Conſulſhip was Quintus Æmilius Papus, with whom he was again Conſul in the year 475 (b). But between theſe two Conſulſhips muſt be placed his Embaſſy to Pyrrhus [C]. He was ſent to that Prince with a commiſſion to treat concerning the ranſom of thoſe who had been made priſoners in the battle which the Conſul Lævinus loſt in the year 473. Pyrrhus being told that Fabricius was very poor offered him money (c), but Fabricius would not accept of it, though the King proteſted that he would not require of him any thing that was diſhoneſt, and had no other deſign than to give him a pledge of his friendſhip. Fabricius being once at that Prince's table, Cineas ſpeaking of the Epicureans ſaid, that they placed the ſummum bonum or higheſt happineſs in a voluptuous life, entirely free from all public buſineſs, and that they did not believe that the Gods minded the government of this world; whereupon Fabricius cried out, Heaven grant that Pyrrhus and the Samnites take a great delight in this Philoſophy as long as they wage war againſt us (d). This reflection was not one of the leaſt reaſons which gave Pyrrhus a very good opinion of the Romans. He was ſo well pleaſed with Fabricius's behaviour, that he offered him the firſt place in his Council and in his Armies, if he would go over to him after the peace ſhould be concluded (e). But this Roman anſwered with his wonted ſincerity, It is not your intereſt to have me with you, for they, who at preſent honour and admire you, would chooſe rather to have me for their King, if they ſhould once know what I can do. This diſcourſe, tho' not very obliging, yet did not ſeem to offend Pyrrhus, and did not prevent the good ſucceſs of Fabricius's embaſſy. During his Conſulſhip in the year 475 he ſhewed Pyrrhus a noble example of honeſty, for he let him know that his own Phyſician offered to poiſon him [D], if he was but ſure of a reward. We muſt place under this year the battle of Aſculum, which was the ſecond againſt Pyrrhus [E]. The moſt probable opinion is that the Romans loſt

(b) Cicero, de Amicit. cap. 11.

(c) Plut. in Pyrrho. Dion. Hal. Excerpt. de Legat.

(d) Plut. in Pyrrho. Val. Max. lib. 4. cap. 3. See alſo Cicero, de Senect. cap. 12.

(e) Idem, Plut. in Pyrrho. Eutropius ſays, that Pyrrhus offered Fabricius the fourth part of his Kingdom.

[C] Between theſe two Conſulſhips muſt be placed his Embaſſy to Pyrrhus.] The Authors do not agree concerning the time of this embaſſy. Some pretend that Fabricius was ſent to Pyrrhus before Cineas came to Rome (9); others aſſert it was after Cineas was returned to his maſter. Plutarch is of this laſt opinion (10). However it is certain that Pyrrhus did nothing conſiderable in his ſecond campaign. The two firſt battles were fought the former during the firſt campaign, the latter during the third: the intermediate year was ſpent in negotiations for a peace. Now it was during this interval that Fabricius went to Pyrrhus, and that Cineas was ſent to the Romans. But whether of them ſet out firſt cannot be eaſily determined with any certainty. Adhuc ſub judice lis eſt. It is ſtill a matter of diſpute.

(9) Vide Sigonium in Faſt. ad ann. 473. and Eutropium, lib. 2.

(10) In Pyrrho, pag. 395.

[D] He let Pyrrhus know, that his own Phyſician offered to poiſon him.] This fact is attended with a thouſand difficulties in the Authors that mention it. Some ſay (11) that an unknown perſon brought Fabricius a letter from Pyrrhus's Phyſician, by which he promiſed, that he would poiſon his maſter, if they would abundantly reward him for it, and that Fabricius deteſting ſuch an offer wrote together with his collegue to Pyrrhus, and ſent him his Phyſician's letter. Plutarch tranſcribes the letter which the two Conſuls wrote, and gives us afterwards an account of the battle of Aſculum as being a fact which happened after the Phyſician's offer. Others (12) aſſert, that after Pyrrhus had gained the two firſt battles, one Timocharis came ſecretly to the Conſul Fabricius, and promiſed that if they could agree about a reward, he would poiſon Pyrrhus, which he could eaſily do, becauſe his ſons were the King's Cup-bearers. Fabricius wrote to the Senate about this: the Senate ſent Embaſſadors to Pyrrhus, who adviſed him in general words to beware of his ſervants, but were not to mention Timochares: They would have ſome regard for a man, who deſigned to do them a piece of ſervice; and they would alſo be juſt towards Pyrrhus. Timocharis nomen ſuppreſſit, utroque modo æquitatem amplexus, qui nec hoſtem malo exemplo tollere, neque eum qui bene mereri paratus fuerat prodere voluit (13). Others (14) maintain that the perſon, who came to meet Fabricius, was called Nicias, and that it was not the Senate but the Conſuls who ſent to Pyrrhus. They tranſcribe the Conſul's Letter word for word, but it is not the ſame we read in Plutarch. Some (15) ſay, that Pyrrhus's Phyſician was called Cineas, and that he wrote to the Senate, and that the Senate rejected his offer, and gave Pyrrhus notice of it. Others again (16) pretend, that Fabricius ſent back to Pyrrhus the deſerter who offered to poiſon him, and that the Senate approved the Conſul's action. According to ſome (17), Pyrrhus's Phyſician came himſelf to Fabricius, who ſent him back bound and fettered to his maſter. Florus (18) does not aſcribe this action to Fabricius but to Curius. Medicum venale Regis Pyrrhi caput afferentem Curius remiſit. i. e. "Curius ſent back to Pyrrhus his Phyſician, "who offered to ſell that Prince's life." In this Florus ſhewed himſelf a leſs ſkilful Judge than Pyrrhus, who by this action knew his Fabricius, and cried out that he alone and no other perſon could with more difficulty be put out of his cuſtomary path of virtue, than the ſun could be drawn from his uſual courſe (19). I do not wonder, that conſidering theſe different accounts of the ancients, their tranſcribers ſhould miſtake one thing for another. See Freinſhemius upon Florus; you will find that he entirely miſrepreſents what Aulus Gellius had borrowed from Valerius Antias and Quadrigarius. I ſhall make no reflections upon this great difference of accounts; I leave them to my readers: I ſhall only obſerve, that we ſhould not find facts related with ſo many incoherent circumſtances, if the Authors could be cured of the two following defects; the firſt is their truſting too much to their memory; the ſecond is their exceſſive boldneſs in giving the ancient examples they alledge, ſuch a turn as ſuits beſt with the ſubject they have in hand. As for the moral reflections upon the honeſty of the ancient Romans, which excels ſo much that of our age, they are ſo obvious to every reader, that I need not mention them. See Seneca's CXXth Epiſtle.

(11) Plut. in Pyrrho, pag. 396.

(12) Valerius Antias apud Gellium, lib. 3. cap. 8. See alſo Val. Maxim. lib. 6. cap. 5.

(13) Valerius Maximus, ibid.

(14) Quadrigarius, apud Gellium, lib. 3. cap. 8.

(15) Ælian. Div. Hiſt. lib. 12. cap. 33. It ſhould, it ſeems, be read, Nicias, inſtead of Cineas, as Andrew Schottus has obſerved, lib. 3. Obſerv. Hiſt. cap. 34. Schefferus, upon this paſſage of Ælian is miſtaken, when he ſays that Valerius Antias calls this Phyſician Nicias.

(16) Cic. de Offic. lib. 3. cap. 22.

(17) Eutropius, lib. 2. Aurel. Victor, de Viris Illuſtr.

(18) Lib. 1. cap. 18.

(19) Suidas, in Ἀποσυγχοῦντες, and in Φαβρίκιος. See alſo Eutropius, lib. 2. and Aurelius Victor, de Viris Illuſtribus.

[E] The battle of Aſculum . . . was the ſecond againſt Pyrrhus.] The Authors reckon generally but three battles between this Prince and the Romans, the two firſt of which were fought before his voyage into Sicily, and the third after his return into Italy. But they who have aſſerted that the Conſul P. Decius was killed in a battle againſt Pyrrhus (20) muſt either acknowledge that there were four battles fought (21), or they muſt deny that Pyrrhus fought with Fabricius: For it is certain that Decius's Conſulſhip happened before Fabricius was Conſul the ſecond time, and after Lævinus's Conſulſhip, during which the firſt battle was fought. Eutropius, who places the ſecond battle under Decius's Conſulſhip, ſays that Pyrrhus went the next year into Sicily, and that Fabricius made war only againſt the Samnites and the Lucanians, over whom he triumphed. Plutarch and Florus aſſert poſitively that the ſecond battle was fought between Pyrrhus and Fabricius. How can we truſt to the ancient Hiſtorians

(20) Quod quidem ejus factum niſi eſſet jure laudatum non eſſet imitatus quarto ſuo conſulatu filius; neque porro ex eo natus cum Pyrrho bellum gerens Conſul cecidiſſet in prælio, ſeque è continenti genere tertiam victimam reipublicæ præbuiſſet. Cic. lib. 2. de Finib. cap. 19.

(21) Father Labbe, Chronol. Franc. and La Faiole, Hiſt. de la Répub. Rom. admit four battles, but the former places that in which Decius was killed, before Fabricius's Conſulſhip, and the latter places it after it.

loſt it [F], but that it coſt the conqueror ſo many brave men, that he did no longer hope to gain any advantage by continuing the war, ſo that it happened very luckily for him that he was called to aſſiſt the Sicilians. Fabricius was Cenſor in the year 478, and had for his Collegue (f) the ſame Æmilius Papus with whom he had been twice Conſul. They gave an inſtance of great ſtrictneſs and ſeverity; for they (g) degraded a Senator called Cornelius Rufinus, who had been a Dictator, and twice a Conſul; and the only reaſon they had for doing it was, that they had found at his houſe ten pound weight of ſilver plate for the uſe of his table. Fabricius had hated this man a long while, and yet he laboured to make him obtain the Conſulſhip at a time when he thought that he was more capable than his competitors to acquit himſelf of that employment for the good of the Commonwealth; on which occaſion he ſaid a good thing which Tully relates [G]. Who would wonder that ſuch a man died ſo poor, that they were obliged to marry his daughter at the expence of the Public [H]? I read in no Author what Moreri relates, namely, that the Senate was obliged to bear the charges of his funeral. I only know that in order to honour his great virtues, they (h) broke in his behalf through the Law of the Twelve Tables, by which it was prohibited to bury any perſon in the City.

(f) Cicero, de Amicitia, cap. 11.

(g) Gellius, lib. 4. cap. 8. and lib. 18. cap. ult.

(b) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. 3.

Hiſtorians in things of little importance, ſince it cannot be known with any certainty in what years the moſt remarkable battles happened?

[F] . . The moſt probable opinion is that the Romans loſt it.] The ancients have alſo had their battles of Seneff; in which each party claimed the victory, and returned ſolemn thanks to God for it in the moſt pompous manner. See what has been obſerved upon this battle of Aſculum in the remark [M] of the article PYRRHUS. In ſome reſpects nothing is eaſier than for Providence to pleaſe all parties. Men do ſeldom own that fortune was favourable to their enemy in the war; they almoſt always publiſh that he was beaten, and has a thouſand reaſons to be vexed. If he happened to have ſome ſucceſs, they abuſe him for doing but little, and for not knowing how to improve the opportunity he had: they ſuppoſe that he had formed a thouſand great deſigns, and deſerves to be expoſed to public laughter ſince they all miſcarried. There are few perſons that want leſs than the News-Writers, to be encouraged to ſing and praiſe God's favours and bleſſings: Theſe Writers might be left out of a Canticle, that ſhould be written after the manner of that which the Hebrew boys ſung *. For they practiſe wonderfully well the commandment, Rejoice evermore (22).

* See that ſong in the Apocrypha.

(22) St. Paul's 1ſt Epiſtle to the Theſſalonians, chap. 5. ver. 16.

[G] He ſaid a good thing, which Tully relates.] This P. Cornelius Rufinus was a brave and great Captain, but prodigiouſly covetous and rapacious (23). He petitioned for the Conſulſhip at a time when the Commonwealth was in danger. His competitors were men of no merit, and who did not underſtand the art of war. Fabricius, tho' he hated Rufinus, yet he made great intereſt for him: Men wondered at it, and aſked him the reaſon of his conduct. It is, ſaid he, becauſe I chooſe rather to be plundered than to be ſold. Nihil eſt quod miremini, ſi malui compilari quam vænire (24). Cicero pretends that Fabricius made this anſwer to Rufinus himſelf, who gave him thanks for his kind ſervices. Nihil eſt quod mihi gratias agas, inquit, ſi malui compilari, quam vænire (25). i. e. "You need "not return me thanks, ſaid he, if I choſe rather, &c."

(23) Aulus Gellius, lib. 4. cap. 8.

(24) Idem, ibid. See alſo Quintil. lib. 12. cap. 1. pag. m. 558.

(25) Cicero, lib. 2. de Oratore, cap. 67.

[H] They were obliged to marry his daughter at the expence of the public.] I ſhall quote two Authors. Senatus Fabricii Luſcini Scipioniſque filias ab indotatis nuptiis liberalitate ſua vindicavit, quoniam paternæ hæreditati præter opimam gloriam nihil erat quod acceptum referrent (26). "The Senate generouſly gave a portion "to the daughters of Fabricius Luſcinus and Scipio, "when they married; becauſe they had inherited "nothing from their father, but glory of their name." This is the firſt paſſage I promiſed to quote; the ſecond is taken from Apulejus. Quod ſi modo judices de cauſa iſta ſederent C. Fabricius, Cor. Scipio, Manius Curius, quorum Filiæ ob paupertatem de publico dotibus donatæ ad maritos iverunt, portantes gloriam domeſticam pecuniam publicam (27). i. e. "If C. Fabricius, Cn. "Scipio and Manius Curius were but judges in this "cauſe whoſe daughters becauſe they were poor receiv-"ed a portion from the Treaſury, and brought thus "to their huſbands with the money of the public the "glory of their own families."

(26) Val. Max. lib. 4. cap. 4.

(27) Apuleius, Apolog. 1. pag. m. 286.

FABRICIUS (VINCENT) a native of Hamburg in the ſeventeenth Century, was eminent for his wit and learning, and for the civil employments with which he was intruſted. He was a good Poet, an able Phyſician, a great Orator, and a learned Civilian. He gained the eſteem of all the learned men in Holland whilſt he ſtudied at Leyden, and they liked his Latin Poems ſo well, that they adviſed him to print them. He publiſhed them in the year 1632. This edition has been followed by ſome others [A]. He

[A] The firſt Edition of his Poems has been followed by ſome others.] I muſt not forget to obſerve that it was Daniel Heinſius, at whoſe houſe he lodged, who chiefly encouraged him to publiſh his Latin Poems. He was not much pleaſed with this firſt Edition; wherefore he publiſhed another with corrections and additions in the year 1638. He added it to a Satyr in proſe, which he dedicated to Salmaſius, and which is entitled Pranſus paratus. The Poets who ſpend their time in making anagrams, thoſe that write ſmutty verſes, and they who deſpiſe the Poets, are all ſoundly ridiculed in that piece. Obſerve that he wrote a Latin Poem, which a Phyſician of Geneva (1) inſerted into the ſecond part of his Medecina ſeptentrionalis collatitia. Here follows what the Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres ſaid, when he gave an account of that Phyſician's Book. "This is "perhaps leſs ſurprizing than the ſtory of a Dutch "maid-ſervant, who had been ſhut up in a garden, "when three large carbuncles or plague-ſores had been "obſerved upon her during the plague which raged in "the year 1636. She thought of nothing but her "long home, when a young man, who was in love "with her, gave her no other remedy but the moſt "tender embraces he was capable of; and as he per-"ceived that they were of ſome effect, he took care, "in order to adminiſter the remedy oftener, to go "and lie every night with this infected maid. She "recovered her health perfectly well, and as for him, he "did not get the leaſt diſtemper from her. This gave "Vincent Fabricius an opportunity to write a pretty "Poem in Latin, which he dedicated to Salmaſius, "and which was ſoon after printed at Hamburg. It "is inſerted at length in this work, page 210 (2)." This was as happy a ſubject as a Poet could wiſh to write upon, and La Fontaine could have made a very merry tale of it, which might have been intitled, Love the Phyſician. Let the diſciples of Hippocrates and Galen inquire into the natural cauſes of this little miracle. What a triumph of love do we not ſee here? If this paſſion gives wit to the moſt ſtupid, it alſo inſpires the moſt cowardly with courage and boldneſs: for in all likelihood this maid's lover would have run away like an hare had he met a footman infected with the plague: but becauſe he was in love with this maid, and had a favourable opportunity to ſatisfy his paſſion, he ventured to expoſe himſelf to the danger, laughed at it, and was happy enough to find, by his own experience,

(1) Theophilus Bonnet.

(2) Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, Fevrier 1687, pag. 176.

He was for ſome time Counſellor to the Biſhop of Lubec, and afterwards Syndic of the City of Dantzic. This City alſo honoured him with the dignity of Burgomaſter, and ſent him thirteen times Deputy into Poland. He died at Warſaw during the Diet of the Kingdom April the 11th 1667, aged fifty four years. A Collection of his works was publiſhed in the year 1685, by the care of his ſon Frederic Fabricius (a). See the Remark.

perience, that fortune aſſiſts the bold (3).

(3) Audaces Fortuna juvat.

The moſt complete edition of our Fabricius's Poems is that of Leipſic in the year 1685; for beſides the Poems printed in the firſt Edition, it contains ſeveral others, which had never been publiſhed. I add that it contains alſo ſeveral adoptive pieces, and the Orations which the Author made to the Kings of Poland, and that which he delivered at Leiden in the year 1032 De Obſidione & Liberatione Urbis Leidenſis, (of the Siege and Deliverance of the City of Leiden) and the Theſes of Phyſick which were the ſubject of his publick diſputation at Leyden in the year 1634, &c (4).

(4) Taken from the Acta Eruditorum, printed at Leipſic for June 1686, pag. 278, 279.

FAKREDDIN (a), Prince of the Druſes in Syria, was expelled his dominions by the Turks, and took refuge at Malta, then at Florence, and afterwards at Rome, towards the year 1620 (b). He pretended to be related to the Duke of Lorrain. "The deſire of "reigning made him return to Mount Libanus. He again gave jealouſy to the Turks, "who made war upon him. He was perſuaded to go to Conſtantinople to juſtify him- "ſelf, and he had there his head ſtruck off. Mir Ali, his ſon, ſucceeded him, and had "for his ſucceſſor Mir Ahmed bin Mahan, and it is the ſon of this laſt who reigns at "preſent (c)." Thoſe people had formerly many Emirs, but Ibrahim Baſha of Cairo ſubdued them all in the year 1584, under Amurat III. Thirty or forty years after, Fakreddin made himſelf maſter of ſeveral Fortreſſes (d). The Mercure François (e) ſpeaks of his arrival at Florence under the year 1613, and relates ſome circumſtances of it; but if we would know his Hiſtory more exactly, and without engaging ourſelves in tedious reading, we muſt reſort to a Work of Mr. de la Croix (f). We ſhall there ſee that this Prince, whom the Arabs called ſimply Eben Maan, the ſon of Mana, took the name of Feccred-din, which ſignifies the flambeau or light of the Faith *; that he ſet up for a Conqueror; that he oppreſſed the people whom he had conquered; that having continued five years in Italy, he returned to his native country in the year 1618 with vaſt deſigns; but that not being able to execute them, he was obliged to ſubmit to Sultan Amurat, who cauſed him to be ſtrangled in his preſence the 14th of March 1633.

(a) He is named Fackraddin in a paſſage which I have quoted above, in Remark [B] of the Article ECCHELLENSIS.

(b) Journal des Savans, of the 12th of March 1703, pag. 170. of the Paris Edition.

(c) Ibid. pag. 174.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Pag. 243. of the 3d Volume.

(f) Intitled, Etat preſent des Nations & Egliſes Greque, Armenienne, & Maronite, en Turquie. i. e. "The preſent State of the Greek, Armenian, and Maronite Nations and Churches in Turky." See the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th Chapters of the 3d Book. pag. 174, & ſeq. of the Dutch Edition, 1693.

* It properly ſignifies the Boaſt or Glory of the true Religion. ADD. REM.

☞FALKLAND (LUCIUS CARY), Lord Viſcount), ſon of Sir Henry Cary, Lord Viſcount Falkland in the Kingdom of Scotland [A], by Elizabeth, ſole daughter and heir of Sir Laurence Tanfield, Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer (a). He was born in the year 1610 [B]; and in 1622 went with his father, who was Lord Deputy of Ireland, to that Kingdom, and was educated at Trinity-College in Dublin. In the earlier part of his life he indulged himſelf in ſome youthful ſallies, but travelling under the care of a diſcreet Tutor, he ſoon returned to the greateſt ſtrictneſs and decency of manners (b). Before he came to the age of twenty years he was maſter of a noble fortune, which deſcended to him by the gift of a grandfather, without paſſing through his father or mother, who were then both alive (c); and ſhortly after he came to this fortune, and before he was of age, he went into the Low-countries, with a reſolution of procuring a command, and to give himſelf up to it, from which he was diverted by the compleat inactivity of that Summer, ſo that he returned to England, and ſhortly after entered upon a ſevere courſe of ſtudy (d). For this purpoſe he retired frequently to his ſeat at Great Tew, about ten miles from Oxford, and to that Univerſity, where he applied himſelf to the more ſolid parts of Learning, as he had done before with great ſucceſs to the ſtudy of Poetry and polite Literature [C]. About the time of his father's death, which happened in (a) Lloyd's State Worthies, pag. 939. 2d edit. London 1670 in 8vo, and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 586. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(c) Hiſtory of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, begun in the year 1641. Written by Edward Earl of Clarendon, vol. 2. Part 1. B. 7. pag. 351. edit. Oxon 1707, in 8vo.

(d) Idem, ibid. pag. 357.

[A] Son of Sir Henry Cary, Lord Viſcount Falkland in the Kingdom of Scotland.] This Sir Henry was ſon of Sir Edward Cary of Aldenham and Berchamſted in Hertfordſhire, Knight, Maſter of the Jewel-Houſe to Q. Elizabeth and K. James I, and deſcended from the family of the Carys in Devonſhire, and of the Beauforts Dukes of Somerſet. Sir Henry's Mother was Katherine, Daughter of Sir Henry Knevet Knight (1). He was born in Hertfordſhire, and at about ſixteen years of age was ſent to Exeter College in Oxford, and upon leaving the Univerſity was brought to Court, and made Knight of the Bath at the creation of Charles Prince of Wales. He was appointed Comptroller of his Majeſty's Houſhold in 1617, one of the Privy Council, and Lord Deputy of Ireland in 1622, and about the ſame time created Viſcount Falkland in the Kingdom of Scotland, being then in high eſteem with the King for his great abilities and experience in affairs of ſtate (2). The accident of breaking his leg in Theobald's Park proved fatal to him (3) in September or October 1633 (4), and not in 1620, as Mr. Lloyd affirms (5). He wrote ſeveral things, but not printed and is ſuppoſed to be the Author of The Hiſtory of the moſt unfortunate Prince, K. Edward II, with choice political obſervations on him and his unhappy Favourites, Gaveſton and Spencer; containing ſeveral paſſages of thoſe times not found in other Hiſtorians. London 1680 in 8vo. Mr. Wood obſerves (6), that this Book being found among the papers of the ſaid Henry Lord Viſcount Falkland, "was therefore publiſhed as his, when "the Preſs was open for all ſuch Books that could "make any thing againſt the then Government, with a "Preface to the Reader patched up from very inconſi- "derable Authors by Sir Ja. H. as is ſuppoſed."

(1) Lloyd's State Worthies, pag. 938. 2d edit. London 1670, and Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 585. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Wood, ubi ſupra, col. 585, 586.

(3) Lloyd, pag. 939.

(4) Wood, col. 586.

(5) Pag. 939.

(6) Col. 586.

[B] He was born in the year 1610.] Some are of opinion that he was born at Burford in Oxfordſhire; but this does not appear from the Regiſter of that place, which commences about the beginning of the reign of King James I (7). We have aſſerted that he was born in 1610 upon the authority of the Earl of Clarendon, who tells us (8) that he was in the thirty fourth year of his age, when he was killed September the 20th 1643.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Hiſtory of the Rebellion, vol. 2. Part 1 B. 7. pag. 359.

[C] As he had done before with great ſucceſs to the ſtudy of Poetry and polite Literature.] His admirable taſte for Poetry gained him the admiration of all the in 1633, he was appointed one of the Gentlemen of his Majeſty's Privy-Chamber (e). He continued his ſtudies with the utmoſt vigour [D], enjoying the converſation of the moſt eminent genius's and ſcholars of that age, who reſorted to his houſe at Great Tew [E], till the expedition againſt the Scots in 1639, in which, though he received ſome repulſe in the command of a Troop of Horſe, of which he had a promiſe, he went a volunteer with the Earl of Eſſex (f). Mr. Cowley wrote a beautiful copy of verſes upon his going to that expedition [F]. In the beginning of the year 1640, he was choſen a Member of the Houſe of Commons for Newport in the Iſle of Wight to ſerve in that Parliament, which began at Weſtminſter on the 13th of April the ſame year; and "from the debates which were there managed, ſays the Earl of Clarendon (g), with all "imaginable gravity and ſobriety, he contracted ſuch a reverence to Parliaments, that "he thought it really impoſſible they could ever produce miſchief or inconvenience to the "Kingdom, or that the Kingdom could be tolerably happy in the intermiſſion of them. "And from the unhappy and unſeaſonable diſſolution of that Convention, he harboured, "it may be, ſome jealouſy and prejudice to the Court, towards which he was not before "immoderately inclined, his father having waſted a full fortune there in thoſe offices "and employments, by which other men uſe to obtain a greater." He was choſen again for the ſame place in the Parliament which began November the third following; and exerted himſelf with great vigour againſt thoſe exorbitances which had been moſt grievous to the State (h), and declared himſelf warmly in oppoſition to the Court [G]. He made likewiſe a ſevere ſpeech againſt the Biſhops [H]. However, diſliking the exceſſes which (e) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(f) Clarendon, pag. 357.

(g) Pag. 352, 353.

(h) Idem, pag. 353.

the beſt Poets of that age. Ben Johnſon has an Epigram on him in his Underwoods; and Mr. Waller (9) highly extols his wit. Sir John Suckling likewiſe has introduced him into his Seſſion of the Poets (10), where he writes of him:

But he was of late ſo gone with Divinity,
That he had almoſt forgot his Poetry;
Tho' to ſay the truth, (and Apollo did know it,)
He might have been both his Prieſt and his Poet.

(9) Poems, pag. 81. edit. 1668.

(10) See Suckling's Fragmenta Aurea, pag. 19. edit. London 1648, in 8vo.

Mr. Wood (11) and Dr. Hyde (12) aſcribe to him a Comedy called The Marriage Night, printed at London 1664 in 4to. But Mr. Gerard Langbaine (13) calls this Play a Tragedy, and aſſures it was written by Henry Lord Viſcount Falkland, ſon to our Lucius Lord Viſcount Falkland.

(11) Col. 588.

(12) Catalog. impreſſor. Libror. Biblioth. Bodleianæ, pag. 244.

(13) Account of the Dramatic Poets, pag. 197. edit. Oxon. 1691.

[D] He continued his ſtudies with the utmoſt vigour.] Having once reſolved not to ſee London, which he loved above all places, till he had perfectly learned the Greek tongue; he went to his houſe in the country, and purſued it with ſuch indefatigable induſtry, that it will not be believed in how ſhort a time he was maſter of it, and accurately read all the Greek Hiſtorians (14). Before the year 1633 he had peruſed and read over all the Greek and Latin Fathers, and was indefatigable in looking over all Books, which with great expence he cauſed to be tranſmitted to him from all parts (15).

(14) Clarendon, ubi ſupra, pag. 351.

(15) Idem, Animadverſions upon a book, intitled, Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church by Dr. Stillingfleet, and Imputation refuted and retorted by S. C. By a perſon of Honour, pag. 185. edit. London 1674.

[E] Enjoying the converſation of the moſt eminent genius's and ſcholars of that age, who reſorted to his houſe at Great Tew.] Among thoſe were Mr. Chillingworth, Mr. John Earle, and Mr. Hugh Creſſy of Merton College, George Aglionby of Chriſt Church, Charles Gataker of Pembroke College, (ſon of Thomas Gataker B. D.) who was afterwards his Chaplain, Mr. Thomas Triplet, afterwards Doctor of Divinity, and Prebendary of Weſtminſter, and Mr. George Sandys the Poet (16).

(16) Wood, col. 586, 587.

[F] Mr. Cowley wrote a beautiful Copy of Verſes upon his going to that expedition.] They were printed in the third Edition of his Works (17) under this title, To the Lord Falkland; for his ſafe return from the Northern Expedition againſt the Scots. Mr. Cowley begins thus:

(17) London 1672, in fol. pag. 4, 5.

"Great is thy charge, O North; be wiſe and juſt;
"England commits her Falkland to thy truſt:
"Return him ſafe: Learning would rather chooſe
"Her Bodley, or her Vatican to loſe.
"All things that are but writ or printed there,
"In his unbounded breaſt engraven are.
"There all the Sciences together meet;
"And every Art does all her kindred greet,
"Yet juſtle not, nor quarrel; but as well
"Agree, as in ſome common Principle."

[G] Declared himſelf warmly in oppoſition to the Court.] The Earl of Clarendon tells us (18), that he was ſo rigid an obſerver of eſtabliſhed laws and rules, that he could not endure the laſt breach or deviation from them; and thought no miſchief ſo intolerable as the preſumption of Miniſters of State to break poſitive rules for reaſons of State; or Judges to tranſgreſs known laws upon the title of conveniency or neceſſity, which made him ſo ſevere againſt the Earl of Strafford, and the Lord Finch, contrary to his natural gentleneſs and temper; inſomuch that they, who did not know his compoſition to be as free from revenge, as it was from pride, thought that the ſharpneſs to the former might proceed from the memory of ſome unkindneſſes, not without a mixture of injuſtice, from him towards his father. But without doubt, continues the Earl, he was free from thoſe temptations; and in both caſes was only miſled by the authority of thoſe, who, he believed, underſtood the laws perfectly, of which himſelf was utterly ignorant. And if the aſſumption which was then ſcarce underſtood, had been true, that an endeavour to overthrow the fundamental laws of the Kingdom was treaſon, a ſtrict underſtanding might make reaſonable concluſions to ſatisfy his own judgment from the exorbitant parts of their ſeveral charges. The great opinion he had of the uprightneſs and integrity of thoſe perſons who appeared moſt active, eſpecially of Mr. Hampden, kept him longer from ſuſpecting any deſign againſt the peace of the Kingdom. And though he differed from them commonly in concluſions, he believed long their purpoſes were honeſt. When he grew better informed what was law, and diſcerned in them a deſire to controul that law by a vote of one or both Houſes, no man more oppoſed thoſe attempts, and gave the adverſe party more trouble by reaſon and argumentation; inſomuch as he was by degrees looked upon as an advocate for the court, to which he contributed ſo little, that he declined thoſe addreſſes, and even thoſe invitations, which he was obliged almoſt by civility to entertain. He made ſeveral Speeches in the Parliament, which were afterwards printed; as I. A Speech concerning Uniformity. II. A Speech concerning ill Counſellors, both ſpoken in 1640. III. A Speech about Ship-Money, December the 5th 1640. IV. A Speech concerning John Lord Finch, lately Lord Keeper, and the Judges. V. A Speech to the Lords of the Upper Houſe, after the reading of the Articles againſt John Lord Finch, January the 14th 1640. VI. A Speech concerning Epiſcopacy, February the 9th, 1640; which we ſhall mention in the following Note.

(18) Hiſtory of the Rebellion, pag. 353.

[H] He made likewiſe a ſevere ſpeech againſt the Biſhops.] The Speech begins thus: Mr. Speaker, he is a great ſtranger in Iſrael, who knows not, that this Kingdom hath long laboured under many and great oppreſſions both in Religion and Liberty; and his acquaintance here is not great, or his ingenuity leſs, who doth not know and acknowledge, that a great, if not a principal cauſe of both theſe, hath been ſome Biſhops and their Adherents. Mr. Speaker, a little ſearch will ſerve to find them to have been the deſtruction of unity under the pretence of Uniformity; to have brought in ſuperſti- tion

which the Parliament ſeemed to be hurrying into, he went over to his Majeſty, and was made a Privy Counſellor and Secretary of State [I], conſtantly attending the King. From the breaking out of the civil wars his natural chearfulneſs and vivacity grew clouded; but when there was any overture or hope of peace, he would be more erect and vigorous, and tion and ſcandal under the titles of reverence and decency; to have defiled our Church by adorning our Churches; to have ſlackened the ſtrictneſs of that union, which was formerly between us, and thoſe of our Religion beyond the ſea, an action as unpolitic as ungodly. He proceeds with great ſeverity to repreſent the ill conduct and views of the Biſhops; " but I wiſh, ſays he, " that we may diſtinguiſh between thoſe, who have " been carried away with the ſtream, and thoſe, who " have been the ſtream, that carryed them; between " thoſe, whoſe proper and natural motion was towards " our ruin and deſtruction, and thoſe who have been " whirled about to it contrary to their natural motion, " by the force and ſwinge of ſuperior orbs. And " as I wiſh we may diſtinguiſh between the more and " leſs guilty, ſo I yet more wiſh we may diſtinguiſh " between the guilty and the innocent. Mr. Speaker, " I doubt not, if we conſider, that if not the firſt " planters, yet the firſt ſpreaders of Chriſtianity, and " the firſt and chief defenders of Chriſtianity againſt " Hereſies within, and Paganiſm without, both with " their ink and with their blood, and the main con- " ducers to the reſurrection of Chriſtianity, at leaſt " here, in the Reformation (and we owe the Light of " the Goſpel we now enjoy to the fire they then en- " dured for it) were all Biſhops. And that even now " in the greateſt perverſion of that order, there are " yet ſome, who have conduced in nothing to our late " innovations, but in their ſilence; ſome, who in an " unexpected and mighty place and power have ex- " preſſed an equal moderation and humility, being " neither ambitious before, nor proud after, either of " the Croſier's ſtaff, or white ſtaff; ſome, who have " been learned oppoſers of Popery, and zealous oppo- " ſers of Arminianiſm; between whom and their in- " ferior Clergy in frequency of preaching hath been " no diſtinction; whoſe lives are untouched, not only " by guilt, but by malice, ſcarce to be equalled by " thoſe of any condition, or to be excelled in any Ca- " lendar. I doubt not, I ſay, but if we conſider this, " this conſideration will bring forth this concluſion, " that Biſhops may be good men; and let us give but " good men good rules, we ſhall have both good Gover- " nors and good Times. Mr. Speaker, I am content " to take away all thoſe things from them, which to " any conſiderable degree of probability may again beget " the like miſchiefs, if they be not taken away. If " their temporal titles, power, and employment ap- " pear likely to diſtract them from the care of, or " make them look down with contempt upon their " ſpiritual duty, and that the too great diſtance be- " tween them and thoſe they govern, will hinder the " free and fit recourſe of their inferiors to them, and " occaſion inſolence from them to their inferiors; let " that be conſidered and cared for. I am ſure, neither " their Lordſhips, their judging of Tythes, Wills, " and Marriages, no, nor their Voices in Parliaments " are Jure divino; and I am ſure, that theſe titles " and this power are not neceſſary to their authori- " ty, as appears by the little they have had with " us by them, and the much that others have had " without them. If their revenue ſhall appear likely to " produce the ſame effects (for it hath been antiently " obſerved that Religio peperit divitias, & filia devora- " vit matrem) let ſo much of that as was in all pro- " bability intended for an attendant upon their Tem- " poral Dignities, wait upon them out of doors. Let " us only take care to leave them ſuch proportions as " may ſerve in ſome good degree to the dignity of " Learning and the encouragement of Students; and " let us not invert that of Jeroboam; and as he made " the meaneſt of the people Prieſts, make the higheſt " of the Prieſts the meaneſt of the people." If it be feared, that they will again employ ſome of our laws with a ſeverity beyond the intention of thoſe laws againſt ſome of the weaker brethren, that we may be ſure to take away that power, let us take away thoſe laws; and let no ceremonies, which any number counts unlawful, and no man counts neceſſary (againſt the rules of policy and St. Paul) be impoſed upon them. Let us conſider their part of the rule, they have hitherto gone by, that is, ſuch Canons of their own making as are not confirmed by Parliament, have been, or no doubt ſhortly will be by Parliament taken away; that the other part of the rule, (ſuch Canons as were received before the Reformation, and not contrary to any law,) is too doubtful to be a fit rule, exacting an exact knowledge of the Canon Law, of the Common Law, of the Statute Law, knowledges, which thoſe, who are thus to govern, have not, and it is ſcarce fit they ſhould have. Since therefore we are to make new rules, and ſhall no doubt make thoſe new rules ſtrict rules, and be infallibly certain of a Triennial Parliament to ſee thoſe rules obſerved as ſtrictly as they are made, and to encreaſe or change them upon all occaſions, we ſhall have no reaſon to fear any innovation from their tyranny, or to doubt any defect in the diſcharge of their duty. I am confident, they will not dare either to ordain, ſuſpend, ſilence, excommunicate, or deprive otherwiſe, than we would have them. And if this be believed, I am as confident, we ſhall not think it fit to aboliſh upon a few days debate an order, which hath laſted (as appears by ſtory) in moſt Churches theſe ſixteen hundred years, and in all from Chriſt to Calvin; or in an inſtant change the whole face of the Church, like the ſcene of a maſke.

" Mr. Speaker, I do not believe them to be Jure di- " vino; nay I believe them not to be Jure divino; " but neither do I believe them to be Injuria humana. " I neither conſider them as neceſſary, nor as unlaw- " ful, but as convenient or inconvenient. But ſince all " great mutations in Government are dangerous, even " where what is introduced by ſuch mutation is ſuch " as would have been very profitable upon a primary " foundation; and ſince the greateſt danger of muta- " tion is, that all the dangers and inconveniences they " may bring are not to be foreſeen; and ſince no wiſe " man will undergo great danger but for great neceſſi- " ty; my opinion is, that we ſhould not root up this an- " cient tree as dead as it appears, till we have tried whe- " ther by this or the like lopping of the branches the " ſap, which was unable to feed the whole, may not " ſerve to make what is left both grow and flouriſh. " And certainly if we may at once take away both " the inconveniences of Biſhops, and the inconve- " nience of no Biſhops, that is of an almoſt univerſal " mutation; this courſe can only be oppoſed by thoſe, " who love mutation for mutation's ſake. Mr. Speaker, " to be ſhort, (as I have reaſon to be after having " been ſo long) this tryal may be ſuddenly made. Let " us commit as much of the Miniſters Remonſtrance as " we have read, that thoſe heads both of abuſes and " grievances which are there fully collected, may be " marſhalled and ordered for our debate. If upon " that debate it ſhall appear, that thoſe may be taken " away, and yet the order ſtand, we ſhall not ſo " commit the London Petition at all; for the cauſe of " it will be ended: if it ſhall appear, that the aboli- " tion of the one cannot be but by the deſtruction of " the other, then let us not commit the London Petition, " but let us grant it."

[I] Made . . . Secretary of State.] Two things he could never bring himſelf to, whilſt he continued in that office, that is, to his death; for which he was contented to be reproached, as for omiſſions in a moſt neceſſary part of his place. The one, employing of ſpies, or giving any countenance or entertainment to them. I do not mean ſuch emiſſaries, as with danger would venture to view the enemies camp, and bring intelligence of their number, or quartering, or any particulars, that ſuch an obſervation can comprehend; but thoſe, who by communication of guilt or diſſimulation of manners wind themſelves into ſuch truſts and ſecrets as enable them to make diſcoveries. The other, the liberty of opening letters, upon a ſuſpicion that they might contain matter of dangerous conſequence. For the firſt, he would ſay, that " ſuch inſtruments muſt " be void of all ingenuity and common honeſty, before " they could be of uſe; and afterwards they could " never be fit to be credited; and that no ſingle pre-and exceedingly ſollicitous to preſs any thing which he thought might promote it. And ſitting among his friends, often, after a deep ſilence and frequent ſighs, would with a ſhrill and ſad accent, ingeminate the word peace, peace; and would paſſionately profeſs, that the very agony of the war, and the view of the calamities and deſolation which the Kingdom did and muſt endure, took his ſleep from him, and would ſhortly break his heart (i). The morning before the battle at Newbury in Berkſhire, he called for a clean ſhirt, and being aſked the reaſon of it, anſwered, that if he were ſlain in the battle, they ſhould not find his body in foul linnen. His friends endeavouring to diſſuade him from going into the fight, as having no call to it, and being no military officer; he ſaid, that "he was weary of the times, and foreſaw much miſery to his own country, and "did believe he ſhould be out of it before night (k)." He put himſelf in the firſt rank of Lord Biron's regiment, and was killed by a muſquet ſhot in the lower part of his belly, in the thirty fourth year of his age (l), on the 20th of September 1643 (m). He wrote ſeveral pieces [K]. Whitelock tells us (n), "that his death was lamented "by all that knew or heard of him, being a Gentleman of great parts, ingenuity, and "honour,

(i) Idem, pag. 357, 358, 359.

(k) Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs. By Bulſtrode Whitelocke Eſq; pag. 73, 74. edit. London 1732, in fol.

(l) Clarendon, pag. 359.

(m) Wood, col. 588.

(n) Ubi ſupra, pag. 74.

"ſervation could be worth ſo general a wound and cor- "ruption of human ſociety, as the cheriſhing ſuch perſons "would carry with it," The laſt he thought "ſuch a "violation of the Law of Nature, that no qualification "by office could juſtify him in the treſpaſs." And though he was convinced by the neceſſity and iniquity of the time, that thoſe advantages of information were not to be declined, and were neceſſarily to be practiſed, he found means to put it off from himſelf, whilſt he confeſſed he needed excuſe and pardon for the omiſſion; ſo unwilling was he to reſign any part of good nature to an obligation in his office. In all other particulars he filled his place with great ſufficiency, being well verſed in Languages, to underſtand any that are uſed in buſineſs, and to make himſelf again underſtood (19).

(19) Clarendon, Hiſtory of the Rebellion, pag. 355, 356.

[K] He wrote ſeveral pieces.] Beſides his Poems he wrote A Draught of a Speech concerning Epiſcopacy, found among the Lord Falkland's Papers ſince his Death, written with his own hand. Oxon. 1644 in 4to, and A Diſcourſe of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome. Oxford 1645 in 4to; and A View of ſome Exceptions made againſt the Diſcourſe of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome. Oxford 1646 in 4to. Theſe two Tracts were reprinted at London 1651 in 4to with this title: Sir Lucius Cary, late Lord Viſcount of Falkland, his Diſcourſe of Infallibility, with an Anſwer to it; and his Lordſhip's Reply. Never before publiſhed; together with Mr. Walter Montague's Letter concerning the changing his Religion. Anſwered by my Lord of Falkland. This volume is dedicated by Dr. Thomas Triplet, afterwards Prebendary of Weſtminſter, to the Right Honourable Henry Lord Viſcount Falkland, ſon of our Author. In the Epiſtle Dedicatory Dr. Triplet obſerves, that the Lady Falkland, widow of Lucius Lord Falkland, not long before her death (20), committed to him ſome excellent monuments of her deceaſed Lord's reaſon, wit, and induſtry, "in the ſearch of that, which he "would have as gladly found, as he hath rationally "rejected, an infallible Judge here on earth in all "our controverſies in point of Religion." He afterwards remarks, that in this Diſcourſe my Lord Falkland excels his antagoniſt in civility as well as in reaſon, and ſhews that a Gentleman wrote with a Scholar's pen. Mr. Wood tells us (21), that "before Triplet's Edition, another was put out by Anony- "mous, to which J. P. put a Preface, which is o- "mitted in that of Triplet." But in the Edition by Triplet mentioned above, which we have now before us, there is a Preface to the Reader ſigned J. P. (22); in which the Writer refers to Dr. Triplet's Dedication. Mr. Walter Montague's Letter printed in this Edition is dated from Paris 21ſt of November 1635. His Diſcourſe of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome begins with this remark, that "to him that doubteth "whether the Church of Rome hath any errors; "they anſwer, that ſhe hath none, for ſhe never can "have any. This being ſo much harder to believe "than the firſt, had need be proved by ſome certain "arguments, if they expect that the belief of this "one ſhould draw on whatſoever they pleaſe to pro- "poſe. Yet this is offered to be proved by, no better "ways than we offer to prove by that ſhe hath erred, "which are arguments from Scripture and ancient "Writers, all which they ſay are fallible, for nothing "is not ſo but the Church; which if it be the only "infallible determination, and that can never be be- "lieved upon its own authority, we can never infalli- "bly know that the Church is infallible; for theſe "other ways of proof may deceive both them and us, "and ſo neither ſide is bound to believe them. If "they ſay that an argument out of Scripture is ſuf- "ficient ground of divine Faith, why are they of- "fended with the Proteſtants for believing every part "of their Religion upon that ground, upon which "they build all theirs at once? And if following the "ſame rule with equal deſire of finding the truth by "it (having neither of thoſe qualities, which Iſidorus "Peluſiota ſaith are the cauſe of all hereſy, ἀνθαδίαν "καὶ πρόπτωσιν, pride and prejudication) why ſhould God "be more offended with the one than with the other, "tho' they chance to err?" The Anſwer to this Diſcourſe of Infallibility is ſaid to have been written by G. Holland, ſometime a Student in the Univerſity at Cambridge, but afterwards a Prieſt of the Church of Rome (23). Our Author likewiſe wrote a Letter to Mr. Fr. M. an. 1636, printed at the end of Mr. Charles Gataker's Anſwer to five captious Queſtions propounded by a Factor for the Papacy, by parallel queſtions and poſitive reſolutions. London 1673 in 4to. This Factor for the Papacy is the ſame Fr. M. to whom the Lord Falkland's Letter is addreſſed. Mr. Tho. Smith. B. D. Fellow of Chriſt-College in Cambridge in his Advertiſement prefixed to the Engliſh Tranſlation of Monſr. Daillé's Treatiſe concerning the right Uſe of the Fathers (24) informs us, that "the Tranſlation of this Tract "hath been often attempted, and oftner deſired by "many noble perſonages of this and other Nations; "among others by Sir Lucius Cary, late Lord Viſ- "count Falkland, who with his dear friend Mr. Chil- "lingworth made very much uſe of it in all their "writings againſt the Romaniſts. But the papers of "that learned Nobleman, wherein this Tranſlation "was half finiſht, were long ſince involved in the "common loſs. Thoſe few, which have eſcaped it "and the preſs, make a very honourable mention of "this Monſieur, whoſe acquaintance the ſaid Lord "was wont to ſay was worth a voyage to Paris." Mr. Smith immediately after mentions a Treatiſe of the ſame Nobleman, which was ſhortly to be publiſhed, wherein he had this paſſage concerning Cardinal Perron: Him I can ſcarce ever laudare in one ſenſe, this is quote, but I muſt laudare in the other, that is praiſe, who hath helpt the Church to all the advantages, which wit, learning, induſtry, judgment and eloquence could add unto her. But what this Treatiſe of our Author's was, and whether it was ever publiſh'd, we cannot yet learn. Sir Peter Pett, as we are informed in Biſhop Barlow's Genuine Remains (25), judging that it might tend to the public benefit of mankind, to have my Lord Falkland's works publiſh'd together in one volume in folio, wrote a long Letter to Dr. Thomas Barlow, Biſhop of Lincoln, acquainting the Biſhop with his deſign, and that he intended to prefix to the Edition the Life of that Nobleman, from materials communicated to him in converſation by the Lord Chief Juſtice Vaughan, Mr. Robert Boyle, the Lady Ranelagh, Mr. Abraham Cowley, and Mr. Edmund Waller, who had all an intimate friendſhip and frequent converſation with his Lordſhip. Sir Peter Pett requeſted the Biſhop to furniſh him with ſome Memoirs relating to that Nobleman. The Biſhop in his Anſwer obſerved, that he had none of the Lord Falkland's writings, except what are publiſh'd; but that he had the honour to be acquainted with his Lordſhip at Oxford, when he

(20) She died in February 1646. Wood, col. 589.

(21) Col. 588.

(22) Probably John Pearſon, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter.

(23) Wood, ibid.

(24) Printed at London 1651, in 4to.

(25) The Genuine Remains of the learned Prelate Dr. Thomas Barlow, late Lord Biſhop of Lincoln. Publiſhed from his Lordſhip's original Papers, pag. 324, & ſeqq. edit. London 1693.

" honour, courteous and juſt to all, and a paſſionate promoter of all endeavours of " peace betwixt the King and Parliament." The Earl of Clarendon has given an admirable character of him in his Hiſtory of the Rebellion (o), and in another work of his (p), where he ſtyles him a Nobleman of moſt prodigious learning, of the moſt exemplary manners, and ſingular good nature, of the moſt unblemiſhed integrity, and the greateſt ornament of the nation, that any age hath produced. Dr. Thomas Triplet likewiſe in his Epiſtle Dedicatory of the Lord Falkland's Diſcourſe of Infallibility &c. gives him the higheſt commendations [L]. While he lived, and eſpecially after his death, he was eſteemed by many to have been a Socinian [M]. His perſon was little and of no great ſtrength, and his eye black and lively (q). His body lies interred at Great Tew (r). By his Lady Letice [N], the daughter of Sir Richard Moriſon of Tooley Park in Leiceſterſhire, Knight, he had ſeveral children [O].

(o) B. 7. pag. 350, & ſeqq.

(p) Animadverſions upon a book intitled, Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church by Dr. Stillingfleet, and the Imputation refuted and retorted by S. C. By a Perſon of Honour. London 1674 in 8vo, pag. 185.

(q) Wood, col. 588.

(r) Idem, ibid.

FALLOPIUS

he was Secretary of State, and knew his natural and acquired parts to be exceeding great; and that he was a loyal ſubject and faithful ſervant to his Prince, and a true ſon of the Church of England. The Biſhop likewiſe remarks, that when Mr. Chillingworth undertook the Defence of Dr. Potter's Book againſt the Jeſuits he was almoſt continually at Tew with my Lord, examining the reaſons of both parties pro and con, and their invalidity or conſequence, where Mr. Chillingworth had the benefit of my Lord's company and his good Library. " The benefit he had, ſays the Biſhop " (26), by my Lord's company was very great, as " Mr. Chillingworth would modeſtly and truly con- " feſs. But his Library, which was well furniſhed " with choice Books (I have ſeveral times been in it, " and ſeen them) ſuch as Mr. Chillingworth neither " had, nor ever heard of many of them, till my " Lord ſhewed him the Books and the paſſages " in them, which were ſignificant and pertinent to " the purpoſe. So that it is certain, that moſt of thoſe " antient authorities, which Mr. Chillingworth makes " uſe of, he owes, firſt to my Lord Falkland's learn- " ing, that he could give him ſo good directions, and " next to his civility and kindneſs, that he would " direct him."

(26) Ibid. pag. 329.

[L] Dr. Thomas Triplet likewiſe . . . . gives him the higheſt commendations.] He tells us, that my Lord Falkland's Religion was the more eminent, becauſe the more early, at that age, when young gallants think leaſt of it. That his natural parts were very great. " Dixit ex tempore, ſaith Pliny of Iſæus, ſed tan- " quam diu ſcripſerit: and I may truly, ſays " Dr. Triplet, apply it to him; his anſwers were " quick and ſuddain, but ſuch as might very well " ſeem to have been meditated. In ſhort, his abili- " ties were ſuch, as though he needed no ſupplies of " induſtry, yet his induſtry ſuch as though he had no " parts at all. . . . While others ſtudied the Heraldry " of horſes, of dogs, or at the beſt their own; he, " though not inferior to his neighbours in deſcent and " honour, knowing well how much more glorious it " is to be the firſt than the laſt of a noble family, " (blood without virtue making vice but more con- " ſpicuous) was ſo far from relying upon that emp- " ty title, that he ſeemed ipſe ſuos genuiſſe parentes, to " have begotten his anceſtors, and to have given them " a more illuſtrious life, than he received from them." Dr. Triplet then obſerves, that though there were as much true worth cloſely treaſured up in him, as well divided had been able to have ſet up an hundred pretenders; yet ſo much modeſty withal, that the hearing of any thing was more pleaſing to him, than one tittle of his own praiſe. This virtue was indeed in an high degree in him, and ſhewed itſelf upon all occaſions. If any thing though never ſo little unhandſomly had been ſpoken or done where he was, he was the greateſt ſufferer in the company, and much more out of countenance than he, that gave the offence. And ſurely he that was ſo tender of another man's civility, may very juſtly be preſumed to have had a great regard to his own. And ſo he had indeed. For though his courage were as great as his wit and his learning, (and that is expreſſion high enough,) his valour ſo undaunted and dreadleſs, as his great fall witneſt, ἐν πολυφθόρῳ Διὸς ὄμβρῳ καὶ χαλαζαίνῃ φόνῳ in that fatal Hail, that made more orphans than his children; yet to do an ill or uncivil thing he was an arrant coward. Though he was of David's ſtature, of his courage too, μορφὰν βραχὺς, ψυχὰν δὲ ἄκαμπτος· ; and in this moſt like him, afraid of nothing but to offend. Dr. Triplet afterwards tells us, that his Lordſhip was eminent for the virtue of friendſhip: " If it be, ſays he, a kind of pleaſure to read diſ- " courſes of friends and friendſhip; what is it to en- " joy ſuch a friend, in whom really was, what excel- " lency either Hiſtory can record, or almoſt Poetry " fain? Nothing ſo hard in Lucian's Toxaris, that he " durſt not do; and nothing ſo handſome in all Sene- " ca's Laws of Benefits, that he knew not how to " do, and to out-do for his friend."

[M] While he lived, and eſpecially after his death, he was eſteemed by many to have been a Socinian.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (27), who tells us, that he was ſaid to have been ſtrengthned in that opinion by Chillingworth; but that all who knew him were fully poſſeſſed with opinions to the contrary. The Earl of Clarendon having ſuggeſted (28), that Mr. Creſſy in his Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed to the Catholick Church by Dr. Stillingfleet, had aſperſed the memory of my Lord Falkland with the character of a Socinian; Mr. Creſſy in his Epiſtle Apologetical (29) profeſſes that he never intended ſuch a thing.

(27) Col. 587.

(28) Animadverſions upon a book intitled, Fanaticiſm &c. pag. 184, 193.

(29) Pag. 81, 82, 83. edit. 1674.

[N] His Lady Letice.] She died about the 35th year of her age, and was interred by her deceaſed huſband in February 1646 (30). In 1648 there was publiſhed at London in 8vo a Book by Mr. John Duncan, a ſequeſter'd Divine, intitled, The returns of ſpiritual comfort and grief in a devout ſoul. Repreſented (by intercourſe of Letters) to the right honourable the Lady Letice Viſcounteſs Falkland, in her life-time; and exemplified in the holy life and death of the ſaid honourable Lady &c.

(30) Wood, col. 589.

[O] He had ſeveral children.] The eldeſt named Lucius, became a Nobleman of Chriſt Church in the latter end of the year 1646, being then a young man of great hopes, but died ſoon after at Paris (31). The next ſon was Henry, who had not the advantage of academical education, being in his younger years ſo wild and extravagant, that he ſold his father's incomparable Library for an horſe and a mare. But he afterwards reformed, and proved a man of excellent parts, and was elected one of the Knights for Oxfordſhire to ſerve in that Parliament, which began at Weſtminſter Jan. 27, 1658. Upon which occaſion ſome of the houſe oppoſing his admiſſion, and urging, that he had not ſowed his wild-oats; he replied, If I have not, I may ſow them in the houſe, where there are geeſe enough to pick them up. And when Sir F. N. told him, that he was a little too wild for ſo grave a ſervice; he replied, Alas! I am too wild, and my father was ſo before me, and I am no baſtard, as &c (32). He was afterwards elected Burgeſs for the City of Oxford in the Parliament, which began on the 25th of April 1660, and a Knight of the Shire for the ſame County in the Parliament, which began in May the year following. He was appointed by King Charles II Lord Lieutenant of Oxfordſhire. He died April 2d 1663, aged about 29 years, and was interred near his father and mother at Great Tew. By his Lady Rachel, daughter of Sir Anthony Hungerford of Blackbourton in Oxfordſhire Knt. he left a ſon, Anthony, Lord Viſcount Falkland, Treaſurer of the Navy during the reign of King James II, and ſworn one of the Privy Council to King William III on the 17th of March 1691, and appointed one of the five Commiſſioners of the Admiralty in 169$\frac{2}{3}$. He died the year following, being then Burgeſs for Bedwin in Wiltſhire (33).

(31) Idem, col. ibid.

(32) Lloyd's State Worthies, pag. 941, 942. and Langbaine, ubi ſupra, pag. 197.

(33) Wood, col. 589.

T.

☞FALLOPIUS or FALLOPIO (GABRIEL), one of the moſt celebrated Phyſicians and Anatomiſts of the ſixteenth Century, and famous for his diſcovery of the Fallopian Tubes, by which the Ova deſcend from the Ovarium, was born at Modena in the year 1523. Tomaſini and Ghilini are miſtaken in placing his birth higher. Andrew Marcolini, the ſcholar of Fallopius, publiſhed in 1564 a Treatiſe De chermalibus Aquis atque Foſſilibus, to which are prefixed ſeveral letters, by which it appears that this famous Phyſician died immaturely; which could not be, if he lived ſeventy three years, as Tomaſini and Ghilini, who has copied the former, pretend, by fixing his birth in 1490, and his death in 1563. He was deſcended of a noble family, and enjoyed a ſtrong and vigorous conſtitution, with vaſt abilities of mind, which he cultivated by an intenſe application to his ſtudies in Philoſophy, Phyſic, Botany, and eſpecially Anatomy, in which he made ſome new diſcoveries. He travelled through the greateſt part of Europe, and penetrated by his labour into the moſt abſtruſe myſteries of nature. He practiſed Phyſic with prodigious ſucceſs, and gained the character of one of the ableſt Phyſicians of his age, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings [A]. He was made Profeſſor of Anatomy at Piſa in 1548, and at Padua in 1551. He died at Padua October the 9th 1562, aged thirty nine years (a). Dr. Freind (b) tells us, that he was a great maſter in his Profeſſion, and that he was a ſcholar of Braſſavolus, and read his Lectures upon the Morbus Gallicus about the year 1555, much later than Daniel le Clerc (c) places him; but that, "though "he treats of every branch of the diſeaſe very exactly, he ſays little or nothing but "what may be found in Maſſa (d)."

(a) Vide Caſtellani, Vitæ medicorum; Teiſſier, Eloges des Savans; and Merklin's Lindenius renovatus.

(b) Hiſtory of Phyſic, Part 2. pag. 374. 2d edit. London 1727.

(c) In his Hiſtoire de la Medicine.

(d) Nicholas Maſſa in his book de Morbo Gallico. Dr. Freind, pag. 373, ſays that he wrote in 1536, about forty years after the firſt appearance of the Diſeaſe.

[A] Diſtinguiſh'd himſelf by his writings.] They are as follows: Opera genuina omnia, tam practica, quàm theorica in tres tomos diſtributa. Venice 1584 in fol. 1606 in fol. Francfort 1600 in fol. cum Operum Appendice. Ibidem 1606. The firſt volume contains, 1. Inſtitutiones Anatomicæ. This work was publiſhed under this title: De humani Corporis Anatome Compendium. Padua 1585 in 8vo. 2. Obſervationes Anatomicæ, printed ſeparately at Venice in 1562 in 8vo, Paris 1562 in 8vo. Helmſtad 1588 in 8vo. This laſt Edition is enlarged. 3. Obſervationes de Venis. 4. De partibus ſimilaribus humani Corporis, printed at Nuremberg 1575 in fol. 5. De Medicamentis ſimplicibus, printed ſeparately by Andrew Marcolini at Venice 1566 in 4to. 6. De Materia medicinali in Librum primum Dioſcoridis. 7. De thermalibus Aquis Libri VII. 8. De Metallis atque Foſſilibus, Libri duo. Theſe two laſt works were printed at firſt by Marcolini at Venice in 1564 in 4to. 9. De Medicamentis purgantibus ſimplicibus. 10. Epiſtola ad Mercurialem de Aſparagis, printed at Venice in 1566 with the Treatiſe de Medicamentis purgantibus. The ſecond volume contains, 1. De Ulceribus & eorum Speciebus: De Morbo Gallico: De Ulceribus ſingularum Partium. Theſe Treatiſes had been printed before at different times. 2. De Vulneribus in genere & Specie. 3. Commentarius in Hippocratis Coi Librum de Vulneribus Capitis; printed at Venice 1571 in 4to. 4. De Cauteriis; printed at Venice 1570 in 4to. The third volume contains, 1. De Tumoribus præter Naturam; printed at Venice 1563 in 4to. 2. Expoſitio in Librum Galeni de Oſſibus; printed at Venice 1570 in 4to. 3. De luxatis & fractis Oſſibus. 4. Methodus conſultandi. 5. De Compoſitione Medicamentorum; printed at Venice 1570 in 4to. His Opuſcula, printed at Padua 1566 contain the following pieces: 1. De Morbo Gallico Liber. This is the third Edition of that Treatiſe, which was printed firſt at Padua in 1564 in 4to, and afterwards at Venice in 1565 in 8vo. It was inſerted in a Collection of Works on the ſame ſubject, intitled, Aphrodiſiacus, ſive de Lue Venereâ, printed at firſt at Venice in 1616 in two volumes in fol. and afterwards at Leyden in 1728 in two volumes in fol. 2. De Bubone peſtilenti Tractatus. 3. Quæſtio de Principio Venarum. 4. De Balſamo. 5. De Aſpalatho. 6. De Sandalis. 7. De Muſco. 8. De Moſcho. 9. De Ambrâ. 10. De Zibetto. 11. De Decoratione. 12. De Caloribus Tractatus, in quo agitur de Concoctione. With theſe twelve Treatiſes of our Author we find in the ſame volume the two following: Gulielmi Rondeletii tractatus de Fucis; and Petri Angeli Agathi Arcanorum Liber primus. This laſt Writer publiſhed this Collection, which is in 4to, and has added Notes on ſeveral paſſages of Fallopius. H.

☞FALSTAF (Sir JOHN). See FASTOLF.

FANNIA, wife of Caius Titinius (a) a Citizen of Minturnæ, behaved very generouſly towards Marius, though ſhe was not very well pleaſed with the ſentence he paſſed in a cauſe in which ſhe was very nearly concerned. This woman had loſt her reputation by her diſſolute life; and yet Titinius married her; nay this was the very reaſon for which he married her; for he deſigned to divorce her in time, and not to return her dowry, for which purpoſe it was neceſſary that his wife were found guilty of adultery. He did not fail to perform his deſign as ſoon as he thought it convenient; but Fannia would defend herſelf, and went to law with him. Marius was the judge in this cauſe. As ſoon as he was acquainted with the whole matter, he called Titinius aſide, and adviſed him to return Fannia her dowry. But as he could not perſuade him to it, he gave his peremptory ſentence, by which Titinius was obliged to return the dowry [A], and Fannia was (a) Plutarch, in Mario, pag. 427 E, calls him Tinius.

[A] Marius gave his ſentence, by which Titinius was obliged to return her her dowry.] Nothing was more juſt than to force him to it, ſince he was not ignorant of Fannia's diſſolute life when he married her. If he had married her for a woman of honour, and had ſincerely deſired that ſhe ſhould live honeſtly with him, it would have altered the caſe: but he was content to be her cuckold for ſome time in order to make himſelf maſter of her large eſtate (1): It was not juſt therefore that he ſhould ceaſe to be ſo, and yet enjoy the advantage of it. Nothing then was more reaſonable than Marius's ſentence. Mulierem impudicitiæ ream ſeſtercio nummo, Titinium ſumma totius dotis damnavit, præfatus idcirco ſe hunc judicandi modum ſecutum, quod liqueret ſibi Titinium patrimonio Fanniæ inſidias ſtruentem impudicæ conjugium expetiſſe (2). i. e. "The wo- "man, who was found guilty of diſſoluteneſs, he "condemned to pay a fine of four pence, and Titi- "nius he ſentenced to reſtore her whole dowry: ſay- "ing, that he paſſed this ſentence, becauſe it appeared "to him, that Titinius had laid a ſnare to invade "Fannia's eſtate by marrying her, tho' he knew ſhe "was a diſſolute woman." Plutarch hints that this was the reaſon of Marius's ſentence. Ἐφαίνετο καὶ τὴν Φαννίαν ἀκόλαστον γεγονέναι, καὶ τὸν ἄνδρα τοιαύτην εἰδότα λαβεῖν, καὶ συμβιῶσαι πολὺν χρόνον (3). i. e. "It appear- "ed that Fannia had been a diſſolute woman; and "that the man married her tho' he knew her to "be ſuch, and lived a great while with her."

(1) Τούτου διαστάσα τὴν φερνὴν ἀπήτει λαμπρὰν οὖσαν. i. e. "Having di- "vorced her he "would have "her dowry, "which was "conſiderable." Plut. in Mario, pag. 427, E.

(2) Valerius Maximus, lib. 8. cap. 2. num. 3.

(3) Plut. in Mario, pag. 427 E.

was declared well and duly convicted of diſſoluteneſs, and condemned to pay a fine of four pence (b). Some time after Marius was obliged to fly from Rome, and was declared an enemy to the Commonwealth. He hid himſelf a while in the Fens of Minturnæ, whence he was afterwards taken, and committed to the cuſtody of the Magiſtrates, who lodged him in Fannia's houſe, thinking that ſhe would reſent the diſgraceful ſentence which he had pronounced againſt her: but Fannia was ſenſible that ſhe had been juſtly dealt with [B], and took all poſſible care of the gueſt who had been ſent to her (c).

(b) Plutarch. ibid. Valerius Max. lib. 8. cap. 2. num. 3. ſays, that ſhe was condemned ſeſtertio nummo.

(c) Taken from Valerius Maximus, lib. 8. ch. 2. num. 3.

[B] Fannia was ſenſible that ſhe had been juſtly dealt with.] She knew in her conſcience that ſhe deſerved all the infamy with which Marius had loaded her, and conſequently that he deſerved all the eſteem we ought to have for an upright judge. She had recovered her eſtate by Marius's ſentence. This was a greater advantage for a woman of her character, than if Marius had declared in a full Court that ſhe was honeſt: this would not have retrieved the reputation ſhe had loſt by her lewdneſs. Her neighbours, and in general all her acquaintances would not have had a better opinion of her than they had before; ſo that Marius did her a more effectual ſervice by declaring her a proſtitute, and reſtoring her eſtate to her, than if he had pronounced her an honeſt woman, without cauſing her dowry to be returned to her. When a woman's diſſoluteneſs is publickly known, ſhe does not mind detraction any longer; but then ſhe deſires more than ever to have money, and to enjoy her own eſtate. Let us not wonder therefore, that Fannia behaved towards Marius as towards an upright judge. See Valerius Maximus, I quote his words in the margin (4). But alſo let us not doubt but that a great many perſons would have abuſed Marius, had they been in Fannia's caſe.

(4) Fannia autem hæc eſt, quæ poſtea Marium, hoſtem à ſenatu judicatum, cœnoque paludis, qua extractus erat, oblitum, etiam in domum ſuam cuſtodiendum Minturnis deductum, ope quantacunque potuit, adjuvit: memor, quòd impudica judicata eſſet, ſuis moribus; quod dotum ſervaſſet, illius religioni acceptum ferri debere. Val. Maxim. lib. 8. cap. 2. num. 3.

FANNIA, an illuſtrious Roman Lady, the worthy daughter of the celebrated Petus Thraſea, and the worthy grand-daughter of Arria, had ſuch a generous ſoul, and was ſo eminently virtuous, that ſhe might be not only an example for other women, but alſo a pattern of courage and conſtancy to men. She twice attended her huſband Helvidius into baniſhment, and was herſelf afterwards baniſhed for his ſake, that is, becauſe ſhe had deſired Senecio to write Helvidius's life, and had furniſhed him with materials for it. She confeſſed it boldly before the judges [A], and only denied that her mother was privy to it (a). This happened under the Emperor Domitian. This greatneſs of ſoul was attended in her with ſuch a ſweet and agreeable temper, that ſhe was as much beloved as ſhe was reſpected (b).

(a) Taken from Pliny the Younger, Epiſt. 19. lib. 7.

(b Eadem quam jucunda, quam comis, quam denique (quod paucis datum eſt) non minus amabilis, quam veneranda. Plin. Epiſt. 19. lib. 7.

[A] She had furniſhed materials for the Life of Helvidius, and confeſſed it boldly before the Judges.] Metius Carus a noted informer accuſed Senecio with having wrote the Life of Helvidius. Senecio ſaid in his defence that he could not refuſe this ſmall favour to Fannia's entreaties. Fannia being aſked in a threatning manner whether Senecio ſpoke the truth, anſwered, that he did. But it will be better to hear Pliny himſelf. Bis maritum ſecuta in exilium eſt, tertio ipſa propter maritum relegata. Nam cum Senecio reus eſſet quod de vita Helvedii libros compoſuiſſet, rogatumque ſe à Fannia in defenſione dixiſſet, quærente minaciter Metio Caro, an rogaſſet, reſpondit; Rogavi; an commentarios ſcripturo dediſſet; Dedi; an ſciente matre; Neſciente: Poſtremo nullam vocem, cedentem periculo, emiſit. Quin etiam illos ipſos libros, quamquam ex neceſſitate & metu temporum abolitos, SC. publicatis bonis, ſervavit, habuit, tulit que in exilium, exilii cauſam (1) (The ſenſe of part of this paſſage has been given above; the reſt ſignifies;) "The danger ſhe was in did not draw the leaſt "complaint from her. Nay, her eſtate having been "forfeited by a Decree of the Senate, ſhe took with "her in her baniſhment thoſe very Books, which "were the occaſion of it, though afterwards they "have been deſtroyed, becauſe it was dangerous to "keep them." If on the one hand it raiſes our indignation to ſee the baſe flatteries of a vaſt number of Romans, who would get preferments under the firſt Emperors, we are on the other hand ſtruck with admiration when we ſee a conſiderable number of generous perſons, who kept up the Roman dignity amidſt the public depravation. The Author, whom I have quoted, cannot ſufficiently commend Fannia. He tells us a circumſtance, with which the curious will not be diſpleaſed; it is, that the Prieſts appointed ſome Ladies to take care of the Veſtal Virgins, who by ſickneſs were obliged to leave their Convent. Fannia took ſo much care of one of theſe Virgins, that ſhe fell ſick herſelf. Angit me Fanniæ valetudo. Contraxit hanc dum aſſidet Juniæ virgini Veſtali, ſponte primum, (eſt enim affinis) deinde etiam ex auctoritate Pontificum. Nam Virgines, cum vi morbi atrio Veſtæ coguntur excedere, matronarum curæ cuſtodiæque mandantur. Quo munere Fannia dum ſedulo fungitur, hoc diſcrimine implicata eſt (4). i. e. "I am grieved at Fannia's ſickneſs: ſhe got it whilſt "ſhe took care of Junia a Veſtal Virgin; ſhe did it firſt "of her own accord (for ſhe is related to her) and afterwards by the order of the Prieſts. For when "theſe virgins are obliged by ſickneſs to retire out of "the Temple of Veſta, they are committed to the "care of ſome matrons. Whilſt Fannia acquitted "herſelf carefully of this taſk, ſhe fell ſick."

(1) Plin. Epiſt. 19. lib. 7.

(2) Plin. Epiſt. 19. lib. 7.

FANNIUS a Roman Family. We ſhall mention ſome perſons who were of that family; nor ſhall we omit Moreri's blunders [A].

FANNIUS

[A] Nor ſhall we omit Moreri's blunders.] I. He places Caius Fannius's Quæſtorſhip under the Conſuls C. Calpurnius (1) Piſo and M. Popilius Lænas, and under the year 611 ſince the building of Rome. There are two blunders here; for Fannius was Quæſtor in the year 614; and that Conſulſhip muſt not be placed under the year 611 but under the year 614 of Rome. II, Fannius Strabo had not been twice Conſul, but once only: the Conſulſhip of the year 632, which Moreri aſcribes to him, belongs to Caius Fannius his ſon. III. Theſe words, this Fannius, who was Conſul in the year 632, was perhaps the ſon of the former, are abſurd. For who would not underſtand them thus; He was perhaps the ſon of the firſt Fannius, whom I Moreri have mentioned? Now this firſt Fannius is the Annaliſt, who far from being Fannius Strabo's father, was his nephew. If, in order to excuſe Moreri, it be ſuppoſed that his firſt Fannius is Fannius Strabo, he will lie open to three exceptions; the firſt, that he expreſſed himſelf in the moſt wretched manner; the ſecond, that he aſſerted a thing of which a few lines lower he muſt have doubted; the third, that he was ignorant of a notorious fact. There is no reaſon to doubt, but Domitius Ænobarbus's collegue in the Conſulſhip in the year 1632 was the ſon of him who was Conſul in the year 592 (2). Let us proceed to other blunders. IV. Fannius Pliny the younger's friend did not write a Hiſtory which was loſt: It was loſt indeed in time with an infinite number of other Books; but it is moſt probable that it was extant for a long while. However it is not true that Pliny mentions the loſs of this Hiſtory. Moreri, who aſſerts it, ſhews by this that he did not underſtand Voſſius's Latin. He had ſeen, that Voſſius, after having quoted Pliny's words, who laments (3) the

(1) He ſhould have ſaid Cn. Calpurnius.

(2) I follow Sigonius; Moreri ſays 593.

(3) Quod me recordantem miſeratio ſubit quantum vigiliarum quantum laboris exhauſerit fruſtra. Plinius, Epiſt. 5. lib. 5.

FANNIUS STRABO (CAIUS) was Conſul at Rome with Valerius Meſſala in the year 592 from the building of Rome. This Conſulſhip was remarkable upon two accounts: firſt, by the regulation which the Senate made concerning the money ſpent in entertainments; ſecondly by a decree of the Senate by which the Prætor (a) was empowered to drive the Rhetoricians and Philoſophers from Rome [A]. The Romans were not ſatisfied with the Senate's regulation concerning the expence of entertainments, but they made a Law upon this ſubject, which from the Conſul Fannius's name was called Lex Fannia [B]. We ſhall mention in another plea (b) the extravagancies which occaſioned this the death of Fannius, by which the preparations he had made for a large work had all been loſt, adds the following ſad reflection (4): Ita profecto eſt, nam ut alibi de alio loquitur Plinius (5) omnia illa cum ipſo ſine fructu poſteritatis obierunt. i. e. "Thus it is, indeed; "for as Pliny ſays of another in another place, all "theſe writings periſhed with him without any advan- "tage to poſterity." Moreri did not underſtand, that this paſſage of Pliny does not relate to Fannius's works, but to thoſe of another man, as Voſſius expreſly obſerves it. It is true Voſſius makes uſe of Pliny's words to repreſent the condition to which this Fannius's works were reduced in time. But this is one of the leaſt privileges of the method of applications: the ſame words, which would expreſs a downright falſity in the Book of the firſt Author, are very true when they are applied a thouſand years after to other ſubjects. Moreri was ſo well perſuaded, that Pliny ſpoke of his Fannius in the ninth Letter of the firſt Book, that he has quoted it at the end of the article. V. He ought not to have ſaid, that Fannius's Poems were placed with his picture in the Temple of Apollo and the Muſes, and in a public Library. This is more than hyperbolical; it is not exaggerating an object, it is giving a quite different notion of it: for it is almoſt ſaying, that Fannius's picture became an idol, and the object of people's devotion in the Temple of the falſe Gods. How far is this from truth! for the utmoſt that could be ſaid was, that this man's Poems and picture were lodged in Auguſtus's Library. I own that this Library was placed in Apollo's Temple (6), but this muſt be underſtood in the ſame ſenſe as when we ſay, that there is a fine Library in the Cathedral Church of ſuch a place; and it is as abſurd to miſtake the two following phraſes for each other, to put up a picture in a Cathedral Church, and to put a picture in the Library of a Cathedral Church, as it is to take in the ſame ſenſe theſe two phraſes; to place a Poet's picture in Apollo's Temple, and to place a Poet's picture in the Library of Apollo's Temple. Let us confeſs therefore that Voſſius did not expreſs himſelf accurately when he mentioned Fannius (7); his careleſsneſs miſled Moreri; but the latter ought at leaſt to have taken notice of the disjunctive particle aliamve (or in another): If he had obſerved it, he would not have ſaid that Fannius's Poems were placed with his picture in the Temple of Apollo and the Muſes, and in a public Library. The copulative particle and inſtead of the disjunctive or, and the omiſſion of aliam, are here a prodigious blunder: for it does not only multiply things without any neceſſity, but it alſo hints, that the honour done to Fannius when his picture was placed in a public Library, was of another kind than that he received, when his image was put up in the Temple of Apollo. And if it was of another kind, what could it be but a ſort of a conſecration, and idolatry? It cannot be ſaid in Moreri's defence that by the Temple of Apollo he underſtood the Library of that Temple; the particle and which he made uſe of deprives him of that excuſe. Was not this Library a public one?

(a) His name was Marcus Pomponius.

(b) In the Remark [B] of the Article TITIUS (CAIUS).

(4) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 161.

(5) Lib. 5. Epiſt. 9.

(6) Suet. in Auguſto, cap. 29.

(7) Cujus poëmata in ædem Apollinis & Muſarum aliamve Bibliothecam publicam cum imagine fuerunt delata. Voſſ. de Poët. Latin. pag. 34. i. e. "Whoſe Poems "were placed "with his pic- "ture in the "Temple of "Apollo and "the Muſes, or "in another "public Library.

[A] To drive the Rhetoricians and Philoſophers from Rome.] Suetonius (1) and Aulus Gellius acquaint us with this: Here follow the words of the latter. C. Fannio Strabone, M. Valerio Meſſala Coss. Senatus-conſultum de Philoſophis & Rhetoribus Latinis factum eſt. M. Pomponius Prætor Senatum conſuluit. Quod verba facta ſunt de Philoſophis & Rhetoribus, de ea re ita cenſuerunt: Uti M. Pomponius Prætor animadverteret coëaretque, uti ei è Republica ſideque ſua videretur, uti Romæ ne eſſent (2). i. e. "Under the Conſuls C. "Fannius Strabo and M. Valerius Meſſala the Senate "made a Decree concerning the Philoſophers and the "Rhetoricians. M. Pomponius the Prætor conſulted "the Senate. The affair concerning the Philoſophers "and the Rhetoricians having been brought before the "Senate, they have ordered, that M. Pomponius the "Prætor ſhould take care, as it ſhould appear to him "to be his duty and the advantage of the Common- "wealth, that they ſhould not continue at Rome."

(1) Suet. De claris Rhetorib. cap. 1.

(2) Aul. Gell. lib. 15. cap. 11.

[B] They made a law . . . . which . . . was called Lex Fannia.] Aulus Gellius ſpeaks diſtinctly of this law, and of the Senatus-conſultum or Senate's Decree, as of two things which came the one after the other. The Senatus-conſultum was made firſt, and afterwards the Law. Legi adhuc nuper in Capitonis Atei conjectaneis Senatus decretum vetus C. Fannio & M. Valerio Meſſala Coss. factum; in quo jubentur Principes civitatis qui ludis Megalenſibus antiquo ritu mutitarent, id eſt, mutua inter ſe convivia agitarent, jurare apud Conſules verbis conceptis, non amplius in ſingulas cœnas ſumptus eſſe facturos, quam centenos vicenoſque æris, præter olus & far & vinum; neque vino alienigena, ſed patrio, uſuros; neque argenti in convivio plus pondo, quam libras centum illaturos. Sed poſt id Senatus conſultum Lex Fannia lata eſt, quæ ludis Romanis, item ludis plebejis & ſaturnalibus & aliis quibuſdam diebus, in ſingulos dies centenos æris inſumi conceſſit, decemque aliis diebus in ſingulis menſibus tricenos; cæteris autem omnibus diebus denos (3). i. e. "I have read but lately in Capito Ateus's "Collections an old Decree of the Senate made un- "der the Conſuls C. Fannius and M. Valerius Meſ- "ſala, in which it is ordered, that the chief perſons "of the Commonwealth, who during the feſtivals of "the Goddeſs Cybele ſhould treat one another accord- "ing to the ancient cuſtom, ſhould ſwear before the "Conſuls after a certain form, that they would not "ſpend for every entertainment above ſeven ſhillings "and ſix pence *, beſides herbs, bread and wine; "and that they ſhould not make uſe of any foreign "wine, but only of that of their own country; and "that they ſhould not uſe at table above an hundred "pound weight in ſilver plate. But after this De- "cree of the Senate the Fannian Law was paſſed, by "which it was permitted to ſpend every day about "ſix ſhillings and three pence in every entertainment "during the Roman Games, the Plebeian Games, "and the Saturnalia or Feſtivals of Saturnus, and in "ſome other days: and ten other days in every month "it was permitted to ſpend in an entertainment (about) "two ſhillings; and every day beſides but ſeven pence "half penny." This was a wonderful frugality: it was confining men extremely: where are now a days the rich Nations that would ſubmit to ſuch a yoke? But waving all reflections upon men's morals, let us apply ourſelves to another kind of criticiſm, and examine under which Fannius the Fannian law was made; for there are ſome, who think it was not made under the perſon whom Aulus Gellius mentions.

(3) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 24.

* This we take to be very near the value of the Roman money mentioned in the original.

Glandorpius (4) obſerving how Aulus Gellius diſtinguiſhes the Senatus-conſultum from the Law, thinks that the Law was made a great while after the Senate's Decree; that is to ſay, under the Conſulſhip of Caïus Fannius, the ſon of our Caïus Fannius Strabo, in the year 632 ſince the building of Rome. But this opinion cannot be reconciled with what we read in Pliny, that the Fannian Law was made eleven years before the third Punic War. I ſhall quote the paſſage at length, becauſe it contains ſome curious particulars. The Reader will find in it, that the inhabitants of Delos were the firſt that fattened hens, whence it ſoon happened that men would not eat any poultry, but what had been fattened. In order to put a ſtop to this luxury, it was ordered by the Fannian Law that no poultry whatſoever ſhould be ſerved on the table except hens, that had not been fattened. But men found means ſoon after to evade this Law, for it was pretended that it did not prohibit to eat chickens that had been fattened. Gallinas ſaginare Deliaci cœpere; unde peſtis exorta opimas aves & ſuopte corpore unctas devorandi. Hoc primum antiquis cœnarum interdictis exceptum invenio

(4) Gland. Onomaſtic. pag. 333.

this Law. I do not find any thing remarkable concerning MARIUS FANNIUS, the brother of him who is the ſubject of this Article. Each of them left a ſon both named Caius, as will appear by the two following Articles.

jam lege C. Fannii, Coſſ. XI annis ante tertium Punicum bellum, ne quid volucre poneretur præter unam gallinam, quæ non eſſet altilis: quod deinde caput tranſlatum per omnes leges ambulavit. Inventumque diverticulum eſt, in fraude earum gallinaceos quoque paſcendi lacte madidis cibis: multo ita gratiores approbantur (5). Macrobius would furniſh us with very good arguments againſt Glandorpius, if his accounts were not ſomewhat intricate. He quotes one after another the Laws of the ancient Romans againſt Table-expences, and mentions them in the following order. The firſt Law was made at the requeſt of C. Orchias a Tribune of the people; the ſecond, which was the Lex Fannia was made twenty two years after the firſt (6). Now the firſt was paſſed three years before Cato obtained the Cenſorſhip; ſo that the Fannian Law muſt have been made nineteen years after Cato obtained that employment. But he was created Cenſor in the year of Rome 569, and therefore the Fannian Law was made in the year 588. This conſequence, which is rightly drawn from Macrobius's words compared with the Faſti Conſulares, does alſo agree with his very expreſſions. Poſt annum viceſimum ſecundum Legis Orchiæ Fannia Lex lata eſt anno poſt Romam conditam, ſecundum Gellii opinionem, quingenteſimo octogeſimo octavo (7). But the difficulty is, that he ſays the Fannian Law was made in the year 588 ſince the building of Rome according to Aulus Gellius's opinion. Conſult Aulus Gellius as much as you pleaſe, you will never find in his work this point of Chronology; you will only find, that after the Decree made by the Senate when C. Fannius and Valerius Meſſala were Conſuls, that after this Decree, I ſay, the Fannian Law was made. Macrobius could not ſay, that according to Aulus Gellius's opinion this Law was made in the year 588, unleſs he ſuppoſed, that Aulus Gellius aſſerts the Fannian Law was made under the Conſuls Fannius and Meſſala, and that they were Conſuls in the year 588. But it is certain that Aulus Gellius aſſerts neither of theſe facts, and that he expreſſes himſelf rather as a perſon who rejected the former, than as one who would admit it. POST id Senatusconſultum Lex Fannia lata eſt (8). i. e. "This Law "was made AFTER this Decree of the Senate." I know very well that it cannot be concluded from this "Latin paſſage, that the Decree of the Senate and "the Law were not made the ſame year; which is what I object againſt Glandorpius's argument: a year is long enough for the Senate to make a Decree, and afterwards for the people to confirm, amend or extend the Senate's Decree by an authentick Law: Aulus Gellius might therefore expreſs himſelf as he has done, tho' it had been certain that the Decree and the Law were paſſed the ſame year. But it is alſo true that his words offer another ſenſe; and that Macrobius therefore offended againſt the rules of accuracy, if he pretended that Aulus Gellius placed the Law and the Senate's Decree under the ſame Conſulſhip. Macrobius is ſtill more to be blamed with regard to the other circumſtance; for Aulus Gellius would have committed a very groſs blunder, had he placed the Conſulſhip of Fannius and Meſſala under the year 588. This confuſed and unaccurate account of Macrobius prevents us from making uſe of his authority to ground any thing certain upon it, with regard to Chronology. Here follows ſomething more confuſed, which will ſuffer us ſtill leſs to depend upon this Author.

According to his ſuppoſition it is very certain that the Fannian Law was made in the year 588 ſince the building of Rome: for he puts an interval of twenty two years between this Law, and that which was called Lex Orchia; and he aſſerts that the latter was made three years before Cato was Cenſor. Now the Cenſorſhip was conferred upon him in the year of Rome 569 (9). The Orchian Law was then paſſed in the year 566; add twenty two years to this number, and you will find the year 588 ſince the building of Rome. It is not therefore neceſſary to make any corruction in Macrobius's words (10). If they are not right, it is the fault of the Author and not of the Tranſcribers. F. Hardouin ſuppoſing that they have altered the numbers in the text of Macrobius, propoſes a very probable manner in which the text might have been corrupted. Hinc Macrobium emendamus, lib. 2. Saturn. cap. 13. pag. 367. apud quem corruptus annorum numerus legitur. Fannia lex, inquit, lata eſt anno poſt Romam conditam, ſecundum Gellii opinionem, quingenteſimo octogeſimo octavo. Scriptum erat per literarum compendium, DLXXXXIII. Librarii deinde, ut alias ſæpe advertimus, denarii nota poſtrema in quinarium verſa, DLXXXVIII. perperam reſcripſerunt (11). i. e. "Hence we may correct a paſſage in "Macrobius, Saturn. B. 2. chap. 13. pag. 367, where "the number of years has been corrupted. The Fannian "Law, ſays he, was made in the year five hundred eighty eight ſince the building of Rome according to "Aulus Gellius's opinion. It was written in numbers "thus DLXXXXIII. But the Tranſcribers, as I have "often obſerved elſewhere, altered the laſt X into "an V, and put erroneouſly DLXXXVIII." The misfortune is, that this ſuppoſition is falſe: for if Macrobius had not ſet down the year 588, but the year 592, or 593, he would have refuted himſelf by his own calculations. Give his words what turn you pleaſe, you will never find him accurate: and if one ſhould ſuppoſe that according to him the Lex Orchia was made when Cato had been three years Cenſor (12), it would only increaſe the confuſion. See the Article TITIUS (13), where I examine whether what Macrobius ſays of this man may ſerve to ſupport Glandorpius's opinion.

(5) Plin. lib. 10. cap. 50.

(6) Prima omnium de cœnis lex ad populum Orchia pervenit, quam tulit C. Orchius Tribunus plebis de Senatus ſententia, tertio anno quam Cato Cenſor fuerat. Cujus verba, quia prolixa ſunt prætereo. Summa autem ejus præſcribebat numerum convivarum. Et hæc eſt Lex Orchia, de qua Cato in orationibus ſuis vociferabatur, quod plures quam præcepto ejus cavebatur ad cœnam vocarentur. Cumque auctoritatem novæ legis aucta neceſſitas imploraret: poſt annum viceſimum ſecundum legis Orchiæ Fannia lex lata eſt, anno poſt Romam conditam, ſecundum Gellii opinionem, quingenteſimo octogeſimo octavo. Macrob. Saturnal. lib. 2. cap. 13.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Aul. Gell. lib. 2. cap. 24.

(9) See Sigonius in Faſtis.

(10) Pighius would have us read quingenteſimo nonageſimo ſecundo (592) inſtead of quingenteſimo octogeſimo octavo. And F. Hardouin will have us read quingenteſimo nonageſimo tertio (593). See the following quotation.

(11) Harduin. in Plinium, lib. 10. pag. 482. tom. 2.

(12) It might only be ſuppoſed that the word to be underſtood in this paſſage of Macrobius tertio anno quam Cato Cenſor fuerat, is not ante before, but poſt after.

(13) Remark [B].

FANNIUS (CAIUS) the ſon of the preceding, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his Eloquence [A]. He was Conſul with Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus in the year 632 ſince the building of Rome, and though he was indebted to Caius Gracchus for the Conſulſhip, yet he reſiſted this Tribune's factious deſigns (a), and publiſhed an Oration againſt him, which Cicero has commended [B].

(a) Plutarch. in Vita Gracch.

FANNIUS

[A] He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence.] Leſt the imagination of my Readers ſhould go too far, I muſt obſerve to them, that the perſon I ſpeak of was never an Orator of the firſt rank. He always paſſed for an indifferent one: Fannius in mediocribus oratoribus habitus eſſet: But the following Remark will ſhew that I might expreſs my ſelf as I have done without any exaggeration. Does not Velleius Paterculus place him amongſt the moſt famous Orators (2)?

(1) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 26.

(2) Paterc. lib. 2. cap. 9.

[B] He publiſhed an Oration againſt C. Gracchus, which Cicero has commended.] Here follow his words. Horum ætatibus adjuncti duo C. Fannii, Caii & Marci filii, fuerunt, quorum Caii filius qui Conſul cum Domitio fuit unam Orationem de ſociis, & nomine Latino contra Gracchum reliquit, ſane & bonam & nobilem (3). i. e. "In their time lived the two Caii Fannii, the ſons of "Caius and Marcus; one of whom, namely the ſon "of Caius, who was Conſul with Domitius, left an "Oration againſt Gracchus concerning the allies and "the people of Latium, which is indeed a good and "noble piece." This Oration was ſo well liked by the ſkilful judges, that ſome pretended that Perſius (4) had wrote it, others that ſeveral perſons of quality had had a hand in it. They thought it too good to come from an indifferent Orator, ſuch as Fannius was reckoned to be. Cicero confutes this by obſerving amongſt other arguments, that Fannius had always been uſed to ſpeak in public, and had gained ſome reputation when he was a Tribune. Eam ſuſpicionem propter hanc cauſam credo fuiſſe, quod Fannius in mediocribus oratoribus habitus eſſet, oratio autem vel optima eſſet illo quidem tempore orationum omnium: ſed nec ejuſmodi eſt, ut

(3) Cicero in Bruto, cap. 26.

(4) He was one of the moſt learned men of that time. See the Article PERSIUS (CAIUS).

FANNIUS (CAIUS) the ſon of Marcus, and firſt couſin to the foregoing, was Quæſtor in the year of Rome 614, and Prætor two years after. He bore arms in Africa under Scipio Africanus the Younger (a), and in Spain under Fabius Maximus Servilianus (b). He was a diſciple of Panætius (c) a great Philoſopher of the Stoic Sect, and married Lælius's ſecond daughter. He wrote Annals which were eſteemed [A]. He took it ill that Lælius conferred the dignity of an Augur on Quintus Mutius Scævola his other ſon-in-law, nor was he ſatisfied with Lælius's excuſes [B]. It will be of ſome uſe to obſerve, that Cicero having aſſerted that Fannius the Hiſtorian was Lælius's ſon-in-law, was demonſtratively refuted [C] by Pomponius Atticus; and yet he was not miſtaken. You will find in one ſingle remark the blunders of ſome Authors concerning the Fannii [D].

(a) Ipſe Fannius apud Plutarchum in Vita Gracch. pag. 826, A.

(b) Appian. in Iberic. pag. m. 476.

(c) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 26.

FANNIUS

ut à pluribus confuſa videatur: unus enim ſonus eſt totius orationis, & idem ſtylus, nec de Perſio reticuiſſet Gracchus, quum & Fannius de Menelao Marathenio, & de ceteris objeciſſet, præſertim quum Fannius nunquam ſit habitus eloquis: nam & cauſas defenſitavit, & tribunatus ejus, arbitrio & auctoritate Publii Africani geſtus, non obſcurus fuit (5). i. e. "I believe that this was "ſuſpected becauſe Fannius always paſſed for an indif- "ferent Orator, and that this Oration was one of the "beſt that had been made at that time. But it does "not appear to have been compoſed by ſeveral hands, "for the ſtyle and language is the ſame through the "whole: nor would Gracchus have been ſilent with "regard to Perſius (if he had compoſed that Oration) "ſince Fannius had reproached him with regard to "Menelaus Marathenus and others; eſpecially ſince "Fannius was never thought to want a tongue; for "he pleaded at the bar, and gained ſome re- "putation when he was a Tribune, in which poſt he "acted according to Publius Africanus's directions, and "under his patronage." This paſſage acquaints us that Fannius was of a plebeian family. Cicero is charged with aſcribing in another place to Fannius the ſon of Marcus, the office of a Tribune which he here aſcribes to Fannius the ſon of Caius. In præſentia mihi velim ſcribas quibus CENSS. C. Fannius M. F. Tribunus pl. fuerit. Videor mihi audiſſe P. Africano, & L. Mummio (6). i. e. "I wiſh at preſent you would "write to me under what Cenſors C. Fannius the ſon "of Marcus was a Tribune. I think I have heard "it was under P. Africanus and L. Mummius." But I cannot find that this cenſure (7) is well grounded: for it may very well be that Fannius the ſon of Marcus was a Tribune during the Cenſorſhip of Scipio Africanus, and that Fannius the ſon of Caius followed, when he was a Tribune, the directions of the ſame Scipio Africanus. Now if theſe two things be very poſſible, why ſhould we not ſay that Cicero ſpeaks of the one in this place, and of the other in his letters to Atticus? I find more difficulty in the word Cenſoribus (Cenſors), which has been put inſtead of Conſulibus (Conſuls) in the paſſage from the letter to Atticus; for as Cicero wanted chiefly to know in what year ſuch or ſuch perſons had been Tribunes of the people, or Prætors, &c. (8), he aſked, no doubt, under what Conſuls they bore thoſe offices. The Cenſors were changed but every five year; ſo that Cicero could not have known in what year a perſon had been a Tribune, if he had known only under what Cenſor it was.

(5) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 26.

(6) Cicero, Epiſt. 13. ad Attic. lib. 16.

(7) Corradus is the Author of it: Here follow his words in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 187. Videbatur Cicero audiviſſe tunc Fannium Tribunum plebis fuiſſe; quanquam libro decimo ſexto ad Atticum de C. Fannio M. F. hoc ipſum ſcribit: ſed quum poſtea nihil infrà ſuo loco ea de re dicat, videtur errorem, ſuo Attico fortaſſe monente, cognoviſſe, & hunc pro illo repoſuiſſe.

(8) See the 5th Letter of the 2d Book to Atticus.

[A] He wrote Annals, which were eſteemed.] Cicero mentions them in honorable terms (1). Ejus omnis in dicendo facultas ex hiſtoria ipſius non ineleganter ſcripta perſpici poteſt, quæ neque nimis eſt infans, neque perfecte diſerta. i. e. "His ſkill in writing appears from his Hiſtory, "which is not without elegancy: it is written with "ſome eloquence, though it be not abſolutely perfect "that way." Brutus made an Abridgment of this Hiſtory, as appears from one of Cicero's letters to Atticus (2), where we read the following words; Conturbat me Epitome Bruti Fanniana, in Bruti Epitoma Fannianorum. i. e. "I am puzzled with Brutus's "Abridgment of Fannius's Hiſtory." Voſſius (3) obſerves, that Manucius did not well interpret this Latin paſſage in his Commentary; he thought, ſays he, that this work of Brutus was a ſhort Hiſtory of the family of the Fannii, or of the remarkable actions which the Fannii had done. But Manutius ſaid no ſuch thing in his Commentary: he underſtood this paſſage as he ought to have done. In Bruti epitoma Fannianorum, ſignifies according to him, quam confecit Brutus annalium Fannianorum, id eſt hiſtoriæ à Fannio conſcriptæ (4).

(1) In Bruto, cap. 26.

(2) The 5th of the 12th Book.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 28.

(4) See Grævius's Edition, tom. 2. pag. 75, 76. of Manucius's Commentary.

i. e. "The Abridgment which Brutus made of Fannius's "Annals, that is to ſay, of the Hiſtory which Fan- "nius wrote." If inſtead of charging Manucius with this blunder, Corradus (5) had been accuſed of it, there would have been no miſtake. If Fannius's Annals were far from being a maſter-piece of eloquence, yet they had a perfection much more valuable than an elaborate ſtyle, for they were ſincere. This is what Salluſtius ſaid of Fannius (6).

(5) See Grævius's edition, tom. 2. pag. 296. col. 1.

[B] He was not ſatisfied with Lælius's excuſes.] He had married Lælius's youngeſt daughter; the eldeſt was Scævola's wife, but Scævola was younger than Fannius. The latter pretended that as he was the eldeſt, Lælius ought to have preferred him before Scævola for the dignity of an Augur. Lælius ſaid in his own defence, that he had not preferred his youngeſt ſon-in-law before the eldeſt, but his eldeſt daughter before the youngeſt. But this diſtinction did not ſatisfy Fannius, who for that reaſon did not much love his father-in-law. Is ſocerum, quia cooptatus in Augurum Collegium non erat, non admodum diligebat, præſertim cum ille Q. Scævolam ſibi minorem natu generum prætuliſſet, cui tamen Lælius ſe excuſans non genere minori dixit ſe illud, ſed majori filiæ detuliſſe (7). This paſſage of Cicero does not agree very well with his Dialogue on Friendſhip; in which he introduces Fannius talking with his father-in-law as a ſon-in-law very well pleaſed, and even as his Collegue in the dignity of an Augur.

(6) Cum aliis Hiſtoriographis fingula tradidiſſet (Salluſtius) in libro primo hiſtoriarum, Catoni brevitatem, Romani generis diſertiſſimus paucis abſolvit: Fannio vero veritatem. Marius Victorinus in primum Ciceronis de Inventione, apud Voſſium, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 28, 29.

(7) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. 26.

[C] Cicero was demonſtratively refuted.] I only tranſlate Cicero's own words; Sed tu me γεωμετρικῶς refelleras (8). I am very much miſtaken if there is not ſomething ironical here. Cicero hints to his friend, who of all men was beſt acquainted with the different families, that we ought ſometimes to miſtruſt our memory, and that we may happen to take for unanſwerable arguments what is only a mere fancy. You proved demonſtratively to me (ſays he) that I was miſtaken, when I aſſerted that Fannius was Lælius's ſon-in-law; I had it from Hortenſius, who deſerves to be credited in ſuch things: yet I was obliged to ſubmit to your geometrical arguments: but here comes Brutus who refutes you in the Abridgment he made of Fannius's Hiſtory; get off, if you can (9). Thus Cicero ſpeaks to his friend: it is plain that he jeſts when he calls Atticus's pretended arguments geometrical demonſtrations. Obſerve that Cicero's expreſſions prove firſt, that Fannius had ſaid in Hiſtory, that he was Lælius's ſon-in-law. Secondly, that it was only by the Abridgment of this Hiſtory publiſhed by Brutus that Cicero knew Fannius had ſaid this. For if he had known it before, he would not have mentioned Hortenſius as his only voucher. If Mezeray had ſaid in his Hiſtory that he had been married with the daughter of ſuch an one, they who ſhould mention this marriage remembring what the Hiſtorian himſelf had ſaid of it, would not alledge a bare hear-ſay to prove it; or if they did, they would deſerve to be laughed at.

(8) Idem, Epiſt. 5. lib. 12. ad Atticum.

(9) Scripſi quod erat in extremo: idque ego ſecutus hunc Fannium qui ſcripſit hiſtoriam, generum eſſe ſcripſeram Lælii: ſed tu me γεωμετρικῶς refelleras: te autem nunc Brutus & Fannius. Ego tamen de bono auctore Hortenſio ſic acceperam, ut apud Brutum eſt. Hunc igitur locum expedies. Cicero, Epiſt. 5. ad Atticum, lib. 12.

[D] Here follow the blunders of ſome Authors concerning the Fannii.] Let us begin with Mr. LLOYD. I. He places the making of the Fannian Law under the year 508 ſince the building of Rome, and he quotes the fourteenth chapter inſtead of the twenty fourth of the ſecond Book of Aulus Gellius. He alſo quotes the ſeventeenth chapter of the third Book of Macrobius's Saturnalia *, inſtead of quoting the twelfth chapter of the ſecond Book. II. He ſays that Caïus Fannius the ſon of Marcus, and ſon-in-law of Lælius, was more illuſtrious than his couſin Fannius both with regard to his eloquence and to his morals, moribus & ipſo dicendi genere clarior. This is a downright falſity. Cicero to whom he refers us, is very far from ſaying this (10).

* But this is right according to ſome Editions, particularly that of Paris, 1585, 8vo. CRIT. REM.

(10) He ſays, moribus & ipſo genere dicendi dixerior. Idem, in Bruto, cap. 26. i. e. "More un- "polite both "with regard to "his manners "and to his elo- "quence."

FANNIUS QUADRATUS a Latin Poet, whose Poems, though they were ridiculous, were put with his picture in the Library, which Auguſtus had cauſed to be collected [A]. Horace who was contemporary with this Fannius has mentioned him with a great deal of contempt, and called him a Paraſite (a), which is a fault common to bad Poets.

(a) Aut erucier quid Vellicet abſentem Demetrius, aut quod ineptus Fannius Hermogenis laudet convivia Tigelli. Hor. Sat. 10. lib. 1. ver. 78.

III. He ſays with regard to the Poet Fannius, that his Poems were carried with his picture into the Temple of Apollo and the Muſes, or into ſome other Library. He tranſcribed this blunder from Voſſius (11). IV. He applies to Fannius Cepio an epigram of Martial (12) and does not tranſcribe it well, for he gives it thus,

(11) See Moreri's blunders in the remark [A] of the Article FANNIUS a Family, num. 5.

Hoſtem cum peteret (13), ſe Fannius ipſe peremit:
Hic rogo non furor eſt ne moriare mori?

(12) The 80th of the 2d book.

i. e. "Fannius attacking (it ſhould be, flying from) "the enemy killed himſelf. I aſk was it not a mad- "neſs in you to die leſt you ſhould dye?

(13) It ſhould be fugeret.

Theſe two verſes have no meaning as he gives them, the word peteret (attacked) inſtead of fugeret (run away) renders the whole epigram inſipid and flat. But if you leave fugeret, the epigram cannot be applied to Fannius Cepio, who was at the head of a conſpiracy againſt Auguſtus. I do not quote Macrobius (14), who mentions the great faithfulneſs which one of this Fannius's ſlaves had for his maſter, and by which it appears that Fannius avoided death with all imaginable care; I do not, I ſay, quote Macrobius, who does not ſay that Fannius was tired at laſt with ſhunning death ſo much. But I quote Dion Caſſius, who aſſerts poſitively that Fannius was killed (15), and that one of his ſervants betrayed him (16). Is not this a proof that he did not kill himſelf? Let us paſs to HOFMAN. He has committed Mr. Lloyd's four blunders, and part of Moreri's. He has quoted the ninth letter of Pliny's fifth Book, which relates to none of the Fannii. He ſays that Fannius Strabo was twice Conſul, firſt with Valerius Meſſala, and then with Domitius Ænobarbus. He adds that the Fannian Law was made during Fannius's firſt Conſulſhip, upon which he refers us to his article Fannia, where we find that this Law was made in the year 508: he places therefore Fannius Strabo's firſt Conſulſhip under the year 508, inſtead of placing it under the year 592, or 593. Before he mentioned Fannius Strabo he had made an article of Caius Fannius, who was Conſul with Domitius; ſo that he makes two perſons of one.

(14) Saturn. lib. 1. cap. 11.

(15) Καὶ (οὐ γὰρ ὑπέμεινεν τὸ δικαστήριον) ἐρήμην μὲν ὡς καὶ φεύγοντες ἥλωσαν, ἀπισφάγησαν δὲ ὑπὸ πολλῷ ὕστερον. i. e. "As they "did not appear "before the "Court, were "condemned to "baniſhment in "their abſence, "and ſoon after "killed." Dion. lib. 54. pag. m. 598. ad ann. 732.

(16) Τινὰ δὲ ἕτερον (τῶν δούλων) τὸν προδόντα αὐτόν. i. e. "An- "other ſlave, "who betrayed "him." Idem, ibid.

[A] His Poems .... were put ... in the Library, which Auguſtus had cauſed to be collected.] It was lodged in the Temple of Apollo Palatinus See what Horace ſays of Fannius.

Beatus Fannius ultro
Delatis capſis & imagine: quum mea nemo
Scripta legat, vulgo recitare timentis (1).

(1) Horat. Sat. 4. lib. 1. ver. 21.

Monſieur Dacier underſtands theſe words in the following manner. This Fannius, ſays he, though a bad Poet, yet by his intrigues, and by a kind of a party, which he had raiſed in his favour by reading his Poems in all places and to all comers, got leave againſt every one's expectation, and againſt all juſtice to carry his writings and his picture into the Library, which Auguſtus had conſecrated, and it is for this that Horace very wittily banters him .... Fannius by gathering together every day a great many perſons, to read his Poems before them, had got an infinite number of friends, who cried up his Poems every where, and ſpread copies of them in all places: whereas the Poems of Horace who would not be indebted for his reputation to any one but himſelf, and who ſhewed his Poems but ſeldom, and to very few perſons, were almoſt unknown, and made not half the noiſe in the world, that Fannius's ſilly Works did. For at that time, as well as now, a cabal had often much more power than true merit. This is the ſenſe of this paſſage, which had not been well underſtood before. For as to what Acron ſays, that the Senate did Fannius this honour in order to get rid of his importunity; or that ſome perſons, who coveted Fannius's eſtate, for he had no children, carried his books and his picture into the Library, with a deſign to court his friendſhip and to become his heirs; all this, I ſay, is a mere fancy, which cannot have the leaſt foundation. I quote in the margin (2) the Latin words of the antient interpreter, whom Mr. Dacier condemns. I have obſerved ſomewhere (3) that ſatyres ſhould be commented upon either by the author himſelf, or by ſome contemporary Writer. This paſſage of Horace confirms my opinion. We do not exactly know the meaning of it; we muſt gueſs at its ſenſe: and though our conjectures be never ſo happy, there will ſtill remain ſome doubts. We ſhould not be thus puzzled, if Horace himſelf or ſome Author of the age of Auguſtus, had wrote a commentary upon his ſatyrs; but as one of the chief perfections of that kind of writing is, that they contain a thouſand ſtrokes of raillery, expreſſed with ſome darkneſs, and which hint at ſome ſtories that are not generally known, I ſhould think that a ſatyric Author does not much care for a commentary. The modern Theophraſtus (4) was not well pleaſed, when men raiſed him enemies by applying the characters he deſcribed, to ſuch or ſuch particular perſons.

(2) Fannius Quadratus poëta loquaciſſimus & ineptiſſimus fuit, cui Senatus audiendi faſtidio ultro capſas & imaginem obtulit, ut libros ſuos mitteret, & in auctoritatem reciperetur, tanquam optimus Poëta: vel, ut alii referunt, Fannius Poeta malus cum liberos non haberet, hæredipetæ fine ejus cura & ſtudio libros ejus & imaginem in publicas bibliothecas referebant, nulla tamen meritò ſcriptoris.

(3) See upon this the Remark [A] of ABELLI, and the Remark [C] of ASSOUCI, towards the end.

(4) La Bruyere.

FANNIUS (CAIUS) a Latin Author who lived in the time of Trajan, and had a great ſhare in Pliny the Younger's eſteem and friendſhip. Though he was very much taken up with the pleading of cauſes, yet he wrote a Collection of Nero's cruelties; I mean that he gave an account of the laſt moments of thoſe, whom Nero had put to death, or baniſhed. He had publiſhed three books upon that ſubject, written with a great deal of accuracy [A] and politeneſs, and he laboured the Continuation with ſo much the more care, as he ſaw the firſt parts were very much read. But death prevented him from compleating his work. He had it in his thoughts that he ſhould dye before he had publiſhed his fourth book, becauſe of a certain dream (a).

(a) Taken from Pliny the younger, Epiſt. 5. lib. 5.

☞FANSHAW

[A] He had publiſhed three Books written with a great deal of accuracy upon Nero's cruelties.] Nothing was more proper than ſuch a work to render Nero's name odious. It was a kind of a Martyrology. It is well known that the ſatyrs written with the utmoſt wit are infinitely leſs prejudicial to a Tyrant, than a Martyrology unſkilfully compiled. The dying hours of them that are perſecuted, recommend them on two accounts: firſt by the miſerable condition to which they are generally reduced; ſecondly by the patience and fine ſpeeches with which their laſt hours are generally attended, at leaſt in the account of them. This makes men forget the paſſages in their life, which might otherwiſe prevent the effects of compaſſion and veneration. Judge how many coals of fire this heaps on the head of a Perſecutor and a Tyrant. You may think then whether this work of Fannius was not very proper to inſpire men with horror againſt Nero's memory: for it contained an account of the dying hours of a vaſt number of illuſtrious perſons, who had been perſecuted; the whole written with a great deal of accuracy. Let us hear Pliny. Pulcherrimum opus imperfectum reliquit. Quamvis enim agendis cauſſis diſtringeretur, ſcribebat tamen exitus occiſorum aut relegatorum à Nerone: & jam tres libros abſolverat, ſubtiles, & diligentes, & Latinos, atque inter ſermonem hiſtoriamque medios. Ac tanto magis reliquos perficere cupiebat, quanto frequentius hi lectitabantur (1).

(1) Plinius, Epiſt. 5. lib. 5.

☞FANSHAW (Sir RICHARD), famous for his Embaſſies and Writings, was deſcended of an ancient family [A], and youngeſt ſon of Sir Henry Fanſhaw of Ware-Park in Hertfordſhire, the King's Remembrancer in the Court of Exchequer, which Office was held by that family for ſeveral generations. He was brother likewiſe to Thomas Viſcount Fanſhaw of Dromore in Ireland, and to Sir Simon Fanſhaw Bart. (a). He was born about the year 1608 [B], and received the firſt rudiments of his education under the famous Mr. Thomas Farnaby, and afterwards compleated his ſtudies in the Univerſity of Cambridge, from whence he went to travel in foreign countries (b). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo early by his abilities, that in 1635 he was taken into the employments of State by King Charles I, and then ſent Reſident to the Court of Spain; whence being recalled in the beginning of the troubles in 1641, he adhered to the Royal Intereſt, and was employed in ſeveral important matters of State (c). In 1644 he was appointed Secretary at War to Charles Prince of Wales, whom he attended into the weſtern parts of England, and thence into the Iſlands of Scilly and Guernſey. In 1648 he was made Treaſurer of the Navy under the command of Prince Rupert, which he managed till the year 1650, when he was advanced to the dignity of a Baronet; and being ſent Envoy extraordinary to the Court of Spain, and thence recalled into Scotland, he there ſerved in the quality of Secretary of State. This employment he diſcharged in this conjuncture to the great ſatisfaction of all parties, though he never took the covenant or engagement. Thence he attended his Majeſty to Worceſter, and was taken priſoner in the battle there, and conveyed to London, where continuing in cloſe cuſtody till he contracted a ſevere fit of ſickneſs, he had the liberty allowed him, upon bail given, to go for the recovery of his health to any place which he ſhould chooſe, on condition that he ſtirred not five miles from the place without leave of Parliament (d). During theſe and other vacant hours he wrote divers Poems, and made ſeveral Tranſlations [C]. In February $16\frac{59}{60}$ he repaired to

(a) Short Account of his Excellency Sir Richard Fanſhaw and his Writings, prefixed to the Original Letters of his Excellency Sir Richard Fanſhaw during his Embaſſies in Spain and Portugal, edit. London 1702 in 8vo.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 43, 44. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Idem, ibid.

[A] Deſcended of an antient family.] This family was ſeated at Fanſhaw in Derbyſhire. Our Author's great grandfather was John Fanſhaw of that place, brother of Henry Fanſhaw, and father of Thomas Fanſhaw Eſquires, who were ſucceſſively Remembrancers of the Exchequer to Queen Elizabeth. This Thomas was father of Sir Henry Fanſhaw, Knt.; which Gentleman was our Author's father, and died of an apoplexy at Hertford aſſizes March 10th 1615 (1).

(1) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 43. 2d edit. London 1721.

[B] He was born about the year 1608.] This appears from the Author of the Short Account of Sir Richard Fanſhaw (2), who informs us, that he was in the fifty ninth year of his age when he died in 1666. Mr. Wood ſays (3), that he was then fifty nine years of age.

(2) Prefix'd to Original Letters of his Excellency Sir Richard Fanſhaw during his Embaſſies in Spain and Portugal, edit. London 1702 in 8vo.

(3) Ubi ſupra.

[C] During theſe and other vacant hours he wrote divers Poems, and made ſeveral Tranſlations.] His works are as follow. He wrote, I. Divers Poems, printed at London 1646 in 4to, and 1664 in 8vo with his Tranſlation of Il Paſtor fido. The firſt of thoſe Poems is An Ode upon occaſion of his Majeſty's Proclamation an. 1630, commanding the Gentry to reſide upon their eſtates in the country. II. A ſummary Diſcourſe of the civil wars of Rome. London 1664 in 8vo. He hath tranſlated from Engliſh into Latin Verſe, I. The faithful Sheperdeſs, a Paſtoral, written originally by John Fletcher Gent. This tranſlation was printed at London 1658 (4). II. Spencer's Shepherd's Calender (5). But Mr. Gerard Langbaine (6) thinks it a miſtake to aſcribe ſuch a Tranſlation to our Author, ſince he had not heard of any other than that done by Mr. Theodore Bathurſt, ſometime Fellow of Pembroke-Hall in Cambridge, and printed at the end of Spencer's Works in fol. London 1679. Sir Richard Fanſhaw tranſlated out of Latin into Engliſh, 1. The fourth Book of Virgil's Æneis on the Loves of Dido and Æneas. 2. Two Odes out of Horace relating to the civil wars of Rome, againſt covetous rich men. Theſe are printed among his Poems at London 1664 in 8vo. He tranſlated from Italian into Engliſh Il Paſtor fido: The faithful Shepherd, a Paſtoral. London 1646 in 4to and 1664 in 8vo. This Paſtoral was written originally by Guarini, a native of Ferrara in Italy, and Secretary to Alfonſus the ſecond, Duke of that Principality. The Tranſlation is dedicated to the Hope and Luſtre of three Kingdoms, Charles Prince of Wales. In this Dedication our Author ſpeaks modeſtly of his performance, as if the Poem "had loſt "much of the life and quickneſs by being poured out "of one veſſel (that is one language) into another; "beſides the unſteadineſs of the hand, that pours; "and that a Tranſlation at the beſt is but a mock-"rainbow in the clouds, faintly imitating the true "one, into which Apollo himſelf had a full and im-"mediate influence." But Sir John Denham in his Verſes upon this Tranſlation highly commends it, and after having cenſured ſervile Tranſlators proceeds thus:

(4) Wood, col. 44.

(5) Edward Philips's Theatrum Poetarum, Modern Poets, pag. 159. edit. London 1675.

(6) Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, pag. 196, 197. edit. Oxon. 1691.

A new and nobler way thou doſt purſue
To make Tranſlations and Tranſlators too.
They but preſerve the aſhes, thou the flame,
True to his ſenſe, but truer to his fame.
Fording his current where thou findſt it low,
Let'ſt in thine own to make it riſe and flow;
Wiſely reſtoring whatſoever grace
Is loſt by change of times, or tongues, or place.
Nor fetter'd to his numbers and his times,
Betray'ſt his Muſic to unhappy rimes:
Nor are the nerves of his compacted ſtrength
Stretch'd and diſſolv'd unto unfinew'd length.
Yet after all (leſt we ſhould think it thine)
Thy ſpirit to his circle doſt confine.

Sir Richard tranſlated from Spaniſh into Engliſh, Querer per ſolo querer: To love only for love's ſake, a dramatic romance repreſented at Aranjuez before the King and Queen of Spain, to celebrate the birth-day of that King, Philip IV. It was written originally by Antonio de Mendoza in 1623. It was tranſlated and paraphraſed by our Author in 1654 during his confinement at Tankerley Park in Yorkſhire (7). At that time he wrote on this work three Stanza's in Latin and Engliſh, which are as follow:

(7) Langbaine, pag. 194.

"Ille ego, qui (dubiis quondam jactatus in undis,
"Qui dum nunc aulæ, nunc mihi caſtra ſtrepunt,)
"Leni importunas mulcebam carmine curas,
"In quo Paſtoris flamma Fidelis erat.

"At nunc & caſtris, auliſque ejectus & undis,
"(Nam mihi naufragium portus, & ira quies,)
"Altius inſurgens Regum haud intactus amores,
"Et Reginarum fervidus arma cano:

"Quæ (vinc'lis, Hymenæe tuis, ſpretiſque coronis)
"Nec juga ferre virûm, nec dare jura velint.
"Dulce procelloſos audire ex littore fluctus!
"Eque truci terram dulce videre mari."

Time was, when I, a pilgrim of the ſeas,
When I 'midſt noiſe of camps and courts diſeaſe,
Purloin'd ſome hours to charm rude cares with verſe,
Which flame of Faithful Shepherd did rehearſe.

But now reſtrain'd from ſea, from camp, from court,
And by a tempeſt blown into a port,
I raiſe my thoughts to muſe on higher things,
And ecchō' arms and loves of Queens and Kings:

(e) Idem, ibid. to the King at Breda (e). Upon the Reſtoration it was expected that he would have been made one of the Secretaries of State, not only from the kindneſs which his Majeſty had for him, and the hopes formerly given him of it, but likewiſe as a recompence in ſome meaſure for the great ſufferings which both his family and himſelf had ſuſtained in the King's ſervice. However miſſing that preferment he had the place of Maſter of the Requeſts conferred on him, a ſtation, in thoſe times, of conſiderable profit. Afterwards for his known abilities and ſkill in the Latin Languages, he was made Secretary for that tongue (f). In 1661 he being then Burgeſs for the Univerſity of Cambridge was ſworn one of the Privy Council of Ireland, and ſent Envoy to the Court of Portugal, with a dormant Commiſſion to be Embaſſador, which he was to make uſe of as occaſion ſhould require (g). In 1662 (b) he was again ſent to that Court with the title of Embaſſador, and negotiated the marriage of his maſter King Charles II, with the Infanta Donna Catherina, daughter of the late King Don John VI, and only ſiſter to the preſent King Don Alfonſo. Upon his return thence in 1663 he was made one of his Majeſty's Privy-Council (i). In January 166$\frac{3}{4}$ he was ſent Embaſſador to both the Courts of Spain and Portugal [D], in which time the foundation of peace betwixt thoſe Crowns and England was laid by him. His deportment during his former employments in thoſe Courts gained him

(f) Short Account &c. ubi ſupra.

(g) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(i) Short Account, ubi ſupra.

Which Queens (deſpiſing crowns and Hymen's band)
Would neither men obey, nor men command.
Great pleaſure from rough ſeas to ſee the ſhore:
Or from firm land to hear the billows roar!

This Tranſlation was not printed till after our Author's death at London 1671 in 4to; to which is added Fieſtas de Aranjuez, Feſtivals repreſented at Aranjuez, written likewiſe by Antonio de Mendoza, and tranſlated by Sir Richard Fanſhaw. He tranſlated alſo out of Portugueze into Engliſh The Luſiad, or Portugal's Hiſtorical Poem, written by Luis de Camoens. This Tranſlation was printed at London 1665 in fol. and dedicated to William Earl of Strafford, ſon and heir to Thomas Earl of Strafford, Lord Deputy of Ireland, upon whoſe trial our Author wrote a copy of verſes printed among his Poems. Mr. Wood tells us (8), that beſides theſe Tranſlations he hath performed others, which continue partly in manuſcript.

(8) Col. 44.

[D] In January 166$\frac{3}{4}$ he was ſent Embaſſador to both the Courts of Spain and Portugal.] We have ſeveral Letters of the Earl of Arlington to Sir Richard, while the latter was employed in his embaſſy in Spain, publiſh'd in a Book intitled, The right honourable the Earl of Arlington's Letters, Vol. II. containing a compleat collection of his Lordſhip's Letters to Sir Richard Fanſhaw, the Earl of Sandwich, the Earl of Sunderland, and Sir Will. Godolphin, during their reſpective Embaſſies in Spain from 1664 to 1674. As alſo to Sir Robert Southwell in Portugal. Now publiſhed from the originals, and never before printed. London 1701 in 8vo. In this Book are publiſhed the Inſtructions given to Sir Richard Fanſhaw upon his going Embaſſador to Spain in 1664. In 1702 there were printed at London in 8vo, Original Letters of his Excellency Sir Rich. Fanſhaw, during his Embaſſies in Spain and Portugal; which, together with divers Letters and Anſwers from the chief Miniſters of State of England, Spain, and Portugal, contain the whole negotiations of the Treaty of Peace between thoſe three Crowns. The Editor in the Preface remarks very judiciouſly, "that ſome Hiſtorians "are too often guilty of partiality, by ſupporting a "faction, or ſerving an intereſt. Others for want "of knowing ſecret affairs as they were tranſacted, "(which public Miniſters are very ſhy in communicating, while they live, for fear of diſobliging their "maſters, or rendering themſelves obnoxious to cenſure) muſt conſequently give us but a lame and imperfect account of men and things. But men of "learning are conſcious, that this partiality or defect "is abundantly and ſatisfactorily remedied and ſupplied, by the publication of thoſe great men's Letters and Memoirs after their death, that tranſacted "thoſe affairs in perſon, wherein the curious want "ſatisfaction; for by this means ſecrets are diſcovered, intrigues laid open, myſteries revealed, and "matters of fact ſet in their proper lights as they were "acted, with all the adhering circumſtances of time, "place, perſons, concurrence, oppoſition, diſpatch, "and delays, without a poſſibility, at leaſt a probability "of impoſing upon the enquirer; unleſs we could "conclude that truth and juſtice were baniſhed the "world, which would diſcover a greater want of cha- "rity than any ingenuous man would be thought "guilty of." But with reſpect to that pretence, the Editor aſſures us, that the purchaſer is ſecured from danger in the publication of theſe Letters, Anſwers, Obſervations, and Memoirs, by a triple concurrence of indiſputable teſtimonies of their veracity and genuine deſcent. "Firſt, ſays he, from the known ho- "nour and integrity of Sir Richard Fanſhaw, who "was the Author of them, and left them in the poſ- "ſeſſion of his daughter, from whoſe hands we re- "ceived them. Secondly being printed from the ori- "ginals ready to be produced, if occaſion ſhould re- "quire. And thirdly, becauſe the contents were tranſ- "acted in our memories." In the Inſtructions to him he is directed, after paying the uſual compliments to the King and Queen, the Prince, the Infanta, Don Juan of Auſtria, the Duke de Medina las Torres, and the other principal Miniſters of the Court, in terms proportionable to their different conditions, to offer to the King's conſideration that diſadvantage, in which both the Crowns ſuffer by the various interruptions, and almoſt deſtruction of the commerce and trade ſo uſeful and beneficial to both Nations. Upon this head he is inſtructed immediately to demand reparation from, and exemplary puniſhment upon ſome of the Free-Booters, who had taken ſhips from the Engliſh contrary to the articles of peace then ſubſiſting; as alſo to explain himſelf more at large therein to the Duke of Medina las Torres, the principal Miniſter there, and to deal with him upon a Treaty in that matter. With reſpect to Portugal, he is directed, that if the Duke of Medina las Torres ſhould ſuggeſt any thing of a deſire, that the Court of England would quit Portugal, he ſhould ſeem ſurprized with it, as a matter, which he did not expect, and acquaint the Duke, that rather than he would ſeem to admit any debate upon a particular ſo contrary to the honour of his maſter, he would take his leave of the Court of Spain, and return to England. Next he is adviſed, as opportunity ſhould offer, to inform himſelf what kind of Licence Don Domingo Grillio had, and of what extent for the tranſportation of Blacks into the Weſt-Indies; and accordingly to offer him the proſecution of the contract begun by his Agent in England the year before. One point he is ordered earneſtly to inſiſt upon, before he enters into any debates, even at his firſt arrival, viz. the ſending an Embaſſador to England; and to take occaſion, upon any delay therein, to talk of his own return to England; and not to make any ſtep in the formalities of a Treaty, till ſuch an one be diſpatched. He is farther inſtructed to employ his utmoſt ſkill and induſtry, in penetrating into and diſcovering under what model and form his Catholick Majeſty deſigned to leave the Government, when he ſhould die; with all things elſe of the moſt ſecret nature, that might poſſibly come to his knowledge, of which he is ordered to give weekly accounts to the Engliſh Court, and to put the ſecret matters into cypher, leſt by any foul play on the way the contents of his Letters ſhould be diſcovered. He is alſo inſtructed to entertain a good correſpondence and friendſhip with all the Embaſſadors, him ſuch high value and eſteem there, that his reception was vaſtly magnificent, exceeding all that were before; which thoſe Kings declared was done as a particular reſpect to the perſon of the Embaſſador, and was not to be a precedent to ſucceeding Embaſſadors (k). June the 4th 1666 he was ſeized of a violent fever at Madrid, which proved fatal to him on the 16th of the ſame month old ſtyle (l), being the very day on which he had deſigned to ſet out in order to his return to England (m). His body was embalmed, and brought thence by his Lady through Spain and France by land to Calais, whence it was conveyed by ſea to London, and interred in the pariſh Church at Ware in Hertfordſhire, among his anceſtors, with a fair monument of marble over him (n). He was a compleat maſter of the Spaniſh, Portugueſe, Italian, and French Languages (o); and was an able ſtateſman, a great ſcholar, and remarkable for his ſincerity, humanity, and piety (p). He married a daughter of Sir John Harriſon, by whom he had ſeveral children.

(k) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(l) Idem, ibid.

(m) Short Account. ubi ſupra.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Langbaine's Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets, pag. 191. ed. Oxon. 1691.

dors, Reſidents, and Agents of Princes and States in alliance with England, who ſhould happen to be in the Court of Spain, and eſpecially with the French Embaſſador; "by whoſe reputation there, ſay the In- "ſtructions, and his carriage towards you, you will "beſt know how to treat with him. One thing in "very great confidence you may inform him of, that "you are come thither to ſet ſome treaty on foot "for a truce, at leaſt with Portugal, of which you "have had means to know better than others the great "neceſſity, for the weakneſs in which that Crown is, "and imprudence into which the Nation falls every "day, notwithſtanding all ſucceſſes, whereof they "never make a right uſe; without entering into more "particular conference with him herein, till the mat-"ter be well advanced, it being certain he will do "all he can to diſturb it. And notwithſtanding the "good correſpondence we recommended to you to en-"tertain with the ſaid Embaſſador, yet you muſt be "wary that his forwardneſs or preſumption do not "lead him to any points of advantage above you, "remembering eſpecially, that the Crown of England "doth not yield the hand to any King." We have afterwards the following paſſage in theſe inſtructions. According to the lights and informations given you herein, you ſhall acquaint the Duke of Medina las Torres with a report brought hither to our Couſin Prince Rupert of his brother Prince Maurice's being detained a priſoner in the Indies, with ſuch circumſtances as make it probable to him; and therefore we aſk of him the Duke, that a perſon be purpoſely ſent into the Indies to make inquiry into the matter, it being a ſatisfaction we could not deny to our ſaid couſin, for the quiet of his mind in ſo important a concernment; and for your directions therein you muſt make reſort to the papers given into your hands concerning this matter. H.

FAREL (WILLIAM), one of the moſt eminent Miniſters of the Reformed Church, was the ſon of a Gentleman of Dauphiné, and was born at Gap in the year 1489 (a). He ſtudied Philoſophy (b) and the Greek and Hebrew Tongues (c) at Paris with great ſucceſs, and was for ſome time a Teacher in the College of Cardinal le Moine (d). It was James le Fevre, ſurnamed Stapulenſis, who procured him that employment (e). I think that he was alſo indebted to the ſame learned man for the choice which William Briçonnet Biſhop of Meaux made of him to preach in his Dioceſs: this Prelate had ſome inclination for the Reformed Religion, for which reaſon he invited into his Dioceſs ſome perſons who had reliſhed the new opinions. Farel amongſt others was called to preach there in the year 1521 (f). The perſecution which was raiſed at Meaux in the year 1523, againſt thoſe that were ſtiled Heretics, obliged him to provide for his ſecurity ſomewhere elſe than in France (g). He retired to Straſburg [A], where Bucer and Capito admitted him as a brother (h); he was afterwards received as ſuch by Zwinglius at Zurich, by Haller at Berne, and by Oecolampadius at Baſil (i) [B]. As he was thought a very proper man to make Proſelytes, he was adviſed to undertake the Reformation of Religion

(a) Ancillon, Vie de Guillaume Farel, pag. 1.

(b) Ibid. pag. 10.

(c) Ibid. pag. 18 and 28.

(d) Ibid. pag. 29.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid. pag. 110, and 193.

(g) Ibid. pag. 110.

(h) Ibid. pag. 197.

(i) Ibid.

[A] He retired to Straſburg.] I thought that I ought to follow the account of a man (1), who tells us, that he has by him Farel's own Journal; I have ſaid therefore upon his credit, that our William Farel flying from Meaux retired to Straſburg. But I ought not to diſſemble that another Miniſter (2), who ſeems to me to have followed very good Memoirs, relates this affair otherwiſe. He ſays that Farel being obliged to leave Meaux, went to Gap, and endeavoured to eſtabliſh the Reformation there. This deſign did not ſucceed, and only expoſed Farel to the hatred and ill offices of his countrymen. Wherefore he retired to Baſil, where he held a public diſputation which expoſed him to great dangers. Hence he went to Straſburg, where Bucer and Capito received him with open arms, and where he preached the truth to the French Refugees till the year 1527, when he went to Montbeliard to forward the Reformation there (3). This laſt fact is abſolutely falſe; we ſhall ſhew below that Farel preached the Goſpel in the territories of Montbeliard in the year 1524.

(1) Ancillon, Miniſter of Metz before the repeal of the Edict of Nantes, and afterwards at Berlin. See his Vie de Farel, publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1691, pag. 202.

(2) Frider. Spanheim.

(3) Taken from Frideric Spanheim's Oration, intitled Geneva reſtituta, pag. 39, 40.

[B] He was received as a brother .... by Oecolampadius at Baſil.] I add the name of that city to my Author's account, who has omitted it. This omiſſion may lead us into a miſtake, for it would make us think that Oecolampadius was a Miniſter of Bern. Mr. Ancillon's words are as follow. In the year 1524 Zuinglius, the bright and clear Light of Zurich, Haller the Veſſel of Election at Bern, Oecolampadius the Lamp of God's houſe, embraced Farel (4). I obſerve in this account another omiſſion, which is more conſiderable ſtill. He does not mention a famous diſpute in which Farel was engaged at Baſil in the year 1524. I know that he has mentioned it in another place (5), but he has not well ſet down the time when it happened (6), and does not ſpeak of it where he ought to have done it, that is to ſay, when he related (7) hiſtorically and in a chronological order all Farel's labours. Let us therefore ſupply his omiſſion. Farel being arrived at Baſil in the year 1524, came before the Faculty of Divinity, and declared that he deſired to hold a public diſputation. The Divines of Baſil, and eſpecially Lewis Berus Provoſt of St. Peter refuſed to give him leave, pretending that his Theſes were agreeable to the new Doctrines. The Senate having been acquainted with this refuſal gave Farel leave to maintain his Theſes. Farel cauſed them to be poſted upon the College-Gate. The Grand-Vicar, the Rector of the Univerſity, and the Profeſſors publiſhed a prohibition to aſſiſt at this diſputation upon pain of excommunication. The Senate being perſuaded that this prohibition was a dangerous attempt on their authority, commanded all the Divines, the Curates and the Students to be preſent at this diſputation, and declared that they who ſhould refuſe it would loſe the right of making uſe of the public mills and ovens, and of buying the neceſſaries of life at the Market (8). By this means Farel had all the advantage he could wiſh for; he held his diſputation in the preſence of an infinite number of Clergymen and Laymen, February the 15th 1524. But yet the Roman Catholic faction was ſtill ſo ſtrong, that they obliged him ſoon after to retire from Baſil (9).

(4) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 197, 198.

(5) In pag. 43. where he does not treat of the chronological ſeries of Farel's labours.

(6) He places it on Feb. the 15th 1520.

(7) In chap. the 13th pag. 191, &c.

(8) Secus facturis uſu molendinorum, furnorum & mercatus interdicit. Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theol. Exter. pag. 114.

(9) Taken from Melch. Adam, ibid. pag. 113, 114.

gion at Montbeliard, in which deſign he was ſupported by the Duke of Wittenberg, who was Lord of that place, and he ſucceeded in it moſt happily (k). He tempered his zeal a little according to Oecolampadius's advice [C]. In the year 1528 he had the ſame ſucceſs

(k) Ibid. pag. 204.

[C] He tempered his zeal a little, according to Oecolampadius's advice.] Here follow Mr. Ancillon's words. " Farel according to the advice which Oe- " colampadius gave him, tempered his ardour, and " managed his zeal according to the temper of his " hearers, all of whom he converted to the Communion " of Jeſus Chriſt (10)." This is meant of his preaching at and about Montbeliard. Others ſay that as he had diſcovered too much heat and paſſion in thoſe quarters, Oecolampadius adviſed him to add prudence to his mettle when he ſhould preach the Goſpel in another place (11). Baſilea exactus in monte Bellicardi Evangelium Chriſti aliquandiu docuit, poſt & in aliis Gallici idiomatis peritis vicinisque locis: tanta animi contentione tantoque ardore: ut divinitus illum ad munus ejuſmodi excitatum res demonſtraret: quanquam alicubi moderationem in eo quidam deſiderarint, ut dicemus. Circa annum viceſimum ſeptimum iterum annunciandi verbi locum invenit, in quodam oppido, cui Ælin nomen: ubi ut fortiter & prudenter ageret, Oecolampadius ſubmonuit (*). i. e. " Being baniſhed from Baſil he " preached the Goſpel of Chriſt for ſome time at " Montbeliard, and afterwards alſo in ſome neighbour- " ing places where the people underſtood French; he " did it with ſo much zeal and ardour, that it plainly " appeared he had been divinely choſen for that " function: though ſome perſons wiſhed he had been " a little more moderate. About the year 1527 he " met with another opportunity to preach the Goſpel " in a certain village called Ælin, when Oecolampa- " dius adviſed him to behave both with fervency and " prudence." The Author from whom I have borrowed this paſſage, gives us (12) the very words, which Oecolampadius made uſe of when he entreated his friend to break himſelf of his violence. Ita Oecolampadius alicubi (†): Qui hic tibi & Evangelio favent, ne quid ardore zeli initia inter attentes, timent. De quo ſatis monui antè, quàm abires: nunc non item. Neque enim excidiſſe animo crediderim; quomodo inter nos convenerit: nempe ut quantò propenſior es ad violentiam; tantò magis te ad lenitatem exerceas; leoninamque magnanimitatem columbina modeſtia frangas. Duci, non trahi, volunt homines. Unum ſpectemus; quomodo lucrifaciamus animas Chriſto; & quomodo ipſi doceri vellemus, ſiquidem adhuc teneremur in tenebris & captivitate Antichriſti. Vide ut Chriſtum etiam vita exprimas, exemplo inquam docendi. Et alibi (§) apertiùs: rogavi ex N. ſuper manſuetudine tuâ: quâ nihil magis Chriſtianum, nedum Apoſtolum decet. Is cùm mirè extuliſſet ſedulitatem indefatigabilem, ardoremque inextinguibilem, & ſatis felicem ſucceſſum: ſubdit, quod in ſacrificos imbres effundas convitiorum. Non ignoro, quid illi mereantur, & quibus coloribus depingi debeant: pace tamen tua dixerim, amicus & frater fratri: non videris per omnia officii tui reminiſci. Evangelizatum, non maledictum miſſus es. Condono, imò laudo zelum: modò ne deſideretur manſuetudo. Da operam, mi frater, ut ſpiritum meum exhilares etiam hoc nuncio: quod in tempore ſuo, vinum & oleum infundas; quod Evangeliſtam, non tyrannicum legiſlatorem præſtes. i. e. " Oecolampadius ſpeaks " ſomewhere thus: they who wiſh well here to you " and to the Goſpel, are afraid leſt your fiery zeal " ſhould carry you too far in this beginning. I have " given you ſufficient warning of this before you " went away: I ſhall not repeat what I told you then, " for I cannot think that you have already forgotten " what we agreed upon together: namely, that the " more you are inclined to violence, the more you " ought to ſtrive how to acquire more gentleneſs, and " to qualify that magnanimity of a lyon by the meek- " neſs of a dove. Men will be led, and not pulled " by main force. Let us only mind this, how we " may gain ſouls to Chriſt; and how we our ſelves " would chooſe to be taught, if we laboured ſtill under " the darkneſs and ſlavery of Antichriſt. Take care " that you imitate Chriſt by your actions; I mean by " your manner of teaching. He ſpeaks more openly " ſtill in another place. I have enquired of N. about " your meekneſs, than which nothing becomes better " a Chriſtian, not to ſay, an Apoſtle. This perſon " having highly commended your indefatigable care " and your inextinguiſhable ardour, and your ſucceſs, " which is not inconſiderable, added, that you poured " out ſhowers of reproaches on the Prieſts. I know " what they deſerve, and how they ought to be deſ- " cribed: but give me leave to ſay it, as a friend " and brother to a brother: You do not ſeem to re- " member in every reſpect what your duty requires of " you. You are ſent to preach the Goſpel, and not " to rail. I excuſe, nay I commend your zeal, provided " it does not want meekneſs. Strive, my dear bro- " ther, to fill my ſoul with joy, by acquainting me " that in a proper time you know how to mix wine " with oil, and that you behave like an Evangeliſt, " and not like a tyrannical Legiſlator."

(10) Ancillon's Vie de Farel, pag. 204.

(11) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theol. Exter. pag. 114.

(*) In Epiſt. lib. 4.

(12) Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theol. Exter. pag. 113, 116.

(†) Lib. 4. Epiſt. pag. 916.

(§) Lib. 4. Epiſt. pag. 956.

Here follows an inſtance of Farel's too fiery zeal. On a proceſſion day he pulled out of a Prieſt's hand the image of St. Anthony, and threw it from the bridge down into the river. He would have been knocked down had not God prevented it by a panic fear, with which the mob was ſeized on a ſudden. It is however thus that the Miniſter whom I quote pretends Farel was ſaved. Cùm verò Farellus noſter aliquando, publica occaſione gloriæ divinæ aſſerendæ oblata, Antonii idolum, magna cum pompa per urbem circumgeſtatum, Sacrificulorum manibus excuſſum in ſubjectum flumen è ponte præcipitaſſet, Pentheus alter haud dubie futurus erat, ni mira Dei providentia furibundæ plebis ora & manus injecto terrore panico præter ſpem compeſcuiſſet (13). i. e. " It happened one day that our " Farel met with an opportunity to maintain publickly " the Glory of God. For St. Anthony's image being " carried about the city with great pomp and ceremo- " ny, he ſnatched it out of the Prieſt's hand, and " threw it over the bridge into the river. For which " action he would no doubt have been torn to pieces " like another Pentheus, had not God's wonderful " providence refrained the mouths and hands of the " populace, by filling them unexpectedly with a " panic fear." Eraſmus did very much diſlike Farel's temper. Thus he writes to the Official of Bezançon. Habetis iſthic in propinquo, novum Evangeliſtam Pharellum, quo nihil vidi unquam mendacius, virulentius, aut ſeditioſius (14). i. e. " You have in your neigh- " bourhood the new Evangeliſt Farel; I never ſaw a " man more falſe, more virulent, or more ſeditious." In another place he gives us a frightful character of him: but it muſt be remembered, that he thought Farel had abuſed him in ſome of his writings. Supereſt Pharellus, bone Chriſte, quàm pius, quam innocens, vir! In quem quid ſcripſerim non referunt. Si nunc eſt converſus ad meliorem frugem, gratulor homini. Qualis olim erat, mihi valde diſplicuit, ſeditioſus, acidæ linguæ, & vaniſſimus. Sic rem geſſit in monte Pellicardi, ut bis inde profugerit. Baſilienſis Senatus, quum cuperet civitatem eſſe tutam à ſeditione, juſſit Pharellum ire exulatum. Oecolampadius cujus mensâ tum utebatur non ſemel objurgavit hominem, quòd obtrectandi nullum faceret finem, teſtatus ſe non poſſe ferre in convivio tam amarulentas obtrectationes. Id mihi narravit, qui in eadem menſa accumbebat, vir integritatis rariſſimæ. Apellârat me Balaam, hac de cauſa cum illo expoſtulanti, nihil certi reſpondit, ſed ſic elapſus eſt, ut diceret negotiatorem quendam Dupletum hoc dixiſſe, is enim jam abierat; & fieri poteſt ut dixerit, ſed à Pharello doctus. De colloquio noſtro ſcripſit epiſtolam ad fratres Conſtantiam, in qua ſæpe in decem verſibus non erat unum verbum verum. Omitto jam leviora. Talem expertus, ſi talem depinxi, nihil mirum. Nunc qualis ſit neſcio (15). i. e. " Is " Farel alive, Good Lord, what a pious, what an " innocent man! They do not relate what I wrote " againſt him. If he is now altered for the better I " wiſh him joy. But I diſliked him extremely as he " was formerly, a ſeditious, ſlanderous and deceitful " man. The Senate of Baſil being willing to keep " their city free from ſedition, baniſhed Farel; and " Oecolampadius with whom he uſed to board has " often cenſured him for his continual railings, de- " claring that he could not bear thoſe bitter invectives " at table. This has been related to me by a man " of an uncommon ſincerity, who uſed to diet at the " ſame

(13) Fridericus Spanheim. in Geneva reſtituta, pag. 40, 41.

(14) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 30. lib. 18. pag. 798. It is dated December the 29th 1524; whence it appears that Farel went that year into the territories of Montbeliard. See alſo the 14th Letter of the 30th book, but correct the date of it, and put 1525, inſtead of 1515.

(15) Eraſm. in Epiſtola ad Fratres Germaniæ inferioris, pag. 2128, 2129. It is the 69th Letter of the 31ſt book; it was written in the year 1530. I have corrected ſome errors, which crept into the London edition. Compare this with what I ſhall quote from Eraſmus in the Remark [L] quotation (43).

(l) Ibid. pag. 206, 207.

(m) Ibid. pag. 207, 208.

ſucceſs in the City of Aigle, and ſoon after in the Bailiwick of Morat (l) [D]. He went afterwards to Neufchatel in the year 1529, and argued againſt the Roman Catholic party with ſo much ſtrength, that this City embraced the Reformed Religion and eſtabliſhed it intirely November the 4th 1530 (m). He was ſent (n) a Deputy to the Synod of Waldenſes held in the Valley of Angrogne; hence he went to Geneva, where he laboured againſt Popery; but the Grand Vicar and the other Clergymen reſiſted him with ſo much fury, that he was obliged to retire. He was called back in 1534 by the inhabitants, who had renounced the Roman Catholic Religion, and he was the chief perſon that procured the perfect abolition of Popery in that City the next year. He was baniſhed from Geneva with Calvin in the year 1538 (o), and retired to Baſil, and afterwards to Neufchatel (p), where there was great probability of a large Evangelical harveſt. Some months before he had received at Neufchatel a deadly affront, but for which ſuch a ſatisfaction was made him [E], that it cannot be ſaid he was forced to go to Mets. He

(n) Spanheim, in Geneva reſtituta, pag. 42, 43.

(o) Beza, in Vita Calvini.

(p) Ancillon, Vie de Guillaume Farel, pag. 170.

(16) Matth. xi. 12.

LUTHER.

[D] He had ..... ſucceſs in the city of Aigle, and ſoon after in the Bailiwick of Morat. According to Monſieur Ancillon he did not go to Neufchatel but after he had reformed the City of Aigle and the Bailiwick of Morat: but Monſieur Spanheim the father makes him go to Neufchatel immediately on his leaving Montbeliard, and to Aigle, &c. His account is ſo curious that it deſerves to be tranſcribed at length. The Reader will ſee in it this Reformer's intrepidity, and with how much courage he got over the oppoſition which the Prieſts made, who cauſed the bells to be rung that his voice might not be heard: they alſo made uſe of the artifice to which Ulyſſes had recourſe to prevent the bad effects of the ſinging of the Syrens, they ſtopped their ears with locks of ſilk. This it was they oppoſed to Farel's thundering eloquence: but at laſt they became more reaſonable, and heard him favourably. Inde, that is to ſay from Montbeliard, Neocomum delatus Farellus, ſed & ibi duriter habitus Aquileiam Bernatum oppidum Valeſiis conterminum incolere cœpit, & ludum aperire erudiendæ juventuti in ſpeciem, revera docendæ veritati. Turbatum hic etiam à Sacrificulis, & Farello quærenda ſedes alia. Delecta Moratum, Helveticæ gentis fortitudine & victoria nobile municipium. Sed nec ibi Farello noſtro quies. Extruſus itaque in agrum Biellenſem divina providentia totum illum tractum ingenti ſucceſſu Evangelii prædicatione implevit, eumque inter ludibria, verbera, & contumelias innumeras, Diaboli & Cleri ingratiis, Chriſto vindicavit. Accêſſere mox Orba & Granſonium, quicquid fremeret Satan, quicquid Sacrificuli in Farelli & Evangelii perniciem molirentur. Imperterritus hominis animus omnes in ſtuporem dabat, cùm viderent animum ſimul ac vocem illi ad ſtrictos enſes conſtare, adeò quidem, ut & illi ex Clero, qui continuo campanarum clangore, & aure bombycinâ lanugine oppletâ, concionem ejus eludere diu ſatagerant, poſtmodùm patulas aures & faventes animos ad Farelli auditorium adferrent (17). i. e. "Hence Farel went to Neufchatel; but being alſo "ill treated there, he retired to Aigle, a town belonging to thoſe of Bern, and ſituated near the country "called Valais; there he opened a ſchool with a pretence to teach the youth, but in reality with a deſign "to preach the truth. But the Prieſts drove him from "thence alſo, and he was obliged to think of another "place whither to retire. He choſe Morat, a town "famous for the courage and victory of the Swiſs "nation. But even there he could not live quietly. "Being therefore by the providence of God ſent into "the territory of Bienne, he ſpread with a wonderful "ſucceſs the knowledge of the Goſpel through that "whole tract, and gained it to Chriſt notwithſtanding "the innumerable affronts, blows and injuries with "which the Devil loaded him, and againſt all oppoſition of the Clergy. Soon after he reformed Orbe "and Granſon, though the Devil raged at it, and "the Prieſts did all that lay in their power to deſtroy "Farel and the Goſpel. This man's undaunted "courage raiſed people's admiration, when they ſaw "that neither his preſence of mind nor his voice "failed him amidſt drawn ſwords; ſo that even thoſe "Clergymen who by the noiſe of the bells and by "ſtopping their ears with ſilk endeavoured at firſt "to render his preaching ineffectual, heard him afterwards with attention and with a favourable diſpoſition "towards him." You will not find Lauſanne in the liſt of the cities where Farel planted the Reformed Religion: and yet he eſtabliſhed it alſo at Lauſanne, if we may believe Beza (18), and the inſcription of his picture. Pray obſerve, that during the firſt ſermons he made at Mets, the Dominican Friars had their recourſe to their bells, as to an infallible remedy: but in vain did they ring them, they could not interrupt the Preacher. He ſtrove with the bells who ſhould be better heard, and he was not beaten. Primam concionem in cœmiterio Dominicanorum habuit. Qui cùm aliud non poſſent, campani æris impulſu impedire concionem conati ſunt. Ibi tum Farellus contra ad ravim uſque vocem intendit: nec vinci ſe à ſtrepitu ullo paſſus eſt (19). His voice was like the thunder, and we may apply to him what Spanheim ſaid of a Monk who preached againſt Lutheraniſm. Dominicanæ familiæ Monachus, qui pro concione in Palatii cœnobio ſtentoreâ declamatione Cornua quæ vincatque tubas, in Lutheranum nomen invehebatur, à Petro Roberto Olivetano .... publicè increpitus & correptus (20). i. e. "A Dominican Friar, "who preaching in the Convent of the Palace inveighed againſt the Lutherans with a Stentorean "voice, and louder than a hunter's horn and a trumpet, was publicly reproved by Peter Robert Olivetan."

(18) Beza, in Iconibus.

(19) Melch. Adam, in Vitis Theolog. Exter. pag. 114. See alſo a Letter of Bucer to Calvin. It is the 37th amongſt Calvin's Letters, and dated October the 6th 1541. This date does not agree with Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. liv. 16. 433. who places Farel's journey under the year 1542.

[E] He received at Neufchatel a deadly affront, ... for which ... ſatisfaction was made him.] "Farel "having endeavoured to reform the Church of Neufchatel ſo that every thing might be done with order "and decency, was continually improving men's morals, reforming all abuſes, and ſuppreſſing all ſcandalous actions, as much as lay in his power. This "ſtrictneſs, with which he laboured to have the eccleſiaſtical diſcipline obſerved, rendered him odious and "even unſufferable to the wicked and vicious. It "happened one day that a woman of a nobſe Family "parted from her huſband. Farel entreated her not "to put aſunder what God had joined together, and "inſiſted upon the ſtrongeſt arguments to perſuade her "to do her duty. This woman would not hearken "either to the private advices ſhe had received, or "to thoſe of the Conſiſtory, or to the entreaties of "the

(17) Spanheim, Geneva reſtituta, pag. 41, 42.

(20) Spanheim. Geneva Reſtituta, pag. 56.

He had a thouſand difficulties to ſtruggle with in that riſing Church, and was obliged to retire with the faithful into the Abbey of Gorze (r) [F], where the Count of Furſtemberg protected them. But they could not continue there long, for they were beſieged in the Abbey, and obliged at laſt to ſurrender after a capitulation (s). Farel very happily made his eſcape [G], and endeavoured to procure an effectual reſtoration for his friends by the means of the Proteſtant Princes of Germany (t). He went to take again upon him his former functions of a Miniſter at Neufchatel, whence he took now and then a journey to Geneva. When he went thither in the year 1553, he found that he was very odious to ſome perſons there [H]. During his ſtay at Geneva at this time he was preſent at Servetus's execution (u). He went again to Geneva in the year 1564, to bid farewell for (r) Ibid. pag. 211.

(s) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. liv. 16. pag. 434.

(t) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 99, 100.

(u) Idem, pag. 228.

" the Magiſtrates of Neufchatel; ſo that Farel thought " himſelf obliged to blame and condemn this diſobe- " dience after another manner, and that he ought to " remove that ſcandal publickly in a ſermon and " from the pulpit. Hence it was that on a Sunday " morning the laſt day of July he ſpoke with his " wonted ardour both againſt this rebel woman, and " againſt them that ſupported her in her obſtinacy. " They who favoured her took his action very ill. " That ſame day they combined together againſt Farel, " and knew ſo well how to work upon the people, " that at two of the clock they met in an open place " near the church and the caſtle, to conſult together " how they ſhould deal with Farel. The opinions " were divided, ſome being for, and others againſt " Farel: at laſt the majority voted that Farel ſhould " leave Neufchatel within two months. The prudent " conduct of the Governor and of the Council of " State, as they call it, prevented a ſedition and the " effuſion of blood. As Farel had no other motive or " view, but the promoting of the glory of God and " the honour of his Church, the ſedition did not ſur- " prize him, he was not daunted by it, but continued " to perform the functions of his office without the " leaſt faint-heartedneſs. No ſooner were the ſove- " reign Lords of Bern acquainted with the raſh un- " dertaking of this Lady's friends, but they wrote im- " mediately to the Governor and Council of Neufcha- " tel, that they might prevent the evil and ſuppreſs " it before it grew worſe. They ſent two Deputies " of the moſt conſiderable perſons of their Council, " who being arrived at Neufchatel, repreſented in the " ſtrongeſt manner to the four Miniſters, and to the " Council and Citizens, what a ſignal injury it would " be to Farel, and to the ſignal ſervices he had done, " and to the grace of which God had made him an " inſtrument towards them. Hence it happened, that " on the 28th of November the Council iſſued out a " Decree, by which it was ordered, that all miſun- " derſtanding ſhould be ſuppreſſed, all partiality ſmo- " thered, all miſtruſt ended, and all hatred and ani- " moſity ſtifled and appeaſed; that Farel ſhould con- " tinue to perform the functions of his office, as being " blameleſs both with regard to his doctrine and to " his morals, and as a man who had done the Church " very great ſervices; that whoever ſpoke ill of Fa- " rel ſhould be condemned to pay a great fine; Farel " being in reality the Claſſis * of Neufchatel, the " Chariot of Iſrael, and the Horſemen thereof, by his " piety, his probity, and his learning. According " to the advice of the Magiſtrates of Bern, Farel, by " a majority of the votes of the Citizens of Neufcha- " tel, was continued in his poſt January the 4th, " 1542, to the great comfort of all good men, and " to the ſhame of his enemies, who were all ſilenced. " This added new ſtrength to Farel's zeal; he ſtorm- " ed and thundered more than ever againſt vice and " corruption (21)." It muſt be obſerved, that this Miniſter aſſerted with great zeal and vigour the ſeverity of Church diſcipline, and impoſed publick penance on all thoſe ſinners that raiſed any ſcandal. Here follows the ſubſtance of a Letter written to the Claſſis of Neufchatel by the Miniſters of Baſil July the 28th 1554. They ſay that they commend Farel's zeal in taking all poſſible care that the Church-diſcipline be exactly obſerved, that the reign of vice be deſtroyed, that the holy Sacraments be adminiſter'd in a holy and profitable manner; adding that they approved, as well as Farel, that they who by their ſins ſcandalize the Church, ſhould make a ſolemn confeſſion of their faults, give a public teſtimony of their repentance, and by an extraordinary humiliation make amends for the offence they have given (22).

* What a Claſſis is, ſee in the Article BEKKER. Remark [N].

(21) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 176, &c.

(22) Ibid. pag. 153.

[F] He was obliged to retire into the Abbey of Gorze.] The women were like to tear him in pieces there, if we may believe Monſieur de Madaure. He charges him with having cried out, that it is falſe that the Virgin Mary continued a Virgin after her delivery (23). The women of Gorze, adds he, ſtartled at this blaſphemy and audaciouſneſs, fell upon him, and with their nails pluck'd out his hair and beard, and tore him with ſuch a fury, that he would never have eſcaped ſafe out of their hands, had not Captain Henry Franck deliver'd him. Monſieur Ancillon ſhews this to be a fable.

(23) Madaure in the book intitled, La Naiſſance & la Decadence de l'Hereſie à Mets, quoted by Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 66. (a).

* (a) Mr. Bayle is miſtaken in this quotation and in the (25): He takes for the name of a man, the name of the city of which he was a titulary Biſhop. This man's name was MARTIN MEURISSE; he was a Franciſcan Friar, and Biſhop of Madaure, Suffragan and Adminiſtrator of the Biſhoprick of Mets. Thus he ſtiled himſelf in the titles of his Books, and particularly of that which Mr. Bayle quotes: It is intitled, Hiſtoire de la naiſſance, du progrès, & de la décadence de l'Hereſie dans la ville de Mets & Païs Meſſin. i. e. "The Hiſtory of the birth, progreſs, and fall of " hereſy in the city and territories of Mets." This title ſeems to have been copied from that which Florimond de Remond prefixed to his Hiſtory. Mr. Bayle was probably miſled by Monſieur Ancillon's manner of quoting this Author in his Life of Farel; he calls him generally le Sieur de Madaure *; which is a manner of expreſſing one's ſelf as inaccurate, as if Coeffeteau was quoted under the name of le Sieur de Dardaine or de Marſeille, or Cardinal du Perron under the name of le Sieur d'Evreux or de Sens. Meuriſſe's work, which occaſioned this remark, was printed at Mets for J. Antoine in the year 1642, 4to. The reader will find a Catalogue of his other Works in Waddingi Scriptores Ord. Minorum, and in the Bibliotheca Telleriana, p. 115, 192, and 294. CRIT. REM.]

* See the Mélange Critiq. de Mr. Ancillon, tom. 2. pag. 271.

[G] Farel very happily made his eſcape.] Beza having related (24), that this Abbey was beſieged, and at laſt ſurrendered upon terms, adds, and tho' ſtrict ſearch was made after Farel, yet he made his eſcape having been put in a cart amongſt the lepers. Monſieur de Madaure pretends that Farel eſcaped by being put in a cart full of lepers, having his face made white with meal, and holding a clapper in his hand (25). But Monſieur Ancillon anſwered, that this meal and this clapper are all of the Sieur de Madaure's own invention, and he grounds this anſwer on Beza's ſilence. But this is not a ſolid foundation; for Beza was not obliged to relate all the circumſtances of this affair, but only the ſubſtance of it.

(24) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. liv. 16. pag. 434.

(25) Madaure, Naiſſance & Decadence de l'Hereſie à Mets, qnoted by Ancillon, pag. 95.

[H] He was very odious to ſome perſons at Geneva.] They brought a criminal action againſt him, and he was obliged to appear before the Judges: for the Senate of Geneva wrote to the Magiſtrates of Neufchatel, deſiring them to order that the perſon accuſed ſhould come and anſwer the charges that were brought againſt him. As ſoon as the Senate heard that Farel was arrived, they ſent Calvin word, that he muſt not be ſuffered to preach. Calvin does not acquaint us with the iſſue of this affair, he only ſays, that he would willingly blot out with his own blood the diſhonour, which thoſe of Geneva brought upon themſelves, by their ungrateful conduct. Here follows the whole paſſage. Nunc ad ſummum pervenit nequitia, ut omni pudore excuſſo templum Domini in lupanar convertere obſtinate cupiant. Atque ut ſciatis quam fœda ſit deformitas, cum hic nuper eſſet, frater noſter Farellus, cui ſe totos debent, ut ſatis noſtis, & pro jure ſuo eos libere moneret, for ever to Calvin who was dangerouſly ill. He married at the age of ſixty nine [I]. He took a ſecond journey to Mets in the year 1565, being invited by his ancient flock to come and ſee the fruits of the ſeed which he had ſowed in their hearts (y). The day after moneret, tantus in eum furor exarſit, ut capitale judicium in eum intentare non ſint veriti. Scio equidem non debere novum videri, ſi reperiantur in urbe libera factioſi homines, qui turbas concitent. Sed deploranda eſt Senatus noſtri cæcitas, quod libertatis ſuæ patrem, & patrem hujus Eccleſiæ ſibi reum cauſæ capitalis mitti a Neocomenſibus popoſcit. Dedecus hujus urbis proferre cogor, quod ſanguine meo delere cuperem. Venit Farellus: antequam urbem ingreſſus eſſet, denunciabat domi meæ apparitor Senatus, ne ſuggeſtum conſcenderet. Reliqua non proſequor: quia ſatis eſt ejus ingratitudinis guſtum dediſſe, quæ bonis omnibus & ingenuis merito ſtomachum movebit. Sed quoniam me complures cauſæ impediunt, ne mala noſtra aperte deplorem, ſic breviter habete, niſi per vos cohibeatur Satan, habenas ei laxatum iri (26). i. e. "Wickedneſs is now come to the higheſt degree; ſo "that men having now loſt all ſhame, obſtinately de- "ſire to turn the Church of God into a place of pro- "ſtitution. And that you may know how abomina- "ble the corruption is; I muſt tell you, that when "our brother Farel was here lately, to whom they "are ſo much indebted, as you very well know, he gave "them free advice, as he has a right to do; whereupon "they fell into ſuch a paſſion againſt him, that they "did not ſcruple to bring a criminal action againſt "him. I am ſenſible that it is no new thing, to ſee "in a free City factious men, who raiſe commotions. "But we ought to lament the blindneſs of our Senate, "who required from the Magiſtrates of Neufchatel "to ſend thither to them the Father of their Liberty "and the Father of this Church, as a perſon charged "with a capital crime. I am forced to relate the diſ- "honour of this City, which I would blot out with "my own blood. Farel came; and before he en- "tered the city, the Senate's officer declared at my "houſe, that he ſhould not get into the pulpit. I "ſhall not relate the reſt, for it is ſufficient to have "given you an inſtance of ſuch an ungratefulneſs, "which juſtly exaſperates all good and honeſt perſons. "But as there are ſeveral reaſons, which do not ſuf- "fer me openly to bewail our misfortunes, I ſhall on- "ly warn you in one word, that if Satan be not re- "ſtrained by you, he will ſoon be let abſolutely looſe."

(y) Ancill. Vie de Farel, pag. 263.

(26) Calvinus, Epiſtola ad Tiguri-nos Miniſtros; it is the 165th; it is dated from Geneva Nov. the 26th 1553.

[I] He married at the age of ſixty nine.] "It ap- "pears by a writing under Farel's own hand, that he "married an elderly maiden called Mary, the daugh- "ter of Alexander Torel of the City of Roan; that "this maiden retiring to Neufchatel for the ſake of "Religion, had been brought up in the knowledge "of the Lord by her mother, who was a widow in- "deed, and feared and ſerved God; that this maiden "was honeſt and virtuous, and her life regular and "blameleſs. The Bans of Farel and Mary Torel's "marriage are ſtill extant written by Farel himſelf, "with great ſimplicity; they were publiſhed Septem- "ber the 11th, the 21ſt, and October the 2d, 1558 "(27)." Let us ſee how Monſieur Ancillon vindi- cates this marriage (28). Farel did not marry till he was ſixty nine years old, and as his friends ſaid, when he had one foot in the grave. Farel's friends thought his marriage very ſtrange, and out of ſeaſon: yet Farel found means to make his friends approve the reaſons, that made him enter into a ſociety, ſuch as marriage is, in his old age. Men have thought till this time, that Farel was perſuaded to marry by a ſecret inſpiration and an extraordinary motion. However it be we know, that by marrying, he propoſed to provide for his old age, becauſe of his infirmities, by the means which God himſelf has ordained; that is, by taking an help for his piety to cheriſh it in him, an help for ſociety, to make it more agreeable, an help for œconomy, whom he might truſt with the things belonging to this life, and an help for his weakneſs, that he might poſſeſs his veſſel in ſanctification and honour. We know that Farel married in order to ſhew, that a ſtate of celibacy is neither meritorious nor ſatisfactory, as they of the Romiſh Church aſſert. We know, that Farel married to prove that the grace of a perpetual continency is neither given to all, nor for ever *. The end of this Apology will ſurprize all thoſe who have but a ſuperficial genius, and even ſeveral other perſons: Men will hardly imagine, that the gift of continence, which has been kept till the age of ſixty nine, ſhould on a ſudden diſappear and vaniſh away. The moſt ſenſual and moſt voluptuous perſons do generally loſe their incontinency at that age, and even ſooner. Even they, who have not made too bad an uſe of their hot conſtitution, find that their ſtrength is entirely decayed before they come to their ſixty ninth year; and here is a man, who at that age begins to find, that he cannot be continent any longer. This is certainly very extraordinary; but yet let us not call it a mere fable. Let us remember that the impreſſion of ſome objects upon our brains is not in the power of our ſoul. When ſome objects pleaſe us, it is not becauſe we will have it ſo, but becauſe they move after a certain manner the fibres of our brains, and open ſome valves in them which were ſhut. This alteration produces almoſt an infinite number of others in our body: hence come thoſe deſires, that foretaſte of pleaſure, and a thouſand other innovations, which deſtroy our continency. Thus Mary Torel altered the courſe of the animal ſpirits in this good old man: ſhe pleaſed him; ſhe had that proportion between the object and the faculty, which raiſes the ſentiments of love, and all that follows; and this was enough. Do not come and tell me, that this maiden was not young, and that ſhe is not repreſented as beautiful. This is nothing to the purpoſe; the proportion I have mentioned, that great ſpring, that grand mover, conſiſts neither in youth nor beauty; it is a certain Je ne ſcai quoy, I know not what, which has its ſeat in the imperceptible particles. The effects of it are felt, tho' the manner of its action be unknown (29). A man may have ſeen ten thouſand women for twenty years, and yet have never had a mind to marry. This ſame man may chance to meet with a woman in a boat, in an entertainment, or in a viſit, and will like her ſo well as to be ready to marry her immediately: and yet ſhe is neither ſo young nor ſo beautiful as thoſe, whom he did not fall in love with: ſhe alſo has been in company with ſeveral men, much more inclinable to love than this is, and yet ſhe did not inflame their heart. Why? Becauſe the proportion between the object and the faculty was wanting, and happens to be in this particular caſe; and ſo the marriage is ſoon agreed upon. It may even be ſaid, that a man advanced in years, who from a long chain of arguments infers that he muſt marry, does by that very means diſpoſe himſelf to incontinency. He becomes liable to be eaſily ſtruck in that part of the brain, which gives riſe to love: the object that touches him in that part pleaſes and charms him, he thinks of it continually, he deſires to enjoy it, and all this makes him loſe the noble gift of continence, with which nature had endowed him; he finds himſelf in a burning condition, and marries according to St. Paul's advice. There is nothing therefore improbable in the vindication of our old man's marriage, which I have tranſcribed; on the contrary, we meet there with an inſtance, which ſtrongly proves, that nothing is more raſh, than a vow of celibacy. The gift of continency is not a thing on which men may depend. Suppoſe you have been proof againſt a thouſand very lovely objects, even for a great many years. Well; does it follow from thence that you will be ſo perpetually? Can you anſwer for it, that you will never meet with an object more proportionable to the fibres of your brain? This comes like the thief in the night, when you do not expect it. Keep therefore always your liberty, poſſeſs your gift as though you did not poſſeſs it, and think that you can and perhaps ſhall loſe it, when you will not be aware of it. You need only meet with a perſon with whom you fall in love, and away goes your continency.

(29) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calviniſme de Maimbourg, pag. 557.

Notwithſtanding all this, it is ſomewhat ſurprizing, that Farel ſhould have continued a batchelor till he was an old man. His conſtitution which was all fire, and ſo ſtrong that in his ſeventy fifth year (30) he had a ſon by his wife who was pretty old, required, it ſeems, that he ſhould have married young. The moſt powerful

(30) He lived 76 years, and left a ſon who was but one year old. See Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 272.

(27) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 242, 243.

(28) Ibid. pag. 240, 241.

* Chryſoſt. Hom. 47. on St. Matth.

after his arrival (z) he preached in the Church of the intrenchment. He was not then ſo old as it is related [K]. He returned to Neufchatel, and died there September the 13th in the ſame year (aa). He left a ſon who was but one year old, and who died three years after (bb). Though he was more capable to preach than to write books, yet he ſet up for an Author [L]. Let us not omit to obſerve, that he laid the foundations of the

(z) That is to ſay May 13.

(aa) Melch. Adam, Vit. Theolog. Exter. pag. 115.

(bb) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 272.

powerful eloquence, with which he confuted the pretended validity of monaſtic vows, did not require it leſs; ſince at that time men were obliged to preach by their own example, if they would not be ſuſpected of ſome remains of heterodoxy (31). Eraſmus mentioning the ſucceſs which the Reformers had, ſays amongſt other things, that ſeveral Monks and Nuns married: he had ſaid juſt before that Farel preached in the territories of Montbeliard. In montem Bellicardi vocatus eſt Pharellus ad prædicandum Evangelium hoc novum; cujus hic mirus eſt ſucceſſus. Jam multi repudiârunt Baptiſmum, & revocârunt Circumciſionem. Miſſam abominantur plurimi: Sunt qui publicè doceant, in Euchariſtia nihil eſſe niſi panem & vinum. Velum & cuculla deponitur paſſim. Nubunt & ducunt uxorem Monachæ & Monachi (32). i. e "Farel is called to Mont-"beliard to preach this new Goſpel there: It ſucceeds "wonderfully here: A great many perſons have al-"ready renounced their Baptiſm, and are returned to "their Circumciſion. A great number abhor the "Maſs. There are ſome who maintain that there is "nothing but bread and wine in the Lord's Supper. "The veil and Monk's hood are every where thrown "off. Monks and Nuns marry." Monſieur Maimbourg obſerves, that Farel's Sermon to the Nuns of Geneva abounded with exhortations to marry. The Nuns of St. Clara, who were the only Nuns at Geneva, were obliged to leave the city; however no violence was offered theſe holy Virgins. Only they made them the ſtrongeſt exhortatious they could, to perſuade them to quit the veil, and to accept the huſbands that were offered them. They were alſo obliged to liſten to a long and ridiculous Sermon, which the Miniſter Farel preached to them in their Convent, before the Syndics, from theſe words of the Goſpel, Exſurgens Maria abiit in Montana, "Ma-"ry aroſe .... and went into the hill-country;" to prove to them, that after the example of the Virgin, who went to ſee her couſin Elizabeth on the mountains of Judea, they ought not to be ſhut up, but were obliged to live in the world, and to marry like other women (33). I ſhall obſerve by the by, that they, who find that the Miniſters in thoſe days took too much care to extol the excellency of marriage, and to exclaim againſt the vows of continency, do not take notice of the circumſtances of that time. It muſt be obſerved, that the celibacy of the Clergy had been for ſome Centuries, an inexhauſtible ſpring of ſcandalous lewdneſs, which diſgraced the Chriſtian Church. The ax was therefore to be laid to the root of the tree. This ſpring was to be drained by aboliſhing the vows of continency. This pernicious doctrine was ſtrongly to be confuted, namely that a Clergyman who keeps a concubine ſins leſs, than one who marries. This doctrine is an unavoidable conſequence from the law of celibacy; for according to the principles of the Church of Rome, a Clergyman who marries after he has made his vow of continency, engages himſelf upon oath to tranſgreſs all his life-time an inviolable Law; he is therefore more guilty, than if he committed now and then the crime of fornication; this is only a tranſient fall; it does not prevent him from acknowledging his fault; he may repent it, and return to the obſervation of his vow; but if he marries he puts himſelf under a neceſſity of breaking it without remorſe and irretrievably. It was therefore neceſſary to preach with the utmoſt vigour upon the honeſty and dignity of matrimony, and againſt the audacious attempt of thoſe, who diſparaged it to ſuch a degree as to prefer fornication before it. It was beſides to be feared, leſt if the Prieſts and Monks, who renounced Popery, abſtained from marrying, the ſame lewdneſs would ſoon be obſerved in the Reformed Churches, which had rendered the Popiſh Clergy deſpicable and abominable to all honeſt men. To prevent therefore this great diſorder it was neceſſary to encourage theſe Gentlemen to marry, ſuppoſing they wanted encouragement; it was neceſſary that the greateſt man ſhould pave the way before them, and ſet them an example. We muſt however do juſtice to the great men of the primitive Church, who have ſo much recommended celibacy. They were induced to it by commendable motives: for nothing is more proper to make the Goſpel proſper, than the thought that they who preach it, have mortified the fleſh, and deprive themſelves of thoſe very pleaſures, which worldly perſons may lawfully enjoy. They had conſidered, that matrimony was attended with a thouſand worldly cares, and ſenſual occupations, which could not but interrupt the ſacerdotal functions. In a word, they ſuffered themſelves to be impoſed upon by the faireſt ſide of celibacy, and went ſo far as to convert it into a Law. But we may ſafely ſay that the promoters of it had not ſufficiently ſtudied human nature, had they been well acquainted with it, they would never have laid ſuch a heavy yoke on the ſhoulders of the Miniſters of the Altar. They ought to have ſaid to each other, we mind only the outward ſhew, the glory of this appearance deceives us,

Maxima pars vatum, pater & juvenes patre digni,
Decipimur ſpecie recti (34).

If they had foreſeen the conſequences of this Law, they would probably have taken all their fine notions for ſnares laid before them by the Devil.

Obſerve that Florimond de Remond aſſerts, that Farel had already had a wife, when he married in his old age. Farel having left him his place when he went to be a Miniſter at Neufchatel, where in a decrepit age, being threeſcore and ten years old, troubled with the ſtone and the gout, (the uſual attendants of old age) he married again with the daughter of his chamber-maid, being eager after the ſport as an old deer, vainly regretting the heat of his youth, and oftener lazy and uſeleſs in her arms, than amongſt his Books (35).

[K] He was not then ſo old as it is related.] Beza aſſerts that Farel went to Mets in the year 1565, notwithſtanding his great age, for he was then above fourſcore years old (36). He has ſet down Farel's age more accurately in another Book (37), where he makes him live but ſeventy ſix years. Monſieur Ancillon ought not to have tranſcribed that blunder of Beza, ſince he had put Farel's birth under the year 1489 (38). Thus Authors forget in one paſſage of the ſame Book what they have ſaid in another place. God, ſays he (39), made Farel, who was above fourſcore years old, take the reſolution to go again to Mets, ... where he arrived May the 12th 1565.

[L] Yet he ſet up for an Author.] He publiſhed in Latin an account of a controverſy in which he was engaged at Bern in the year 1528 (40). Monſieur Ancillon does not mention it. He ſpeaks only of the Sommaire & Declaration brieve néceſſaire à tous Chretiens. i. e. "A ſummary and ſhort declaration ne-"ceſſary for all Chriſtians," printed in the year 1552; and of his Book concerning the Lord's Supper and his Teſtament, printed in the year 1553 (41), and of another Book intitled Le Glaive de l'Eſprit (42), i. e. "The Sword of the Spirit," printed at Geneva in the year 1550, and deſigned to confute the Free-thinkers. Eraſmus mentions ſome anonymous writings of Farel; his words are as follow (43). Cum Phallico fuit mihi congreſſiuncula perbrevis. Ejus hiſtoriam ſcripſit cuidam Conſtantienſi, exemplum clam ad me perlatum eſt. Nihil vidi vanius, nihil glorioſius, nihil virulentius. Sunt ibi interdum decem verſus in quibus ne ſyllaba quidem vera eſt. Idem edidit libellum de Pariſienſibus & Pontifice. Quantum illic inficetiarum, quantum ineptæ virulentiæ, quam multi nominatim traducti? & tamen ipſe ſolus non apponit nomen ſuum. Idem ut audio auxit ſtolidum Alberi judicium, quod nondum videre licuit; viſi ſunt Conſtantiæ & alii duo libelli, quos in me ſcripſit. Et profitetur novum dogma, ſic traducendos, qui obſiſtunt Evangelio, inter quos me numerat, & Balaam paſſim appellat. i. e. "I have had a ſhort controverſy "with Farel, of which he wrote an account to ſome "body at Conſtance, a copy of which has been ſe-"cretly

(31) See the Article of BUCER, Remark [E].

(32) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 19. lib. 30. pag. 1907. It is dated from Baſil Feb. 10, 1515; but it ſhould be 1525.

(33) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, liv. 1. pag. m. 48.

WHY the Miniſters, in the beginning of the Reformation inſiſted ſo much upon the neceſſity of marriage.

(34) Horatius, de Arte Poetica, ver. 24.

(55) Flor. de Remond Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 7. chap. 18. pag. m. 929.

(36) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. liv. 16. pag. 456.

(37) Beza, in Iconibus.

(38) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 1.

(39) Ibid. pag. 263.

(40) Melch. Adam, Vit. Theolog. Exter. pag. 16.

(41) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 44.

(42) Ibid. pag. 212.

(43) Eraſmus, Ep. 133. lib. 19. pag. 951. it is dated Sep. 6, 1524.

(cc) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. liv. 5. pag. 891. See the laſt Remark.

the Church of Grenoble in a journey which he made to Gap (cc). We ſhall throw Moreri's blunders and the errors of ſome other Writers into the ſame remark [M]. Obſerve

" cretly conveyed to me. I never ſaw any thing " more idle, more vain, more violent. There are " ſometimes ten lines etogether, in which there is " not one ſyllable tru . He alſo wrote a ſmall " Book concerning the Pariſians, and concern- " ing the Pope. How much low wit is there in " that Book, how many ſilly invectives, how many " perſons traduced by name! And yet he alone does " not put his name to it. He has alſo, as I hear, " made additions to Alberus's judgment, which I have " not yet been able to ſee. There have been ſeen at " Conſtance two other pamphlets alſo, which he " wrote againſt me. He maintains a new doctrine, " namely, that they ought to be thus ſlandered, who " oppoſe the Goſpel, amongſt whom he reckons me, " and he calls me in ſeveral places Balaam."

[M] We ſhall throw Moreri's blunders, and the errors of ſome other Writers into the ſame remark.] I. Moreri ſays, that by Farel's means Hereſy made the moſt conſiderable progreſs in Dauphiné. He is miſtaken: for all the ſhare Farel had in the converſion of that province is contained in the following words of Beza (44). In the mean while it happened that William Farel going from his Church of Neufchatel in Switzerland to Gap his native place, and paſſing through Grenoble, made there a ſtrong and lively exhortation; he being a man full of a godly zeal, as much as any perſon of this age; and having diſpoſed thoſe of Grenoble to their duty he left them Aynard Pichon for their Miniſter, to encourage them. II. I own that Farel was Miniſter at Neufchatel after he left Geneva, but before he was a Miniſter at Geneva, he had already performed the ſame functions at Neufchatel; ſo that Moreri has not followed a chronological method. III. He commits a blunder of the ſame nature, when he ſays that this Miniſter having been a little ill uſed at Geneva, taught his doctrine afterwards at Mets, at Montbeliard, at Lauſanne, and in other places. After his baniſhment from Geneva he taught it only at Neufchatel and at Mets. His firſt exploit, if I may ſay ſo, was the Reformation of Montbeliard: what he did at Lauſanne happened before he was a Miniſter at Geneva. IV. Moreri ought not to have quoted Sleidan's Annals, it is not ſo that this Author's Hiſtory is called. V. According to Moreri Farel is charged with renewing the Hereſy of Paul of Samoſata, and that of the Elceſaites, as appears from a letter which he wrote to Calvin, and which begins thus, Litteras tuas quæque eſt &c. (45), and which is the 78th among Calvin's Epiſtles, I have not yet been able to trace out the origin of all this; I have only found (46) that one Peter Caroli, formerly a Doctor of the Sorbonne, retired to Geneva about the year 1535. He was obſerved to be a Trimmer, and a man who loved women and his belly; it was not therefore an eaſy matter for him to find a good preferment. He deſired to be Miniſter of Neufchatel, but could not obtain it, and Farel was no doubt the cauſe of it. Calvin and Viret were alſo againſt him, and this was probably the true reaſon which induced Caroli to accuſe them ſometimes of Arianiſm, and ſometimes of Sabellianiſm. A Synod was aſſembled at Lauſanne, before which Caroli produced all the proofs he could gather to ſupport his charge. But the accuſed defended themſelves ſo well that all thoſe proofs were pronounced void and null: they obtained a ſentence by which they were declared orthodox, and as for Caroli he was judged unworthy of the Holy Miniſtry (47). Caroli was not diſcouraged for all this: he appeared again with new papers and proofs before a Synod held at Bern, and endeavoured to obtain a ſentence, by which it was declared that the accuſed had at leaſt given room for ſuſpicions. But they refuted him fully even in this reſpect, and were abſolved of the ſuſpicions as well as of the Hereſies. (48) Ubi à nobis excuſſa omnia fuerunt quibus ſuſpicionem aliquam de tempore præterito injicere conabatur .... atque hac de ratione, cui non ſatisfaceret, nemo præter ipſum repertus eſt. Fratres ut dignum erat fidis Chriſti Miniſtris nos iniquiſſime in ſuſpicionem aliquam (49) adductos ſibi videri pronuntiarunt. It appears from Calvin's letter, out of which I tranſcribed thoſe words, that the Extracts which this man had ſpread every where, had given ſome perſons a bad opinion of the accuſed Miniſters. So true it is, that man is capable to be impoſed upon by the boldneſs of an impudent ſlanderer! Caroli did not yield to the authority of the Synod; he continued alone to maintain that he had juſtly accuſed them (50). Such is the character of thoſe intermedling, proud and revengeful men; they will never own that they had raſhly defamed their brethren. Dum hæc geruntur, afferuntur à Myconio literæ publice ad conventum ſcriptæ. Aliæ rurſum à Capitone ad Farellum generatim miſſæ, quibus utriſque intellectum eſt, horrendum longe lateque rumorem de noſtra controverſia pervagatum eſſe. Denique ad excitandam erga nos gentium omnium invidiam malicioſe à certis hominibus fabrefactum. Quod autem homo nihili futiliſſima ſua vanitate tantum proficere potuerit, ut tot Eccleſiis ſiniſtram de nobis opinionem injiceret: id vero eſt, quod nos vehementer perturbavit. Calvin obſerves that Caroli was condemned to be baniſhed (51). Take notice that by the account I have juſt now given it does not appear that Farel was accuſed of Samoſatenianiſm. I know that Lindanus obſerves, that this Miniſter taught that the Holy Ghoſt was nothing elſe but the motion, which God impreſſes on the creatures (52). I know alſo that Lindanus quotes for his voucher a letter of Caroli to the Cardinal de Lorraine (53), but I am certain that there is a great deal of unfair dealing in all this. He commits a blunder, which I muſt not paſs over. Thoſe of Baſil, ſays he (54), dreaded Farel's ſeditious ſpirit ſo much, that knowing he fled twice from Montbeliard, they baniſhed him. He quotes Eraſm. epiſt. ad Prin. Infer. Germ. It is an eaſy matter to convince him, that he did not well examine the Authors he quoted. Eraſmus's letter is not directed ad Principes, to the Princes, but ad fratres inferioris Germaniæ to the brethren in Lower Germany. Eraſmus does not ſay, with thoſe of Baſil, that Farel fled twice from Montbeliard; he knew very well, that Farel did not go to Montbeliard but after he had been baniſhed from Baſil. Prateolus (55) admits all Lindanus's blunders, and tranſcribes his very phraſes: they both mention to us a pretended Sect of Farreliſts, which never exiſted but in the fancy of thoſe impertinent compilers of the Catalogues of Heretics. The Jeſuit Gaultier mentions the ſame Sect, and quotes Prateolus. He tells us (56) that Farel revived the whole hereſy of Paul of Samoſata, and the doctrine of the Elceſaïtes. He pretends to prove it by a Letter in which he ſuppoſes that this Miniſter does not condemn to eternal damnation thoſe that diſſemble their faith when they are in danger, provided they do not openly profeſs idolatry. Dicens nolle ſe eos damnare qui periculorum formidine adducti fidem diſſimulant, modo idololatriam exterius non profiteantur (57). He quotes, Farell. ep. ad Calv. cujus initium, Literas tuas, quæque eſt 78 inter Epiſtolas Calvini (58). i. e. " Farel in his Letter to " Calvin, which begins thus, Your Letter, and which " is the ſeventy eighth amongſt Calvin's Epiſtles." We have ſeen above, that Moreri grounds his aſſertion upon the ſame Letter. I have Calvin's Letters printed at Hanaw, in the year 1597. The LXXVIIIth is from Bucer to Calvin; none of our Farel's Letters begin with Literas tuas, nor favour the Syſtem of the Nicodemites; and I find in his Life written by Monſieur Ancillon (59), that it is to the Letter, which he wrote to Calvin November the 2d 1544, that we are indebted for Calvin's excellent work againſt the Nicodemites, which we have in page 789 of his Opuſcula to page 803. Here follows a manifeſt lye of Father Gaultier. He ſuppoſes that Calvin drove Farel from Geneva, qui tamen eam (Genevam) illi poſtea eripuit, adeo ut deinde Neocomenſis Miniſter creatus ſit (60). i. e. " Who " yet deprived him afterwards of that Church (of Ge- " neva) ſo that he was made a miniſter of Neufchatel." And yet it is unqueſtionable that theſe two Miniſters were driven from Geneva at the ſame time, and for the ſame reaſon; and that when he was called back, they would call Farel back alſo, who notwithſtanding Calvin's preſſing entreaties (61), obſtinately refuſed to comply with the deſire of thoſe of Geneva.

This falſity of Father Gaultier is more tolerable, than what we read in Prateolus in the paſſage where he aſſerts, that the officers ſurprized Farel at Baſil in a bawdy-houſe on an Holy Friday (62).

(44) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. liv. 5. pag. 890, 891.

(45) See below quotation (58) from Father Gaultier. You will ſee there, that the words quæque eſt, are no part of the letter.

(46) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. 16. pag. 435.

(47) Nos Synodi ſententia fuimus abſoluti, ille indignus judicatus qui Miniſterio fungeretur. Calvinus, Epiſtolâ ad Grynæum. It is the 5th in the edition of Hanaw 1597.

(48) Idem, ibid.

(49) Sycophanta ille Senatus Conſulto in exilium actus eſt, nos plane abſoluti non à crimine modo, ſed ab omni quoque ſuſpicione. Idem, ibid.

(50) See the Quotation (47).

(51) See the Quotation (49).

(52) Hic præter Sacramentariſmum etiam Samoſateni renovavit hæreſim Spiritum Sanctum affirmans motum in rebus creatum. Lindanus. in Dubitantio, Dial. 2. pag. m. 147.

(53) Ita in Summa Gallicana Scripturæ, teſte Petro Carolo Epiſt. ad Card Lotharingum. Idem, ibid.

(54) Hunc adeo ſeditioſum metuebant Baſilienſes, ut cum bis Monte Pellicardo profugiſſet eum in exilium abire juſſerint. Idem, ibid. pag. 146.

(55) Prateol. in Elencho Hæreſ. pag. m. 180. See alſo pag. 290.

(56) Pauli Samoſateni hæreſim in integrum reſtituit docens Spiritum Sanctum eſſe quendam motum creatum. Jacobus Gaultierus, in Tabula Chronograph. pag. m. 757.

(57) Idem, ibid.

(58) See above, quotation (45).

(59) Ancillon, Vie de Farel, pag. 212.

(60) Gault. Tab. Chronogr. pag. 757.

(61) See Calvin's 111th Letter.

(62) Prateolus, in Elencho Hæreſ. pag. 290.

ſerve, that Farel was thought to be the Author of ſome Libels which were poſted up in ſeveral ſtreets of Paris, and even on the very gates of the Louvre in the year 1534 (dd), which proved very prejudicial to the whole Proteſtant Party in the Kingdom.

(dd) Florimond de Remond, Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie, liv. 7. chap. 5. pag. m. 859.

FARNABY (THOMAS), in Latin Farnabius, was one of the learned Humaniſts of the ſeventeenth Century. His notes upon moſt of the ancient Latin Poets have been of very great uſe to young beginners; they are ſhort, learned, and deſigned chiefly to clear up the text. He lived at London (a), and applied himſelf to the education of Noblemen and Gentlemen's children, which procured him a handſome livelihood for his family (b). I think that his Dedications brought him alſo ſome profit, though he obſerves, ſomewhere, that the time was paſt when they were profitable [A]. He dedicated his Horace, and afterwards his Juvenal and Perſius, to Prince Henry, James the Firſt's eldeſt ſon, and was very kindly received by that young Prince (c), when he had the honour to preſent his Juvenal and Perſius to him, the Prince did even in ſome manner command him to write ſuch Commentaries on all the Latin Poets; but he was ſo vexed at the cenſures of ſome Critics, that out of ſpite, and againſt his own inclination, he reſolved to diſcontinue that kind of labour. Yet they made him afterwards alter his reſolution (d). He had a country-houſe twenty miles diſtant from London, whither he retired in the year 1636 (e). Charles I ordered him to write a Latin Grammar for the uſe of all the ſchools, when that which had been eſtabliſhed by Law, and againſt which a great many complaints had been made, was to be reformed (f). He died in the year 1647 (g). A French Dominican Friar has commended the works of this Author [B]. See alſo what the Jeſuit Vavaſſeur § (α) ſays of Farnaby's Notes on Martial in his Work intitled, De Epigrammate (h).

(a) Barlæus, Epiſt. 119. pag. 292.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) See the Dedication of his Lucian.

(d) Taken from the ſame Dedication.

(e) Farnab. Epiſt. ad Voſſium, pag. 303. Epiſtolarum ad Voſſium ſcriptarum.

(f) Idem, ibid. pag. 302.

(g) Witte, in Diar. Biograph.

(h) Pag. 270, &c.

[A] He obſerves ſomewhere, that the time is paſt, when Dedications were profitable.] He quotes on this occaſion a fact which Valerius Maximus relates, which is, that though men did no longer conſult the flight of birds, when they married, as they uſed to do antiently, yet they ſtill invited to their wedding the perſons appointed to make that conſultation. They ſtill kept up, at leaſt by name, ſome footſteps of the antient ceremony. Quod antiquis, apud quos nihil niſi auſpicio prius ſumpto gerebatur factitatum, ut ex more, nuptiis auſpices interpoſiti, quamvis auſpicia deſiiſſent (Val. Max. lib. 2. cap. 1.) ipſo tamen nomine veteris conſuetudinis veſtigia uſurparent: hoc pleriſque noſtrum quos vexat inſanabile hoc ſcribendi cacoëthes, uſu venit ut quamvis patronorum exoleverit cum auctoritas tum benignitas, non citra ambitionem tamen ſummis & gravibus viris perituræ chartæ tutelam obtrudamus (1). i. e. "As it happened to the antients, who uſed to under-"take nothing without conſulting the flight of "birds, that though this cuſtom came to be out of "uſe at weddings, yet as Valerius Maximus ſays, "B. 2. c. 1. they invited the Auſpices to their wed-"dings, thus keeping up, at leaſt by name, ſome re-"mains of the antient cuſtom; ſo it is with us, who "labour under this incurable itch of writing; though "the authority and generoſity of Patrons be out of date, "yet we are ſo ambitious as to put our works, which "will ſoon periſh, under the patronage of ſome grave "and noble perſon." His meaning is that all the reality of dedications is periſhed, and yet they are ſtill in uſe.

(1) Thomas Farnabius, Epiſt. dedicatoria Tragœdiar. Senecæ.

[B] A French Dominican Fryar has commended the works of this Author.] It is in the paſſage in which he undertakes to prove that the Jeſuits are much below a great many other Writers, who have illuſtrated the Belles Lettres (α). Doleo, continues he (2), meo tempore, cùm literis humanioribus ſtuderem, defuiſſe nobis illud ſubſidium ad rem litterariam maximum, quod ſuppeditarunt à paucis annis Farnabius & alii; Poëtis omnibus commentariis marginalibus ita clarè explicatis, ut mediocris Grammaticus poſſit etiam difficillimos inoffenſo pede locos decurrere. Hæc non poſſunt expectari aut parari adjumenta, ad Auctorum peritiam, ab iis, qui per tres aut quatuor annos literas humaniores docent, & ad Theologiæ conſcendunt vel Philoſophiæ cathedram, ſed ab his, qui conſeneſcunt & immoriuntur Grammaticæ, aut Rhetoricæ ſcholis; quales non dubito fuiſſe illos, qui adeò utilem & neceſſariam opem contulerunt bonarum litterarum ſtudioſis, Commentatores marginales. i. e. "I am "ſorry, that in my time, when I ſtudied polite Lite-"rature, we wanted this great aſſiſtance to improve "our ſelves in it, which ſince a few years Farnaby "and others have afforded: for they have explained "all the Poets in ſo clear a manner by their marginal "notes, that a man but indifferently ſkilled in the "Grammar, can go eaſily through the moſt difficult "paſſages. Theſe helps towards underſtanding the "ancient Authors cannot be expected from nor pro-"cured by them that teach polite Literature only for "three or four years, and then are promoted to a "Profeſſorſhip of Divinity or Philoſophy, but only "by thoſe who ſpend all their life-time, and even die "in a Grammar ſchool; ſuch were, I am ſure, thoſe "who by their marginal commentaries have afforded "ſuch an uſeful and neceſſary aſſiſtance for the ſtudy "of polite Literature.

(2) Vincent. Baronius, Apologet. lib. 5. Sect. 1. pag. 316.

§ (α) The Author of this obſervation is, I think, Cæſar Cremonin, in his Oration delivered in the year 1591 in behalf of the Univerſity of Padua againſt the Jeſuits. Monſieur Anthony Arnaud quotes the paſſage in page 6 and 7, of his Franc & véritable Diſcours, &c. That is, "Candid and true Diſcourſe." In the edition of the year 1662. And the Oration itſelf is printed in page 451 of the Mercure Jéſuite in the edition of the year 1626. CRIT. REM.

☞FARNABIE, or FARNABY (THOMAS). We ſhall endeavour to ſupply the defects of Mr. Bayle in this Article. He was ſon of Thomas Farnabie of London Carpenter, and grandſon of Mr. Farnabie, ſometime Mayor of Truro in Cornwall [A]. He was born in London about the year 1575, and became Servitor to Mr. Thomas French Fellow of Merton College in Oxford in the beginning of 1590; but being a youth of unſettled diſpoſition, though pregnant parts, he continued there but a ſhort time, and being enticed

[A] Grandſon of Mr. Farnabie, ſometime Mayor of Truro in Cornwall.] This we are informed of by Mr. Wood (1), who likewiſe tells us (2), that he was aſſured by Mr. Francis Farnabie, ſon of him, of whom we treat in this article, that "the great grandfather "of his father, viz. the father of him, who was "Mayor of Truro, was an Italian Muſician." Father Niceron (3) has miſtaken the ſenſe of this paſſage of Mr. Wood, and aſſerts, that Mr. Farnabie the Critic's grandfather "was an Italian by birth, and a Mu-"ſician by Profeſſion, and having ſettled in England, "was ſometime Mayor of Truro in Cornwall." From which words it is evident, that he has applied to Mr. Farnabie's grandfather what relates to his great grandfather.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 104. 2d edit. London 1721.
(2) Col. 105.
(3) Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire de Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 16. pag. 268. edit. Paris 1731.

enticed to abandon his Religion and country went to Spain, and was for ſome time educated there in a certain College belonging to the Jeſuits. At length being weary of their ſevere diſcipline, he found a way to leave them, and went with Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins in their laſt voyage in 1595, being in ſome eſteem with the former. He afterwards ſerved as a ſoldier in the Low-Countries; but being reduced to great neceſſity he landed in the weſtern part of England [B], where wandering about for ſome time under the name of Thomas Bainrafe, the anagram of his ſurname, he ſettled at Martock in Somerſetſhire, and taught a Grammar-ſchool there with good ſucceſs [C]. He afterwards removed to London, and opened a ſchool in Goldſmiths-Rents behind Red-Croſs Street near Cripplegate, where were large gardens and handſome houſes, and great accommodations for the young Noblemen and other youths [D], the number of whom at one time amounted to above 300. While he taught this ſchool, he was made Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Cambridge (a), and April 24, 1616 (b) was incorporated in that of Oxford. At length, upon occaſion of ſome underhand dealing of his landlords [E], and frequent ſickneſſes in the City he removed about 1636 to Sevenock in Kent, (in the neighbourhood of which place, at Otford, he had purchaſed an eſtate,) and taught there the ſons of ſeveral Noblemen and Gentlemen, who boarded with him, with great ſucceſs, and grew rich, purchaſing an eſtate there, and another near Horſham in Suſſex. His works gained him a great reputation [F]. Upon the breaking out of the commotions in 1641, he was eſteemed ill affected to the cauſe of the Parliament, becauſe when the proteſtation was (a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 104. 2d edit.

(b) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 202.

[B] Landed in the weſtern part of England.] It was in Cornwall; at which time his diſtreſſes, ſays Mr. Wood (4), made him ſtoop ſo low, as to be an Abcdarian, and ſeveral were taught their Hornbooks by him.

(4) Ubi ſupra.

[C] Taught a Grammar-School there with good ſucceſs.] In 1646, when Mr. Charles Darby was called to teach that School, he found in that town and in the neighbourhood many who had been Mr. Farnabie's Scholars, ingenious men, and good Grammarians, even in their grey hairs (5).

(5) Idem, ibid.

[D] Great accommodations for the young Noblemen and other youths.] The School-Houſe was a large brick-building divided into ſeveral partitions and apartments, according to the diſtinctions of the forms and claſſes, under the care and inſpection of the reſpective Uſhers allotted to attend them (6).

(6) Idem, ibid.

[E] Upon occaſion of ſome underhand dealing of his landlords.] Theſe are the very expreſſions of Mr. Wood (7); which are extremely miſtaken by Father Niceron (8), who tells us, that our Author left his School in London on account of ſome uneaſineſſes, which he ſuffered from the Maſters, who taught in conjunction with him, &c. Il s' acquitta tranquillement de ſon emploi juſqu'à l'an 1636, que quelques chagrins que lui ſuſciterent les Maîtres qui enſeignoient avec lui, & ſes frequentes infirmitez l'obligerent à le quitter.

(7) Ibid.

(8) Ubi ſupra, pag. 270.

[F] His works gained him a great reputation.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them. I. Notæ ad Juvenalis & Perſii Satyras. London 1612 in 8vo. The third Edition was printed at London 1620 under the following title: Junii Juvenalis & Auli Perſii Flacci Satyræ: cum Annotationibus ad marginem, quæ obſcuriſſima quæque dilucidare poſſint. Tertia Editio prioribus multo emendatior & auctior. It is dedicated to Henry Prince of Wales. Ben. Johnſon wrote the following Epigram upon his notes on Juvenal:

Temporibus lux magna fuit Juvenalis avitis,
Moribus, ingeniis, divitiis, vitiis.
Tu lux es luci, Farnabi; operiſque fugâſti
Temporis & tenebras ingenii radiis.
Lux tua parva quidem mole eſt, ſed magna vigore,
Senſibus & docti pondere judicii.
Macte, tuo ſcriptores, lectoreſque labore
Per te alii vigeant, per te alii videant.

The ſame Poet wrote likewiſe another Epigram upon the Notes on Perſius, which is as follows:

Cum Juvenale tuo, Farnabi, Perſius exit,
Atq; affectatis eruitur tenebris:
Quem legat, & quondam neglectum intelligat ille
Qui Stridone ſatus, nomine ſanctus erat.

II. Notæ ad Senecæ Tragœdias. London 1613 in 8vo. The third Edition was printed at London in 1634 under the following title; L. & M. Annæi Senecæ Tragœdiæ. Poſt omnes omnium editiones recenſioneſque Editio tertia auctior & emendatior, operâ & ſtudio Thomæ Farnabii. To this Edition is prefixed a privilege granted him from the King, dated October 1634 for the ſole printing of that and ſeveral other of his works for one and twenty years; and commendatory verſes by Daniel Heinſius, Richard Andrews M. D. Hugh Holland, Laurence Whitaker, and Na. Tomkins. III. Notæ ad Martialis Epigrammata. London 1615 in 8vo. 1633, &c. in 12mo. Dedicated to Sir Robert Killegrew. IV. Lucani Pharſalia ſive de Bello Civili Cæſaris & Pompei Libri X. Adjectis ad marginem Notis T. Farnabii, quæ loca obſcuriora illuſtrent, London 1618 in 8vo. Dedicated to Sir Francis Stuart. To this Edition are prefixed commendatory verſes in Latin by R. A. M. D. and Mr. John Selden; the latter of whom, among others, has the following lines upon our Author:

Haut eſt ingenio repertus alter,
Farnabi, potior, ſcientiorve,
Aut priſcæ hiſtoriæ Poeticeſve,
Cui mandetur honos vices gerendi,
Tutorum, & tenebris faces parandi
Quam tu, cui veteres reconditique
Ritus ex adytis patent; & omnes
Theſauro Sophiæ nimis reducti.

V. Index Rhetoricus Scholis & Inſtitutioni tenerioris ætatis accommodatus. London 1625 in 8vo. To an Edition printed at London 1646 in 8vo were added Formulæ Oratoriæ & Index Poeticus. The fifth Edition was printed at London 1654 under the following title: Index Rhetoricus & Oratorius, Scholis & inſtitutioni tenerioris ætatis accommodatus. Cui adjiciuntur Formulæ Oratoriæ & Index Poeticus. Operâ & Studio Thomæ Farnabii. Editio quinta, prioribus emendatior. This Book is dedicated to Dominico Molino, Senator of Venice. The Index Poeticus ſubjoined to this Edition was printed at London 1634. In the Preface to the Index Rhetoricus he informs us, that he had publiſhed about twenty years before his Scheme of Tropes in verſe without his name; which meeting with ſucceſs, was claimed by a certain plagiary; upon which our Author compoſed his Index Rhetoricus. Monſr. Gibert (9) ſpeaks of this Book with commendation, and obſerves, that Monſr. Baillet has paſſed a favourable judgment upon it; and that Father Vavaſſeur, tho' he affirms, that Mr. Farnabie's Latin is ſometimes exceptionable, yet allows him to be a diligent and learned Writer. VI. Florilegium Epigrammatum Græcorum, eorumque Latino Verſu a variis redditorum. London 1629 in 8vo, &c. VII. Notæ ad Virgilium. London 1634 in 8vo. VIII. Syſtema Grammaticum. London 1641 in 8vo. IX. Notæ in Ovidii Metamorphoſes. Paris 1637 in fol. (10); and London in 12mo 1677 &c (11). X. Phraſiologia Anglo-Latina. London in 8vo. XI. Tabulæ Græcæ Linguæ. London in 4to. XII. Syntaxis. London in 8vo. XIII. Notæ in Terentium. Our Author had finiſhed his Notes upon Terence as far as the fourth Comedy, in which he was engaged, when he was cut off by death. But Dr. Meric Caſaubon compleated the two laſt Comedies, and publiſhed the whole at London 1651 in 12mo.

(9) Jugemens des Savans ſur les Auteurs, qui ont traité de la Rhetorique, ſubjoined to Monſieur Baillet's Jugemens des Savans, tom. 8. pag. 247, 248. edit. Amſterdam 1725, in 4to.

(10) See Niceron, ubi ſupra, pag. 273.

(11) Wood, col. 105.

was urged that year, he ſaid, It was better to have one King than five hundred. Afterwards being ſuſpected to have favoured the riſing of the country for the King about Tunbridge in 1643, he was impriſoned in Newgate, and thence carried on ſhipboard. It was likewiſe debated in the Houſe of Commons whether he ſhould be ſent to America; but this motion being rejected, he was removed to Ely-Houſe in Holbourn, where he remained for about a year before his death. He died June the 12th 1647, aged ſeventy two, and was interred in the Chancel of the Church at Sevenock, and over his grave an epitaph was inſcribed [G]. He was twice married, and left iſſue by both his wives [H]. He is celebrated by ſeveral Authors, and particularly by John Dunbar (d) a Scot, who ſtiles himſelf Megalo-Britannus, and Richard Bruch (e).

(c) Idem, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 104, 105.

(d) In Epigram. Cent. VI. edit. London 1616, in 8vo, in Centur. ſext. num. 74.

(e) Epigrammatum Hecatontides duæ. London 1627, in Hecatontas altera, num. 17.

[G] Over his grave an Epitaph was inſcribed.] It was as follows: P. M. Viri ornatiſſimi Thomæ Farnabii Armigeri, Cauſæ olim Regiæ Reiq; publicæ ſed litterariæ Vindicis acerrimi. Obiit 12 Junii 1647.

Vatibus hic ſacris qui lux, Farnabius, olim,
Vate carens, ſaxo nunc ſine luce jacet.

[H] He was twice married, and left iſſue by both his wives.] His firſt wife was Suſanna, daughter of John Pierce of Launcells in Cornwall, Gent. By her he had a ſon named John, who was a Captain in King Charles I's army, and inherited his father's eſtate in Suſſex, where he lived in good eſteem, and died about the beginning of 1673. Our Author by his ſecond wife, Anne, the daughter of Dr. John Howſon, Biſhop of Durham, had ſeveral children, one of whom named Francis, inherited his father's eſtate at Kippington in the pariſh of Sevenock; and from him Mr. Wood received an account of ſeveral paſſages of his father's life (12). T.

(12) Wood, col. 105.

☞FASTOLF (JOHN) Knight Banneret, Companion of the moſt Noble Order of the Garter, and Baron of Cilliguillim, a victorious Commander and Governor in France for many years, and an eminent Miniſter of State under three Kings of England, was deſcended of an antient, numerous and honourable family in Norfolk; particularly that branch which was ſeated at Caſtre in Fleg, near Great Yarmouth in this county (a), the patrimony of his anceſtors; whereof himſelf was ſeized as the chief heir-male, till he conveyed it into other hands; having ſplendidly adorned it with magnificent buildings; and where it is ſuppoſed that he was born, in or near the year 1380: However ſome, who betray great ignorance in their accounts of him, have placed his birth at Potten in Bedfordſhire. To paſs over many conſiderable perſons of his name and lineage, who are upon record; as that Faſtolf who was Mint-Maſter under King Edgar (b): Sir Nicholas Faſtolf chief Juſtice of Ireland, and a Juſtice Itinerant in Nottingham, in the reign of King Edward III (c); and others diſtinguiſhed, not only with the degree of Knighthood, but various poſts of honour, it will be more neceſſary, here to obſerve, that John Faſtolf Eſq; who was founder of a Religious Houſe at or near the ſeat beforementioned (d), is generally taken to be the father of our Worthy, and might not improbably be that John, (ſon of Nicholas) who in 1393 appointed himſelf to be buried in the Church of the Holy Trinity, in which place was alſo a free chapel dedicated to St. John the Baptiſt, to which, as ſeveral preſentations had been made, by many others of the family, ſo alſo by our religious Knight himſelf (e). There is no doubt but a maſter of thoſe accompliſhments which made him ſo uſeful in adminiſtrations of the greateſt conſequence, and a man who was ſuch a patron and promoter of Learning as he will particularly appear to have been, was a man of Education. Whether he received any part thereof in the family of Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk (f), particularly in the quality of his Page, though a courſe of education not uncuſtomary in thoſe days, for the ſons even of Noblemen, is yet an aſſertion to be received but doubtfully, conſidering our authority for it is only that of a Poet (g), under whoſe hands the character of this renowned Knight has very wrongfully ſuffered, it being perverted with a licence moſt unaccountable, as will before we have done be more amply manifeſted. This we may depend on, ſince we have it from one of his own ſervants, that the merits of our Worthy were ſuch, before he received the Honour of Knighthood as recommended him in marriage with a wealthy Perſon of Quality named Milicent Lady Caſtlecomb daughter of Robert Lord Tibetot and Relict of Sir Stephen Scrope, ſon of the Lord Scrope. This marriage was ſolemnized on the feaſt of St. Hillary in Ireland about the twenty eighth year of his age, or the tenth of Henry IV. He obliged himſelf in the ſum of a thouſand pound to pay her an hundred pounds a year, in the nature of pin-money, during her life; and ſhe received the ſame to the 24th year of that King's reign (h). The lands in Wiltſhire and Yorkſhire which came to him by his marriage with this Lady deſcended to Stephen Le Scrope Eſq; her ſon and heir. We may preſume he had a command in France before the death of King Henry IV. Becauſe in the very firſt year of his heroick ſucceſſor Henry V we find Faſtolf had the caſtle and dominion of Veires in Gaſcoigne granted him (i); whence it may be probable, that he then reſided in that Dutchy which belonged to the Crown of England. In the third year following, that is 1415 when Harfleur was taken, Faſtolf was conſtituted Lieutenant thereof by the Earl of Dorſet (k); in which year being as yet but an Eſq; he was retained by (l) indenture on the 18th of June, with ten Men of Arms and thirty Archers, to ſerve the King in his intended voyage into France; and having received the Honour of Knighthood before the 29th of January following had the Mannor and Demeſnes of Fritenſe near Harfleur then granted to him during life, for his good ſervices (m). The ſame year

(a) Camden. Britan. de Icenis.

(b) Sir Andrew Fountain's Saxon Coyns, Tab. 5. n. 10.

(c) Clauſ. 1. Edw. 3. p. 2. M. 20. and Dugdale in Chron. Series.

(d) Speed's Chron. in Tab. of Relig. Houſ. and Weever's Fun. Monum. fol. 363.

(e) Regiſt. of Norwich.

(f) He died at Venice about the 2d year of his baniſhment by K. Ric. II. Ann. 1. Hen. IV.

(g) Shakeſpeare's 2d Part of K. Hen. IV. Act. 3. Scene 2.

(h) Itinerar. Will. Worceſter, Miſcell. M. 221. in Bibl. C. C. C. and Dr. Thoroton's Antiq. of Nottinghamſh. fo. 104.

(i) Rymer. Fœd. ad fin. Vol. 17.

(k) MS. Petri Baſſet, in Officio Heralderum.

(l) Rymer, vol. 9. fol. 270.

(m) Ibid. fol. 329.

year towards the latter end of October he was in the midlde of the famous battle of Agincourt, where, among others, he ſignalized himſelf moſt gallantly, by taking the Duke of Alençon priſoner (n). In 1418 he was appointed to ſeize the caſtle and dominion of Bec Creſpin (o), and other Mannors; and had that caſtle and other lands, to the yearly value of two thouſand Scutes (p) granted him in ſpecial tail. In 1420 he was at the ſiege of Monſterau, and in the following year at that of Meaulx-en-brie. In January 1422 which was the firſt year of Henry VI. the town of Mulent being ſurprized, John Duke of Bedford Regent of France with Sir John Faſtolf, then Grand Maſter of his Houſhold and Seneſchal of Normandy, laid ſiege to that place and retook it. In 1423 after the relief of the caſtle of Cravent, Sir John was advanced to be Lieutenant for the King, and Regent in Normandy, in the diſtricts of Roan, Eureux, Alençon and the countries beyond the river Seine: Alſo Governor of the counties of Anjou and Maine; and before the battle of Vernoyle was created a Banneret. About three months after, as a French Hiſtorian obſerves, Sir John then Captain of Alençon and Governor of the Marches thereof laid ſiege to the caſtle of Tennuye in Maine (q), which was ſurrendred to him. In 1424 he was diſpatched to prevent the delivery of Alençon to the French (r) upon a diſcovery made that a Gaſcoigner had ſecretly contracted to betray it. In September 1425 he beſieged Beaumont le Vicomte which ſurrendred (s), and then likewiſe took the caſtle of Sillie-le-Guillem whence he was honoured with the title of Baron. The ſame year he took St. Ouen d'Eſtrais near Laval, alſo the caſtle of Gravelle, and was about the ſame time elected in England, with extraordinary diſtinction of his deſerts, Knight of the Garter [A]. In 1426 John Lord Talbot was conſtituted Governor of Anjou and Maine (t); for which end Sir John Faſtolf was removed to another Government (u), which might poſſibly be the ſource of thoſe jealouſies and competitions between them which were never reconciled. In October 1428 he had a protection (w), being then going into France, and there he performed an action of that bravery and conduct as can ſcarcely be parallelled in antient or modern Hiſtory. It was at the battle of Herrings as the French have called it, becauſe being in Lent, a great quantity of that fiſh was then carried by him from Paris among other proviſions to relieve the Beſiegers of Orleans; and he made uſe of the carriages in which they were conveyed, to obſtruct the French army, who endeavoured to intercept him, till his forces defeated and routed them. It is related at large by an Engliſhman before cited, who appears to have been in the French wars under him, though his narrative is written in French [B] with a Latin title; and more curſorily by ſeveral of the French Hiſtorians; who agree with him that the Engliſh had a great diſadvantage in number, but not in the number of French who were ſlain by them. Soon after the Engliſh were driven to raiſe the ſiege of Orleance, followed the battle of Pataye; where the French made ſuch a ſudden onſet, that many of moſt approved and undoubted courage, among the Engliſh, ſaw no chance for life but

(n) MS. int. Collect. J. Anſtis Arm.

(o) Rot. Norman. 6 Hen. 5. M. 40.

(p) A French Gold Coin called by them Eſcue d'Or, from Scutum a Shield, in value 3 s. 4 d. See Forteſcue, de Laud. Legum Angliæ, pag. 118. alſo his Difference between an abſolute and limited Monarchy, pag. 21.

(q) Chartier, Hiſt. de Char. VII. pag. 9.

(r) Hollingſhed's Chron. pag. 587.

(s) Baſſet, ut ſupra.

(t) Idem.

(u) Hollinſhed, pag. 597.

(w) Rymer, vol. 10. fol. 408.

[A] Elected Knight of the Garter.] In the ſcrutiny for an Election on St. George's Eve 4th of Henry VI, there was an equality of votes for Sir John Faſtolf and Sir John Radcliffe Seneſchal of Guyenne, but the Duke of Bedford who was Lieutenant in the King's abſence, tho' he judged them both right worthy of admiſſion, declared in preference of Sir John Faſtolf's merits and ſervices, notwithſtanding that Sir John Radcliffe was the older ſoldier, and had paſſed twenty eight winters unreproached in armies (1): So Faſtolf was firſt choſen of the Order, ſucceeding the Earl of Weſtmoreland in the third ſtall of the Prince's ſide; and Radcliffe was elected ſoon afterwards upon another vacancy. The Letter which was ſent to our Worthy upon this occaſion into France, ſignifies that this honour was conferred on him, in conſideration of his good, loyal, and honourable ſervices, performed to the King's father and the King himſelf; and for other deſerts of honour which God had endowed him with, in his conſtant behaviour as a good, and faithful ſubject, and for the pains and travels ſuſtained by him in the wars to ſupport the King's right and juſt claim (2). His oath was received, and he inveſted by the Earls of Warwick, Saliſbury and Suffolk, according to the Commiſſion to them directed. After his mantle, helmet and ſword were offered by his Proctors, there was a Commiſſion iſſued on the 25th of Feb. in the 5th of Hen. VI for his Inſtallation: wherein, to his former character, is the addition made of his great ſenſe, valour, and experience in arms (3).

(1) Aſhmole's Hiſt. of the Garter, pag. 270.

(2) Idem, in Append. n. 21, 22.

(3) Idem, in Append. n. 50.

[B] Related at large by an Engliſhman &c. tho' his narrative is in French.] Who ſpeaking of the ſiege of Orleans ſays, Et environ le temps de Kareſme enſuivant, pource que vivres & artilleries commençoient a faillir ou dit Siege, fut appointe & ordonne, que Sire Jehan Faſtolf &c. That is, as we ſhall here briefly render it. About the time of the enſuing Lent, Sir John Faſtolf and Sir Thomas Rampſton were appointed to go and ſollicit the Regent at Paris for a ſupply of proviſions to carry on the ſiege, and he ordered them corn, herrings, &c. alſo artillery, with horſes and carriages in great plenty, beſides a band of croſs bows and a party of the guards from his own palace, for their ſafer convoy: ſo that they returned about fifteen hundred ſtrong. When, as they marched, one froſty morning, between Yearnville en Beauſſe and Rouvroy, they ſpied, in the large plain where they were, an army of French and Scots under Charles ſon of the Duke of Bourbon, Sir William Styward Conſtable of Scotland, and many other eminent Commanders, from a great diſtance, and to the number of about nine or ten thouſand men, approaching to encounter them. Hereupon Faſtolf ranged his troops in order, planted before his archers ſharp-pointed ſtakes or palliſadoes, and intrenched himſelf about with the carriages and horſes all chained or linked together to break the force of their cavalry and prevent being ſuddenly overrun, ſo waited the arrival of their enemy; who ſoon after aſſailed them in this entrenchment; but the Engliſh defended themſelves, and annoyed their aſſailants with ſuch extraordinary vigor and valour, that they defeated the French, ſlew Sir William Styward with his brother and many others, French as well as Scots, au Nombre de XXVC ou environ to the number of twenty five hundred or thereabout, and put the reſt ſhamefully to flight, without the loſs or hurt of any one conſiderable perſon: after which glorious victory Sir John Faſtolf and his party proceeded in their march to the ſaid ſiege (4). Herewith, the French Hiſtorian Chartier agrees very well, as that this rencounter was near Janville, that the French Eſtoient beaucoup en plus grand nombre que les Anglois, much more numerous than the Engliſh, that there were great and deſperate ſkirmiſhes between them, that Stuart the Conſtable before mentioned and the Sire d'Orval were killed; but mentions no more beſides, than Environ deux cent hommes en leur compagnée, about two hundred men of their party (5).

(4) Lib. de Actis Armorum & Conqueſtûs Regni Franciæ &c. Compilatus fuit ad Nobilem virum J. Faſtolf Baronem de Cylyeguillem Anno 1459 &c. per Pet. Baſſet Arm. &c. MS. in Officio Armorum.

(5) Hiſtoire de Cha. VII. pag. 17.

but in flight. It is ſaid in our Hiſtories, that Faſtolf himſelf perceiving the inevitable fate of the battle, withdrew without giving or receiving a blow, as deeming it mere raſhneſs to fight at ſuch diſadvantage. And thus much is obſerved by the French Hiſtorians, who write, that he and ſuch others as could eſcape (from being killed or taken) in that unexpected ſurprize retired to Corbeil (x); and ſurely a raſh rencounter is leſs commendable than a prudent retreat. Nor would this he made have been under any ſuſpicion of a cenſure, but for the conſequence which may be thought to have attended it; not that he might have prevented it had he ſtood his ground, but with the Lord Talbot, Scales, Hungerford, and Sir T. Rampſton, been taken priſoner of war. What follows in our own later Engliſh Hiſtorians That for this departure the Duke of Bedford took from him the George and Garter (y), is clogged with ſo many improbabilities, and ſo many ſolid reaſons have been given for the unlikelihood thereof (to which others ſtill might be added, if occaſion were) that the ſhort abſtract of them we ſhall refer to in this place [C], may be ſufficient to ſatisfy any reaſonable perſon. But were the worſt granted that is here alledged or ſuggeſted, and if he was deprived of the Enſigns of his Order upon any warmth of a ſudden miſunderſtanding, yet this can be no diminution of Sir John Faſtolf's honour, ſeeing the very ſame Hiſtorians inform us, that after an examination of this charge, his conduct appeared ſo juſtifiable, thoſe Enſigns were reſtored him; or as they themſelves word it, for apparent cauſes of good excuſe; and againſt the mind of the Lord Talbot, who muſt have been a very powerful adverſary. Beſides he was continued both in military and civil Adminiſtrations of the higheſt importance; for in 1430 the Regent conſtituted him his Lieutenant in Caen (z), as being a perſon of vigilance and experience in wars. In 1432 he went into France in company with the Regent, and was ſoon after one of the Ambaſſadors ſent to the Council of Baſil and one of thoſe ſelected to treat of a final or temporary peace with the adverſary of France (aa): and that year Faſtolf with the Lord Willoughby commanded the army which aſſiſted the Duke of Bretagne againſt the Duke of Alençon (bb). The next year going into foreign parts he had licence to conſtitute John Faſtolf of Olton Eſq; his general Attorney. In 1434 or the beginning of the next year he was with the Regent in France. In 1435 was again one of the Ambaſſadors to conclude a Peace with the Adverſary of France (cc). In September this year the Regent died at Roan, and, as the ampleſt teſtimony of his confidence in the honour and integrity of Sir John Faſtolf, appointed him one of the Executors of his Laſt Will (dd). If any one ſhall think theſe marks of diſtinction might proceed from any private affection in the ſaid Regent, let him obſerve that the Duke of York who ſucceeded in the Lieutenancy of France, made our Knight a Grant of an annuity of twenty pounds yearly out of his own lands, for his notable and laudable ſervices and good council; which is ſufficient to ſhew this Duke's ſentiments alſo of his deſerts (ee). In 1436 and one or more years after, we have accounts that Sir John was in Normandy. In 1443 he obtained licence to employ ſome ſhips for the furniſhing his houſe (ff). In 1450 he conveyed to John the Cardinal, Archbiſhop of York, and others, his Mannor of Caſtre in Fleg, and ſeveral other lands mentioned in a Deed of the ſaid Conveyance (gg). About the year 1453 he was grown through age and infirmities unable to travel on foot or horſeback without the greateſt hazard of his health: wherefore his abſence at the annual feaſts of the Knights Companions of the Garter was afterwards excuſed (hh). He held out however at leaſt ſix years longer, as may be gathered from an account of the age he arrived at, which is given by a noted Contemporary [D] in that (x) Chartier, Hiſt. de Char. VII. pag. 26. & Monſtrelet, vol. 2. pag. 46, &c.

(y) Hall's Chronicle, fol. 26. and Hollinſhed, fol. 601.

(z) Huet. Origines de Caen, pag. 50.

(aa) Rymer, vol. 10. pag. 525, 527, 530.

(bb) Chartier, pag. 59.

(cc) Rymer, vol. 10. fol. 642.

(dd) Regiſtr. Chicbele, vol. 1. pag. 475.

(ee) Sandford's Genealog. Hiſtory, fol. 386.

(ff) Rymer, vol. 11. fol. 44.

(gg) Clauſ. 29 Hen. VI.

(hh) The Black Book of the Garter.

[C] We ſhall refer to in this place.] Among which reaſons for the ſaid unlikelihood, one is, that no authentic contemporary appears to have vouched it; again, there ſeem to be abſurdities in the very expreſſion; the George not being in all probability a ſymbol of the Order in that age; but admitting, thereby was only meant the Croſs of St. George, it muſt yet be granted that the Duke of Bedford, as he could not inveſt any perſon with the Order, ſo it is improbable he ſhould have the power to diveſt any one of it without conſent of the Sovereign and concurrence of the other Knights. It is ſtill more incredible that he exerciſed this authority upon a bare information without examining into the truth of the charge, which is utterly inconſiſtent with the honour, generoſity, and exalted character of this Regent, who had the greateſt reverence for this Order, and was a moſt punctual obſerver of its Statutes. Moreover will it be believed, this Duke, who held himſelf circumſcribed to the Statutes in the election of our Knight, ſhould be on leſs guard in depoſing of him, even to the aſſuming a liberty not allowed by the Statutes then in being? For the degradation of a Knight who ſhould fly from battle was an article firſt inſerted into the Statutes made by Henry VIII. And this too is there reſtrained with theſe words: — If it ſhould pleaſe the Sovereign, and the Company in the next Chapter (6).

(6) Mr. Anſtis's Regiſter of the Garter, vol. 2. pag. 139.

[D] By a noted contemporary.] This was William Caxton, our firſt Printer; who ſays of Cicero's Tract of Old Age, which he printed in Engliſh about twenty years after the death of our Knight, that it was "tranſ-
" lated, and thyſtories openly declared, by the orde-
" nance and deſyre of the noble auncient Knyght Sir
" Johan Faſtolf of the Countee of Norfolf Baneret;
" lyving the age of fourſcore yere; exerciſying the " warrys in the Royame of Fraunce and other coun-
" trees, for the diffence and unyverſal welfare of " bothe Royames of England and Fraunce, by fourty
" yeres enduryng; the fate of armes hauntyng, and
" in admynyſtryng juſtice and polytique governaunce,
" under thre Kynges; that is, to wete, Henry the " fourth, Henry the fyfthe, Henry the ſyxthe; and " was Governor of the Duchye of Angeou, and the " Countree of Mayne; Capytain of many Townys,
" Caſtellys and Fortreſſys in the ſaid Royame of " Fraunce; havyng the charge and ſaufgarde of them
" dyverſe yeres; occupyeng and rewlynge thre hon-
" dred ſpeeres, and the bowes accuſtomed thenne;
" and yeldyng good accompt of the forſaid townes,
" caſtellys, and fortreſſys to the ſeyd Kynges, and to " their Lyeutenauntes, Prynces of noble recommen" dation; as Johan Regent of Fraunce, Duc of Bed-
" forde, Thomas Duc of Exceſter, Thomas Duc of
" Clarence and other Lieutenants (7)."

(7) Caxton's Tully de Senectute, fol. 1481. in Pref.

that noble character of him, with a reference to which we ſhall conlude this Abſtract of his actions abroad, and character in a publick capacity.

As his martial virtues had made him formidable in war, thoſe he now exerciſed in his retired and domeſtic life, rendered him no leſs amiable; all we meet with in this ſcene of his ſtory, being elegant, hoſpitable and generous, either as to the place of his aboad, or thoſe perſons and foundations on which he ſhowered his bounty. To ſupport theſe acts of munificence, he had many fair Mannors and large poſſeſſions in Norfolk, Suffolk, Surrey, beſides Yorkſhire and Wilts, as was before obſerved; the particulars whereof may be found upon record (ii). He was a benefactor to both the Univerſities, bequeathing a conſiderable legacy to Cambridge for building the ſchools of Philoſophy and Civil Law (kk); and at Oxford he was ſo bountiful to Magdalen College, that his name is there commemorated in an Anniverſary Speech. And though the particulars of his favour to that College are not ſpecified becauſe he enfeoffed the Founder in his life-time; it is yet known that the Boars-Head in Southwark, now divided into tenements, yielding one hundred and fifty pounds yearly, together with Caldecot Mannor in Suffolk, were part of the lands he gave; and Lovingland in that county is conceived alſo to have been another part of his donation. But at Caſtre the antient eſtate of his family is to be ſeen the remains of his ſplendid ſeat, or manſion houſe; at one corner whereof ſtands a ruinated Tower of brick, above one hundred foot high; and over one of the windows are carved his arms, ſurrounded with the Garter. Tradition will have it, this houſe was erected by a French Nobleman taken priſoner by our famous Knight, according to the model and architecture of his own Caſtle in France, as the price of his ranſom; which, if true, might be the abovenamed Duke of Alençon. He furthermore appointed, here, by his Executors, a College to be built, for a Maſter, ſix Prieſts, and ſeven poor men; and that they ſhould endow it with an annuity of a hundred and twenty marks, chargeable upon ſeveral parts of his eſtate; but by ſome accident it dwindled to a Chantery. He likewiſe built a houſe in Yarmouth and a Royal Place as it is termed in Southwark (ll.) His liberality ſeems alſo to have been beſtowed at Bickling and Pulham-Mary in Norfolk, the Churches whereof being formerly adorned with his Arms; and amongſt the ornaments in the latter, there was the Effigies of Sir John Faſtolf (mm) in gilt armour, painted on one of the glaſs windows with his Creſt, on a Wreath, Azure and Or, a Plume of Feathers Argent; and two Eſcutcheons with the Croſs of St. George within the Garter; alſo his Lady kneeling, in her Coat Armour, Argent, a Satire Gules. ſubſcribed with a ſupplication to pray for the ſoul of Sir John Faſtolf, who in his life-time had performed many charitable deeds. But though this picture of his perſon is defaced, we have ſeen as above ſome agreeable draughts of his magnificent mind. They are now to be retrieved, at leaſt to be repreſented here, only in miniature; but would have rendered him much more illuſtrious, had they deſcended to us in their full proportion; for ſo they ſeem to have been drawn out in that particular Treatiſe intitled, Acta Domini Johannis Faſtolf (nn) written by his Soget or Segret, a Herald or Purſuivant who is alſo called his Secretary, named William Wyrceſter or Botaner, no title among the officers of arms, but the name of his mother's family, as himſelf obſerves in his Itinerary. Had this Treatiſe of our Knight's Life and Actions been tranſmitted in due time to the public, it might have prevented thoſe liberties which have been taken with his character; I mean the Theatrical miſrepreſentations which are daily conſolidating into thoſe that are Hiſtorical; whereby he is now vulgarly conceived, an old, unweildy, humorous, debauched, cowardly bravo; a fit ornament for the ſign poſts of drinking houſes, and lately made, even the leading hero in the Hiſtory of Highwaymen (oo). I am very ſorry theſe conſequences are attributed to Shakeſpeare, whoſe rare and admirable genius has, by univerſal ſuffrage, eſtabliſhed him a principality in the drama; and do cordially wiſh that ſome more ſubſtantial apology could be produced from him, than either a quibbling variation of our Worthy's name, or a little anachroniſm, or that this character of Sir John Falſtaffe as he calls him in the two parts of Henry IV, and his Merry Wives of Windſor, was written and acted originally under the name of Sir John Oldcaſtle; for which, upon reprehenſion, he ſubſtituted Falſtaffe, as may be obſerved more particularly below [E]. If this ſubſtitution may imply an accidental rather than premeditated defamation, the Author

(ii) Eſcheat. 38, 39 Hen. VI. n. 45.

(kk) Lib. Proc. Univ. Cant.

(ll) Vincent. MS. in Office Arm. n. 18. pag. 122.

(mm) MS. inter Collect. Johan. Anſtis Arm.

(nn) See Bale in Cent. Script. Brit.

(oo) See Captain Johnſon's Hiſtory of Highwaymen, fol. 1732, pag. 1.

[E] More particularly below.] Faſtolf is viſibly changed by Shakeſpear into Falſtaffe, that the very name might import the character of falſe courage, or a man whoſe profeſſions were deceiving and not to be relied on. The Poet might think this variation would be ſufficiently taken for a feigned name, and be more acceptable, as it was more proper for the feigned character, to which had been affixed a name the Players were obliged to expunge. But by whatever means, unleſs it was the inimitable humour of the character, this ſubſtitution paſſed ſo unexceptionably among his contemporaries; for we cannot ſuppoſe the noble Earl of Shrewſbury would be ſeen to encourage ſuch an expoſure for the ſake of an antiquated difference between the two Families; yet from poſterity the Poet has not met with the ſame indulgence. For as Dr. Fuller very juſtly obſerves, "The Comedian is not excuſable by "ſome alteration of his name, ſeeing the vicinity of "ſounds intrench on the memory of that worthy "Knight; and few do heed the inconſiderable difference "in ſpelling their names (8)." As for the Anacroniſm, that too is ſo inconſiderable, as will ſcarcely perſuade us the poetical Knight was not intended for the hiſtorical one. It is true Shakeſpear deſcribes his Falſtaff to have been ſome fifty years old, or inclining to three ſcore, before the battle at Shrewſbury, which was in 1403 (9), and brings in a relation of his death in the firſt Act of Henry V, which, tho' it agrees not by many years with the age and death of the real Sir John Faſtolf; ſo that whatever propriety the Poet gained by imitating his name, he may have loſt in making us ſuppoſe thereby that he meant the ſame perſon; yet,

(8) Worthies of England in Norfolk.

(9) The First Part of Henry IV. Act 2. Scene 3.

(pp) The Life of Mr. W. Shakeſpear by Nic. Rowe Eſq; before the edition of his Plays in 8vo 1709, pag. 9.

Author is not denied to be blame-worthy nevertheleſs, in his ſecond choice (pp). For though the dead are not ſenſible of ſuch injuries to their memory, they are yet injurious to the living; and when a particular character of eminence ſuffers ſuch diſtortion, it diſables the very limbs of public virtue, by diſcouraging hopeful minds, through the proſpect of ſuch ungrateful returns, from the emulation of that which is laudable and exemplary. But to proceed. Our worthy Knight having, in this retirement, attained to the venerable age of fourſcore years, was at laſt ſeiżed with an hectic fever and aſthma; and having laboured under theſe diſeaſes full twenty weeks (qq), departed this life on St. Leonard's Feaſt, and, as ſeveral old manuſcripts have, after one another it ſeems, remembered in the year 1459. The authorities may be more particularly ſeen in thoſe Memoirs which have ſo greatly reſtored our Worthy to his true light; and to which, we muſt here pay the juſtice of our acknowledgments for thoſe circumſtances which conſtitute the greateſt part of this Article; hoping the channel in which they here run, will not render them leſs clear than they are in the fountain from whence they are drawn. But as the learned and elaborate Collector of them John Anſtis Eſq; Garter principal King of Arms (rr), has elſewhere, in the ſame work, obſerved, Sir John Faſtolf died rather in the next year, on that day, or, as he quotes a little further from the Eſcheats, on the eve or vigil of that Feaſt, that is, on the fifth of November in the 39th of King Henry VI, or Anno Dom. 1460 (ss), no leſs than thirty ſeven years beyond the wide and random conjecture of Fuller in his Worthies. He was buried in the Abbey of St. Benedict de Hulme in Norwich; and ſo devoutly was he revered in the duſt, that John Beauchamp Lord of Powyke in his laſt will dated the 15th of Edward IV, appointed a Chantery, more eſpecially for the ſoul of Sir John Faſtolf.

(qq) MS. penes Dom. Hans Sloane, Baronet.

(rr) In his Regiſter of the Order of the Garter, vol. 2. 1724.

(ss) Idem, vol. 1. in Pref.

yet, as his Life comprehends all that period, it intrenches upon his memory in point of time, no leſs than the former liberty does in relation to his name. But this death of Falſtaff in Shakeſpear will naturally ſuggeſt to us a probability of the Tradition, that the part was firſt deſigned for Sir John Oldcaſtle, who, as it is well known ſuffered death about the middle of that King Henry's reign beforementioned in the year 1417, Shakeſpear is thought to have formed his two Plays of Henry the IVth, and Hiſtory of Henry the Vth from that old Play called The famous Victories of Henry V, containing the honourable battle of Agincourt, which opens with a ſcene of the ſaid Prince Henry's robberies; where Sir John Oldcaſtle is one of the gang; and it is likely that Shakeſpear might continue the name of Oldcaſtle till it was ordered to be changed, if not by a complaint from ſome deſcendants of the Family; yet as reflecting upon a perſon who makes ſuch a conſiderable figure among our Reformers in Bale and Foxe's Martyrology. The late accurate Editor of Shakeſpear has been curious enough to obſerve ſome paſſages in thoſe Plays, which amount to a proof that the name was originally Oldcaſtle (10), and Dr. Fuller, who might converſe with ſome perſons that ſaw this character of Skakeſpear's when it was firſt acted, does poſitively aver, that "true it is Sir John Old-"caſtle was the make-ſport in all Plays for a coward. It "is eaſily known out of what purſe this black penny "came; the Papiſts railing on him for a heretick; "and therefore he muſt alſo be a coward, tho' indeed "a man of arms every inch of him, and as valiant as "any in his age. Now as I am glad that Sir John "Oldcaſtle is put out, ſo I am ſorry that Sir John "Faſtolf is put in, to relieve his memory, in this "baſe ſervice, and be the Anvil for every dull wit to "ſtrike upon (11)." But, as the treſpaſs was poetical, we ſhall end with a poetical animadverſion taken from an original Hiſtorical Poem on Three of our Kings; in the poſſeſſion of the writer of this article. Herein the Poet has five ſtanza's of reproof for this liberty taken on the Stage in derogation of our Knight; but, for brevity, ſhall at preſent repeat only theſe two (12).

(10) Mr. Theobald's edit. of Shakeſpeare, vol. 3. 1733, pag. 348, 349, 451.

(11) Worthies of England in Norfolk.

(12) Τριπαρῳδια: The ſeveral Reigns of Richard II. Henry IV. and Henry V. MS. 8vo 1649, in H. 5 Stanz. 136. 139.

Here to evince that ſcandal has been thrown Upon a name of honour; charactred
From a wrong perſon, coward and buffoon;
Call in your eaſy faiths, from what you've read
To laugh at Falſtaffe; as a humour fram'd,
To grace the ſtage, to pleaſe the age, miſnam'd.

No longer pleaſe yourſelves to injure names
Who lived to honour: if, as who dare breathe
A ſyllable from Harry's choice, the Fames,
Conferr'd by Princes, may redeem from death?
Live Faſtolffe then; whoſe Truſt and Courage once
Merited the firſt Government in France.

FATIMA, the daughter of Mahomet, and wife of Ali. Some Relations import that ſhe is the great Saint who is venerated with ſo much devotion at Com (a) [A]: but moſt Travellers are of another opinion. Some ſay the Saint of Com was the daughter of Ali and Fatima [B]. According to Pietro della Valle ſhe was their grand-daughter [C]. Others

(a) It is a City of Perſia.

[A] Some Relations import that ſhe is the great Saint... of Com.] Sir Thomas Herbert, in his travels to Perſia, having ſaid that the Moſque of Com is a magnificent ſtructure, adds (1): The devotion which they have for this place has enriched it with many conſiderable preſents which have been carried to the ſepulchre of Fatima the wife of Mortis Ali, and daughter of Mahomet the great Prophet of all the Muſſulmans, who is interred there. The ſtructure of the Moſque is round, and built in the Epirotic manner. The tomb of the pretended She-Saint is raiſed twelve feet from the ground, and covered with a Pall of white velvet, to which they go up by ſome ſteps of maſſy ſilver.

(1) Pag. 339. quoted by Beſpier, in his Remarks on the preſent State of the Ottoman Empire by Rycaut, tom. 1. pag. 23.

[B] Some ſay ſhe was the daughter of Ali and Fatima.] This is what we find in the relation of Figueroa: they told me, ſays he (2), that at Com there was a very famous Moſque, dedicated to the memory of a great Saint named Lela, the grand-daughter of Mahomet, and daughter of Ali and Fatima. The Sieur Beſpier advances a very probable conjecture: The name of Lela, ſays he (3), is uſually given to the great Ladies of Africa, and it is alſo the title of honour which is there given to the bleſſed virgin, mother of our Lord JESUS, for whom the Mahometans have a great reſpect and veneration, as well as for her ſon. He cites Diego de Torres, who aſſures us (4) that they call the Virgin Mary Lela Mariam, which ſignifies Lady Mary, and that (5) all the daughters of the Sherif take the title of Lela, and he names them all four, viz. Lela Mariam, Lela Aya, Lela Fatima, and Lela Lu. After this Beſpier adds, that he is ſomewhat inclined to believe that Lela was not the proper name of the Saint mentioned by Figueroa, but only the title of honour which preceded it, and that ſhe had another name which Figueroa has omitted, or which they did not tell him; the inhabitants of Com, who held this maid for a Saint, calling her only Lela, or the Lady, by way of excellence; nearly in the ſame manner as moſt Chriſtians ſay our Lady, inſtead of the bleſſed Virgin Mary.

(2) Embaſſy, pag. 220. quoted by Beſpier, ibid.

(3) Ibid. pag. 22.

(4) Hiſt. of the Sherifs, chap. 74.

(5) Ibid. chap. 107.

[C] .... According to Pietro della Valle ſhe was their grand-daughter.] "There is a fine bridge at Com, and "near the bridge ſtands a beautiful Moſque, in which "they told me a ſiſter of Iman Riza, whom they have "in veneration, and who was one of the moſt eſteemed "ſucceſſors

Others say she was the daughter of Mûsa the son of Jaafar. This last opinion is supported by an authentic proof, I mean by the titles which are given to the Saint of Com in the solemn prayers addressed to her by the Pilgrims [D]. These are prayers of a set form, and consequently furnish a good proof, which gives us no great idea of the exactness of Travellers, since some of the most celebrated are so negligent in their account of such a Saint. It appears from this form of prayer that Fatima, the daughter of Mahomet, the wife of Ali, and mother of several children, is nevertheless reverenced as a Virgin [E].

" successors of Mahomet, is interred; she likewise is " considered as a Saint after their manner, so that they " have a great respect and veneration for the place of " her burial (6)." Iman Riza was the son of Hosein, who was the son of Fatima (7): it follows, therefore, that the sister of Iman Riza was the granddaughter of Fatima. Tavernier's account agrees in this particular with that of Pietro della Valle. " What is most remarkable at Com is a large Mosque.. " where are to be seen the sepulchres of Shah Sefi, " and Shah Abbas the Second, and that of Sidi Fatima " the daughter of Iman Hocen, who was the son of " Ali and Fatima Zurha the daughter of Mahomet (8)."

(6) Pietro della Valle, pag. 58. of the 2d Vol. of his Travels, quoted by Bespeir in his Remarks on the present State of the Ottoman Empire, pag. 23, 24.

(7) Bespier, ibid. pag. 24.

(8) Tavernier, Voyag. liv. 1. pag. 75. of the Dutch Edition 1679.

[* Ali, surnamed al Ridâ, or, as the Persians pronounce it, Riza, was the eighth Imâm of the race of Ali and Fatima the daughter of Mahomet, and was the sixth in descent from them, and not their grandson, being the son of Mûsa, the son of Jaafar, (which last was their great great grandson) as appears from the prayers in the following remark †. ADD. REM.]

† See also D'Herbel. Bibl. Orient. pag. 97.

[D] The solemn prayers addressed to her by the pilgrims.] Sir John Chardin (9) has set down the two principal prayers which are directed to be said by the pilgrims of Com. The first begins thus: I visit my Lady and mistress Fathmé the daughter of Mousa, the son of Dgafer, on whom be salvation and peace for ever. There is one thing considerable in these prayers, which is, that the pilgrims therein recommend themselves to the intercession of the Saint, and also pray for her. You have already seen that they wish her peace and eternal salvation; here follows another passage of the formulary: I wish thee eternal salvation, O Fathmé daughter of Mousa, holy, virtuous, and righteous Virgin, directress to truth, pious, sanctified, worthy of all our praises, who intirely lovest the faithful, and art intirely beloved by them: Maid without spot, and free from all impurity. May God vouchsafe to take his greatest pleasure in thee, to accept thee and establish thee in paradise, which is thy dwelling and thy refuge for ever (10). But see in what manner they presently recommend themselves to her prayers (11); I am come to seek thee, O Lady and mistress of my soul, with an intention of drawing near unto the most high God by this act of devotion, and unto his Apostle and his children. The mercy of God be on him and them for ever. I abhor and detest my sins, of which I have made an unhappy burthen, which I am sinking under, and I do my utmost to break the yoke of hell. Vouchsafe to grant me thy intercession, O holy Virgin, on the day wherein the good shall be separated from the wicked. Be thou propitious to me; for thou art of a race, and descended from ancestors, which suffer none of those who love them to fall into misery, who never refuse the request of any who come to pray to them, who avert all sorts of evil from those who love them, and whose enemies, on the contrary, can never prosper. Sir John Chardin informs us (12) that the tomb of this Fathmé has been thrice rebuilt: her father, continues he, brought her to Com on account of the persecution which the Chalifs of Bagdad carried on against his family, and all those who held Ali and his descendants for the only lawful successors of Mahammed. She caused some fine structures to be built in that city, and died there. The people believe that God took her up into heaven, and that her tomb is empty, and nothing but a representation. The Church of Rome, therefore, is not the only one that honours the assumption of Virgins. We shall see immediately that the immaculate conception, and the virginity of a mother, seem to be two doctrines of Mahometism. One thing is wanting in Sir John's relation. He should have told us the time when Mousa the father of Fathmé lived.

(9) Journal du Voiage de Perse, pag. 464. of the Amsterdam Edition, by Wolfgang, 1686.

(10) Journal du Voyage de Perse, pag. 465.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Ibid. pag. 468.

[* Musa the son of Jaafar, and father of Ali Riza and Fatima, was born in the year of the Hejra 128 †, and died in the year 183 §. ADD. REM.]

† A. C. 745.

§ A. C. 799.

[E] Though wife of Ali, and mother of several children, she is nevertheless reverenced as a virgin.] The pilgrims, according to the Form of prayers, are to say this, among others: " I wish thee eternal salvation, " O most pure, most righteous, and immaculate vir- " gin, glorious Fathmé, daughter of Mahammed the " Chosen, wife of Ali the well-beloved, mother of the " twelve true Vicars of God, of illustrious birth (13)."

See D'Herbel. pag. 650. and Elmacin. pag. 115.

(13) Journal du Voyage de Perse, pag. 464.

FAUCHET (CLAUDIUS) a native of Paris, and first President of the Cour des Monnoyes in that City, published some books, which gained him the reputation of a learned man [A]. He died very old in the year 1601. Lewis the XIIIth did not like his manner

[A] He published some Books, which gained him the reputation of a learned man.] He has translated Ta- " citus's History very learnedly and with an immense " labour. His Translation has been printed at Paris " for Abel L'Angelier in the years 1582, 1583, and " 1584, in folio, in 4to, and in 8vo; tho' he did " not put his name to it, any more than to his Book of " the Antiquities of the Gauls, . . . so little does he " care for glory, being only desirous to be useful to " the public (1)" Thus la Croix du Maine spoke in the year 1584. Monsieur Baillet does not speak of this Translation as of an anonymous work; Claudius Fauchet, says he (2), has translated into our language the works of Tacitus, which have been printed under his name in several forms, but the first five Books were translated by Stephen de la Planche (3). In the year 1579 Fauchet published in 4to a Collection of the Antiquities of the Gauls and the French; twenty years after he gave another Edition of it in 8vo, and carried his labour to the first family of the Kings of France. He published a Continuation of it in the year 1601, in 8vo: it is intitled, Fleur de la maison de Charlemagne . . . contenant les Faits de Pepin & ses successeurs depuis l'an 741, jusques à l'an 840 de JESUS CHRIST, i. e. " The Flower of the House of Charles the Great, . . . " containing an account of the Actions of Pepin and of " his Successors from the year of Christ 751, to the year 840." He died when they printed his work intitled, Declin de la maison de Charlemagne . . contenant les faits de Charles le Chauve & ses Successeurs depuis l'an 840, jusqu'à l'an 987, de JESUS CHRIST, & entrée de Régne de Hugues Capet. i. e. " The Decline of Charles the " Great's House, ... containing an account of the " Actions of Charles the Bald, and of his Successors " from the year 840 of Christ, to the year 987, and " to the beginning of Hugh Capet's reign." This volume came out in the year 620 in 8vo. As for the work intitled, Origine des Chevaliers, Armories & Heraux, ensemble de l'Ordonnance, Armes & Instrumens, desquels les François ont anciennement usé en leurs Guerres. i. e. " The Origin of Knights, Coats " of Arms and Heralds, together with the order " which the French observed, and the Arms and In- " struments they made use of anciently in their wars;" as for this work, I say, it was printed at Paris in 8vo, in the year 1600. He published at Paris in 4to in the year 1581, Recueil de la Langue & Poësie Françoise, Ryme & Romans; plus les Noms & Sommaires des Oeuvres de 127 Poëtes François, vivans avant l'An 1300; i. e. " A Collection relating to the French Tongue and " Poetry, Rhyme, and Romances; with the names and " an abridgment of the works of 127 French Poets, " who lived before the year 1300." The edition of his works published at Paris in the year 1610 (4), and which Moreri mentions, was counterfeited at Geneva the next year.

(1) La Croix du Maine, Bibloth. Françoise, pag. 57.

(2) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 4. num. 939. pag. 535.

(3) Du Verdier calls him Plance.

(4) It is in 4to.

(a) See the Remark [O] of the Article LEWIS XIII.

manner of writing (a). He has been compared with Scipio du Pleix in the Sieur Sorel's Bibliotheque Françoiſe (b) or French Library. This deſerves to be read.

(b) In pag. 377. of the 2d edition.

(a) I have ſeen him quoted in Latin under the name of Falcarius.

FAUCHEUR (a) (MICHAEL LE) was a very celebrated Miniſter amongſt the Proteſtants in France in the 17th Century. His greateſt Talent was that of Preaching [A], and we may ſay that he excelled in it. He was admired on that account in the Church of Montpellier [B]. And as his reputation ſpread abroad, and the Church of Paris was uſed to chooſe the moſt eminent Preachers that were in the Provinces, they ſoon choſe him to be one of their Miniſters. He was reſolved to undeceive thoſe who thought he was capable only of compoſing a good Sermon and of delivering it with a good grace. He undertook therefore a conſiderable work, that required a great deal of time; it was a Treatiſe upon the Sacrament, againſt Cardinal du Perron. Men were agreeably ſurpriſed to ſee a large Volume in folio coming from him, which was ſtuffed with Greek and Latin paſſages, and full of all kind of learning concerning this controverſy. His other works are ſeveral volumes of Sermons, and a Treatiſe intitled, De l'Action de l'Orateur [C], which has been lately reprinted in Holland. I have ſeen a manuſcript letter of his in Latin, in which he gave the Great Du Moulin very good advice concerning his book of the Salmurian Controverſies. Le Faucheur died at Paris April the 1ſt 1657 (b).

(b) Witte in Diar. Biograph. See alſo Monſieur Daillé's Life, pag. 44.

[A] His greateſt talent was that of preaching.] I have been told that he preached once with ſo much ſtrength againſt duelling, that the Marſchal de la Force, who heard this Sermon, proteſted before ſome men of courage, tht if he were challenged to fight a duel, he would not accept it.

[B] He was admired . . in the Church of Montpellier.] The Sermon which he preached there on a Faſt day in the year 1618 has been often printed. It is a very eloquent and pathetical piece.

[C] He wrote a Treatiſe of the Action of an Orator.] It was printed at Leyden in the year 1686, and it was falſly aſcribed to Monſr. Conrart (α), either becauſe they thought him the Author of it, or becauſe they hoped that the Book would ſell better, if they prefixed to it the name of a man, who was very famous for his politeneſs. The Authors of the Journal publiſhed at Leipſic gave a very exact account of this Book in their Journal for January 1687 (1). They did not omit the paſſage where the Author ſpeaks of a certain Preacher, who had made a rule to himſelf to cough very regularly, and exactly at ſuch or ſuch a period of his Sermon: and leſt he ſhould fail in it, he uſed to put marks in his manuſcript wherever he deſigned to cough: he wrote in thoſe paſſages hem, hem, as it has been ſeen in the original after his death (β). The advice which theſe Authors gave has been followed by a Profeſſor of Helmſtad (2), who has tranſlated this Treatiſe into Latin. This Tranſlation was publiſhed in the ſame city in the year 1690. The Authors of the Journal of Leipſic have given ſome account of it (3), and acquainted the publick, that the Tranſlator reſtored this work to its true Author. What they ſuppoſe, namely, that this work having been printed at Lyons in the year 1676 without the Author's name, it was publiſhed at Paris ten years after under the name of Mr. Conrart, and that the Dutch Edition imitated the blunder of that of Paris by aſcribing the work to the ſame Mr. Conrart; this, I ſay, wants to be corrected. I. The anonymous Edition of Lyons 1676 is not the firſt: I remember to have ſeen this Book as ſoon as the year 1666 (γ). II. It was not printed under Mr. Conrart's name at Paris in the year 1686. Theſe words, ad Exemplar Pariſ. MDCLXXXVI, which theſe Gentlemen quote (4), do not ſignify that it was printed from the Edition which was publiſhed at Paris in 1686, but that it was printed in 1686, according to the Paris Edition; ſo that the year of that Paris Edition is not ſet down.

(1) Pag. 17, 18.

(2) Melchior Smidius.

(3) In the month of July 1690, pag. 368.

(4) Pag. 17. anni 1687.

* (α) It was falſly aſcribed to Monſieur Conrart.] The reaſon of it was, that the licenſe for printing it was granted to the Sieur Conrart, Counſellor and Secretary to his Majeſty: ſo that Mr. Conrart was certainly the perſon that publiſhed it. Now when an Author's name is not printed in the title-page of his Book, it may reaſonably be aſcribed to the perſon who is named in the Licence, eſpecially when that perſon does not ſay the leaſt thing by which it appears that he is only the Editor of the Book. But there is ſomething more with regard to this Book, which is intitled, Traité de l'Action de l'Orateur, ou de la prononciation & du geſte. i. e. "A Treatiſe concerning the Action of "an Orator, or of Pronunciation and Geſture." Towards the end of the Preface the Author tells his readers, that it is to the Counſels of his friends they are indebted for this work, otherwiſe, ſays he, I would never have been determined to WRITE it, and leſs ſtill to PUBLISH it. This cannot but perſuade the reader, that he, who publiſhed it, had alſo compoſed it; and it is for this reaſon that a great many perſons thought that Mr. Conrart who publiſhed it, was alſo the true Author of it †. CRIT. REM.]

† From the Critical Remarks printed at the end of the Paris edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary.

(β) He wrote in thoſe paſſages, hem, hem, &c.] By reading this one is inclined to think it is ſaid of ſome Preacher, who was contemporary with le Faucheur. But the fact, as he relates it, (p. 81.) is as follows. Olivier Maillard in one of his Sermons delivered at Bruges in the year 1500, made a mark in all the paſſages where he deſigned to cough, writing there hem, hem, hem, as appears by the printed copy of that Sermon. The Author of the Critical Remarks printed at the end of the Paris Edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary, ſeems to doubt of this fact; or if it be true, he ſays that theſe hems ſignify perhaps quite another thing, than what le Faucheur imagined *. CRIT. REM.]

* Ibid.

(γ) As ſoon as the year 1666.] Mr. Bayle did not know when this work, which is but a ſmall Book in 12mo containing 243 pages, was printed for the firſt time: the firſt Edition was publiſhed by a Licence dated July the 18th, 1656. Mr. Conrart had made over his right to the Bookſeller Courbé January the 10th 1657, and the Book was printed off the firſt of February following §. CRIT. REM.]

§ Ibid.

(a) Quem ætate Pauli IV (it ſhould have been Pauli III) Romani Pontificis, anno Chriſti MDXL vixiſſe conſtat. Hankius, de Scriptoribus Rerum Romanarum, tom. 2. pag. 134.

FAUNO (LUCIO) in Latin Faunus, an Italian Author who lived towards the middle of the ſixteenth Century (a), wrote a Book of the Antiquities of Rome, delle Antechità della Città di Roma, which has been printed in Italian, and in Latin [A]. He tranſlated ſome of Flavius Blondus's works into Italian (b).

(b) Epitome Bibliotheca Geſneri, pag. m. 552.

[A] His Book of the Antiquities of Rome . . . has been printed in Italian, and in Latin.] The Italian Edition printed at Venice is ſaid to be of the year 1558, in 8vo, in the Catalogue of Thuanus's Library. They mention (1) another publiſhed in the ſame city in the year 1553. The Latin Edition was publiſhed at Venice in the year 1546, if we may believe the Epitomizer of Geſner. Others place the Venice Edition under the year 1549 (2).

(1) See Mr. Teiſſier, in Catal. Catalogor. &c. pag. 550.

(2) Hank. De Scriptor. Rer. Roman. pag. 134.

FAUSTA

FAUSTA, the daughter of Maximianus Herculeus (a), was the Emperor Conſtantine's conſort. They had married her to him with a deſign to deceive him (b); but ſhe diſcovered Maximianus's ſnares to her huſband (c). It is related that Conſtantine, ſuſpecting that Criſpus, whom he had had (d) by a concubine (e), had a criminal converſation with Fauſta, cauſed him to be put to death; and that, in order to comfort Helena his mother, who grieved extremely for that young man's death, he cauſed Fauſta to be ſmothered in a very hot bath. This is what Zoſimus aſſerts (f). Some ſay that Fauſta being in love with Criſpus, diſcovered her paſſion to him, but as ſhe could not perſuade him to ſatisfy her deſire, ſhe complained to Conſtantine that he attempted to raviſh her. They add, that Conſtantine giving credit to Fauſta's calumny, put Criſpus to death, and that having found out afterwards that his ſon was innocent, he put that woman to death [A]. Cardinal

(a) Zoſimus, lib. 2. pag. m. 81.

(b) Idem, ibid. pag. 82.

(c) Idem, ibid. See alſo Eutropius, lib. 10.

(d) Zoſimus, ibid. pag. 93.

(e) Her name was Minervina. Zoſimus, lib. 2. pag. 93.

(f) Idem, ibid. pag. 103, 104.

[A] Some ſay that Fauſta was in love with Criſpus . . . Conſtantine put Criſpus to death . . . and put that woman to death.] This tragical event is related by ſeveral Authors with a thouſand variations, and ſome of the moſt material circumſtances are almoſt always omitted. Zoſimus (1) pretends, that Conſtantine ſuſpected Criſpus of a criminal converſation with Fauſta, and yet he aſſerts that this Emperor put Criſpus to death, without inflicting the leaſt puniſhment on the Empreſs; for he pretends that ſhe was ſmothered in a bath only becauſe this was thought neceſſary to comfort Conſtantine's mother. Such an account deſerves to be ſeverely cenſured; Criſpus could not be ſuſpected of an inceſt with Fauſta, but Fauſta muſt have been ſuſpected of the ſame crime. Why then does Conſtantine puniſh Criſpus only? This is an objection, which Zoſimus ought to have foreſeen and anſwered; and yet he does not take the leaſt precaution againſt ſuch an exception; whence it follows that in his account of Conſtantine's behaviour he did not follow the rules of a ſtrict accuracy. The latter part of his narration requires that he ſhould have obſerved in the former that Criſpus was ſuſpected, not of inceſt with Fauſta, but of an unſucceſsful attempt on her chaſtity. Thus there would be no difficulty in the whole account; every reader would eaſily underſtand that Conſtantine made his wife's innocency fall a ſacrifice to his mother's affliction, or that by ſome artifice they made him believe, that his wife's conduct had not been abſolutely blameleſs. If we want to have a full account of this event, we muſt conſult Metaphraſtes: I own that he is not a very credible Author, but after all he gives us a fuller account, and places the circumſtances in a better order than any other Writer. Criſpus being accuſed by his mother-in-law is puniſhed; he is the only perſon guilty in his father's eyes. We muſt not therefore think it ſtrange that Fauſta ſhould not ſuffer the leaſt puniſhment. Yet afterwards it is found out that ſhe is a ſlanderer, and ſhe is puniſhed accordingly. Obſerve that Metaphraſtes ſuppoſes, that the Martyr Artemius relates this in Conſtantine's defence, and in anſwer to Julian the Apoſtate's objections. Read the following paſſage from Baronius (2). Artemius Præfectus Auguſtalis, idemque Martyr, cum Chriſtianitatis reus cauſam ageret coram Juliano apoſtata, deroganti illi Conſtantino, multaque in eum objicienti, ac præſertim propinquorum necem, hæc tunc in eum pro Conſtantino reſpondit :* Ille autem (inquit) uxorem Fauſtum juſtè admodum interfecit, ut quæ priſcam Phædram eſſet imitata, ejuſque filium Criſpum calumniata, quod ejus amore captus eſſet, & vim ei conatus eſſet afferre, ſicut etiam illa Hippolytum Theſei filium. Atque primum quidem qui ſic in matrem inſanierat (ut volebant ejus verba) ille cum eſſet maritus punivit. Poſtea autem cum ſciviſſet eſſe mentitam, ipſam quoque occidit, in eam ferens ſententiam omnium juſtiſſimam. Hæc Artemius ad Julianum. Sidonius Apollinaris tells us, that the Conſul Ablavius wrote a Diſtich, which was poſted up on the palace-gate, and which contained a very ſharp reflection on Conſtantine's cruelty. Ut mihi non figuratius Conſtantini domum vitamque videatur vel pupugiſſe verſu gemello Conſul Ablavius, vel momordiſſe diſticho tali clam palatinis foribus appenſo:

Saturni aurea ſæcla quis requirat?
Sunt hæc gemmea (3), ſed Neroniana.

Quia ſcilicet prædictus Auguſtus iiſdem fere temporibus extinxerat Conjugem Fauſtam calore balnei, filium Criſpum frigore veneni (4). i. e. "So that the Conſul Ablavius "does not ſeem to have more elegantly cenſured the "family and life of Conſtantine in a couple of verſes, "or bantered him by that diſtich which was ſecretly "poſted up on the palace-gate, the ſenſe of which is as "follows; Who would wiſh for the Golden Age of Sa- "turn? ſince this is an Age of Jewels §, but a Ne- "ronian Age. Becauſe &c." Theſe words of Sidonius Apollinaris contain nothing concerning the reaſon of Conſtantine's conduct. They only acquaint us, that this Emperor put his wife Fauſta to death by the heat of a bath, and his ſon Criſpus by the cold of poiſon. Moſt of the Authors ſay, that Criſpus was put to death, but not that he was poiſoned. Ad Iſtriam duxit prope oppidum Polam, ubi quondam PEREMPTUM Conſtantini filium accepimus Criſpum (5). i. e. "He "carried him into Iſtria, near the town of Pola, "where we are told that Criſpus Conſtantine's ſon was "killed." St. Jerom's expreſſion is as follows: Hic (Lactantius) extrema ſenectute Magiſter Cæſaris Criſpi, filii Conſtantini, in Gallia fuit, qui poſtea à patre INTERFECTUS eſt (6). i. e. "Lactantius had been in "his old age Tutor in Gaul to the Cæſar Criſpus, "Conſtantine's ſon, who was afterwards put to death "by his father." We read in Euſebius's Chronicle, that Criſpus Conſtantine's ſon, and young Licinius ſon of one of Conſtantine's ſiſters were both moſt cruelly killed, crudeliſſime INTERFICIUNTUR, in the firſt year of the 276th Olympiad, that is to ſay, in the year 325 of the Chriſtian Æra, and that Conſtantine killed his wife Fauſta the fourth year of the ſame Olympiad. Oroſius does not mention Fauſta, but he ſays, that about the time when Arius's hereſies were condemned in the Council of Nice, Conſtantine killed his own ſon Criſpus, and his nephew Licinius, and that it is not known what reaſons thus exaſperated him againſt his own blood. Sed inter hæc latent cauſæ, cur vindicem gladium, & deſtinatam in impios punitionem Conſtantinus Imperator etiam in proprios egit affectus. Nam Criſpum filium ſuum, & Licinium filium, ſororis filium INTERFECIT (7). It is very ſtrange that this Hiſtorian ſhould not have heard what ſo many others aſſert, namely, that Criſpus was put to death becauſe he was ſuſpected of having a criminal love for his mother-in-law; but Oroſius did perhaps hear all this, and ſeveral other reaſons alſo, and theſe different accounts made him perhaps think that the true reaſons of Criſpus's death were a myſtery. Aurelius Victor, who relates that it was thought Fauſta perſuaded Conſtantine to put Criſpus to death, does not tell us, by what motive ſhe perſuaded her huſband. For the reſt he agrees with Zoſimus as to the cauſe of Fauſta's death; he ſays that Conſtantine cauſed her to die in a bath, becauſe his mother Helena being extremely grieved at Criſpus's death, was continually upbraiding him with it. Fauſta conjuge, ut putant, ſuggerente Criſpum filium NECARI jubet. Dehinc uxorem ſuam Fauſtam in balneas ardentes conjectum interemit, cum eum mater Helena dolore nimio nepotis increparet (8). Nothing ſeems more ſurprizing to me, than to find that Eutropius ſpoke of Conſtantine's barbarous actions, without ſaying a word of Criſpus's death, tho' he does expreſly mention the death of Licinius and Fauſta (9). It is pretended, that St. Chryſoſtom, without mentioning any perſon by name, relates this action of Conſtantine: but then he ſuppoſes, that this Prince, ſuſpecting his wife of adultery, cauſed her to be bound on a mountain, that ſhe might be devoured by ravenous beaſts: He adds, that the ſon of this ſame Prince was killed by his own father, or rather by his brother (10). Gregorius Turonenſis aſſerts, that Conſtantine put his ſon Criſpus and his wife Fauſta to death for high treaſon (11). Philoſtorgius relates, that Conſtantine giving

§ See the marginal quotation (3).

(1) Zoſimus, lib. 2. pag. m. 103, 104.

(2) Baronius, ad ann. 324. num. 11. pag. m. 295.

* Ex Metaphr. apud Sur. die 20 Octob. tom. 5.

(3) Savaro makes the following note upon this word. Scilicet quod Criſpus . . . veneno gemmæ id eſt gemmatæ pateræ infuſo potionatus occubuit. i. e. "Criſpus "died of a poiſon which was "given him in a "gem, that is to "ſay in a cup "adorned with "gems."

(4) Sidon. Apollinar. Epiſt. 8. lib. 5. pag. m. 338.

(5) Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 14. cap. ult. pag. m. 57, 58.

(6) Hieronym. de Script. Eccleſ. in Lactantio.

(7) Oroſius, lib. 7. cap. 28. folio m. 321 verſo.

(8) Aurelius Victor, in Epitome, pag. m. 224.

(9) Primum neceſſitudines perſecutus, egregium virum, & ſororis filium, commodæ indolis juvenem interfecit, mox uxorem, poſt numerojos amicos. Eutrop. lib. 10. pag. m. 117.

(10) Chryſoſt. Homil. 15. in Philippenſes. See Henry Valeſius in Ammian. Marcell. lib. 14. pag. m. 58.

(11) Greg. Turon. Hiſt. Franc. lib. 1. cap. 34.

ing

(g) Baron. ad ann. 324, num. 5, & seq.

Cardinal Baronius (g) juſtly complains of the Writers of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, who have concealed theſe facts, or even endeavoured to confute them [B]. He places the marriage of Conſtantine and Fauſta under the year 307 (h), and the death of Criſpus and of this Empreſs under the year 324. There could not happen any thing more dangerous to this ſon of Conſtantine, than his mother-in-law's falling in love with him; for he could not but expoſe himſelf, whatever courſe he took. His complaiſance would have (h) Monſ. Baluze in Lactant. de mort. Perſec. cap. 27. proves that this Chronology is true.

ing credit to the calumnies of his wife, Criſpus's mother-in-law, cauſed him to be put to death, and that having afterwards diſcovered, that this woman committed adultery with a certain meſſenger, he gave orders to ſmother her in a bath (12). Beſides the Authors I have mentioned, the reader will do well to conſult Suidas (13) and Zonaras.

(12) Philoſtorg. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 2. cap. 4.

(13) Suidas, voce Κρίσπος.

I have quoted all theſe Authors, that the reader may ſee the defects, differences, and inaccuracies of the ancient Hiſtorians. Let us alſo obſerve, that ſince there are ſo many Authors to be quoted on this ſubject, it is ſtrange that in Moreri's Dictionary they ſhould till this time quote only Ammianus Marcellinus, who ſays nothing either of Fauſta, or of the reaſon why Criſpus was put to death. You have ſeen above (14) all that we meet with in this Writer upon this ſubject.

(14) Quotation (5).

I muſt not omit taking notice of the liberty which the Jeſuit Cauſſin has taken of adding a great many things of his own invention to the account of this ſtory. This might be tolerable in a Poem, or in a Romance. But theſe ornaments of Rhetoric are not to be ſuffered in a grave and ſerious work, and which is intitled, La Cour Sainte (the Holy Court). Nothing is more agreeable than this for young ſcholars, but nothing is more inſipid for men of years and judgment. It raiſes their indignation to ſee that an Author attempts to deſcribe at large the beauty of Criſpus, the riſe and progreſs of Fauſta's love for him, how ſhe declared it to him, her ſpite at his refuſal, the artifice ſhe made uſe of to be revenged, her grief at the death of Criſpus, &c. to ſee, I ſay, that an Author ſhould deſcribe all theſe things, tho' he does not borrow them from any Hiſtory extant. Here follows what Father Cauſſin relates with regard to the laſt particular I have mentioned. "As ſoon (15) as this news was brought to Court, the wicked "Fauſta perceived it was an effect of her perfidiouſ- "neſs; and repreſenting to herſelf in a moſt lively "manner that unhappy Prince, whom ſhe had lov- "ed ſo much, now cruelly ſlaughtered in that age, "and that beauty, in which death is moſt lamenta- "ble, and with that good nature, which would have "raiſed the compaſſion of the very tygers and lions, "all her anger and hatred was changed into a raving "grief, which made her cry and howl at her huſ- "band's feet, confeſſing that ſhe by her abominable "calumny had killed the chaſte Criſpus, that ſhe had "tempted him to commit a crime, but that ſhe found "him a Joſeph endowed with an invincible chaſtity, "who abhorred her ſin as it deſerved to be abhorred; "at which ſhe being exaſperated, and fearing leſt he "ſhould be beforehand with her, ſhe had recourſe to "that wicked artifice ſhe made uſe of: that therefore "ſhe was unworthy to live, having killed the moſt in- "nocent Prince in the world, and ſtained his own "father with his blood (16)." What a bold attempt is this! An Author of the 17th Century dares to give us a particular account of circumſtances of his own invention concerning a fact which happened in the fourth Century. There is not one ancient Author that tells us how Conſtantine was acquainted with his ſon's innocency, ſo far are they from aſſerting, that Fauſta herſelf diſcovered it to that Emperor.

(15) Of the death of Criſpus.

(16) Cauſſin, Cour Sainte, tom. 2. pag. m. 56.

[B] Cardinal Baronius juſtly complains of the Writers . . . , who have concealed thoſe facts, or even endeavoured to confute them.] He cenſures upon this ſubject three Hiſtorians, Euſebius, Sozomen and Evagrius. The firſt of them does not mention thoſe facts, and the two others diſpute againſt thoſe that mentioned them. Euſebius does not ſay one word of this in his Life of Conſtantine, but he ſpeaks of it in his Chronicle. Sozomen dares not flatly deny the death of Criſpus, nor own it poſitively: he (17) only refutes the Heathen Writers, who had aſſerted, that when Conſtantine could not find in the Heathen Religion any means to atone for ſuch execrable murthers, which means he found in the Chriſtian Religion, he forſook the Religion of his anceſtors, and became a Chriſtian. Evagrius (18) poſitively denies both that Conſtantine put Criſpus and Fauſta to death, and that it was for this reaſon that he embraced the Chriſtian Religion. Baronius (19) having condemned the ſilence of the firſt of theſe three Hiſtorians, as a baſe flattery, charges (20) Sozomen with an incredible ſtupidity, who in order to prove that Conſtantine did not put Criſpus to death, made uſe, ſays he, only of the following argument; viz. Criſpus lived till the twentieth year of Conſtantine's reign, and made ſeveral Laws with him. Baronius (21) does ſtill more wonder at Evagrius's conduct, and refers him to Euſebius's Chronicle, to Aurelius Victor, to Eutropius, to Oroſius, to Sidonius Apollinaris, &c. He confutes afterwards the arguments which Sozomen and Evagrius objected, the former to the Heathen Authors in general, the latter particularly to Zoſimus. I. But let us obſerve firſt, that he curtails their arguments, and that he ought not to have aſſerted, that Sozomen denied the death of Criſpus (22); for this Hiſtorian leaves us doubtful with regard to the fact itſelf, and only confutes the conſequences, which the Heathens pretended to infer from it. The argument he offers againſt them is much ſtronger, than Baronius repreſents it. For if Conſtantine and Criſpus have made Laws together in favour of the Goſpel, it follows from thence, that Conſtantine had forſaken the Pagan Religion before the death of Criſpus, and conſequently that he did not forſake it, becauſe he did not meet in that Religion the neceſſary expiations and atonement for the murther of his ſon, as the Heathen aſſerted. Such is Sozomen's argument; the Annaliſt has entirely enervated it, by ſuppoſing that this Author only ſays, that Criſpus made Laws with Conſtantine (23): he had not made ſuch an undeterminate obſervation, he had ſaid, that the Laws were made in favour of the Chriſtians (24). Baronius has not been more fair with regard to Evagrius: he charges him (25) with objecting to Zoſimus only Euſebius's ſilence: but it is certain that Evagrius does more, for he quotes (26) three paſſages of Euſebius's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, by which it appears that the Emperor Conſtantine had always been addicted to the true faith, and that his ſon Criſpus, the beloved of God, was like his father. II. Let us obſerve in the ſecond place, that Sozomen's other arguments have been well refuted by the Annaliſt (27), who ſhews him plainly, that the Philoſopher Soſipater had been acquainted with Conſtantine, and ought to have anſwered him, according to the Platonic Syſtem, that this Emperor's Murthers could not be expiated. Zoſimus aſſerts that ſuch was that Philoſopher's anſwer to Conſtantine. He has been refuted (28) among other arguments by the following obſervation; namely, that Soſipater could not but know, that there were in the Heathen Religion ceremonies to atone for the moſt heinous murthers. Witneſs Hercules, who killed his ſons and his hoſt, and yet found means to atone for thoſe murthers. Baronius (29) refutes very well theſe anſwers of Sozomen, by obſerving that there was a material difference between the murthers committed by Conſtantine, and thoſe committed by Hercules. The former were perpetrated by a Prince who had the full uſe of his ſenſes, and the latter by a mad-man, whoſe action could not be conſidered as voluntary.

(17) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 5. pag. m. 406, 407.

(18) Evagrius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 41. pag. m. 371.

(19) Baron. ad ann. 324. num. 5. pag. m. 271.

(20) Idem, ibid. num. 7. pag. 294.

(21) Idem, ibid. num. 8.

(22) Ut neget Criſpum occiſum à patre. Baron. ibid. num. 7. Non admittens omnino Criſpum à Conſtantino juſſum occidi. Idem, ibid. num. 20. James Godefroy, Notis in Philoſtorg. pag. 50. commits the ſame blunder.

(23) Eo uno utitur argumento quod Criſpus vivens ad vigeſimum uſque patris Imperii annum pervenerit, multas interea leges cum eo ſtatuens. Baron. ad ann. 324. num. 7.

(24) Πολλοὺς σὺν αὐτῷ νόμους θέμενος νέους ὑπὲρ Χριστιανῶν. Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 5. pag. 406, 407.

(25) Baron. ad ann. 324. num. 8.

(26) Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 41. pag. 372.

(27) Baron. ad ann. 324, num. 22, & ſeq.

(28) Sozom. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 1. cap. 5. pag. 407.

(29) Baron. ad ann. 324, num. 25.

It will doubtleſs be aſked why this Annaliſt takes ſo much care to confirm the ſlanders of the heathen Authors, and to refute the Writers of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, who have anſwered them as well as they could. Does it become a Cardinal to declare himſelf in a manner for the Infidels, who affected to diſgrace Conſtantine's converſion, as though this Emperor had abjured the Heathen Religion, only becauſe its diſcipline was ſo ſevere, that he could not find in it the leaſt remedy to appeaſe the remorſe of his conſcience, whereas the Chriſtians offered him a very eaſy method to waſh off his ſtains by the Water of Baptiſm. Do not think, that Baronius does this without a deſign: he does it only with a view to ſupport certain traditions favourable to the See of Rome: he does have drawn God's wrath upon him; and beſides, if it ſhould happen to be known, he had the worſt to fear from Conſtantine; a refuſal was a matter of great importance; for in this caſe he would draw upon himſelf the indignation and fury of an Empreſs [C]. Some Authors aſſert (i), that Fauſta engaged Conſtantine again to worſhip the falſe Deities, and that God viſited him with a leproſy, in order to draw him from that idolatrous worſhip.

(i) Michael Glycas, lib. 4. apud Baronium, ad ann. 324, num. 35.

does it (30) in order to confirm the Acts of Pope Silveſter, and to prove that Conſtantine was baptiſed by that Pope, at Rome, a little before the Council of Nice was held. The Faſti of Idacius do not favour his opinion, for they put the death of Criſpus under the year 326. F. Pagi (31) places Criſpus's third Conſulſhip under the year 324. Conſult Godefroi's Notes upon Philoſtorgius (32). After all, it is a hard matter to imagine, that a year before or after the Council of Nice, Conſtantine ſhould have conſulted an Heathen Philoſopher, to learn from him by what ceremonies murthers could be atoned for. Could he have been till that time poſſeſſed with the ſuperſtitious notions of the Heathens, after he had ſo long profeſſed the true faith? Obſerve, that there are ſtill at this time ſome perſons (33) who doubt, that he put his ſpouſe Fauſta to death; and do not forget to compare the Heathen Writers with thoſe who have publiſhed, and ſtill do publiſh, that the Reformers of the Church in the ſixteenth Century forſook the Popiſh Religion only with a deſign to deliver themſelves from the hardſhips of celibacy, and abſtinences, and that the liberty of living without auricular confeſſion, and without any auſterity made them find an immenſe number of followers.

(30) Baron num. 29, & ſeq. ad ann. 324.

(31) Pagi, Diſſertat. Hypat. pag. 249.

(32) Jacob. Gothofredus, in Philoſtorg. pag. 51.

(33) See Cellarius, in Eutrop. lib. 10.

[C] A refuſal .... drew upon him the indignation and fury of an Empreſs.] They that have the greateſt knowledge in love affairs, ſay that it is very imprudently done, to act the tempter when a man only deſigns to try whether a woman be virtuous or not. For they who aim at nothing more, expoſe themſelves very much, in caſe they perſuade the woman to conſent that they ſhould enjoy her. The affront ſhe receives when a man does not make an advantage of the kind diſpoſition to which he has reduced her, inſpires her with ſuch a reſentment, as makes her invent a thouſand means to be revenged. She cannot think that he has been deceived, and that the weakneſs ſhe diſcovered has been uſeleſs to her, ſhe cannot, I ſay, think of this, but ſhe falls into a moſt violent paſſion, which the tempter has but too much reaſon to dread. It is much worſe ſtill, when a woman declares her love firſt, and finds that her addreſſes are unſucceſsful. Woe to him whom ſhe tempted, and could not win; ſhe thinks of nothing but his ruin. The Patriarch Joſeph is a proof of this (34). And if the Sacred Hiſtory furniſhes us with this remarkable inſtance, the Hiſtory of the Heroical Times does not contain leſs conſiderable inſtances. Read the ſtories of Bellerophon and of the chaſte Hippolytus. The Hiſtory of the following ages alſo offers us ſomething like it, if it were only our Fauſta, who calumniated Criſpus, becauſe he would not conſent to ſatisfy her deſire. Juvenal has rightly obſerved that the ſhame of ſuch a refuſal inſpires a woman with hatred, and it in this caſe, that ſhe ſhews the greateſt cruelty.

(34) See the 39th chapter of the Book of Geneſis.

Sed caſto quid forma nocet? quid profuit olim
Hippolyto grave propoſitum? quid Bellerophonti?
Erubuit nempe hæc ceu faſtidita repulſa:
Nec Stenobœa minus quam Creſſa excanduit, & ſe
Concuſſere ambæ, mulier ſæviſſima tunc eſt,
Cum ſtimulos odio pudor admovet (35).

(35) Juvenal, Sat. 10. ver. 324.

" She may be handſom, yet be chaſte, you ſay:
" Good obſervator, not ſo faſt away:
" Did it not coſt the modeſt youth his life,
" Who ſhun'd th' embraces of his father's wife?
" And was not th' other ſtripling forc'd to fly,
" Who coldly did his patron's Queen deny,
" And pleaded laws of hoſpitality?
" The Ladies charg'd 'em home, and turn'd the tail.
" With ſhame they redned, and with ſpite grew pale.
" 'Tis dang'rous to deny the longing Dame;
" She loſes pity, who has loſt her ſhame."

Dryden.

An Empreſs, a Queen, and in general the Ladies of the higeſt rank are chiefly to be dreaded, when their addreſſes have not been anſwered. Their quality makes them take an affront more to heart, and furniſhes them with more opportunities to revenge themſelves. We may very well apply to them the words of Juno in Virgil's Æneid.

——— Mene incepto deſiſtere victam (36)?

(36) Virg. Æneid. lib. 1. ver. 37.

In ſuch a caſe an indifferent opinion of their beauty, is an injury which roots itſelf deeply in the heart.

——— Manet alta mente repoſtum
Judicium Paridis ſpretæque injuria formæ (37).

(37) Idem, ibid. ver. 26.

I do not know whether Lactantius made his diſciple (38) read the ſtory of Phœdra; it might have been of ſome uſe to him.

(38) Criſpus, ſon of Conſtantine.

FEITHIUS (EVERARD) was born at Elburg in the Province of Guelderland in the 17th Century. He ſtudied Philoſophy for ſome time, and applied himſelf afterwards intirely to polite Literature, in which he made a conſiderable progreſs. He learned the Greek tongue perfectly, and even the Hebrew tongue; of which the Profeſſors of the Univerſity which the Proteſtants of France had in Bearn gave him a large teſtimonial. Being returned into his own country, from which he had been long abſent, he was under a great conſternation becauſe of the expedition of the Spaniards commanded by Spinola. This determined him to leave his native country; he went to ſettle in France, where he taught the Greek tongue, and was honoured with the friendſhip of Caſaubon, of Meſſieurs Du Puy, and of the Preſident Thuanus. When he was walking one day at Rochelle attended by a ſervant, he was deſired to enter into the houſe of a Citizen (a). Since that day it could never be diſcovered what became of him, notwithſtanding all the ſtricteſt inquiries of the Magiſtrates. It was a pity; for if this young man had lived to grow old, he would have wonderfully explained moſt of the ſubjects relating to polite Literature. This judgment is grounded upon the manuſcript works of his, which are extant (b), one of which was publiſhed at Leyden in the year 1677 [A].

(a) In Civis Rapellani ædes vocatur. Brumannus, ubi infra.

(b) Taken from Brumanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Antiquitatum Homericarum.

" FELIBIEN

[A] One of his Works was publiſhed at Leyden in the year 1677.] It is a Book in 12*mo* of 350 pages, intitled, Antiquitatum Homericarum libri quatuor. i. e. " Four Books of the Antiquities of Homer." It is very learned and abounds with curious and inſtructive obſervations. Henry Bruman, Principal of the College at Swol, and the Author's grand-nephew (1), took care to publiſh it. He promiſed to make a collection of Feithius's other Works, which had been diſperſed through the careleſsneſs of his heirs. I know from very good hands that they are not all periſhed, and that the Work De Athenienſium Republica, and that, intitled De Antiquitatibus Atticis, are in the poſſeſſion of a very learned Antiquary (2).

(1) Avo meo materno frater fuit (Feithius) Brum. Epiſt. Ded. Antiquit. Homer.

(2) Mr. Cuper.

" FELIBIEN (ANDREW) Sieur des Avaux and de Javercy Counſellor and Hiſto-
" riographer to the King, &c. gained a great reputation by his knowledge in the liberal " Arts. He was born at Chartres, and had hardly finiſhed his firſt ſtudies there at the " age of fourteen years, but he was ſent to Paris to improve himſelf in the Sciences,
" and in the management of affairs. But his inclination ſoon made him apply himſelf
" intirely to the Muſes. The firſt Eſſays of his pen diſcovered the beauty of his genius,
" and the gracefulneſs of his ſtyle. The Marquis de Fontenay-Mareuil being choſen
" for the ſecond time Embaſſador Extraordinary to the Court of Rome in 1647, Mon-
" ſieur Felibien was made Secretary to the Embaſſy, and perfectly anſwered the hopes " which that Miniſter had conceived of him. During his ſtay at Rome his natural in" clination for the liberal Arts made him gladly ſpend all the time he could ſpare in vi-
" ſiting thoſe who excelled in them, and eſpecially the celebrated Pouſſin, by whoſe con-
" verſations he learned to underſtand all that is moſt beautiful in ſtatues and pictures;
" and it was according to the exalted notions he then formed to himſelf of the excellency
" and perfection of painting, that he wrote ſince thoſe excellent works, which gained
" him his reputation. On his return from Italy he went to Chartres, and as he deſigned
" to ſettle himſelf, he married Margaret le Maire the daughter of the King's Advocate
" in the Preſidial *, who, as well as he, was related to the chief families in the City,
" and amongſt others to the illuſtrious Houſe of Aligre, which originally came from " Chartres. His friends introduced him afterwards to Monſieur Fouquet, who would " have given him ſtronger proofs of his friendſhip, had he not ſoon after loſt the King's " favour. But Monſieur Colbert, who loved the Arts and Sciences, did not ſuffer him
" to be uſeleſs. After he had deſired him to make ſome draughts for his Majeſty, in " order to engage him to complete the works he had begun, he procured him a Com-
" miſſion of Hiſtoriographer to the King, of his buildings, and of the arts and manu" factures in France; this Commiſſion was delivered to him March the 10th 1666.
" The Royal Academy of Architecture having been eſtabliſhed in the year 1671, he " was made Secretary to it. The King made him afterwards Keeper of his Cabinet of " Antiques, and gave him an apartment in the palace of Brion. He was alſo one of " the firſt Members of the Academy of Inſcriptions and Medals. Monſieur Pellitier
" ſucceeding Monſieur Colbert in the management of the Finances, made Monſieur Fe-
" libien Deputy-Comptroller General of the Bridges and Dykes of the Kingdom.
" Though he was extremely buſy, yet he did not refuſe to take care of the poor for " ſeveral years that he was Adminiſtrator of the Hoſpital of the Quinze-vingts † at " Paris.... He died at the age of threeſcore and ſixteen June the 11th 1695. He left " five children (a) [A]." You will find below a Catalogue of the moſt conſiderable of his works, with a ſhort elogium upon them, and of his moral character [B]. See the Journal des Savans for November the 28th 1695.

* A ſpecial Court of Judicature.

† An Hoſpital for 15 times 20, that is 300 poor blind perſons.

(a) Taken from manuſcript Memoirs ſent from Paris.

☞FELL

[A] He left five children.] " Three ſons and two " daughters; the eldeſt ſon, formerly Dean of the " Cathedral of Bourges, is now Vicar general of that " Archbiſhoprick. The ſecond ſucceeded his father
" in the office of Hiſtoriographer to the King, and " Keeper of his Majeſty's Antiques. He has publiſhed
" a Collection of the Lives and Writings of the moſt " celebrated Architects. The third is a Monk, his " name is, Dom Michael Felibien, of the Congrega" tion of St. Maur (1)."

(1) Taken from the ſame Memoirs ſent from Paris.

[B] You will find below a Catalogue of the moſt conſiderable of his Works, with a ſhort elogium on them, and on his moral character.] " The chief Works we have of " him, are his *Entretiens ſur les Vies & ſur les Ouvrages
" des plus excellens Peintres anciens & Modernes.* i. e.
" *Dialogues concerning the Lives and Works of the moſt
" excellent Painters both Ancient and Modern, in* 4*to.*
" two volumes of the ſecond Edition. *Les Principes
" de l'Architecture, de la Sculpture, & de la Peinture,
" avec un Dictionaire des termes propres de ces Arts.*
" i. e. The Principles of Architecture, Sculpture, and " Painting; with a Dictionary of proper words relating " to thoſe Arts. in 4*to. De l'Origine de la Peinture,
" avec pluſieurs pieces detachées.* i. e. *Of the Origin
" of Painting; with ſeveral other pieces, in* 4*to.* Several
" deſcriptions, as that of Verſailles, and of ſeveral en-
" tertainments given by the King, and of ſeveral pic" tures collected in one volume in 12*mo.* The Con" ferences of the Royal Academy of painting, in one
" volume in 4*to.* The deſcription of the Abbey de la
" Trappe, in 12*mo.* He has alſo left ſome Tranſla-
" tions, as that of the account of what paſſed in Spain
" when the Count-Duke of Olivares fell under the " King's diſpleaſure, tranſlated out of Italian. The " Caſtle of the Soul, written by St. Thereſa, tranſlated
" out of Spaniſh. The Life of Pope Pius V, tranſlated
" out of Italian. In all that he has written appears a
" ſound judgment, an exquiſite taſte, a great clearneſs
" and politeneſs. His ſtyle is exact, natural, noble,
" and elegant. The variety of things with which he " has interſperſed his Works, and eſpecially his " Dialogues, and the beautiful ſtrokes with which he " has adorned them, with that decency which became " his ſubject, make the reading of them very agreea" ble. But how excellent ſoever his talents were that " way, it was not by them alone that he gained his " reputation. He owed a great part of it to his pro-
" bity; and the honour which five Miniſters of State,
" all very well ſkilled in the art of knowing men,
" did him by employing him ſucceſſively, is an au" thentic proof that they approved his conduct. The " King himſelf has more than once commended his " learning and his virtue. If he had been ambitious,
" or leſs moderate, he might eaſily have obtained
" greater preferments, ſince he was ſo well liked at " Court, and favoured by the great Men; but he " could never take upon him to manage other people's " money; and this was his greateſt comfort when he " died. Eight or nine thouſand Livres, which the " King was pleaſed to grant him yearly, together with " his own patrimony, ſeemed to him a ſufficient re-
" ward for a man of Letters, who ought rather to be " a friend to virtue, than a ſlave to riches. He al" ways was a man of honour and piety. Though he " was naturally grave and ſerious, and of a haſty and
" even ſevere temper, yet his converſation was always " agreeable, and even merry, when there was an oc-
" caſion for it. His ſoul was upright, and concerned
" for the cauſe of truth: he uſed to encourage himſelf
" to it, by this motto, which he cauſed to be engraved
" on his ſeal, benefacere, & vera dicere, i. e. *To do
" good, and ſpeak the truth.* Theſe words are alſo
" put

☞FELL (JOHN), a very learned Engliſh Divine and Biſhop, was ſon of Dr. Samuel Fell Dean of Chriſt-Church in Oxford [A], by Margaret daughter of Thomas Wyld of the Commandery in the Suburbs of Worceſter Eſq; and was born at Sunningwell near Abington in Berks, or at Longworth, (as Mr. Wood was informed by a kinſman of his (a),) in the year 1625. He was educated in Grammar learning in the free-ſchool at Thame in Oxfordſhire, and entered a Student of Chriſt Church in Oxford in 1636, at eleven years of age (b), where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts June the 2d 1643 (c); about which time he was in arms for his Majeſty within the garriſon at Oxford, and afterwards was an Enſign. In 1648 he was ejected out of his place in the College by the Parliamentary Viſitors, being then in holy Orders; and from that time to the Reſtoration he lived at Oxford in a retired and ſtudious condition, partly at the lodgings of Dr. Thomas Willis the Phyſician, who married his ſiſter, in Canterbury Quadrangle belonging to Chriſt Church, and partly in his own houſe oppoſite to Merton-College Church (d); in both which places he, with Mr. John Dolben, afterwards Archbiſhop of York, and ſometimes Mr. Richard Alleſtry, kept up the devotions and orders of the Church of England, and adminiſtred the Sacraments to the Royaliſts then in Oxford (e). Upon the Reſtoration he was inſtalled Canon of Chriſt Church on the 27th of July 1660 (f), and Dean of that Church on the 30th of November following (g), having been created Doctor of Divinity on the 3d of October (h), and being at that time Chaplain in ordinary to his Majeſty (i). In his place of Dean he did great ſervices to the College, and in 1666, 1667, 1668, and part of 1669 he was Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity, in which office he reformed ſeveral abuſes (k). February the 6th 1675 he was conſecrated Biſhop of Oxford, and had leave to hold his Deanery in Commendam, in order that he might continue his ſervices to the College and Univerſity (l). He wrote and publiſhed ſeveral works [B]. He died July the 10th 1686, and was interred on the

(a) See Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 795. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 33.

(d) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid. col. 549, 792 and 795.

(f) Idem, col. 795.

(g) Idem, Hiſt. & Antiquit. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 256.

(h) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 137.

(i) Idem, Ath. Oxon. col. 795.

(k) Idem, col. 795, 796.

(l) Idem, col. 797.

(m) Id. 799.

(6) I. 798.

(a) the Fra 1ſt 24, Par 166

(a) ma

(2) Taken from the ſame Memoirs.

(3) For Nov. 28, 1695, pag. 695, &c. of the Dutch edition.

" put in the Exergue of his medal. He lived in a " conſtant practice of theſe two duties, which form " the character of an honeſt man, and a perfect " Chriſtian (2)." You will find a more particular ac- " count of all this, in the Journal des Savans (3).

[A] Dr. Samuel Fell, Dean of Chriſt Church in Oxford.] He was born within the Pariſh of St. Clements Dane near Temple-Bar, London, in the year 1584; elected Student of Chriſt Church in Oxford in 1601, aged 17 years; and took the Degree of Maſter of Arts in 1608. He was choſen Proctor of the Univerſity in 1614, and admitted Bachelor of Divinity the year following, and about that time became Miniſter of Freſhwater in the Iſle of Wight. In May 1619 he was inſtalled Canon of Chriſt Church, and the ſame year took the Degree of Doctor of Divinity, being about that time domeſtic Chaplain to King James I. In 1626 he was made Margaret Profeſſor of Divinity, and ſo conſequently Prebendary of Worceſter, (which Prebend was about that time annexed to the Profeſſorſhip) he being then a Calviniſt. At length leaving his Opinion, he became, ſays Mr. Wood, after great ſeekings and cringings, a creature of Dr. Laud Archbiſhop of Canterbury, by whoſe means he was made Dean of Lichfield, upon the promotion of Dr. John Warner to the See of Rocheſter, in 1637; and Dean of Chriſt Church the year following, in the room of Dr. Duppa advanced to the Biſhoprick of Chicheſter (1). In July 1645 he was appointed Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity (2). In 1647 he was ejected from his Deanery and Vice-Chancellorſhip; and retiring to his Rectory of Sunningwell near Abingdon in Berks, ſpent the ſhort remainder of his life in obſcurity. He died in the Parſonage-Houſe on the 1ſt of February 164§, and was interred in the Chancel of the Church there. He wrote and publiſhed Primitiæ; ſivè Oratio habita Oxoniæ in Scholâ Theologicâ 9 Nov. ann. 1626. Oxford 1627 in 4to. Concio Latina ad Baccalaureos, die Cinerum, in Coloſs. 2. 8. Oxford 1627 in 4to.

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 118. and Hiſt. & Antiq. Univerſ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 256.

(2) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 45.

[B] He wrote and publiſhed ſeveral Works.] In Laudem Muſices Carmen Sapphicum. The Life of the moſt learned, reverend, and pious Dr. H. Hammond. London 1661 in 12mo. There was a ſecond Edition the year following. Mr. Robert Croſſe, Vicar of Great Chew in Somerſetſhire, wrote a Book called Biographia, laying down rules how Lives are to be written, and deſigned to correct Dr. Fell for his way of writing Dr. Hammond's Life, becauſe Dr. Fell had refuſed to licenſe his Piece againſt Mr. Joſeph Glanvill's Plus Ultra (3). The Vanity of Scoffing; in a Letter to a Gentleman. London 1674 in 4to. His name is not prefixed to it. Reſponſio ad Epiſtolam Thomæ Hobbes Malmſburienſis. Printed at the end of Mr. Wood's Hiſtoria & Antiquitates Univerſitatis Oxonienſis. Mr. Hobbes had written Epiſtola ad Dom. Ant. a Wood Authorem Hiſtoriæ & Antiq. Univerſ. Oxon. dated the 20th of April 1674, and printed in half a ſheet on one ſide. " It was upon Mr. " Wood's Complaint made to Mr. Hobbes of ſeveral " Deletions and Additions made in and to his Life and " Character (which he had written of him in that " Book) by the Publiſher (Dr. John Fell) of the ſaid " Hiſt. & Antiq. to the great diſhonour and diſparage- " ment of the ſaid Mr. Hobbes. Whereupon when " that Hiſtory was finiſhed, came out a ſcurrilous An- " ſwer to the ſaid Epiſtle, written by Dr. Fell, which " is at the end of that Hiſtory (4)." Several Sermons, as 1. The Character of the laſt Days, preached before the King, on 2 Peter 3. 3. Oxford 1675 in 4to. 2. Sermon preached before the Houſe of Peers, the 22d of December 1680 being the day of ſolemn Humiliation, on Matthew 12. 25. Oxford 1680 in 4to. Account of Dr. Richard Alleſtrie's Life, in the Preface which he prefixed to that Divine's Forty Sermons, publiſhed by our Author. Dr. Fell was likewiſe ſuppoſed to be the Author of the (5) Intereſt of England ſtated; or a faithful and juſt Account of the Aims of all Parties now pretending, diſtinctly treating of the Deſignments of the Roman Catholic, Royaliſt, Preſbyterian, Anabaptiſt, &c. Printed at London 1659 in two ſheets in 4to. It was anſwered by Marchamont Needham in a Pamphlet intitled, Intereſt will not lie: in a View of England's true Intereſt in reference to the Papiſt, Royaliſt, Preſbyterian, &c. in refutation of a treaſonable Pamphlet intitled, The Intereſt of England ſtated. London 1659 in ſix ſheets in 4to. Our Author alſo reviſed and illuſtrated with marginal Notes the Works of St. Cyprian, which he publiſhed under this title; Sancti Cæcilii Cypriani Opera recognita & illuſtrata per Joannem Epiſcopum Oxonienſem. Printed in 1682 in fol. in the Printing-Houſe joining on the Eaſt-ſide of the Theatre erected at the charge of the Univerſity of Oxford on the motion of Dr. Fell in 1674. To this Edition are added the Annales Cyprianici of Dr. John Pearſon, Biſhop of Cheſter. Our Author tranſlated into Engliſh St. Cyprian's Treatiſe Of the Unity of the Church, Oxford 1681 in 4to. He publiſhed the firſt Epiſtle of St. Clement, from Mr. Patrick Young's Edition and Latin Tranſlation, with ſome ſhort running notes added thereto, Oxford 1669 in 12mo. and Alcinoi in Platonicam Philoſophiam Introductio, Oxford 1667 in 8vo; and Dr. Thomas Willis's Pharmaceutice rationalis, Oxon 1674 and 1675 in 12mo and 4to, with a Poſtſcript added to the Author's Preface giving ſome account of him. He publiſhed or reprinted every year while he was Dean of Chriſt Church, ſome Author, commonly a Claſſic, againſt new-years tide to diſtribute among

(3) A Prefatory Anſwer to Mr. Henry Stubbe, the Doctor of Warwick, &c. By Joſeph Glanvill, pag. 211. edit. London 1671 in 12mo.

(4) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 645.

(5) Idem, col. 798.

(m) Idem, col. 799.

the 13th of the ſame month in the Cathedral of Chriſt Church (m). Mr. Wood tells us (n), that he was the moſt zealous man of his time for the Church of England; a great encourager and promoter of learning in the Univerſity, and of all public works belonging to it; of great reſolution and exemplary charity; of ſtrict integrity; a learned Divine; and excellently ſkilled in the Latin and Greek Languages, and Philology.

(n) Col. 797, 799.

mong the Students of the Houſe, to which Books he either put an Epiſtle, or running Notes, or Corrections (6). The firſt Piece which he publiſhed of the Author of The whole Duty of Man, was The Ladies Calling, to which he prefixed an Epiſtle to the Reader, giving an account after what a private manner the copy of it, accompanied with a Letter, was conveyed to his hands. This Epiſtle is omitted in the folio Edition of that Author's Works, as alſo Dr. Hammond's Epiſtle before The whole Duty of Man, and that of Dr. Humphrey Henchman before The Gentleman's Calling; which two Books had been publiſhed by thoſe Divines. Dr. Fell likewiſe publiſhed in the year 1675 two other Pieces written by the ſame Author, viz. The Government of the Tongue, and The Art of Contentment; and in 1678 The lively Oracles given to us, &c. In 1684 all the Works of the ſaid Author were printed together at Oxford and London in folio. The whole Duty of Man, The Decay of Chriſtian Piety, and The Gentleman's Calling, (which though publiſhed by Dr. Henchman ſome years before The Decay of Chriſtian Piety, is in this Edition placed after it) make the firſt Part, which is printed at London; and the four Pieces abovenamed make the ſecond Part, printed at Oxford. Before the whole volume is a general Preface by Dr. Fell, wherein among other things, he points at no leſs than five ſpurious Pieces, which have expreſly, or by a deſigned implicationuſurped the name and authority of this unknown, though celebrated Author. In this Edition Dr. Fell hath inſerted in the margin of the four laſt Pieces, which make the ſecond Part of the Volume, (and perhaps of The Gentleman's Calling, and The Decay of Chriſtian Piety) the heads and contents of each ſection, with marginal abbreviations, which were till then wanting in all the Parts, except The whole Duty of Man. He cauſed alſo at his own proper charge The Hiſtory and Antiquities of the Univerſity of Oxford, compiled in Engliſh by Mr. Anthony Wood, to be tranſlated into Latin, "and kept two men (7) in pay for doing it, "beſides what he did himſelf, which was conſiderable, "and the Author, which was leſs. And being ſo "done, he cauſed it, at his own charge alſo to be "printed with a good character and on good paper. But "he taking to himſelf the liberty of putting in and "out ſeveral things according to his own judgment, "and thoſe that he employed not being careful enough "to carry the whole deſign in their head, as the Author would have done; it is deſired, that the Author "may not be accountable for any thing, which was "inſerted by him, or be cenſured for any uſeleſs repetitions or omiſſions of his Agents under him (8)."

(6) Idem, col. 798.

(7) Mr. Chriſtopher Waſe, and Mr. Richard Peers.

(8) Wood, col. H. 799. See likewiſe col. 853.

FENELON. See SALIGNAC (FRANCIS de).

FENOILLET (PETER) Biſhop of Montpellier in the 17th Century, was of Anneci in Savoy. He ſtudied with great care and diligence; and having been admitted a Doctor of Divinity, he applied himſelf to preaching, and gained a great reputation that way. He won the eſteem of Francis de Sales, Biſhop of Geneva, who gave him a living in his Dioceſs; he obtained afterwards a Canonſhip in the Cathedral of Anneci. Having been invited to Paris to preach the Lent-Sermons there, he was ſo generally approved that Henry the IVth honoured him with the title of his Preacher, and promoted him three years after to the Biſhopric of Montpellier (a).

(a) Taken from the 4th Letter of Francis de Sales's 1ſt book, pag. 24, 25 of the Paris edition 1662, in 8vo.

FERNEL (JOHN) Phyſician to Henry II King of France, was born in Picardy [A]. He was not very young when he was ſent to Paris to ſtudy Rhetoric and Philoſophy, but he made ſuch a quick progreſs, that having been admitted Maſter of Arts after two years time, the Principals of the Colleges ſtrove who ſhould have him to teach Logic, and offered him a conſiderable ſtipend; but he would not accept their offers, and choſe rather to render himſelf worthy of a public Profeſſor's chair by private Studies and Lectures. He applied himſelf ſo cloſely to his ſtudies, that he deprived himſelf even of the moſt innocent pleaſures which might have diverted him from his Cicero, his Plato, and his Ariſtotle (a). The reading of Cicero procured him this advantage, that the Lectures he read on philoſophical ſubjects were as eloquent as thoſe of the other maſters were barbarous at that time. He alſo ſtudied Mathematics with great application. This continual ſtudy drew upon him a long fit of ſickneſs, which obliged him to leave Paris. On his recovery he returned thither with a deſign to ſtudy Phyſic; but before he applied himſelf entirely to it, he taught Philoſophy in the College of St. Barbara, after which he ſpent four years in the ſtudy of Phyſic; and having been promoted to a Doctor's Degree, he confined himſelf intirely to his cloſet in order to read the beſt Authors, and to improve himſelf in the knowledge of the Mathematics. He had a great correſpondence with an excellent Rhetorician (b), who taught him the Belles Lettres, and whom he inſtructed in the Mathematics. The inſtrument he invented and cauſed to be made relating to that Science ingaged him in a great expence. The wife he had lately married did not like thoſe expences, by which even a part of her portion was laviſhed away. She murmured, ſhe cried, ſhe complained of it to her father (c), and made him really angry with Fernel; who ſubmitted at laſt, and ſent all his inſtrument-makers away, and applied himſelf to practiſe Phyſic. But as the viſiting of his patients could not employ all his time, ſince he ſpent but little of it in his meals or in ſleeping [B], he reſumed the

(a) See the Remark [B].

(b) James Strebæus.

(c) He was a Counſellor at Paris, but we are not told to what Court he before belonged.

(1) Claromontio oppidulo (quod viginti duntaxat milliaribus à Lutetia diſtat) natus atque ingenue educatus, Ambianum in operibus ideirco ſe prædicat, quod patrem inde habuerit. G. Plantius, in Vita Fernelii, initio.

[A] He was born in Picardy.] I keep to this general expreſſion, that I may be ſure not to commit a blunder; for I find on the one hand that he ſtyles himſelf Ambianus, a Native of Amiens, and on the other hand, that it is aſſerted in his Life that he was born at Clermont at twenty miles diſtance from Paris, and that he takes the ſurname of Ambianus only becauſe his father was of Amiens (1). By Clermont is underſtood in this place Clermont in Beauvaiſis. Dom Peter de Saint Romuald gives another reaſon why Fernel was named Ambianus. He was born, ſays he (2), at Clermont in Beauvoiſis, in a houſe ſituated in the ſuburb, where at this time the ſign of the Swan ſtill hangs out. Some have called him Ambianus, of Amiens, becauſe the ſuburb in which he was born, is called the ſuburb of Amiens. Mezerai aſſerts (3), that Fernel was born at Montidier in the Dioceſe of Amiens.

(2) Abregé du Threſ. Chronolog. tom. 3. à l'ann. 1558.

(3) Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. pag. 1129.

[B] He ſpent but little time in his meals or in ſleeping.] the ſame employment, in which he had already been ingaged, before he was a Doctor of Phyſic; I mean, that he read public Lectures upon Hippocrates and Galen. This ſoon gained him a very great reputation through all France, and in foreign countries. At the end of ſix years he was obliged to leave off his Lectures, becauſe his reputation drew ſuch a vaſt number of patients to him, that he had not time enough to aſſiſt all thoſe that deſired his kind offices. But as nothing was capable of making him give over his private ſtudies, he ſpent all the hours he could ſpare in compoſing a Work of Phyſic (d), which was ſoon after publiſhed. The Students preſſed him ſo earneſtly to read Lectures to them upon that work, that he conſented to it, notwithſtanding his wife's reſiſtance [C], and the advice of his friends. He read theſe Lectures for three years, and as in the mean time he undertook another work, which he publiſhed (e), he laid himſelf in a manner under a neceſſity of reading Lectures ſome years longer, for it was paſſionately deſired, that he would alſo explain this new book to the youth. He had not yet finiſhed his Lectures upon it, when he was ſent for to Court, in order to try whether he could cure a Lady, whoſe recovery was deſpaired of [D]. He was ſo happy as to cure her, which was (d) That which is intitled, Phyſiologia.

(e) The book De Venæ ſectione.

All other pleaſure but that of ſtudying was inſipid to him; he cared neither for play, nor for walking, nor for entertainments, nor for converſation. I ſpeak this of the time when he was a Student. Ludos, jocos, compotationes, & commeſſationes, ſermones etiam omnium pene condiſcipulorum, ac familiarium fugere ſtatuit, non cibi, non ſomni, non corporis, non valetudinis, non rei familiaris rationem habere, omnia perpeti, dum liberalium artium cognitionem aſſequeretur, omne in eis ſtudium, diligentiam, curam, induſtriam adhibere: nullum præterquam in diſcendo voluptatem capere: arbitratus omnem horam perire, quæ in bonorum authorum lectione & ſtudiis non collocaretur: tanta in illius animo inſita erat diſcendi cupiditas, tantus cognitionis amor & ſcientiæ (4). i. e. "He reſolved to forſake all plays and "diverſions, and even all converſations with his fel-"low-ſtudents and with his friends; to mind neither "his meals, nor his ſleep; to take no care of his body, "nor of his health, nor even of his eſtate; but to "ſuffer any thing, if he could but improve in the "knowledge of the Belles-Lettres. In this he em-"ployed all his ſtudy, his diligence, his care and his "labour. He took no delight nor pleaſure but in "learning; and reckoned that hour loſt, which was "not ſpent in the reading and ſtudying of ſome good "Author. So great was his natural inclination to ſtudy, "ſo great his love for knowledge and learning." The following part of his life anſwered this beginning; there never was a man more diligent than he was; he uſed to riſe at four of the clock in the morning, and ſtudied till it was time either to read his Lectures, or to viſit his patients: he then examined the urine, that was brought him, and preſcribed medicines according to the conjectures he could make (5). Coming home to dine he ſhut himſelf up amongſt his books, till they called him down to table; riſing from table, he returned into his ſtudy, and did not leave it but for ſuch buſineſs as called him out of doors. Coming home at night he did juſt as at noon; he ſtaid amongſt his Books till they called him to ſupper, and returned to them the moment he had ſupped, and did not leave them till eleven of the clock, when he went to bed. If he invited a friend to dine or ſup with with him, he left him without ceremony as ſoon as dinner or ſupper was over, and went to his Books again. Omnia animi & corporis oblectamenta præ literarum ſtudiis, & medicæ artis exercitatione, pro nihilo ducens; ut nulla vitæ pars neque publicis, neque privatis, neque medicis, neque domeſticis in rebus, vacaſſe officio videretur. Si quem forte ad cœnam vel prandium aliquando invitaret, ab eo neque turpe neque inhoneſtum ducebat, aliquantò poſt ſumptum cibum ſtudiorum cauſa ſe ſurripere (6).

(4) Plantius, in Vita Fernelii.

(5) This was the method of thoſe times with regard to poor people. They did not ſend for the Phyſician, they only ſent him ſome of the patient's urine, upon which he preſcribed what medicines he judged proper. See Plantius, in Vita Fernelii.

(6) Plantius, in Vita Fernelii.

(7) Prædium Pentinianum.

(8) Erat hoc robore animi, atque hac indole virtutis, & continentiæ, ut reſpueret omnes voluptates, omnemque vitæ ſuæ curſum in labore corporis atque in animi contentione conficeret; quem non quies, non remiſſio, non æqualium ſtudia, non ludi, non convivia delectarent, nihil in vita expetendum putaret, niſi quod eſſet cum laude, & honore, & cum dignitate conjunctum. Plantius, in Vita Fernelij.

Some years before his death he bought, at his wife's requeſt, a country-houſe (7), but he uſed to go and recreate himſelf there but once or twice a year. He took more delight in a buſy life and in the functions of his profeſſion, than in an eaſy and quiet life (8). He never ſent thoſe patients back, that came to beg for his advice, tho' they were ever ſo poor, and there came ſuch a vaſt number of them to him during the ſummer, that he had not time to ſit down at table, and uſed to dine ſtanding. Tantus ægrorum numerus ad eum confugiebat, ut per totam fere æſtatem ſtans prandere cogeretur: neminem quantumlibet pauperem à ſe abire dimittebat, morbi quo angeretur ignarum, remediiſque ad eum profligandum deſtitutum (9). When his friend entreated him to take ſome relaxation, he anſwered that death would afford him time long enough to reſt. Quod ſi illum nonnunquam de curanda corporis ſui valetudine, deque nocturnis ſtudiis intermittendis, commonefacerem, & ad quieſcendum cohortarer, (erat enim ſomni parciſſimus) reſponſum in promptu habere ſolebat, Longa quieſcendi tempora fata dabunt. i. e. "When I adviſed him to "take care of his health, and not to ſtudy ſo much "over night, when I entreated him to take ſome reſt "(for he uſed to ſleep very little) his anſwer was ready; "Death, ſaid he, will afford me a long time to reſt."

(9) Idem, ibid.

The wives of ſuch Phyſicians are very much to be pitied, when they love their huſbands, and are not covetous: but if they care but little for them, and are covetous, they find ſufficiently how to make amends for the huſband's abſence.

[C] Notwithſtanding his wife's reſiſtance.] It is not a difficult matter to gueſs at the reaſon why his wife would not conſent to this kind of Lectures: They prevented him from viſiting his patients, and thus leſſened conſiderably the profits of his daily practice. The Author of his Life has not omitted mentioning this detriment. Quod onus . . . uxore, amicis omnibus, & ægrorum curis reclamantibus, vel magno rei domeſticæ diſpendio ſuſcepit (10).

(10) Idem, ibid.

[D] He was ſent for to Court in order to try whether he could cure a Lady, whoſe recovery was deſpaired of.] Thoſe who ſhould think that the Hiſtorian hints at Catherine de Medicis's barrenneſs, would be groſly miſtaken, as I think it will be granted by all thoſe who duly weigh his words (11): Nec abſolverat ejus commentationis explicationem, cum in graviſſimo mulieris nobiliſſimæ (12) caſu ad aulicos quaſi edicto regio rapitur. Pervagabatur enim incredibilis ad hujus imperii Proceres de Fernelii eruditione fama & perſuaſio, quaſi unus eſſet e Galliæ medicis calamitoſi illius morbi perſtrenuus oppugnator, & impendentis mortis fortiſſimus vindex, malorumque depulſor, quaſi Hercules Alexicacus: quam ille opinionem de ſe ſtrenue ſuſtinuit, ut non tam ſit creditus mulierem in vita retinuiſſe, quam jam profligatæ ſalute ex inferorum faucibus revocaſſe. i. e. "He had not "yet finiſhed his Lectures upon that Commentary, "when he was called to Court as though it were by "the King's command, to give his opinion in a very "dangerous caſe of a noble Lady. For the great men "of the Kingdom had a very great opinion of Fernel's "learning, as tho' he alone of all the Phyſicians in "France could cure that dangerous illneſs, and like "an helpful Hercules, diſpel the evils, and avert an "imminent death. He anſwered the opinion which "had been conceived of him ſo well, that he ſeemed "to have reſtored that Lady to life, rather than to "have kept her from dying." In the firſt place we may doubt whether Catharine de Medicis is any ways meant here. Secondly it is certain that the Author ſpeaks of quite another thing than barrenneſs. If the Author had meant this Princeſs, who at that time was the Dauphin's Conſort, is it ſtrange that he ſhould give her only the general title of a Noble Lady? Is it not ſtrange that he ſhould ſay ſhe was very dear to the Dauphin (13)? If ſhe was not his Conſort, the expreſſion is good and proper; ſhe might be the Dauphin's miſtreſs, or a Lady for whom he had a great friendſhip: but if ſhe was his ſpouſe, the Hiſtorian expreſſes himſelf impertinently. It is always taken for grant-

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) Henrico Galliarum Regi deſignato cui illa chariſſima erat.

was the firſt cauſe of the eſteem, which Henry II, who was then but Dauphin, and was in love with that Lady conceived for him. This Prince offered him even then the place of firſt Phyſician to him; but Farnel, who preferred his ſtudies before the troubles of the Court, would not accept of that employment, and had even recourſe to ſome artifice in order to obtain the liberty of returning to Paris [E]. He obtained it without any diminution of the penſion that was promiſed him (f). When he had finiſhed his Lectures upon his book, he was deſired to explain ſome other ſubject, but he could not do it, becauſe of the great number of patients that called him daily (g). Yet he did not diſcontinue being uſeful to the public otherwiſe than by his practice. He employed his lucubrations on the work intitled, De abditis rerum cauſis; i. e. "Of the hidden cauſes "of things;" which was followed by ſeven books of Pathology, after which he wrote on Remedies [F]. But before he had finiſhed this laſt work, he was obliged to ſubmit to the orders of King Henry IId, who would abſolutely have him with him for his Phyſician. The contrary of what Fernel dreaded came to paſs, for he enjoyed more reſt and more leiſure at Court, than he had done at Paris; and he might have conſidered the Court as an agreeable retirement, had it not been for the journies, which the new civil war obliged the King to take. Being returned from the expedition of Calais, he made his wife come to Fontainebleau. This good woman, who grieved that ſhe was obliged to leave her relations, fell ſick, and died delirious ſoon after. He was ſo afflicted at it, that he fell ſick twelve days after his wife's burial, and died the 18th day of his illneſs (h)[G]. I ſhall

(f) It was of ſix hundred livres.

(g) Hoc perfunctus munere, alta quædam Hippocratis & Galeni interpretari ſcripta cogitabat, idque ab eo quotidianis precibus & acclamationibus contendebant philiatri omnes, ſed præ ægrorum qui undique ad eum opis cauſa quotidie confugiebant turba, id muneris aggredi non potuit. G. Plantius, in Vita Fernelii.

(h) Taken from his Life written by William Plantius, his diſciple, a native of Mans. It is prefixed to Fernel's Works in all the editions.

ed, in ſuch accounts, that a man loves his wife, that he is extremely concerned for her recovery, and is very thankful to the Phyſicians who cure her. It is therefore ſufficient to obſerve that the patient is his wife, and if one will make uſe of the Epithets chariſſima, tenerrima, deareſt, moſt tender, it muſt be after having employed the word Uxor or Conjux, Wife or Spouſe. Whence I infer, that ſince this Author wrote with good ſenſe and elegantly, he would not have expreſſed himſelf as he has done, had he deſigned to ſpeak of a ſickneſs of the Dauphin's ſpouſe. Add to this the following obſervation. It would have added a new luſtre to John Fernel's glory, had the Lady, whom he cured, been the Dauphin's Conſort. Why then did his Hiſtorian, who extols his reputation, and loads him with praiſes, omit the chief title of this Lady? Thus much with regard to the firſt point. The ſecond is plainer ſtill. Catharine de Medicis was in very good health as long as ſhe was barren. She could weary an horſe, and followed the King when he went a hunting (14); nor did either her health or her life ſeem to be in any danger from her continuing to bear no children. She was not therefore cured of a mortal diſeaſe, when they gave her remedies to cure her barrenneſs. Whence it follows that it is not ſhe who is meant in this place, ſince the Author mentions morbus calamitoſus, mors impendens, profligata ſalus, ex inferorum faucibus revocatio, i. e. "a dangerous illneſs, "an imminent death, a health abſolutely impaired, "and a calling back from the grave."

(14) Brantome, in his Diſcourſe concerning this Queen.

It is not without deſign that I dwell upon all theſe obſervations; it is in order to infer from them a ſtrong proof againſt thoſe who aſſert, that Fernel cured the Dauphin's Conſort of her barrenneſs. This fact appears very doubtful to me, ſince his beloved diſciple does not ſay a word of it, though he mentions another cure much leſs important, than this would have been. It is not at all probable that ſuch a glorious circumſtance of Fernel's Life ſhould have eſcaped his Hiſtorian's notice, or that knowing it, he would have omitted it in the account of that Phyſician's Life. Who would have known this ſtory if Plantius had been ignorant of it? Plantius, I ſay, who had been ſo long educated at the feet of this Gamaliel, and was admitted into his greateſt intimacy? And whom did it become better than this diſciple, to publiſh a circumſtance which was ſo much to the glory of his good maſter? You will ſay perhaps, he had forgot it, when he ſet about writing John Fernel's Life. But would he not have remembred it, when he gave an account of his maſter's journey to the Court? Could he mention that Lady given over by her Phyſicians, that Lady ſo dear to the Dauphin Henry, without calling to mind, that the Dauphin's Conſort had been rendered fruitful by Fernel's preſcription? Credat Judæus Apella. I cannot believe it.

[E] He had . . . . recourſe to ſome artifice in order to obtain the liberty of returning to Paris.] He repreſented firſt, that he was not yet learned enough to deſerve to be intruſted with the health of the Princes, but that if he were permitted to return to Paris, he would zealouſly employ all the means he ſhould meet with there, to become more learned, and more capable of ſerving the Dauphin. But when he ſaw that theſe arguments were of no effect, he pretended to be ſick, and ſent to the Prince a Chirurgeon, who was uſed to ſpeak familiarly to him, and who told him, that Fernel had a pleuriſy, which grief would certainly render mortal, and that his grief was occaſioned by his being abſent from his books, and from his family, and obliged to diſcontinue his Lectures, and to lead a tumultuous life. Simulata pleuritide, & conficta ementitaque a Chirurgo, qui Principi familiaris erat, periculi magnitudine, per eum nunciari jubet, tanti mali cauſam ab animi ægritudine & mœrore proficiſci, quod a ſtudiis eſſet abductus &c (15). The Prince giving credit to this falſe ſtory permitted Fernel to retire. Muſt not a man be exceſſively in love with his ſtudies, and with a philoſophical life, when he employs ſuch tricks, not to be a Phyſician to the Court, that is to ſay, not to have what others endeavour to obtain by all poſſible means? When Henry the ſecond came to the Throne, he renewed his entreaties; but Fernel repreſented that the honour, which was offered to him, was due for ſeveral reaſons, and as an hereditary right, to the late King's Phyſician; and that as for him, he wanted ſome time to make experiments concerning ſeveral diſcoveries he had made relating to Phyſick. The King granted him a delay: but as ſoon as Francis the firſt's Phyſician died, Fernel was obliged to go and fill his place at Henry the ſecond's Court.

(15) Plantius in Vita Fernelii.

[F] He wrote on Remedies.] He had finiſhed his Work on compound Remedies, and was compoſing that on ſimple Remedies, in which he had diſcovered ſeveral properties unknown to the ancients. He did not mention any thing of this to any perſon, being willing that the publick ſhould know to whom the glory of the diſcovery was owing: he was therefore reſolved not to declare it till he publiſhed his Book. The neceſſity under which he was to follow the Court, did not ſuffer him to put the finiſhing hand to this work; his greateſt ſorrow, when he died, was that he could not finiſh it. Hic dolor hominem præcipuè angebat, hæc cura ſollicitabat, quod Therapeuticæ poſtremæ medicinæ parti, in qua multum diuque verſatus erat, quamque ſuis inventis multum locupletare poterat, extremam manum non addidiſſet (16). This is the reaſon why his works contain an excellent Pathology, and but little of Therapeuticks. See the Journal des Savans for April 1666.

(16) Idem, ibid.

[G] He was ſo afflicted at his wife's death, that he fell ſick . . . and died the 18th day of his illneſs.] Conſidering Plantius's account, we may ſay, that ſeveral cauſes concurred to Fernel's death, His ſpleen was in a bad condition; and his affliction coming upon him made it ſtill worſe; whence aroſe a continual fever. He

I ſhall make a remark concerning his age [H]. He got a large eſtate [I], and married

He would not have died ſo ſoon with his ill diſpoſed ſpleen, had it not been for his grief; nor with grief alone, had not his ſpleen been ill diſpoſed. It is even certain that his grief was not occaſioned only by his wife's death: ſeveral other circumſtances vexed him very much before (17). But though we ſhould not mind theſe circumſtances, yet it would plainly appear that Monſieur l'Abbé Deſiandes is ſtrangely miſtaken. John Fernel, ſays he (18), having been ſent for to Court by a Princeſs, who was diſconſolate on account of her barrenneſs, and being acquainted with the death of his wife, fell down at the feet of that Princeſs, whence they carried him to be buried in the Church of St. James in the market-place. This Princeſs is certainly Catherine de Medicis, who ceaſed to be barren in the year 1543. Now Fernel and his wife did not die till the year 1558, and further, it is not true that this Phyſician died ſuddenly. He did not fall ſick till ten or twelve days after he had buried his wife, and died only the eighteenth day of his ſickneſs.

(17) Quum cauſæ quædam externæ hæque graves admodum acerbiſſimum mœrorem attuliſſent, ſuperveniente uxoris obitu quo omnia exaſperata ſunt, humor in liene colle&tus tandem incaleſcens atque putreſcens, inflammationem ejus viſceris peperit, unde & febris accenſa eſt continua. Plantius, in Vita Fernelii. See Thevet, tom. 7. pag. 331.

(18) In a Letter inſerted in the Mercure Galant, for Nov. 1693, pag. 197. See above the remark [C] of the article CHARNACE.

[H] I ſhall make a remark concerning his age.] He died in the ſeventy ſecond year of his age, in the year 1557, ſoon after the taking of Calais, if we believe Plantius the Writer of his Life. Now that city was taken by Henry the ſecond in January 1557, according to the manner of reckoning in thoſe times, that is, if the year be not ſuppoſed to begin with January. But if it be ſuppoſed to begin as we do now, it was in 1558 that Calais was taken. Plantius obſerves, that it had been in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh an hundred years ago; he ſhould have ſaid 211 years ago. Fernel's Epitaph places his death on April the 26th: if this date be right, we muſt infer from thence, that Plantius has not ſet down the year right: for the 26th day of April after the ſurrender of Calais belongs to the year 1558, even according to the ancient way of reckoning. If Thuanus, according to whom Fernel died March the 27th (19), is in the right, Plantius may have ſet down the year right. But this is not the greateſt difficulty. It is ſuppoſed in the Epitaph that Fernel lived but fifty two years, and Plantius makes him live ſeventy two. It muſt not be imagined, that the Printers put ſeventy two inſtead of fifty two; for we find in the ſame Life of Fernel, 1. That he was about ſixty years old when he ſtaid with the King as his firſt Phyſician. 2. That he practiſed Phyſick at Paris for thirty years. 3. That he had applied himſelf to ſeveral things before he practiſed Phyſick. Let us therefore be aſſured that Plantius gave him ſeventy two years, and yet the Epitaph drawn up by Fernel's ſon-in-law ſuppoſes that he lived but fifty two years. Let us quote a paſſage from Guy Patin (20). "Since they "print Fernel in your city, I muſt deſire one thing "of you, which is, to correct a blunder, which they "of Utrecht have committed in their Edition (21), "when they ſay in his Life that he was ſeventy two "years old when he died; for I can aſſure you, that "he was but fifty two years old then, as I have heard "from the late Monſieur de Villeroi, Maſter of the "Requeſts, and the ſon of one of Fernel's daughters, "who died as late as the year 1642: I have alſo been "told ſo by other perſons of his relations, and this is "an evident tradition in his family. But beſides Tradition, which is not always certain, I have two unqueſtionable proofs of it; the one is taken from the "Regiſters of our Faculty, which have been in my "hands, whilſt I was Dean of the Faculty; it is expreſly ſet down in theſe Regiſters, that Fernel died "April the 26th 1558, anno ætatis 52, in the fifty "ſecond year of his age. The other proof is taken "from his Epitaph in the Church of St. James in the "market-place, where it is alſo ſaid, that he died in "his fifty ſecond year. The Author of the Epitaph is "called in it Philippus (22) Barjotius Fernelii Gener, "who was Maſter of the Requeſts, and Preſident in "the Grand Council, and Fernel's firſt ſon-in-law. "The ſecond was Monſieur Gilles de Riant a Preſident au Mortier, who died in the year 1597; his "widow ſurvived him forty five years." It would be a difficult matter to anſwer the vouchers quoted by Guy Patin. If he had quoted only the Epitaph, his argument would not be ſo concluſive as he pretends; for who knows but the Engraver may have omitted two xx, which would reduce 72 to 52. He might alſo be eaſily miſtaken, if he made uſe of arithmetical figures inſtead of Letters: it is an eaſy matter to put a 5 inſtead of a 7. They who know, that an Author, who corrects the proof-ſheets of his own work, does not perceive ſometimes, that the Printers have prodigiouſly altered the numerical letters of figures (23), will not wonder, that the Engraver's error was not perceived by Fernel's ſon-in-law. But as I have already obſerved, Guy Patin's proofs do not conſiſt in this Epitaph only. However I have two objections againſt them. I. I cannot imagine that a diſciple of Fernel, who lived ten years in great intimacy with him, ſhould be ſo groſly miſtaken with regard to his maſter's age. Could he commit an error of twenty years? Would he have written his Life, without enquiring into his age? II. If this diſciple be miſtaken with regard to his maſter's age, he muſt be alſo miſtaken with regard to a great many other things. He tells a falſity, when he relates that Fernel began but late to ſtudy (24). And it is not true that Fernel ſtudied two years in the College of St. Barbara, and then in private with ſo much application, that it threw him into a quartan ague, which laſted a great while, and obliged him to go into the country (25). How were it poſſible that having recovered his ſtrength, he ſhould return to Paris, and that having conſidered what profeſſion he ſhould follow, he ſhould teach two years in the College of St. Barbara, how were this poſſible, I ſay, ſince we know that in 1526 (26) he publiſhed ſome Books of Mathematicks? Now even according to the moſt favourable ſuppoſition, it cannot be pretended that he publiſhed thoſe Books, whilſt he taught in the College. Where then ſhall we find the time that is neceſſary according to Plantius's account, if it be true, that Fernel died in the fifty ſecond year of his age? Would he not have been the Author of an aſtronomical Work at the age of twenty (27)? Can this be true of a ſcholar who begins but late to ſtudy Grammar and Rhetorick? And it muſt be obſerved, that in Fernel's time, a ſcholar who entered upon his courſe of Philoſophy, before he was twenty, was look'd upon as a very forward youth. A boy, who was ſent from the country to the Grammar-School at Paris at the age of fifteen or ſixteen, did not paſs for a ſcholar who began but late to ſtudy. I do not mind here Thevet's teſtimony (28), for he only tranſcribed from Plantius both with regard to the ſeventy two years, which he ſuppoſes Fernel lived, and to all the reſt.

(19) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 21. pag. 431.

(20) Patin, Letter 117. of the 1ſt vol.

(21) Patin is in the wrong to charge the Authors of the Utrecht edition with this blunder; for they only printed Fernel's Life written by William Plantius.

(22) He ſhould have ſaid Philibert.

(23) I know it by my own experience.

(24) Jam natu grandis quum ſub triviali magiſtro Grammaticam diciſſet, etiamſi mater rebus eum curiſque domeſticis potius quam literis TAM SERO deſtinandum contenderet. Plantius, in Vita Fernelii, initio.

(25) Febre quartana TANDEM corripitur, qua crudeliter ac DIU conflictatus cœptum ſtudiorum curſum interrumpere, utque ſalubriore aëre frueretur ſolum vertere cogitur. Idem, ibid.

(26) Geſner, in Biblioth.

(27) The book, which according to Geſner was publiſhed at Paris in 1526, was intitled Monaloſphærium.

[I] He got a large eſtate.] Plantius (29) witneſſes, that during the ten years he lived with Fernel, this Phyſician's gain amounted often to above twelve thouſand livres a year, and was but very ſeldom under ten thouſand. An author whom I have quoted above affords me the following paſſage. After his death they found in his ſtudy thirty thouſand golden crowns: and indeed he died very rich; for beſides this, he left thirty ſix thouſand livres income a year to be divided between his two daughters who were his ſole heirs (30). If we may believe the Writer of his Life, he was generous to his relations, tho' he loved money. Attentus quidem ad rem familiarem, ſed in ſuos beneficus & liberalis (31). Scaliger ſays ſomething very offenſive upon this, and upon a ſubject more tickliſh ſtill. Fernel a downright pennygetter gained a reputation, becauſe he had forwarded the delivery of the Queen-mother. Habuit filiam ſalaciſſimam, cui dedit decem millia aureorum pro dote (32). i. e. "He had a very wanton daughter, with whom "he gave ten thouſand crowns in marriage." They who deſire to know ſomething of Fernel's poſterity may read the following paſſage from Guy Patin (33). "There is in the Convent of the Viſitation at Lyons "a daughter of Monſieur de Riant Counſellor of State. "Her mother is niece to Monſieur de Narbonne; her "name is Mary des Prez. This beautiful Nun, who "has not yet made her vows, amongſt other eminent "qualities ſhe poſſeſſes, is conſiderable by her birth, "being deſcended from our great Fernel, who was "really an incomparable Phyſician. He left two "daughters, the eldeſt of whom was married to Monſieur Barjot, Preſident in the Grand Council, and "Maſter of the Requeſts, from whom is deſcended "the preſent Monſieur d'Annœuil, Steward to the "King's

(28) In Fernel's Elogy, in his 7th vol. pag. 325. edition of 1671, in 12mo.

(29) Plantius, in Vita Fernelii, in fin.

(30) Saint Romua'd, Abregé du Threſor Chronol. tom. 3. under the year 1558.

(31) Plantius, in Vita Fernelii, ſub fin.

(32) Scaligerana prima, pag. 82.

(33) Letter 100. pag. 394. of the 1ſt vol. This Letter is dated Sept. 25, 1655.

ried his two daughters very advantageouſly (i). It is a pretty general opinion that he cured Catharine de Medicis of her barrenneſs [K], and that ſhe nobly rewarded him for it [L]. I ſhall collect in one ſingle remark the blunders of ſome Authors [M].

(i) See the Remark [I].

FERON

" King's Houſhold. Annœuil is an eſtate of twelve " thouſand livres a year, ſituated in our Province of " Picardy near Beauvais, two leagues diſtant from my " native place. Fernel's other daughter was married " to Monſieur Giles de Riant Preſident au Mortier, " who died in the year 1597. Her name was Mag- " dalen Fernel, and ſhe died in March 1642, aged 94 " years, & generatio rectorum benedicetur : i. e. " the " generation of the upright ſhall be bleſſed." I am " very ſorry that I did not go formerly to Villeroy in " the Earldom of Perch, where ſhe died, on purpoſe " to have the honour to ſee her, and to kiſs her hands. " They make us kiſs relicks, which are not worth " theſe. So that your beautiful Nun may boaſt that " ſhe is deſcended from the greateſt man that ever was " of our profeſſion ſince Galen, becauſe the great Fernel " was her great-great-grand-father.

[K] It is a pretty general opinion that he cured Catherine de Medicis of her barrenneſs.] It is pretended that Henry II propoſed this affair to him in ſuch words as were ſomewhat ſurprizing. Maſter Phyſician could you get my wife with child? It is aſſerted that Fernel wiſely anſwered. It belongs to God, ſir, to give you children by his bleſſing ; it is your office to get them, and mine to afford what aſſiſtance Phyſick can procure, which was eſtabliſhed by God as a remedy for human weakneſſes (34). Monſieur Varillas relates what this Phyſician prescribed. The people were perſuaded, ſays he (35), that the Queen-Mother after ten years barrenneſs, did conceive the King only becauſe the firſt Phyſician (36) Fernel adviſed Henry the ſecond to lye with her during her courſes, and that perſons begotten at ſuch a time were ſubject to this ſhameful diſeaſe (37). According to Mezeray (38) Francis II was from his birth of an unhealthful conſtitution, being the firſt child of a mother, who began very late to have her courſes. And indeed ſeveral perſons pretend that Catherine de Medicis became fruitful only becauſe a remedy was found out, which made her courſes flow, which before were ſuppreſſed (39). This method is very different from that, which Monſieur Varillas relates. We have ſeen above, that Scaliger gives us quite another notion of the ſervice done by Fernel ; he hints that this Phyſician was ſent for whilſt Catherine was in labour, and gave her remedies to forward her delivery. This would a little better agree with the cure of a great Lady mentioned by Plantius. But as we can ſee no reaſon why he ſhould not have told the public, that Fernel procured a happy delivery to the Dauphin's Conſort, who was in danger of dying in childbed ; I do ſtill aſſert, that he did not intend to ſpeak of Catherine de Medicis, and from his ſilence I infer a very ſtrong argument to doubt of what is contained in the text of this remark. According to Brantome, it was reported at Court, that it was rather the Dauphin's fault than his Conſort's, if they had no children (40) ; and hereupon he relates the jeſt of a certain Lady. He had there a very good opportunity for telling what is reported of Fernel, and yet he does not mention a word of it : is not his ſilence of great weight ? Would Thuanus have omitted in Fernel's elogy a circumſtance of ſuch importance, if he had either known or believed it ? I think therefore that it is a fact upon which we ought to pronounce non liquet, the truth of it does not appear notwithſtanding the following aſſertion of Scevola de Sainte Marthe. Ab Henrico ſecundo in Regiam accerſitus, principem inter ejus Archiatros locum tenuit. Eo felicis operæ proventu ut quod à natura negatum eſſe videbatur, artis beneficio conſecutus, inviſam ſterilitatem à domo regia repelleret (41). i. e. " Being ſent for to Court by Henry the ſecond, he " was made his firſt Phyſician : his aſſiſtance having " had ſuch good ſucceſs, that what ſeemed to have " been denied by nature, he obtained by his art, re- " moving an unhappy barrenneſs from the Royal Fa- " mily." I fancy, that all theſe difficulties would ſoon be removed, if we had the Diſſertation which Monſieur Varillas has quoted. The Phyſician Fernel, ſays he (42), having obſerved Catherine's conſtitution, took it into his head to cure her indiſpoſition ; and whether it was that the remedies he preſcribed had worked well, or that his ſecret conſiſted only in declaring to the Dauphin at what time his wife was beſt capable to conceive, the Court perceived ſome months after that the Princeſs was pregnant. You will find this paſſage word for word in the Galanteries des Rois de France (43). Monſieur Menjot, a learned Phyſician of Paris, was of opinion, that Fernel conjectured that Catherine de Medicis was barren only through too great a dryneſs of the Uterus, or becauſe that part was too cloſe In the firſt caſe, the ſeed falling on too dry a ſoil could not thrive ; in the ſecond caſe, it could not penetrate ſo far as it ought. Now as during the courſes the womb is moiſtened, and more dilated than at other times, Fernel judged that then was the proper time for the Dauphin to lie with his wife, and the happy minute to do her buſineſs. Monſieur Menjot adds, that Hippocrates might give him the hint of this advice. This Author expreſſes himſelf with ſo much ſtrength, that it would be wronging him, not to tranſcribe his own words. Referunt Catherinam Medicæam Galliarum Reginam ætate licet integra, cùm velut quinta Luna nata progeniem deſperaret, importunam ſibi ſterilitatem votiva fœcunditate commutaſſe, dulcique liberorum propagine ditatam fuiſſe, quòd contrà Moſis edictum ἐν τῇ καθόδῳ τῆ καταμηνίων, quibus ſemen aliàs eluitur, à Rege ſubagitata eſſet, ex conſilio Fernelii ſagaciter conjicientis exuperantem uteri ariditatem benigni ſanguinis aſpergine rigandam eſſe, vel etiam ſtomachum matricis naturaliter, perinde ac ex eventu in gravidis, arctiſſimum nonniſi menſium tranſitu reſerari. Idque edoctus fuerat Fernelius ab Hippocrate (*) jubente mulierem ἐμφρήσσεσθαι τῆ ἀνόδῳ inchoante menſtruo profluvio, ſed maximè eo deſinente, verùm profluente adhuc potiùs quàm arefacto (44).

[L] .... and that ſhe nobly rewarded him for it.] Let us hear Monſieur Patin (43). " Some ſpeak of " the King of England, who married the Princeſs " of Portugal : he deſigns to divorce her becauſe of " her barrenneſs, as Henry II would have done his " wife Catherine de Medicis, had not Fernel happily " cured her ; ſhe was ſo generous that ſhe gave him " ten thouſand crowns every time ſhe lay in, if we " may believe Lewis d'Orleans in his Plante hu- " maine (46)," The as of this Author is more exact than he thought ; for what he relates of the deſign of Charles II King of England is a mere fancy of the News-Writers, which has not the leaſt ground ; and we learn from Brantome that Catherine de Medicis had ſo well gained the love and affection of the King her father-in-law, and of King Henry her huſband, that having been ten years without bearing children, and a great many perſons adviſing the King and the Dauphin to ſend her away, becauſe it was neceſſary that there ſhould be heirs to the Crown of France, neither the one nor the other would conſent to it, ſo much they loved her (47). See in the margin the obſervation I have made upon a paſſage from Gabriel Naudé ; it ſhews that he ſpoke of a thing, with which he was not well acquainted.

This is what I ſaid in the firſt Edition of this Work ; I muſt now add two obſervations to correct it ; the firſt is, that there are ſome Books which mention Charles II's deſign to be divorced from his ſpouſe : the ſecond, that Catherine de Medicis was ſometimes in the moſt terrible fright ; whence it might be inferred, that her father-in-law, and her huſband ſeem to have had now and then ſome thoughts of ſending her away (48). See the remark [O] of the Article MAROT.

[M] I ſhall collect ... the blunders of ſome Authors.] Thoſe of Moreri are but few. He ſays that Fernel ſaw, that the Books he had publiſhed were the only Books on which publick Lectures were read in the Univerſities of Phyſick, and were preferred before all other Books. This is one of the moſt egregious falſities that ever was publiſhed. What Sainte Marthe aſſerts deſerves hardly any credit : judge then what opinion we ought to have of Hyperboles, with which Moreri has diſguiſed it. Sainte Marthe's words are as follow (49). Cujus (Fernelii) admirabili genio id contigit, quod à multis ſeculis nulli quamlibet erudito contigiſſe memini, ut ipſo vivo atque videnti opera quæ de univerſa Medicina ſcripſit in ſcholis publicè legerentur : ejuſque auctoritas veterum

(34) Bullart, Academie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 84. He quotes Dupleix.

(35) Varill. Hiſt. de François II. liv. 1. pag. m. 76.

(36) Fernel was not made firſt Phyſician till after the death of Francis I, and Francis the IId, Catharine's eldeſt ſon was born four years before the death of Francis I.

(37) He ſpeaks of the Leproſy.

(38) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, tom. 3. pag. 42.

(39) See the remark [M] quotation (53).

(40) Brantome, Dames illuſtr. pag. m. 42.

(41) Sammarth. in Elogiis, lib. 1. pag. m. 33.

(42) Hiſt. de François I. liv. 11. pag. m. 99. He ſays in the margin, in the Latin Diſſertation preſented to the King upon this ſubject.

(43) Tom. 1. pag. 225. of the edition of 1694, and pag. 207. of the edition of 1695.

(*) Lib. 1. De Morb. Mul.

(44) Antonius Menjotius Diſſertat. Pathologicar. Part 3. pag. m. 23.

(45) Patin, Let. 515. pag. 520. of tom. 3.

(46) Naudé, de Antiquitate Scholæ Medicæ Pariſienſis, pag. 75. quoting the ſame book of Lewis d'Orleans, ſays that Fernel received this preſent four times. Fernelius ab Henrico ſecundo qui quater illi decem aureorum millia pro quatuor filiis ejus ope & conſilio ſuſceptis obtulit. It is certain that the ten children of Catharine de Medicis were born before Fernel's death.

(47) Brantome, Dames illuſtr. pag. 41.

(48) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for Feb. 1700, pag. 196.

(49) In Elogiis, lib. 1. pag. m. 32.

FERON (JOHN LE) Advocate in the Parliament of Paris, was of Compiegne. He was above threeſcore years of age in the year 1564, and died under the reign of Charles IX. He was one of the moſt diligent and moſt curious men of France for inquiring into noble families, coats of arms, &c. (a), as appears by ſeveral volumes he wrote, ſome of which have been publiſhed [A]. Men of taſte deſpiſed them becauſe of the infinite number of fictions and ſilly ſtories with which he had ſtuffed them [B]. Monſieur le Feron ancient Provoſt of the Merchants at Paris, and Preſident of the Enquêtes * in the 17th Century was of that family (b).

(a) Taken from La Croix du Maine, pag. 211, 222.

(b) Mercure Galant, for Feb. 1703, pag. 38.

* Or Court of Inquiries, a particular Court belonging to the Parliament of Paris.

veterum ſcriptorum inſtar apud optimum quemque rei medicæ magiſtrum graviſſimi eſſet ponderis & momenti. i. e. "Fernel was a man of ſuch wonderful learning, "that there happened to him, what I do not remember to have happened to any learned men for ſeveral ages; namely, that the Works he had wrote upon Phyſick in general, were even in his life-time publickly read in the Colleges, of which he himſelf was a witneſs: and that his authority had as great a weight with the beſt Phyſicians as the writings of the antients." The Sieur Bullart's blunders are more numerous. He ſays, that Fernel reſolved somewhat late to ſtudy the firſt principles of the ſciences under James Strebé (50). Two things are hinted here, the firſt that Fernel began but late to ſtudy: the ſecond that he began it under James Strebé. The former is very true according to Plantius in Fernel's Life. But the latter is abſolutely falſe, for Fernel had already taught Philoſophy in the College of Sainte Barbara, and had been admitted a Doctor of Phyſick, when he entered into a correſpondence with Strebé. This correſpondence conſiſted in a mutual inſtruction; they were taught by, and did teach each other. Fernel taught Strebé the Mathematicks, and learnt from him to write Latin correctly (51). Monſieur Bullart erroneouſly believes, that Henry II was already King of France, whilſt his wife was ſtill barren. If he had conſulted Brantome, he would not have ſaid, that that Prince reſolved to part from her: and if he had conſulted Lewis d'Orleans, he would not have aſſerted that this Queen gave Fernel ten times ten thouſand crowns (52). Let us quote Monſieur Bullart's own words (53) This French Æſculapius made ſuch an effectual uſe of the knowledge he had of the diſtemper, and of the remedy which it was proper to preſcribe, that he rendered the Queen fruitful, by curing the ſuppreſſion of her courſes, after which ſhe had five ſons and five daughters; and at the birth of each of them ſhe gave that learned man ten thouſand crowns. It is falſely ſuppoſed (54) that after Henry II had kept him with him as his firſt Phyſician, and had carried him every where with him as the preſerver of his health .... he gave him time to put in order the materials he had written concerning Phyſick, and furniſhed him with the means to print them. Read this learned man's life, and you will ſee that he only wrote a Treatiſe on Fevers, after he performed the functions of firſt Phyſician to Henry II: you will even find that he died before he had finiſhed that Treatiſe.

(50) Bullart, Académie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 33.

(51) Dum Strebæus à Fernelio Mathematicarum diſciplinarum, Fernelius viciſſim à Strebæo politioris literaturæ cognitionem & gravem plenumque orationis ſtylum accipit, integrum biennium exigitur. Plantius, in Vita Fernelii.

(52) See above Remark [L] quotation (46).

(53) Academie des Sciences, tom. 2. pag. 83.

(54) Bullart, ibid.

[A] He wrote ſeveral Volumes, ſome of which have been printed.] He publiſhed at Paris in 1655, printed by Valcoſan, Catalogue des Conneſtables, Chanceliers, Grandmaiſtres, Admiraux, & Mareſchaux de France, & des Provoſts de Paris, contenant leurs erections & eſtabliſſemens, le temps & exercice de lieurs eſtats, mutation & variation d'iceux, leurs noms, ſurnoms, Seigneuries & armoiries blaſonnées, enſemble un abregé de leurs faicts (1). i. e. "A Catalogue of Conſtables, Chancellors, Grandmaſters, Admirals, and Marſhals of "France, and of the Provoſts of Paris; containing "their foundation and eſtabliſhment, the time and "nature of their ſeveral functions, the alterations that "happened in them, their names, ſurnames, Lordſhip, and Coats of Arms blazoned, together with a "ſhort account of their actions." in fol. The ſame year he publiſhed his Traitté de la primitive Inſtitution des Rois, Herauts, & Purſuivans d'Armes; i. e. "A Treatiſe of the "firſt Inſtitution of the Kings, Heralds and Purſuivants "at Arms." at Paris printed by Maurice Menier in 4to. As for his Hiſtoire Armoriale réduite en 12 Volumes contenant les eſcuſſons, blaſons, noms, ſurnoms, qualitez, & memoire perpetuelle, des Rois, Princes, Seigneurs, Gentils-hommes & Nobles de pluſieurs Royaumes Chreſtiens & Infideles, & principalement du Royaume de France. i. e. "The Armorial Hiſtory written in twelve Volumes, containing the Coats of Arms, blazon, "names, ſurnames, titles, and perpetual memory of "the Kings, Princes, Lords, Noblemen and Gentlemen of ſeveral Kingdoms both Chriſtian and Infidel, and particularly of the Kingdom of France?" as to this Book, I ſay, and ſeveral other Compilations of the ſame kind, La Croix du Maine obſerves that they are not printed (2).

(1) Du Verdier Vau Privas, Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 690.

(2) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 222.

[B] ... Men of Taſte deſpiſed them, becauſe of an infinite number of fictions .... with which he had ſtuffed them.] I have already obſerved (3) what Monſieur le Laboureur thought of them; and I ſhall now tranſcribe a paſſage from Stephen Paſquier. It is to be found in a Letter, which he wrote to a Lawyer (4), who was writing a Work of Eſcutcheons and Coats of Arms. "I can tell you, that amongſt thoſe who med-"dled with this ſubject, le Feron, of whom you write "to me, was ſo ſelf-conceited as to pretend that he ex-"celled in it above all the reſt. I can ſpeak of him, "ſince I have converſed with him now and then in "my younger days. He was an ancient Lawyer be-"longing to our Court, but he never followed the buſineſs much (5), amuſing himſelf with blazoning "Eſcutcheons and Coats of Arms, as you may have "obſerved by ſome Books which he publiſhed upon "that ſubject; and yet he never wrote ſo well as ſome "of them, that wrote ſince his time. For to ſpeak plain, "he did not fetch the origin of Coats of Arms from "the wars, nor from the Nobility, but even from the "beginning of the world; nay he gave our firſt fa-"ther Adam his Coat of Arms: what could they be, "you will ſay? Why, three fig-leaves: and when I "aſked him, why he aſcribed to him ſuch a Coat of "Arms, he anſwered, it was becauſe Adam, after he "had eaten of the forbidden fruit, covered his ſecret "parts with a fig-leaf. And upon this footing he "writes four or five large and thick volumes figured "according to his opinion. A curioſity, which I dare "call inexcuſable as it is inexhauſtible (6)."

(3) In the Remark [C] of the Article PINET.

(4) To Monſ. Moreau, Advocate in the Parliament of Bourdeaux.

(5) See the Opuſcules de Loiſel, pag. 525.

(6) Paquier Lettres, liv. 19. tom. 2. pag. 455.

FERRAND (JAMES) Doctor of Phyſic, and a native of Agen, wrote a book de la Maladie d'Amour; i. e. Of Love ſickneſs; which was printed at Paris in the year 1622. It has not yet been mentioned in the Bibliotheca Medica, or the Library of the Phyſicians; and yet it deſerved to have a place there, more than ſeveral others that are ſet down in it [A].

FERRARA

[A] It deſerved to have a place in the Bibliotheca Medica, more than ſeveral others that are ſet down in it.] Though James Ferrand's deſign was only to conſider love as it often turns into a bodily diſeaſe, and becomes a frenzy, or a melancholy, yet he ſays a great many things which relate to love in general. I take here the word love in the ſenſe it has by way of eminency; I mean for that paſſion which one ſex conceives for the other, a paſſion that has been honoured with a religious worſhip by the Heathens under the name of Venus, and which is one of the deepeſt myſteries of nature. The Dedication of James Ferrand's Book abounds with learning, by which it appears, that there is nothing upon which the Heathen Poets had ſo deeply philoſophized as they have upon love. The Author has omitted the verſes of Lucretius, which I have quoted above (1). I obſerved there, that if this paſſion came into the world by ſin, it was to be conſidered

(1) In the Remark [F] of the Article EVE.

FERRARA (RENATA of France, Dutcheſs of) famous for her virtue, and her attachment to the Reformed Church, was daughter of Lewis XII and Ann of Britany [A]. She was born at Blois (a) the 25th of October 1510 (b), and was contracted to Charles of Auſtria (c) in the year 1513 and the year 1515, and afterwards ſhe was alſo promiſed to Joachim Marquis of Brandenburg; but in 1527 ſhe married Hercules d'Eſte the ſecond of the name, Duke of Ferrara and Modena (d). Others place their wedding day on the 28th of June 1528 (e). A modern Hiſtorian aſſures us that ſhe was miſtreſs of immenſe learning [B]. He relates many things, of which ſome are moſt falſe, and others doubtful, concerning Calvin's journey to this Princeſs's Court [C]. What he advances with relation to the

(a) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. Genealog. pag. 132.

(b) See the Remark [A].

(c) Who was afterwards the Emperor Charles V.

(d) Anſelme, Hiſt. Genealog. pag. 132.

(e) Father du Londel, Faſtes des Rois, pag. 32.

ſidered as a board in a ſhipwrack: it was like a ſecond vital principle granted to mankind, it was a new ſpring neceſſary to ſet all nature a-going. But I ought alſo to have obſerved that this ſecond favour of the Author of all things has the ſtamp common to all the gift of Fortune, which are conſtantly mixed with ſome evil. Fortuna nunquam ſimpliciter indulget (2). They who do not know by their own experience what bitterneſs attends the pleaſures of love (3), may read the Sieur Ferrand's work, it will learn them how to judge of this ſubject by the ſentences of ſeveral grave Author's: for according to the method of thoſe times, this Phyſician quotes a great many paſſages, and hardly ſays any thing without ſupporting it by the authority of ſome Greec or Latin Poet, or of ſome ancient and modern Philoſopher. The Authors have left off this method; but the Authors who followed it are not the leſs inſtructive for it; and after all, I find it ſtrange, that the Lindenius renovatus (4) ſhould not have mentioned the Author, who is the ſubject of this article; this is not the only omiſſion the Writer of that work has been guilty of. See the Remark of the Article VANDERLINDEN.

(2) Q. Curtius, lib. 4. cap. 14.

(3) See the Article SELEMNUS. If it were jealouſy, it would be enough to make the counterbalance the good.

(4) This is the title of the Bibliotheque de Scriptis Medicis, in the laſt edition which is that of the year 1686, in 4to.

[A] She was daughter of Lewis XII, and Ann of Britany.] I ſhall here ſet down a particularity which deſerves to be known. That Queen was brought to bed in the year 1510 "of a ſecond daughter, whom "ſhe named Renata, as if in this birth ſhe had ſeen "her hopes of child-bearing born again, which ſhe "had almoſt wholly loſt; but the ignorance of the "midwives, who aſſiſted her in this laſt labour, treat-"ed her ſo ill, that ſhe became incapable of having "children for the future, and ſuch indiſpoſitions con-"tinued upon her from thence, that at length ſhe died "three years after, at the Caſtle of Blois, the 13th "day of February 1513 (1)." The Author of the Notes on Rabelais's Letters is in all likelihood miſtaken, when he ſays (2), that the Princeſs Renata was born the 15th of October 1509, &c.

(1) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. pag. 890.

(2) Pag. 83.

[B] A modern Hiſtorian aſſures us, that ſhe was miſtreſs of immenſe learning.] Mr. Varillas is the Hiſtorian I mean. His words follow: "Renata of France, "daughter of King Lewis XII, and wife of Hercules "d'Eſte Duke of Ferrara, had made him father of "five of the fineſt children in Chriſtendom, though "as to her perſon ſhe was the moſt deformed Princeſs "of her age. It is true, the defects in her ſhape and "face were ſo abundantly recompenſed by the beau-"ties of her mind, that, taking all together, ſhe had "more reaſon to think herſelf obliged to nature than "to complain. She had more quickneſs and delicacy "of wit than had been ſeen in any woman, not ex-"cepting thoſe of Italy, who pretend to it the moſt; and "it was but a diverſion to her to learn all that was dif-"ficult in the moſt ſublime ſciences. She had eaſily, "and without any effort of mind, made herſelf mi-"ſtreſs of Philoſophy and Divinity, and not one of "her ſex ſpoke of them with better grace, or rather, "in a leſs tireſome manner. She excelled in all parts "of the Mathematics, but eſpecially in Aſtronomy; "and the contempt ſhe had for Judicial Aſtrology "had not hindred her from learning all the ſecrets of "it from the famous Luke Gauricus (3)." He ſays elſewhere (4) ſomething ſtronger yet; viz. that nobody ſurpaſſed her in the moſt profound ſpeculations of Philoſophy, the Mathematics, and Aſtrology. This ſavours of the romantic ſtyle: Varillas, inſtead of qualifying the expreſſions of Brantome, a Gaſcon Author, who gives a looſe to hyperboles but too frequently, and eſpecially when Princeſſes are the ſubject, goes even farther than he. The reader will judge of it immediately. Madame Renée . . . avoit un des bons eſprits & ſubtils qui étoit poſſible: elle avoit fort étudié, & l'ai vu fort ſavante diſcourir fort hautement & fort gravement de toutes ſciences, juſques à l'Aſtrologie & la conoiſſance des aſtres, dont je la vis un jour entretenir la Reine mere, qui l'oyant ainſi parler dit que le plus grand Philoſophe du monde n'en ſauroit mieux parler (5). i. e. "The "Princeſs Renata had as penetrating and refined a "wit as poſſibly could be; ſhe had ſtudied much, and "I have heard her diſcourſe in a very learned, ſub-"lime, and ſolid manner, of all ſciences, even Aſtro-"logy and the knowledge of the Stars, with which I "ſaw her one day entertain the Queen mother, who "hearing her talk ſo pertinently, ſaid the greateſt "Philoſopher in the world could not have ſpoken "better on the ſubject." What a fall is here? According to Varillas, the equality of knowledge between the Princeſs and all men of learning relates to the moſt profound ſpeculations of Philoſophy, the Mathematics, and Aſtrology; but, according to Brantome, it relates only to ſome diſcourſes of Aſtrology, and that too in the judgment of Catherine de Medicis. It is of more uſe than is commonly imagined to lay before the readers a parallel of the original with the copy, as I do here. Conſult the margin (6).

(3) Varillas, Hiſtoire de l'Hereſie, liv. 10. pag. 354 of the Dutch Edition.

(4) Hiſt. de Charles IX, tom. 1. pag. 176 of the Dutch Edition.

(5) Brantome, Vie des Dames illuſtres, pag. m. 300.

[C] . . . And relates ſeveral things, ſome moſt falſe, and others doubtful, concerning Calvin's journey.] Mr. Varillas (7) relates under the year 1535, that Calvin, having made choice of Straſburg for his abode, drew thither thoſe of his ſect who had voluntarily baniſhed themſelves from France. Calvin, proceeds he, having got together a ſufficient number of diſciples to form a Church, by Bucer's advice, preſented a petition to the Magiſtrates of Straſburg, to obtain the ſpiritual direction of the French who had been tranſplanted from France to Alſatia on account of their Religion . . . The Magiſtrates at the perſuaſion of Stunius (8) . . . granted the requeſt, and Calvin by this means had the opportunity of founding a Church after his own way. . . . As his intention was to render the College of Straſburg famous, he was not ſatisfied with drawing thither the fineſt genius's, and the moſt learned men of the Univerſities of France whom he had corrupted; but he was deſirous alſo that the ſame College ſhould be principally obliged to him for its reputation, and he taught there with greater aſſiduity than Luther or Melanchthon had done in the College of Wittemberg: for which reaſon the number of his auditors became incomparably greater than theirs had been, tho' no ſovereign Prince had intereſted himſelf in it. He taught Divinity in this College, and none of the Profeſſors aſſiſted more willingly than he at the public diſputations of the Students. Beſides this, he reviſed his Inſtitution, and added to it a fourth and laſt Book. He ſpent two whole years in theſe laborious employments, and nothing could have drawn him thence if he had not hoped to make a greater progreſs elſewhere; but he ſuffered himſelf to be deceived by the vain conceit, which had been put into his head, of ſpreading his doctrine in Italy; and he imagined that it would be ſomething ſo glorious and ſo agreeable to penetrate into a country which had been inacceſſible to Luther and Zuinglius, and to withdraw from the Pope's obedience the people who were the neareſt to his See, that he could not withſtand the temptation which offered. Mr. Varillas here makes a digreſſion in praiſe of the Dutcheſs of Ferrara (9), after which he ſays (10) that Calvin, being not unacquainted with that Princeſs's diſpoſition, went in diſguiſe from Straſburg to Ferrara. He ſuppoſes that Calvin, having by his wit gained the ear of Renata, endeavoured to give her ill impreſſions of the doctrines of Luther, and thoſe of Zuinglius, and Melanchthon, and that the Princeſs, who (11) had a mind to change her Religion only to be revenged on the Court of Rome, at firſt rejected the doctrines of Calvin;

(6) Brantome, ibid. ſays that Renata, though ſhe was very much deformed in her perſon, brought her huſband a very beautiful offspring. He ſays, pag. 306, that though her outward appearance was not ſo grand, by reaſon of the deformity of her body, yet ſhe had a great deal of majeſty. Varillas, inſtead of ſtopping here, ſays that as to her perſon ſhe was the moſt deformed Princeſs of her age.

(7) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 10. pag. 352, &c.

(8) It ſhould be Sturmius.

(9) It has been ſeen in the preceding Remark.

(10) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 10. pag. 355.

(11) Ibid. pag. 356.

the motives which engaged her to embrace the new Religion, has very little probability [D]. She vin; but that ſhe was not long before ſhe turned Calviniſt. . . . . He preached in her chamber, that it might be the better concealed, becauſe reſpect forbade the ſervants to enquire too curiouſly into what paſſed there. But it is much more difficult for Ladies of quality, than for others, to hide their Religion long from their huſbands. That which the Dutcheſs profeſſed came to the knowledge of the Duke of Ferrara, and that Prince was the more exaſperated at it, becauſe nothing was more oppoſite to his temporal intereſt. He held his dominions of the Holy See, and he knew the Popes would not want power to diſpoſſeſs him, if they had a pretext for it. His dread increaſed when he reflected that Duke Alfonſo his father had been a long time an exile, a vagabond, poor, and a ſoldier in the pay of a foreign nation, for having diſobliged the Pope, and that to get into favour again he had been forced to aſk pardon of Pope Alexander VI, and to marry Lucretia Borgia. Theſe conſiderations in an inſtant changed the Duke who had been hitherto very complaiſant to the Dutcheſs. He obliged her to return to the exerciſe of the new Religion (12), and all the favour ſhe obtained of him for Calvin was, that he ſhould be permitted to go back as he came.

(12) The Printers have made a miſtake here: we muſt read either renounce inſtead of return to, or old inſtead of new.

THIS paſſage of Varillas cenſured.

There are a great many falſhoods in this Narration. I. When Calvin, in 1534, departed the Kingdom of France, he made choice of the city of Baſil (13), and not that of Straſburg, for the place of his retreat; and he continued at Baſil in the greateſt obſcurity he poſſibly could (14), till he undertook his journey to Italy, after he had publiſhed his Chriſtian Inſtitution (15). II. It is falſe, therefore, that he erected at that time a Church at Straſburg, and that he rendred the College of that city more famous than the College of Wittemberg. III. Let us rectify this as well as we can, by tranſferring it to its true time; and we ſhall ſtill find ſeveral lies in the relation. Calvin, being driven from Geneva in the year 1538, went into Switzerland, where he received an invitation from the Magiſtrates of Straſburg to be Profeſſor of Divinity there. He accepted of that employment, and acquitted himſelf therein with the applauſe of the learned (16); but, IV, he did not draw to that College the fineſt genius's, and the moſt learned men of the Univerſities of France: and V, the number of his auditors did not become incomparably greater than that of Luther and Melanchthon had been at Wittemberg. I do not know whence Varillas could take the foundation of theſe romantic hyperboles. It is very certain that Calvin, by the permiſſion of the Magiſtrates, founded a French Church at Straſburg, and that he made it ſubject to his formulary of diſcipline (17); but VI, it is not true that this was the beginning of his labours in that city. He went thither to teach Divinity, to which he was called by the Magiſtrates; and afterwards he deſired their conſent to the erection of a French Congregation. VII. He did not quit theſe laborious employments in hopes of making a greater progreſs in Italy: for he took leave of thoſe of Straſburg, only to return to Geneva (18), whither he ſaw himſelf recalled with great earneſtneſs. It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, as Mr. Varillas does, that Calvin went to ſee the Dutcheſs of Ferrara in the year 1535, after having for two years diſcharged the office of Profeſſor in Divinity, and that of Miniſter, and after having reviſed his Inſtitution, and augmented it with a fourth and laſt Book: for VIII, he left France in the year 1534, and he went to Ferrara towards the end of the year 1535, and IX, when he took that journey his Chriſtian Inſtitution had been publiſhed but once. He did not reviſe, or augment it, till after his return from Italy (19). X. It was not divided into Books before the Edition of 1559. XI. I own that the Dutcheſs of Ferrara was the mother of five children, but they were not all born when Calvin took his journey to that Court. When ſhe lay in of a daughter in the year 1536, Rabelais obſerves that ſhe had already a daughter and a ſon (20).

A Hiſtorian who is guilty of ſo many falſhoods with reſpect to facts ſo eaſy to be related truly, deſerves no great credit with regard to the private converſations which he ſuppoſes between the Dutcheſs of Ferrara and Calvin. This is what I call doubtful; for I have no good proofs to aver, whether Calvin did or did not inſinuate to the Dutcheſs ſuch and ſuch things againſt Luther, Zuinglius, and Melanchthon. I might eaſily be perſuaded that Calvin contributed but little to the converſion of this Princeſs: I believe he found her pretty much out of conceit with the Romiſh faith, and that Marot, who had taken refuge at that Court before him, had a greater hand than he in Renata's change of Religion (21).

(13) Above, Remark [F] of the Article CALVIN.

(14) Ibid. Remark [U].

(15) He publiſhed it at Baſil, in the year 1535. See above the Remark [U] of the Article CALVIN.

(16) Theologiam ibi docuit magno cum doctorum omnium applauſu. Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1538.

(17) Ex Senatus conſenſu Gallicam Eccleſiam conſtituta etiam eccleſiaſtica diſciplina plantavit. Idem, ibid.

(18) He returned thither in the year 1541. See his Life by Beza.

(19) Mr. Varillas, Hiſt. of Charles IX, tom. 1. ſays that Calvin had compoſed, at the Court of the Dutcheſs of Ferrara, the Books of his Inſtitution. In the 10th Book of his Hiſt. of Hereſy, pag. 350, he ſays that Calvin being gone to Nerac, to conſer with le Fevre and Roſſel, read his Inſtitution to them. You muſt know that Calvin conferred with le Fevre at Nerac in 1533, or thereabouts.

(20) Rabelais, Epiſt. 14. pag. 59.

(21) See Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 746, 747.

[D] What Varillas advances with relation to the motives which engaged her to embrace the new Religion, has very little probability.] "The injuries ſhe pretended the King her father had received from Pope "Julius II had inſpired her with an averſion to the "Court of Rome (22)." This, according to Varillas, was the motive which induced her to hearken to the new ſects. "She had a mind to change her Religion "only to revenge herſelf; ſhe thought it ſufficient for "that purpoſe to attack the ſpiritual and temporal au"thority of the Popes, without meddling with the Sa"craments, and above all with the religious Orders, "which would not fail to raiſe very great diſorders in "the beſt eſtabliſhed ſtates (23)." It muſt be owned, generally ſpeaking, that the deſire of revenge may produce in a man's mind a ſtrong inclination to a ſect. If a party appears againſt certain perſons who have done us a great injury, we are very much diſpoſed to ſupport that party, we wiſh it may be juſt, and by dint of wiſhing it, we often come to believe it juſt. This is ſeen, not only in political and academical cabals, but even in religious diſputes; ſo that it is not to be doubted but that a perſonal hatred to a Pope may be ſufficient to induce a Prince to favour the Divines who preach againſt that Pope. But was this the caſe of our Dutcheſs? She was ſcarce out of her ſwaddling-cloaths when Julius II died. The Court of Rome was reconciled to Lewis XII, when that Prince left the world; ſo that our Renata was more likely to hear talk of the peace between her father and Leo X, than of the outrages of Julius II. It is not probable that ſhe ſhould have conceived againſt the memory of this Pope a reſentment which included all his Succeſſors. When we do not hear of a quarrel till after it is ended, the paſſions which it raiſes are not ſo quick; it is the ſight of the evils into which it plunges us, that excites in our minds a violent hatred againſt him who is the author of them. I do not deny but thoſe who during the troubles, and even at the time of the pacification, were yet in the cradle, may conceive a very ſharp reſentment againſt the author of thoſe troubles, when they come to age, and feel themſelves hurt by the fatal conſequences of the miſchief which he cauſed; but was this the caſe of the Dutcheſs of Ferrara? She was excluded from ſucceeding her father by the Salique Law, and conſequently the evils which Julius II had cauſed to Lewis XII would not have concerned her, though they had continued under the reign of Francis I.

(22) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 10. pag. 355.

(23) Idem, ibid. pag. 356.

It is certain that true facts are ſometimes deſtitute of probability; and therefore without deciding whether the Princeſs had any reſentment, or whether ſhe had not, I ſhall only ſay it is not likely that the remembrance of the injuſtice of Julius II ſhould make her fully bent to be revenged on the Court of Rome by embracing the Lutheran Religion. However I ought not to conceal what I have read in Brantome. Perhaps ſays he (24), reſenting the injuries which the Popes had in ſo many inſtances done her father, ſhe withdrew from their obedience, not having it in her power, as ſhe was a woman, to do them more miſchief. I have it from good hands that ſhe often ſaid as much. Mr. Le Laboureur (25) quotes an Elegy of Clement Marot on Renata's being the third time with child; in which the child is congratulated for being conceived at ſo happy a juncture. Marot promiſes him the ruin of the Pope and the Holy See, whom he treats with great indignity, and calls the enemy of his family. This ſhews that the Poet brought domeſtic quarrels on the ſtage, with intent to alienate the Dutcheſs of Ferrara from the Court of Rome. Take notice that he alſo made uſe of good omens, and favourable predictions, of which Poets are ſo liberal, and which ſo frequently prove them to be falſe Prophets (26). He was one in this inſtance, and bluſhed at it no more than his brethren do in the like caſe.

(24) Brantome, Vie des Dames illuſtres, pag. 300.

(25) Addit. aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 747: he obſerves that this Elegy was ſuppreſſed.

(26) See the Remark [C] of the Article FUENTERABIA.

She left Italy on account of her Religion [E], ſo ſoon as her huſband was dead, and returned to France, where ſhe was permitted to profeſs Huguenotiſm. She reſided at Montargis, and there gave protection to many who were perſecuted, till ſhe was obliged to do it no longer. I doubt Mezerai does not fix the time of this exactly [F]. It was with much regret that ſhe yielded to ſo cruel a conſtraint: and if her courage appeared on this occaſion, her charity was no leſs conſpicuous [G]. This virtuous Lady had always ſhewn a very great inclination to diſtribute her liberality to the diſtreſſed [H]. She interceded

[E] She left Italy on account of her Religion.] This is what Thuanus informs me of. Sub idem tempus, ſays he (27), Renata Ferrarienſis, Guiſii ſocrus, quæ ex Italia in Galliam ob religionis cauſſam migraverat, Aurelianum Regis ſalutandi gratia venit. i. e. "About "the ſame time Renata Dutcheſs of Ferrara, and mo-"ther-in-law to the Duke of Guiſe, who had retired "from Italy into France on account of Religion, "came to Orleans to pay her reſpects to the King." He ſays this under the year 1560. The Duke of Ferrara, this Princeſs's huſband, died in the year 1559.

(27) Thuan. lib. 26. pag. 521.

[F] I doubt Mezerai does not fix the time of this exactly.] Relating the outrages which the Reformed ſuffered in divers places in the year 1562, he ſays (28), "that the authority of the Dutcheſs Dowager of Ferrara "ſaved a great number of them, who from all parts "threw themſelves into Montargis under her protec-"tion. The Duke of Guiſe, her ſon-in-law (29), "not being able either by entreaties, or by menaces, "to bring her into the right way, ſent thither John "de Sourches-Malicorne with four troops of horſe; "who having ſummoned her to deliver up to him the "chiefs of the factious who had fled into the caſtle to "her, threatning withal to bring cannon to get them "out by force, received an anſwer worthy ſuch a "Princeſs. Conſider well, ſaid ſhe to him, what you "do: know that no body has a right to command me "but the King himſelf, and that if you carry matters to "ſuch extremity, I will put my ſelf the foremoſt in the "breach, where I will try whether you will have the "inſolence to kill a King's daughter, whoſe death heaven "and earth will be bound to revenge on you and all "your race, even to the infants in the cradle. Theſe "reſolute words having a little cooled his courage, "the Duke of Guiſe's death, which happened at the "ſame time, wholly diverted him from his enter-"prize." Mr. Varillas telling the ſame ſtory, and paraphraſing it according to his uſual cuſtom, applies it to the year 1562 (30). But I ſhould be much deceived if the Proteſtant Writers, who apply this adventure to the year 1569, deſerved not a great deal more credit. We ſhall immediately ſee the words of the Sieur d'Aubigné.

(28) Hiſtoire de France, tom. 3. pag. 86.

(29) Ann d'Eſte, daughter of Renata, married to her firſt huſband Francis of Lorrain Duke of Guiſe, and to her ſecond the Duke of Nemours. She was mother of the Duke of Guiſe who was killed at Blois, and was ſo violent in the ſervice of the League againſt Henry III and Henry IV. She was then called the Dutcheſs of Nemours. See the laſt Remark towards the end.

(30) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, tom. 1. pag. 375.

[G] If her courage appeared on this occaſion, her charity was no leſs conſpicuous.] The anſwer ſhe returned to Malicorne has not been ſo nobly turned by d'Aubigné as by Mezerai; but I doubt the expreſſions he makes uſe of were rather the Hiſtorian's than the Princeſs's. However it be, let us cite d'Aubigné. "This (31) "was the reaſon that all fled from the towns and vil-"lages of the flat country to Montargis, where many "had been preſerved during the firſt wars under "the protection of the Dutcheſs, who being of the "royal blood, and related to the Guiſes, had a par-"ticular privilege. She and her Miniſters blamed "thoſe who took up arms, in ſuch terms as ſet her "and the Prince of Condé at enmity: and this quar-"rel gave ſome colour to the reſpect which was ſhewn "her. But this laſt concourſe of Proteſtants at Mon-"targis ſtirred up the Preachers of Paris, and they "the King, to force her to turn away four hundred "and ſixty perſons, the two thirds women and chil-"dren at the breaſt. That Princeſs, burſting into "tears, ſaid to Malicorne, who brought her theſe "harſh news, that if ſhe had on her chin what he had "on his (32), ſhe would kill him with her own "hands, as a meſſenger of death. She furniſhed "this diſtreſſed company with a hundred and fifty "waggons, eight travelling coaches, and a great many "horſes (33)." The manner how theſe poor people, whom Malicorne endeavoured to deſtroy by the way, eſcaped, is very ſingular. D'Aubigné relates it; as another Huguenot Hiſtorian (34) alſo does, but without naming Malicorne: and as to the Dutcheſs, this is what he ſays of her, under the year 1569 (35): At that time the Duke of Alençon gave the Dutcheſs of Ferrara to underſtand that Montargis (her ordinary reſidence) was a harbour for the Proteſtants; and that plots were daily hatched there againſt his Majeſty. Wherefore he deſired her to diſmiſs them and the Miniſters, and to leave the exerciſe of the Proteſtant Religion, which ſhe profeſſed, or elſe to remove to ſome other place. She anſwered that ſhe was too nearly related to the Crown, to be ſo ill affected to it: beſides, that there was in the town only a poor and harmleſs people, who meddled with nothing which might be of the leaſt importance to the King's ſtate. In ſhort, that ſhe could not leave a place which belonged to her, & where ſhe was reſolved to live and die, and that in the exerciſe of the Religion which had been permitted her by the King, and in which ſhe had hitherto been brought up. However, about the end of September, ſhe was obliged to diſmiſs moſt of thoſe who had retired thither, being threatened with having a garriſon ſent in very ſpeedily. And foraſmuch as there were ſeveral families, many women, and a great number of young and old people, all unable to go the long journeys they were forced to take, or elſe to be at the mercy of thoſe who waited only for an opportunity to deſtroy them; ſhe lent her coaches, carts, and waggons to aſſiſt them, anſwering for the waggoners who carried the reſt and their baggage.

(31) That is, the Maſſacre of the Proteſtants at Orleans, in the year 1569.

(32) See Brantome's words below, Remark [H], Citation (38).

(33) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſelle, tom. 1. liv. 5. chap. 13.

(34) His Work is intitled, The true and complete Hiſtory of the Troubles and memorable things which happened as well in France as in Flanders, and the neighbouring Countries, from the year 1562: it was printed at Rochelle, 1573, in 8vo.

(35) Liv. 8. folio 253.

When I conſider that Thuanus (36) has furniſhed Mezerai and Varillas with what they ſay of Malicorne's fooliſh enterprize in the year 1562, and the Princeſs's couragious anſwer, and that he places this event in the ſame year, I do not know which way to turn myſelf; and perhaps we muſt ſay that the Dutcheſs was twice diſturbed at Montargis, in the year 1562, and in the year 1569: the ſecond time it may be Malicorne was not charged with the commiſſion, though d'Aubigné ſays he was.

(36) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. 30. pag. 608.

[H] She always ſhewed a very great inclination to diſtribute her liberality to the diſtreſſed.] I ſhall make uſe of Brantome's words. If this Princeſs, ſays he (37), was intelligent, wiſe, witty, and virtuous, ſhe was alſo indued with ſo much goodneſs, which ſhe ſo well expreſſed to her huſband's ſubjects, that I never ſaw any one in Ferrara who was not well ſatisfied with her, and did not highly commend her: for above all they had a ſenſe of her charity, which ſhe always took care to exerciſe, and eſpecially towards the French; having this good quality, that ſhe never forgot her own nation, and though ſhe was at a great diſtance from it, yet ſhe always loved it greatly. Never did a Frenchman, paſſing through Ferrara, if he was in want and addreſſed himſelf to her, go from her without receiving a conſiderable alms, and money ſufficient to carry him home; and if he was ſick, and could not travel, ſhe cauſed him to be taken good care of and cured, and then gave him money to return to France. Brantome had heard that when the Duke of Guiſe went to Italy, ſhe ſaved after his return above ten thouſand poor French ſouls, as well ſoldiers as others, who without her aſſiſtance would have periſhed for hunger and want; for as they paſſed thro' Ferrara, ſhe ſupplied them all with medicines and money as far as was in her power; and when her ſtewards repreſented to her her exceſſive expences, ſhe only anſwered, What would you have? theſe are poor Frenchmen, and my Countrymen, whom, if God had given me a beard on my chin, and I had been a man, would now have been all my ſubjects, and would nevertheleſs have been ſuch, if that unjuſt Salique Law did not bear too hard upon me (38). Brantome was not ignorant of her charities at Montargis; let us hear him further (39): "I have heard ſome of her dome-"ſtics ſay, that after her return to France, being re-"tired to her city and houſe of Montargis, when the "civil wars began, ſo long as ſhe lived ſhe took under "her protection a very great number of people, and "thoſe Proteſtants who were driven and baniſhed from "their eſtates and houſes, ſhe aſſiſted, ſuccoured, and "entertained as far as ſhe was able. I ſaw my ſelf, "in

(37) Brantome, Vie des Dames Illuſtres, pag. 302.

(38) Ibid. pag. 303.

(39) Ibid. pag. 305.

terceded ſtrongly for the Prince of Condé when he was impriſoned [I]; but afterwards ſhe fell out with him, becauſe neither ſhe, nor her Miniſters, approved the Proteſtants taking up arms (f). We cannot ſufficiently admire the firmneſs with which ſhe oppoſed the devices which Henry II and her huſband made uſe of, to reclaim her from what they called Hereſy [K]. She died at Montargis the 12th of June 1575 (g), in the profeſſion of the Reformed Religion. It is through groſs ignorance, therefore, that a Jeſuit (h) has put her into the Liſt of thoſe who abjured the errors of the Proteſtants. Her bearing with her huſband's gallantries was not the leaſt mark of her patience under the misfortunes of this world. It is ſaid that after ſhe had brought him three ſons and three daughters, ſhe retired of her own accord to a private houſe, that ſhe might neither ſee, nor traverſe the pleaſures he took with other Ladies. They even add that this poor Princeſs expreſſed ſome friendſhip for her huſband's miſtreſſes (i).

(f) See the Remark [G].

(g) Le Laboureur, Add. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 749.

(h) Joannes Franciſcus Haki, in Libro cui Titulus Via Regia, &c.

(i) See Louis Guyon. Diverſes Leçons, tom. 3. pag. 136.

FERRARIUS

" in the time of the ſecond troubles, the forces of " Gaſcony led by Meſſieurs de Terrides and de Mon- " ſales, amounting to 8000 men, and marching to " the King; when the Chiefs and principal Captains " and Gentlemen, and my ſelf among them, paſſed " by Montargis, and went to pay our reſpects to her, " as we were in duty bound; I believe we ſaw in the " caſtle above 300 Proteſtants, who from all parts " had retired thither: an old Steward of hers, a very " honeſt Gentleman, whom I had been acquainted " with at Ferrara and in France, ſwore to me that ſhe " daily fed above three hundred of thoſe poor refu- " gees."

[I] She interceded ſtrongly for the Prince of Condé.] I ſhall borrow my proof ſtill from the ſame Author. " I have heard ſay, and I have it from good hands, " that when the Prince of Condé was impriſoned at " Orleans, in the time of the young King Francis, " ſhe came from Ferrara two days after, and I ſaw " her arrive, the King and all the Court going to " meet her, and receiving her with great honour, as " ſhe deſerved; ſhe appeared very much concerned at " his impriſonment, and repreſented to the late Duke " of Guiſe her ſon-in-law, that whoever had adviſed " the King to that ſtep, had done very wrong, and " that it was no ſmall matter to uſe a Prince of the " blood in that manner (40)." Thuanus makes her ſpeak in a yet more lofty ſtile. Aurelianum regis ſalutandi gratia venit, deploratoque præſenti rerum ſtatu generum acerbè increpuit, & ſiquidem ante captum Condæum adveniſſet id ſe impedituram teſtata monuit, ut ab injuria erga regiæ ſtirpis principes in poſterum temperaret, nam plagam eam diu ſanguinem miſſuram, nec cuiquam unquam bene vertiſſe qui regis conſanguineos principes prior laceſſiviſſet (41). i. e. " She came to Orleans " to pay her reſpects to the King, and having lament- " ed the miſerable ſtate of affairs, ſhe bitterly reprov- " ed her ſon-in-law, and declared that if ſhe had ar- " rived before the Prince of Condé had been impri- " ſoned, ſhe would have prevented it, that he might " learn for the future to uſe more moderation towards " the Princes of the blood; for that wound would bleed " a long while, nor did ever any man proſper, who " without provocation injured Princes related to the " King."

(40) Brantome, ibid. pag. 306.

(41) Thuan. lib. 26. pag. 521, 522, ad ann. 1560.

[K] We cannot ſufficiently admire the firmneſs with which ſhe oppoſed the devices which Henry II and her huſband made uſe of to reclaim her from . . . . hereſy.] Monſieur le Laboureur has publiſhed (42) a very curious piece. It is the inſtruction which was given by Henry II to Dr. Oriz, when he went to Ferrara. That Doctor was one of the Pope's Penitentiaries, and executed the office of Inquiſitor in France: he was ſent to Ferrara on purpoſe to convert the Dutcheſs. He was charged to tell her, I, That the King had been informed, to his inexpreſſible grief, that ſhe had ſuffered herſelf to be precipitated into the labyrinth of thoſe wicked and damned opinions, contrary and repugnant to our holy Faith. II, That when he ſhall hear ſhe is reconciled and reduced to the true obedience of the Church, the ſatisfaction and pleaſure he ſhall receive thence will not be leſs than if he ſaw her raiſed from death to life. III, That if inſtead of treading in the ſteps of her progenitors, who with ſingular zeal have always protected our holy Catholic Faith, the ſaid Lady ſhould chuſe to remain ſtubborn and obſtinate, this would diſpleaſe the King as highly as it is poſſible for any thing to do, and would make him wholly forget the friendſhip, reſpect, and duty of a good nephew; nothing being ſo odious to him as the followers of ſuch reprobate Sects, to which he is a mortal enemy. If theſe Remonſtrances produced nothing, then Dr. Oriz was to preach ſome polemical Sermons, which the Dutcheſs ſhould be obliged to hear with all her houſhold, whatever refuſal or difficulty ſhe could poſſibly make. Having continued this for ſome days, if he ſaw that by ſuch means he could do no good with the ſaid Lady, he was ordered to declare to her, in the preſence of the Duke her huſband, that it is his Majeſty's will and pleaſure, and he actually intreats and moſt earneſtly exhorts the ſaid Lord Duke, that he cauſe the ſaid Lady to be put in a place ſeparate from all company and converſation, where ſhe may no longer corrupt any body but herſelf, taking from her her own children and all her family in general, of what nation ſoever they be, who ſhall be accuſed or ſtrongly ſuſpected of the ſaid errors and falſe doctrines, that they may be brought to juſtice. . . . . And that ſentence being paſſed on them, the delinquents may receive exemplary puniſhment and correction. All this was to no purpoſe: read Mr. le Laboureur's words (43). The Duke of Ferrara was not dextrous enough to hinder Ann d'Eſte his daughter from being tainted with the new opinions. Her mother, who cauſed her to be brought up to learning, gave her as a companion in her ſtudies Olympia Fulvia Morata, a young Lady of great parts, who was afterwards a good Lutheran. Cum Anna Herculis Eſtenſis Ferrarienſium Principis filia iiſdem literis à Joanne Sinapio viro ſummo inſtitueretur, ut haberet quicum honeſta æmulatione certaret, viſum matri eſt . . . ut Olympia in Aulam in qua aliquot annos magna cum laude fuit advocaretur (44). i. e. " While Ann, the " daughter of Hercules d'Eſte, Duke of Ferrara, was " inſtructed in the ſame kind of learning by John Sina- " pius, a man of great eminence, that ſhe might have " a companion who might raiſe in her a noble emu- " lation, her mother thought proper . . . . to ſend for " Olympia to court, where ſhe lived ſome years in " high eſteem." The converſation of this young Lady gave the Princeſs Ann a great inſight into Religion; and it is moreover ſaid that ſhe was ſenſibly concerned at the puniſhments which were inflicted on the Proteſtants after the affair of Amboiſe, and that ſhe exhorted Catherine de Medicis not to ſhed innocent blood. It is Thuanus who tells us this. Sola Anna Ateſtina Guiſii uxor miti ingenio fœmina, & quæ à teneris annis Ferrariæ ſub Renata parente ei doctrinæ quæ tunc exagitabatur innutrita fuerat, Olympiæ Moratæ lectiſſimæ & eruditiſſimæ fœminæ conſuetudine ad id uſa, lacrimas non tenuiſſe dicitur, ultroque Catharinam monuiſſe ut ſi regem ac regnum ſalvum vellet, ab innocentum ſuppliciis abſtineri juberet (45). i. e. " Ann d'Eſte, wife to the " Duke of Guiſe, a Lady of a mild temper, and who " had been from her infancy brought up by her mo- " ther at Ferrara in the doctrines then under perſecu- " tion, for which end ſhe had Olympia Morata, a " Lady of diſtinguiſhed merit and learning, given her " for a companion, is ſaid to have been the only per- " ſon who did not refrain tears, and to have adviſed " Catherine of her own accord, that if ſhe wiſhed well " to the King and Kingdom, ſhe ſhould give orders to " abſtain from putting innocent people to death." At the time of the League ſhe was very zealous againſt thoſe of the Reformed Religion: family-intereſts, and the remembrance of Poltrot (46), perhaps made her change her opinion. The Duke of Ferrara had quarrelled with Renata before the reign of Henry II; for here is what Rabelais wrote from Rome, in the year 1536. " The Princeſs Renata is in danger of receiv- " ing ſome vexation on this account: the Duke has " taken from her Madam de Soubiſe, her Gover- " nante, and makes her be waited on by Italian wo- " men only, which is no good ſign (47)."

(42) In the Additions to Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 747.

(43) She obſtinately endured the effects of theſe menaces, on which Account Brantôme obſerves there was for ſome time a miſunderſtanding between her and her husband, who could do no more than take from her the education of her children. Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 749.

(44) Cœlius Secundus Curio, in Epiſtola ad Betuleium, inter Epiſtolas Olympiæ Fulviæ Moratæ, pag. m. 97.

(45) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. 24. pag. 496, 497. ad ann. 1560.

(46) Who aſſaſſinated the Duke of Guiſe, her husband.

(47) Epitres de Rabelais, pag. 18.

☞FERRARI (OCTAVIAN), a learned Writer in the ſixteenth Century, was born of a noble family at Milan September the 23d 1518, and ſon of Jerom Ferrari. After he had ſtudied polite Learning, Philoſophy, and Phyſic in the moſt celebrated Univerſities of Italy, he was choſen Profeſſor of Ethics and Politics in the College founded by Paul Canobio by his advice, and held this place for eighteen years. The Senate of Venice engaged him afterwards to remove to Padua, where he explained the Philoſophy of Ariſtotle with ſo much ſkill and elegance, that Francis Vimercat, who was Profeſſor in the Royal College at Paris in the time of Francis I, returning to Italy upon the death of that King, fixed upon him preferably to all other learned men, for the publication of his works. He continued at Padua four years, and then returned to Milan where he continued to teach Philoſophy till his death, which happened in 1586. He was then ſixty eight years of age. We ſhall give an account of his works in the note [A]. He was excellently ſkilled in polite Literature, which enabled him to treat of the Sciences in a pure and elegant ſtyle. He excelled principally in Philoſophy, and was eſteemed a ſecond Ariſtotle. But he was no leſs illuſtrious for probity than his learning. Bartholomew Capra, the Civilian, his intimate friend, to whom he left his Library, made his funeral Oration (a).

(a) Teiſſier, Elog. des Hommes tirez de l'Hiſt. de M. de Thou avec des Additions; and Struvii Bibliotheca Antiqua 1705.

[A] His Works.] I. De Sermonibus exotericis. Venice 1575 in 4to. This Work is very uſeful to thoſe, who would inform themſelves of the Doctrine of Ariſtotle. It is well known that this Philoſopher's Works were of two kinds; the one ſtyled Exoterics were for all ſorts of people; the other intitled Acroamatics were only for the uſe of his ſcholars. Ferrari treats at length of the former. His Book was reprinted with the Additions of Melchior Goldaſt, and a new Diſſertation of Ferrari de Diſciplina Encyclio, under the general title of Clavis Philoſophiæ Peripateticæ Ariſtotelicæ. Francfort 1606 in 8vo. II. De Origine Romanorum. Milan 1607 in 8vo. Though our Author did not put his laſt hand to this work, and death prevented him from finiſhing it, yet it deſerved to be continued down to poſterity, according to Grævius, who has inſerted it in the firſt Volume of his Roman Antiquities, and added his own Corrections to it. Bartholomew Capra, who publiſhed it at firſt, added ſomething of his own, which he ſeemed to think better of than it deſerved. III. He tranſlated Athenæus into Latin, and wrote ſome Notes upon Ariſtotle. T.

☞FERRARI (FRANCISCO BERNARDINO), was of the ſame family with the preceding, and born at Milan about the year 1577. Being entered at firſt as a novice in the Congregation of St. Ambroſe and St. Charles, he applied himſelf with great ſucceſs to Philoſophy and Divinity as well as to the Latin, Greek, Spaniſh and French Languages, and was admitted a Doctor of the Ambroſian College. His vaſt knowledge of books, and abilities in all kinds of learning, induced Frederic Borromeo Archbiſhop of Milan, to appoint him to travel into divers parts of Europe, in order to purchaſe the beſt books and manuſcripts, with a deſign to form a Library at Milan. Ferrari paſſed over part of Italy and Spain, and collected a great number of books, which laid the foundation of the famous Ambroſian Library. About the year 1638 he was appointed Director of the College of the Nobles lately erected at Padua, in the room of Balthaſar Bonifacio. He diſcharged that poſt two years, at the end of which his indiſpoſitions obliging him to quit it, he returned to Milan. This is what we are acquainted with by Tomaſini (a). We are informed of no other particulars of our Author's life, and he is beſt known by his works [A]. He died January 30, 1669, aged ninety two years (b). All his writings are full of learning and curious reſearches into Antiquity; and he wrote with great clearneſs and method, and is very judicious in his conjectures, and exact in his quotations (c).

(a) In his Gymnaſium Patavinum.

(b) See Ghilini, Teatro d'Huomini Letterati, Part 1. pag. 66. & Filippo Picinelli, Ateneo de i Letterati Milaneſi, pag. 200.

(c) Du Pin, Nouvelle Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 17. pag. 109. edit. Amſterdam 1711 in 4to.

☞FERRARI

[A] His Works.] I. De Antiquo Eccleſiaſticarum Epiſtolarum Genere Libri tres. Milan 1613 in 8vo. It. Editio Nova, cum Indicibus Auctorum, Rerum, & Verborum; curâ Gebh. Theod. Meieri. Helmſtad 1678 in 4to. This ſubject had been treated of before by Gerard Rodolphus de Grave, Canon of that city, who died about the year 1594, in a Book intitled De Litteris Canonicis; videlicet, Formatis, Pacificis, Commendatiis, ac Dimiſſoriis, quarum in Eccleſiâ primitivâ uſus fuit. Cologne 1582 in 8vo. Ferrari has quoted this Treatiſe in the ſecond Chapter of his Work, and borrowed a great many things from it without any acknowledgment. II. De Ritu ſacrarum Eccleſiæ Catholicæ Concionum Libri tres. Milan 1620 in 4to. Paris 1664 in 8vo. Cum Præfatione Joannis Georgii Grævii, Utrecht 1692 in 8vo. This Work is very curious. We are informed in the Journal des Sçavans (1), that when the ſecond Edition was publiſhed at Paris, the former was become very ſcarce; which, it is ſaid, was occaſioned by this circumſtance, that Frederic Borromeo Arcbiſhop of Milan, having written a Treatiſe de concionante Epiſcopo, was jealous of Ferrari's Book which was publiſhed at the ſame time with his; upon which account he endeavoured to the utmoſt to ſuppreſs it, and ſucceeded ſo far as to render it extremely ſcarce. But Father Niceron obſerves (2), that there is no ground for this ſtory; ſince Ferrari's Book was not publiſhed at the ſame time with the Archbiſhop's; the latter not being printed till 12 years after, that is, till 1632, after that Prelate's death, and with a permiſſion which ſhews there was a ſede vacante. The jealouſy aſcribed therefore to the Archbiſhop is merely imaginary, as well as the pretended ſuppreſſion. If Ferrari's Book became ſcarce, it is juſt the ſame caſe in the ſpace of 45 years with all Books, whether good or bad, of which there was but one Edition. This Treatiſe is divided into three Books. The firſt treats of the Sermons themſelves; the ſecond of the Preacher and the Auditors; and the third of the place and time of preaching. III. De Veterum Acclamationibus & plauſu Libri ſeptem. Milan 1627 in 4to. It is likewiſe reprinted in the ſixth Volume of Grævius's Roman Antiquities. Du Pin tells us (3) that his Work is full of Eccleſiaſtical and Profane Learning upon the ſubject of the acclamations and applauſes uſed amongſt the antients, which is treated with great accuracy and in its whole extent. Ferrari began ſeveral other Works upon divers Points of Antiquity, both Eccleſiaſtical and Profane; as it is ſurprizing, that as he lived forty two years after the publication of the laſt mentioned Work, he ſhould not have publiſhed ſome other. T.

(1) 2. du Février 1665. See likewiſe Du Pin, Nouvelle Biblioteq. des Auteurs Eccleſ. tom. 17. pag. 102. edit. Amſterd. 1711 in 4to.

(2) Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes illuſtres, tom. 28. pag. 280.

(3) Ubi ſupra, pag. 108.

FERRARI (OCTAVIO), a very learned writer in the ſeventeenth Century, whom Moreri confounds with Octavian abovementioned, was born at Milan May 20, 1607 of the ſame family. His father dying when he was but four years old, his uncle by the father's ſide Franciſco Bernardino Ferrari, mentioned in the preceding article, took him home to his houſe and educated him. He went through his ſtudies in the Ambroſian College; and after he had paſſed through his courſe of Philoſophy and Divinity, applied himſelf intirely to polite Literature, in which he made ſo conſiderable a progreſs, that Cardinal Frederic Borromeo entertained a great eſteem and affection for him, and procured a Profeſſorſhip of Rhetoric in that College, though he was then but one and twenty years old. Six years after, that is in 1634, the Republic of Venice invited him to Padua, in order to teach Eloquence, Politics, and the Greek Language in the Univerſity of that City. This Univerſity was then extremely declined from its former flouriſhing eſtate; but he reſtored it to its luſtre. The Republic rewarded him by enlarging every ſix years his penſion, which at firſt was but five hundred ducats, but at laſt was raiſed to two thouſand. After the death of Joſeph Ripamonte, Hiſtoriographer of the City of Milan, our Author was appointed to write the Hiſtory of that City, and a penſion of two hundred crowns was ſettled upon him for that purpoſe. He began that work, and compoſed eight books; but finding that they would not communicate to him the pieces which were neceſſary for him, and which were repoſited in the Archives of Milan, whither he went every year to ſearch for materials for his work, he deſiſted from it, and left what he had done to his heir on condition that he ſhould not publiſh it. His reputation and the merit of his writings [A] procured him preſents and penſions from foreign Princes. Chriſtina Queen of Sweden, in whoſe honour he had made a public diſcourſe upon her mounting the throne, preſented him with a chain of gold worth a thouſand crowns, and honoured him with her letters. Lewis XIV of France gave him for ſeven years a penſion of five hundred crowns. The infirmities, to which hard Students are ſubject, attacked him very early in life. Frequent pains of the head diverted him from his ſtudies, but he

[A] His writings.] They are as follow: I. De Re Veſtiariâ Libri tres. Padua 1642 in 8vo. Secunda Editio, Libri ſeptem. Quatuor poſtremi nunc primum prodeunt, reliqui emendatiores & auctiores, adjectis Iconibus. Padua 1654 in 4to. Editio nova; accedunt Analecta de Re Veſtiariâ, & Diſſertatio de Lucernis ſepulchralibus Veterum. Padua 1685 in 4to. The two firſt works were reprinted in the ſixth volume of Græviuſ's Roman Antiquities, and that upon the ancient ſepulchral Lamps in the twelfth. Tho' Ferrari's book de Re Veſtiariâ did not ſatisfy Ezechiel Spanheim and Boecler, who repreſent it as a very ſlight and ſuperficial work; other learned men have judged more favourably of it; and Morhof ſtyles it a Book full of Literature, and which intirely explains the ſubject, of which it treats. Græviuſ, Rubenius, and Almeloveen ſpeak of it likewiſe in the ſame manner. The diſcourſe upon the ancient ſepulchral Lamps is principally levelled againſt thoſe, who have aſſerted, that the ancients had the ſecret of making an oil, which would never conſume, or of diſpoſing their lamps in ſuch a manner, that in proportion as they burnt, the ſmoke inſenſibly condens'd, and was reduced into an oil as before. Fortunius Licetus wrote a long Diſſertation de Lucernis Antiquorum reconditis, in four Books, printed at Venice 1621 in 4to, to maintain this opinion; but Ferrari has clearly ſhewn, that theſe eternal lamps, and this oil, which would never be conſumed, are mere chimera's, and all the ſtories related of them abſolute fables. II. Pallas Suecica, Panegyricus Suecorum Reginæ imperium auſpicanti dictus. Third Edition 1651 in 8vo. III. De Laudibus Franciſci Putei. Padua 1651 in 8vo. IV. Analecta de Re Veſtiariâ, ſive Exercitationes ad Alberti Rubenii Commentarium de Re Veſtiariâ & lato clavo. Acceſſit Diſſertatio de Veterum Lucernis ſepulchralibus. Padua 1670 in 4to. This is the firſt edition of theſe Treatiſes, which were afterwards ſubjoined to his book de Re Veſtiariâ. Ferrari could not bear, that Rubenius ſhould find any thing exceptionable in his Book de Re Veſtiariâ; and wrote this Book to criticize that Author in his turn. He has done this in a little too ſevere a manner, without conſidering, that the work which he attacked was poſthumous, and conſequently had not Rubenius's laſt hand. But perſons of the beſt diſpoſition do not love to be criticized, and frequently loſe their temper, and ſometimes even their reaſon, in endeavouring to revenge the injury, which they imagine they have received by being criticized upon. Ferrari complains (1) of a Writer, who had compoſed a Treatiſe of Roman Antiquities, in which he had copied from him all that he had ſaid concerning the Dreſs of the Romans without quoting him, and by that means incurred the imputation of Plagiariſm. He does not name him, but the perſon was Henry Kipping (2), who in a new edition of his philoſophical works printed at Bremen in 1674, added a ſhort Apology againſt Ferrari's Acculation. V. Prolufiones XXVI. Epiſtolæ. Formulæ ad capienda Doctoris Inſignia. Inſcriptiones. Pars I & II. Padua in 4to 1664 and 1668. Pars III. Acceſſit Panegyricus Ludovico Magno Francorum Regi dictus. Padua in 4to. All theſe little pieces and ſeveral others, which had been printed ſeparately, were collected and diſpoſed into proper order by John Fabricius, who publiſhed them at Helmſtad in 1710 in two volumes in 8vo. VI. Veneta Sapientia, ſeu de optimo Civitatis Statu Prolufio. Padua 1675 in 4to. VII. Electorum Libri duo. Padua 1679 in 4to. In this work our Author treats of ſeveral points of Antiquity, which have no connection with each other. VIII. Origines Linguæ Italicæ. Padua 1676 in fol. The Author of the Journal des Sçavans (3) gives the following judgment of this work. "Scaliger had before "treated of this ſubject in twenty four Books, which "are unfortunately loſt. Tho' Ferrari has not taken "ſo great an extent, yet we find a great deal of learning in him. But he appears ſo jealous of the language of his Country, that he thinks that every "other origin, but what he gives it, as well as the "French and Spaniſh, from the Latin Tongue, would "be injurious to it. This prevents him from aſſenting to the opinion of Cardinal Bembo, who ſup-"poſes, that the Italian owes a good number of its "words to the jargon of Languedoc and Provence." Monſr. Menage has written a Book upon the ſame ſubject to correct the errors of Ferrari, and has committed new ones. John Fabricius pretends, that Ferrari and Menage have fallen into miſtakes merely from their not having ſought for the Etymology of a great many Italian words in the German and Swediſh Languages; and he gives us in the third Tome of his Bibliotheca (4) a long liſt of Italian words, which he imagines to be derived from thoſe languages. IX. De Pantomimis & Mimis Diſſertatio nunc primum edita. Wolfenbuttel 1714 in 8vo. John Fabricius publiſhed this Treatiſe; and Mr. de Sallengre has inſerted it in the ſecond volume of his Roman Antiquities. They are Lectures read by Ferrari upon this ſubject, in which he gives in a conciſe manner every thing remarkable upon that point. X. Diſſertationes duæ, altera de Balneis, de Gladiatoribus altera, nunc demum in lucem editæ à Joanne Fabricio. Helmſtad 1720 in 8vo, pagg. 72. Theſe Diſſertations are very ſhort and clear upon the ſubjects treated in them. T.

(1) Pag. 154.

(2) His Antiquitatum Romanarum Libri IV. were printed at Bremen 1664, in 8vo.

(3) For April 26, 1677.

(4) Pag. 286.

he returned to them as ſoon as he was at eaſe. He died March 7, 1682 in the ſeventy fifth year of his age. He was a man of a ſweet temper, ſincere, and affable, and knew how by his engaging behaviour to gain upon perſons the moſt exaſperated againſt each other, which procured him the title of the Reconciler and Pacificator (a). His ſtyle is ſimple and elevated according to the ſubject, and every where elegant and pure. It is rather diffuſe than ſhort, but full of force, and never tedious. He has been charged with being ſometimes turgid and poetical, which is true in ſome paſſages; but it is when he treats of things which admit of ſome elevation, and where hyperboles are in ſome meaſure allowed. With regard to invention and ſubjects of eloquence, his ſentiments are generally ſolid, ingenious, and well choſen (b).

(a) See his Elogium in Charles Patin's Lyceum Patavinum, and Niceron, Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. des Hommes Illuſtr. tom. 5. pag. 77-80.

(b) Le Clerc, Bibl. Ancien. & Moderne, tom. 6. pag. 177.

FERRARIENSIS. It is under this name that a ſcholaſtic Philoſopher, whoſe name was Francis Sylveſtre, is uſually quoted [A]. He was of Ferrara, and was ſo much eſteemed in his Order (a), that he was choſen General of it in the Chapter that was held at Rome in the year 1525. His corpulency did not hinder him from viſiting the Provinces of the Order, with a deſign to reſtore diſcipline and regularity there as much as it was poſſible (b). He died at Rennes in Britany September the 24th 1528. He was aſſiſted in his death-bed by, and received the Sacraments of the Church from Father Ives Mayeuc, a Dominican, who was Biſhop of Rennes from the 29th of January 1506, and who had been Confeſſor to Queen Ann of Britany, to Charles VIII and Lewis XIIth (c).

(a) That of the Dominicans.

(b) Licet corpore gravis, Provincias tamen Ordinis viſitando luſtravit ex officio, reſtituendæ vitæ regulari... pro viribus intendens. Altamura, in Biblioth. Dominic. pag. 253.

I add, that according to Leandro Alberti (d) he died September the 19th 1528, at the age of fifty four years. This Hiſtorian agrees with Altamura concerning the place; but his Tranſlator has not well tranſlated theſe words, nella città di Renes, in urbe Reneſia, he ſhould have ſaid, Redonibus, or in civitate Redonenſi. D'Argentré aſſerts (e), that Franceſco Sylveſtro, General of the Dominicans died at Rennes October the 20th 1528. He thought falſly that his name was Prieras, which was taking him for Silveſter Prierias Maſter of the Sacred Palace under Pope Leo X.

(c) Taken from Altamura, Biblioth. Dominic. pag. 253.

(d) In Deſcript. Italiæ, folio 350 verſo of the Italian edition of Venice 1561, and pag. 540 of the Latin edition of Cologne 1567.

(e) D'Argentré, Hiſtoire de Bretagne, liv. 12. chap. 69.

[A] It is under that name, that . . . Francis Sylveſtre is uſually quoted.] The work which is chiefly quoted is his Commentary on Thomas Aquinas's four Books againſt the Gentiles. He wrote alſo a Comment on Ariſtotle's Philoſophy, and the Life of the bleſſed Oſanna in ſix volumes. She is a Saint whoſe Confeſſor he had been, and who is extremely venerated at Mantua, becauſe of her holineſs and of her miracles (1).

(1) Ex Altamura, in Biblioth. Domin. pag. 253.

FERRET (ÆMILIUS) in Latin Ferrettus [A], one of the learned Civilians in the ſixteenth Century, was born at Caſtello Franco in Tuſcany [B] November the 14th 1489. As ſoon as he was twelve years old he was ſent to Piſa, where he ſtudied the Civil and Canon Law for three years; he ſpent two other years in the Univerſity of Sienna, after which he went to Rome, and was made Secretary to Cardinal Salviati. He was admitted an Advocate at the age of nineteen years, after a public diſputation before a numerous audience of Cardinals and Biſhops. He left then his Chriſtian name of Dominicus, and took that of Æmilius. Having accepted of the Chair of Law-Profeſſor, he explained ſo learnedly the Law de Rebus creditis (of things with which perſons are truſted) that it gained him the title of Secretary to Leo the Xth. He exerciſed that office for ſome years, after which he reſigned it voluntarily, and retired into his native country. He left it again at the end of two years, his father having been killed there, and went to Tridino in the Dukedom of Montferrat. He married there [C], and having continued there four years, he attended the Marqueſs of Montferrat to Rome and to Naples, that Marqueſs commanding part of the French army. This expedition of the French proving unſucceſsful, Ferret endeavoured to return into his native country, but he was taken by the Spaniards, and could not obtain his liberty but by paying a ranſom. He went into France, and taught the Law at Valence with ſo much reputation, that Francis I made him Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris [D], and ſent him an Envoy

[A] In Latin Æmilius Ferrettus.] Monſieur Graverol the Lawyer was miſtaken, who thought, that this Law-Profeſſor's name was Æmilius Perrottus. He would not inquire whether it was by miſtake that ſome called him Æmilius Ferrettus (1). However it be, he aſſerts, that the Æmilius Perrottus, to whom Bunel wrote Letters, is the ſame with the Civilian Æmilius Ferrettus. It is a miſtake: the latter was an Italian, and the former a Frenchman, as Monſieur Graverol might have learnt from Bunel (2). I take him to be the ſame with the Counſellor in the Parliament, whom Thuanus has mentioned with commendation, and whoſe ſon was killed in the ſlaughter on St. Bartholomew's day. Dionyſius item Perrottus, Æmilii Senatoris Pariſienſis non minus integritate quam juris ſcientia clari F. tanto patre digniſſimus eandem fortunam ſubiit (3). i. e. "Denis Perrot, the worthy ſon of Æmilius Counſellor in the Parliament of Paris, a "man eminent by his honeſty as well as by his know-"ledge in the Law, had the ſame fate." Monſieur Graverol was miſled by the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, where we read the following words. Æmilius Ferretus, ſeu Perrotus, Juriſconſultus ſcripſit &c (4). The Author aſcribes to him the Commentary in Legem Gallus, which belongs only to Perrot.

(1) Æmilius Perrotus, qui & aliis Æmilius Ferrettus dicitur (an errore id factum non eſt hic diſquirendi locus) Juris-conſultus fuit magni nominis. Franciſcus Graverol, Notis in Epiſt. II Bunelli, pag. 7.

(2) See Bunel's 7th Letter, pag. 33.

(3) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. 52. pag. 1077, ad ann. 1572.

(4) Epitom. Biblioth. Geſneri, pag. m. 12.

[B] He was born at Caſtello Franco in Tuſcany.] His Anceſtors, who came originally from Ravenna, ſettled in that city of Tuſcany (5). Obſerve here a blunder or two of Monſieur Allard. Æmilius Ferret, ſays he (6), was of Languedoc, but he taught in the Univerſity of Valence with reputation under Henry II. He ſhould have ſaid under Francis I. He might have obſerved from Panzirolus (7), that he was appointed Counſellor in the Parliament of Grenoble; he would thus have belonged to Monſieur Allard's work for a new reaſon.

(5) Panzirolus, de Claris Leg. Interpret. lib. 2. cap. 167. pag. m. 348.

(6) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 103.

(7) Panzirol. de claris Leg. Interpret. pag. 350.

[C] He married there.] His wife was of a very good family. Ex ſplendida Familia (8). He had ſix ſons and one daughter by her (9), and yet he died childleſs, and his nephew was his heir (10). Which is a new proof, that Æmilius Perrot, the Father of a man, who was killed in the year 1572, is not the ſame with Æmilius Ferret, who died childleſs in the year 1552.

(8) Ibid. p. 349.

(9) Idem, ibid.

(10) Uxore ac liberis amiſſis Marcum Nicolai fratris filium hæredem ſcripſit. Idem, ibid. pag. 350.

[D] Francis I made him Counſellor in the Parliament

Envoy to the Venetians, and to the Florentines. He acquitted himſelf ſo well of that employment, that it determined the Marqueſs of Montferrat to ſend him to the Court of Charles the Vth, after he had obtained Francis the Iſt's conſent for that journey. Ferret attended the Emperor in the expedition of Africa; and as ſoon as he was returned into France the King ſent him to the Florentines during the war in which they were ingaged againſt the Emperor. He went back to France when they were ſubdued, and followed the Court to Nice, where the Pope, Charles the Fifth, and the King of France had an interview: having afterwards reſigned the poſt of Counſellor in the Parliament he went to Lyons, and thence to Florence, where he was admitted a Citizen. He was ſent for to Avignon to teach the Law there. His yearly ſtipend was at firſt 550 crowns, then 800, and then a 1000; which is a ſum that had never been given to any Profeſſor in that Univerſity. He gained the love both of the inhabitants and of the ſtudents; they ſhewed it in a very remarkable manner after his death [E], as will appear by the remarks. He died at Avignon July the 15th 1552. He wrote ſeveral books (a) [F]. There is one of his Letters prefixed to the old French Tranſlation of Boccacio's Decameron [G].

(a) Taken from Panzirolus, lib. 2. cap. 167. de claris Legum Interpret.

of Paris.] It was in the year 1536, if we may depend on Panzirolus: but if he be right in this, he muſt be groſly miſtaken ſoon after, when he ſuppoſes, that after Ferret had been promoted to this poſt, Francis I ſent him to Venice and to Florence, and the Marqueſs of Montferrat into Spain, about the time when Charles the fifth was making preparations for his expedition into Africa. This expedition happened in the year 1535.

[E] He gained the love both of the inhabitants and of the Students; they ſhewed it . . . after his death.] Simon Craveta, his ſucceſſor in the Chair of Law-Profeſſor, venturing to cenſure him in his firſt Lecture, was hiſſed at, and driven out of the city. "Unicè tam "a civibus quam auditoribus dilectus (Ferrettus) ingens "ſui deſiderium reliquit, quod Simonis Cravetæ exem- "plum oſtendit, qui Æmilii Cathedræ ſubrogatus, cum "in prima oratione eum perſtrinxiſſet, ab omnibus ex- "ploſus & urbe ejectus, coactus eſt diſcedere (11)."

(11) Panzir. de claris Legum Interpretibus, pag. 350.

[F] He wrote ſeveral Books.] Here follows what Panzirolus ſays of them (12). Plura in jus civile ſcripſit, & librum de Signo & Ratione inſcriptum, in quo multas leges interpretatus eſt, & alterum Bartoli Everriculum nuncupatum, in quo ejus errores congerit. Notas in Inſtitutiones, Opinionum Volumen, Reſponſa, nec paucas Epiſtolas edidit. Opus etiam de Armorum ratione lingua Hetruſca compoſuit. i. e. "He wrote a great "deal upon the Civil Law, and alſo a Book in- "titled de Signo & Ratione, in which he has explain- "ed a great many Laws: another intitled, The ſweep- "ing of Bartolus, in which he has collected a great "many blunders of that Civilian. He has alſo pub- "liſhed Notes upon the Inſtitutes, a Volume of Opi- "nions, Anſwers, and ſeveral Letters. He alſo has "written a Book in Italian of the bearing of Arms." We muſt add to all this a Commentary upon Tacitus.

(12) Idem, ibid.

[G] There is one of his Letters prefixed to Boccacio's Decameron.] This Letter is in Italian, and dated from Lyons May the firſt 1545. He wrote it to the Queen of Navarre. It is a very good Elogy of the Decameron, and of the French Tranſlation, which Anthony le Maçon had made of it by that Queen's order. Emilio Ferretti (thus he ſigns his name) declares, that he never thought that the Tranſlator, tho' a man of wit, a diligent, and good writer, and very well ſkilled in the Italian Tongue, could perfectly well ſucceed in tranſlating of the Decameron, but that he found the contrary upon peruſing his Tranſlation. The Sieur le Maçon's application to agriculture and building, the avocations occaſioned by the cares of his family, for he had a wife and a great many children; all this, I ſay, gave our Ferretti little hopes of ſeeing a good tranſlation written by Maçon. Per la moltitudine & varietà de le cure, ne le quali egli ha reſo ſingular conto di ſe, o per eſſer deditiſſimo a la agricoltura & à l'edificare, ſecondo che dimoſtrano le ville & le caſe ſue, o per haver moglie & buon numero di figluoli & maſchi & femine, à quali e ſtato meſtieri di altro aiuto che di teſſer favole, à ogni altra coſa aſpettavo che mi riuſciſſi che à tradur novelle, almeno in ſi gran numero & di ſi gran varieta: ma la bellezza de l'ingegno ſuo, & il compartimento, per il quale egli ha ſaputo coſi ben diſpenſer il tempo, ha vinte & tante ſue difficultà, & l'imagination mia. Here is by the by a ſhort account of the old Tranſlator of the Decameron.

FERRI (PAUL), in Latin Ferrius, was one of the moſt learned Divines in the ſeventeenth Century. He was born February the 24th 1591, at Mets, where his family made a good figure [A]. He was ſent to ſtudy Divinity at Montaban, and made ſuch conſiderable progreſs in that Science, that he was admitted a Miniſter at Mets in the year 1610 at the age of nineteen. He had already publiſhed a book then [B], and the title of a Proponent * was united in him with that of an Author. The books he publiſhed afterwards at different times gained him a great reputation [C]. He had eminent talents for

* See the marginal quotation (9) in the article of BEKKER.

(1) The Oxford Catalogue ſhould have ſtiled him Metenſis and not Metrenſis.

[A] He was born . . . at Mets (1), where his family made a good figure.] His father James Ferri went for forty years ſucceſſively through all the degrees of the ancient Magiſtracy of that City, and did not get out of employment, but when the Juriſdiction of thoſe Judges, who were called the twelve, was ſuppreſſed in the year 1643. His wife Elizabeth Jolli, our Paul Ferri's mother, was ſiſter to the famous Peter Jolli the King's Attorney at Mets, Toul and Verdun, to whom Monſieur le Bey de Batilli, and Monſieur Boiſſard inſcribed ſeveral of their Epigrams in their Latin Poems.

[B] At the age of nineteen he had already publiſhed a Book.] Here follows the title of it, Les prémieres Oeuvres Poetiques de Paul Ferri Meſſin, où ſous la douce diverſité de ſes conceptions ſe rencontrent les honnêtes libertez d'une jeuneſſe. i. e. "The firſt poetical Works "of Paul Ferri of Mets; in which amongſt the ſweet "variety of his thoughts is to be met the honeſt free- "dom of youth." He cauſed it to be printed at Montauban in 1610. He was then but a Proponent *: but as he was diſpoſing himſelf to be ſoon promoted to the dignity of a Miniſter, he finiſhed his advertiſement to the reader in theſe words: Sat ludo nugiſque datum; i. e. "We have now ſpent time enough in "joking and trifling." If this Collection of Poems was in Latin it would be intitled Juvenilia Pauli Ferrii. We have here a new Author to be added to the Enfans celebres or Famous children, if Monſieur Baillet reprints his Book upon that ſubject. The firſt piece we met with in theſe Poems, is a Paſtoral intitled, Iſabelle, ou le Dedain de l'amour; i. e. "Iſabella, or "the Scorn of Love." There are afterwards ſeveral Sonnets, and ſome Stanzas with this title, Les Gloires d'Iſabelle; i. e. "Iſabella's Trophies;" and laſtly ſeveral Stanzas and Sonnets for Miniſters and other perſons of Montauban, Mets, and la Rochelle.

* See the marginal note (9) in the article of BEKKER.

(2) It is a book in 8vo of 559 pages; it is ſaid in the title page that it is printed at Gotſtad, Gotſtadii. It is probably a fictitious name, which in High-German ſignifies the City of God, by which Geneva is meant.

[C] The Books he publiſhed afterwards at different times gained him a great reputation.] He publiſhed one in 1616 intitled, Scholaſtici orthodoxi ſpecimen (2); i. e. "An Eſſay on the Orthodoxy of Schoolmen." He ſhews in it, that the doctrine of the Proteſtants with for preaching. He was the moſt eloquent man of his Province, and whoſe Sermons moved the audience moſt. His noble preſence, his venerable countenance, and fine way of delivery added a great luſtre to his eloquence. His enemies ſpread a falſe report abroad concerning him, namely, that he was one of the Miniſters whom Cardinal de Richelieu had bribed to procure a coalition of the two Religions. This falſity is to be met with in Guy Patin's Letters [D]. However it is certain, that he was grieved at the diviſion of the Proteſtants, and hoped that he could contribute ſomething to forward a reunion. It was no doubt with this view that he kept a great correſpondence with Dury (a) [E], who negotiated regard to God's Grace, has been taught by the Schoolmen. This Treatiſe gained him the eſteem of the illuſtrious Monſieur du Pleſſis Mornai, who wrote him a Letter about it (3), in which he alſo gave him ſome advice concerning another Work, which he had been told Monſr. Ferri was writing. That other work was printed at Sedan for John Jannon in the year 1618, and is intitled, Le dernier deſeſpoir de la Tradition contre l'Ecriture, ou Refutation du Livre de François Veron. i. e. "The laſt Shift of Tradition againſt the holy "Scripture; or a Confutation of Francis Veron's "Book." Here follows the title of another work publiſhed at Leiden in the year 1630. Pauli Ferrii Vindiciæ pro Scholaſtico Orthodoxo adverſus Leonardum Perinum Jeſuitam, Doctorem Theologum, & Univerſitatis Muſſipontanæ Cancellarium, juſtæ, plenæ, amicæ, in quibus agitur de Prædeſtinatione & annexis, de Gratia & libero Arbitrio, de Cauſa peccati & juſtificatione. i. e. "A juſt, full and friendly defence of the Book intiled, the Orthodoxy of the Schoolmen, againſt Leonard Perinus, a Jeſuit, Doctor of Divinity, and "Chancellor of the Univerſity of Pont-a-Mouſſon; "which treats of Predeſtination, and the Doctrines "connected with that, of Grace and Free-will, of the "Cauſe of ſin, and of Juſtification." This Jeſuit had publiſhed in the year 1619 a Book which he intitled, Thraſonica Pauli Ferrii Calviniſtæ (4); i. e. "The "Bravado of Paul Ferri the Calviniſt." In the year 1654 Monſieur Ferri wrote a general Catechiſm, in order to prove that it had been neceſſary to reform the Church; he publiſhed it that ſame year with this title, Catechiſme general de la Reformation; i. e. "A "general Catechiſm of the Reformation." Monſieur Boſſuet, who was then Canon and Archdeacon of Mets, and who is become famous ſince under the name of Biſhop of Condom, and Biſhop of Meaux, wrote againſt this Treatiſe of Monſieur Ferri. I muſt not forget to obſerve, that this Miniſter was choſen to preach the Funeral Sermon on the death of Lewis XIII, and that on the death of the Queen-mother Ann of Auſtria. Theſe two Sermons have been printed. He alſo made on ſome occaſions prayers for the recovery of their Majeſty's health; theſe prayers have alſo been printed, and are very beautiful.

(a) See his Article.

(3) Dated June 19, 1617. It is printed in the 3d volume of the Memoires de Du Pleſſis, pag. 1158.

(4) Alegambe, Bibliotb. Societat. Jeſu, pag. 305. His Continuator ſays Verrii inſtead of Ferrii.

Let us add to all this a paſſage from Monſieur Ancillon (5). "Monſieur Ferry wrote alſo another Book "(6), which is intitled, Le dernier deſeſpoir de la Tradition; it is a very good book in its kind. He "alſo wrote in the year 1624 a ſmall Book intitled, "Remarquez d'Hiſtoires ſur le Diſcours de la vie & de "la mort de St. Livier, & le recit de ſes Miracles "nouvellement publiées par le Sieur de Rambervillier "Lieutenant General au Bailliage de l'Evéché de Mets, "avec diverſes approbations des Docteurs. i. e. "Hiſtorical Remarks upon the Diſcourſe concerning the "Life and Death of St. Livier, and the account of "his Miracles, lately publiſhed by the Sieur de Ramberviller, Lieutenant General in the Bayliwick of "the Biſhoprick of Mets, with the approbation of "ſeveral Doctors." Monſieur Ferri would not be "known for the Author of this ſmall piece, becauſe "he wrote it againſt a conſiderable perſon, who was "his countryman, and with whom he would not fall "out; but he has made a preſent of this little Book, "ſince I have been his collegue, and I keep it ſtill: "He wrote with his own hand the following words "under the title of it. Par Paul Ferri; (By Paul "Ferri)."

(5) Ancillon, Mêlange Critique, tom. 2. pag. 269.

(6) He had juſt mentioned the Scholaſticus Orthodoxus.

(7) Patin, Letter 509, dated March 24, 1670, pag. 490. of the 3d vol. of the Geneva edition 1691.

[D] This falſity is to be met with in Guy Patin's Letters.] Here follows the paſſage (7), "Monſ. Ferri Miniſter of Mets died a month ago. He was one of the "moſt learned men amongſt thoſe of his Religion. "If Cardinal de Richelieu had lived ſome time longer, "he would have reconciled the two Religions. There "were ſeveral Miniſters bribed for this purpoſe; Mon"ſieur Ferri was one of them, and had a yearly pen"ſion of five hundred crowns. Thus the Huguenots "ſpeak of him here." This Miniſter's enemies revived this falſe report, when he had publiſhed his general Catechiſm, in which they pretended that he laid himſelf open to his adverſary; I mean Monſieur Boſſuet Archdeacon of Mets, who wrote againſt him.

[E] He kept a great correſpondence with Dury.] This correſpondence laſted above twenty five or twenty ſix years. I ſhall relate on this occaſion a ſtory which has been communicated to me. Dury being at Francfort Fair in April 1662, declared to ſome Gentlemen of Mets, that he extremely longed to ſee Monſieur Ferri. When theſe Gentlemen were ready to return home, they aſked him whether he would go in company with them, and exhorted him to undertake the journey, offering to wait for him till the next day. Dury wiſhed that they had given him more time to conſider; but he was obliged to take very ſoon a final reſolution: he reſolved to go to Mets; but he met with two difficulties: the firſt was, that he muſt conſent to dreſs after the French faſhion, like a country-man: the ſecond, to have his great white and ſquare beard ſhaved. He had a great diſlike for the firſt, and the ſecond was a terrible vexation for him. But his great deſire of ſeeing Monſieur Ferri made him get over theſe two obſtacles. He ſet out with the Gentlemen, and they arrived ſo late at Mets, that Dury was obliged to put off his viſit till the next day. But one of the Gentlemen, with whom he came, went early in the morning to Monſieur Ferri, and told him that Dury was arrived, and that it would be civil to make him the firſt viſit. Monſieur Ferri was ſo ſurprized and ſo overjoyed at this news, and was ſo full of the pleaſure of ſaluting immediately this good Doctor, that he forgot to tie the garters of his breeches, and went out half dreſſed. Their meeting was attended with a thouſand edifying tokens of zeal and mutual eſteem. It is thought, that the reſult of their conferences was, that Ferri drew up a writing, which he directed to the Divines of Straſburg. One of them, who probably was not for a coalition of Religions, wrote againſt Monſieur Ferri. Obſerve by the by how much Monſieur Amyraut was miſtaken, when in the year 1647 he ſpoke of Dury as of a man who was dead (8).

Let us tranſcribe here, what Monſieur Ancillon, Monſieur Ferri's collegue, has ſaid of Dury (9). "He "came to Mets, where he conferred with Monſieur "Ferri and me in another perſon's houſe. He told us "as a ſecret all that he had done till then, and what "he intended to do afterwards, and aſked us our ad"vice. We obſerved that he was an honeſt man, "very learned, and very capable of managing an af"fair of that importance. He had already put it in "a great forwardneſs; he had the promiſe of the "Princes of Germany and of the Kings of the North. "He told us that he did not meet with any difficulty "from the Princes, and that there were only ſome "Clergymen who made objections againſt that great "and deſirable work, and oppoſed it. He was very "well ſatisfied with the charity of the Gentlemen of "Zurich, who had furniſhed him with large ſums of "money for his travels, and for ſupplying what he "might want beſides what the Protector (10) allowed "him. We encouraged him as much as we could to "continue his labours till he had performed his de"ſign."

(8) Andrew Rivet obſerved this blunder. Scripſit in ſua præfatione (that is to ſay in the preface of his Specimen Animadverſionum againſt Spanheim) Rever. Duræum piæ memoriæ non depoſuiſſe niſi cum vita ſtudium concordiæ inter Reformatos & Lutheranos ſarciendæ, qui etiamnum vivit Dei gratia & valet. i. e. "He wrote in "his preface, "that the late "Rev. Dury of "bleſſed memory "did to his laſt "breath deſire "to reconcile "and unite the "Reformed with "the Lutherans; whereas "Duræus is ſtill "alive and in "good health, "thank God." Andrew Rivetus, Epiſt. Apologet. ad Guill. Fratrem, dated July 14, 1648. Oper. tom. 3. pag. 386, 387.

(9) Ancillon, Mêlange Critique, tom. 2. pag. 244, 245.

(10) Oliver Cromwel.

In the firſt edition of this Dictionary I gave an account of what was contained in the Memoirs, that had been communicated to me, which is, that the reſult of Dury and Ferri's conference in 1662 was, that the negotiated in Germany the reunion of the Proteſtants, and was an honeſt man, full of zeal and piety, but who at laſt became ſomewhat fanatical [F]. Paul Ferri died December the 27th 1669. He had never left off preaching. They found above fourſcore ſtones in his bladder; and it was this that occaſioned his death. He had a very fine Library, and took a delight in writing his remarks on the blank leaves, which are uſed to be left at the beginning, and at the end of books; and as he wrote a very ſmall but neat hand, he wrote a great many things upon thoſe leaves, which could eaſily be read. In the inſcription of his picture are theſe words, Verbi Divini Miniſter [G]; i. e. "Miniſter the latter wrote a work, which determined a Divine of Straſburgh to write againſt him. This Divine cannot be Dorſcheus, for he died in the year 1659; ſo that his Book de Gratia adverſus Calviniſtam Ferrium (of Grace againſt Ferri the Calviniſt) cannot relate to any thing that followed the conference between the Reconciler Dury and the Miniſter of Mets. What Dury relates, that there were only ſome Clergymen who oppoſed the coalition or reconciliation of Religions, deſerves to be obſerved, and confirms what the reader will find hereafter (11). Hulſeman Profeſſor of Divinity publiſhed at Wittemberg in the year 1644, a Book againſt Dury's project, and intitled it, Calviniſmus irreconciliabilis; (Calviniſm irreconcileable).

(11) In the Remark [D] of the Article HOTTINGER.

[F] Dury at laſt became ſomewhat fanatical.] This appears by the particulars, which I have related above (12) concerning his Apocalyptical deſigns, and ſtill more by the great hopes he entertained from his new expoſition of the Apocalyps. I could not add this laſt particular to the preceding, becauſe I happened to be then at the laſt page of the firſt Volume of this Dictionary; I referred it therefore to this place. Pray let us conſider Dury's Scheme. It is a Method of Meditation deſigned to diſcover the true ſenſe of the holy Scripture by itſelf, in order to prevent all occaſions of diſputing about what may be doubtful: for in caſe any doubt ariſes, there is nothing elſe to do, but to turn immediately to ſome one paſſage, or to ſeveral, in which the controverted ſubject is mentioned: and the true ſenſe of the Scripture being found out by the common rule of interpretation, the controverſy is thereby immediately determined, provided it be agreed beforehand, to admit the ſenſe of the holy Scripture (13). He adds that in order to give an Eſſay of his Method, he was willing to chooſe the Apocalypſe or Revelation of St. John, which is acknowledged without diſpute to be the darkeſt and moſt difficult of the whole Bible; that by deſcribing the method, which leads us to a true underſtanding of it, we may know that the ſame method will diſcover to us the ſenſe, and ſhew us the true meaning of the other Books and paſſages of the holy Scripture, which are leſs difficult (14). He is of opinion that with God's help this battery againſt the power of Darkneſs will be raiſed after ſuch a manner, that the Lord's hand will be lifted up, according to the Prophecy of Iſaiah, Chap. XXVI, 9, 10, 11, 12, which begins at this time to be fulfilled. We muſt therefore endeavour to have them ſurrounded with ſo much light, that they cannot find any place where to hide themſelves (15). How many idle fancies and vain imaginations have we here! What character muſt a man be of, who flatters himſelf that ſuch a method will afford an evidence ſo clear that it will remove all the doubts which may ariſe about the true ſenſe of ſuch or ſuch paſſages in the Bible? This great reconciler ſounded the trumpet in Zion; for he added to his Book a Latin Piece of four pages in 4to with this title, Celeuſma ad pios Evangelii Miniſtros.

(12) In the Remark [C] of the Article DURY.

(13) Duræus, Intelligence de L'Apocalypſe, pag. 24.

(14) Ibid. pag. 25.

(15) Ibid. Epitre Dedicatoire, pag. 9, 10.

Vos qui per vada Sancta navigantes
Lentos figitis ad mandata remos
Audite hoc monitum, ut celeuſma miſſum
Nomine CHRISTI.

i. e. "A ſignal to the pious Miniſters of the Goſpel. "You who navigating over the Holy Sea put a lazy "hand to the oar when the word of command is "ſpoken; hark to this warning, which is given you "as a ſignal in the name of Chriſt."

The perſon who owned the copy which came into my hands had paſted to it the original of the Letter which Dury wrote to the Conſiſtories of the Province of Groningen, when he ſent them his new ſcheme and his Celeuſma. This Letter is dated from Caſſel June 22, 1674; it ſhews that he was extremely zealous and concerned for his new method.

Obſerve that in order to excuſe him and to ſhew that he did not give himſelf over to idle fancies, it may perhaps be ſaid, that his deſign was to touch the conſcience of thoſe who kept the diviſion up. This appears by the following words. What cauſes a diviſion and hatred amongſt the Chriſtians is nothing elſe but men's reſolution of maintaining the principles and method of their particular faction againſt what the common edification requires, according to what we are taught by St. Paul, 1 Cor. ix. v. 19. . . . . My deſign therefore is to inquire after the truly Evangelical and Spiritual remedy which may be applied to the conſcience of thoſe, who for worldly views keep up a ſpirit of faction amongſt the Chriſtians. This therefore is the foundation and intent of my new ſcheme (16). This, will ſome ſay, was going to the very root both of the evil and of the remedy; we ought not therefore to be ſurprized, that he expected ſuch wonders from it. He deſigned to point out "the means to remove the obſtacles which "kept the minds of the Proteſtants out of the road "which led to a more perfect Reformation, as ought "to de eſtabliſhed both in the Schools and in the "Church, whence the Government of the States will "reap a great benefit by God's bleſſing (17)." But let men ſay what they pleaſe, his notions will ſtill be but idle fancies, ſince it was not leſs difficult to touch the conſcience of the Ring-Leaders, than to enlighten their underſtanding.

(16) Ibid. pag. 17.

(17) Ibid. pag. 25, 26.

[G] In the inſcription of his picture are theſe words Verbi Divini Miniſter.] Several of my Readers will be glad to find here the Diſtich, which is at the bottom of his picture,

Tales ſi multos ferrent hæc ſæcula Ferri,
In Ferri ſæclis aurea ſæcla forent.

i. e. "If there were many ſuch Ferri's in this age, "this age would be a golden age *."

* It is impoſſible to preſerve the gingle and puns of the original in a Tranſlation.

The firſt print of a Miniſter's picture, which the Proteſtants of Mets publiſhed after this, was that of Monſieur Ancillon: they put the words Verbi Divini Miniſter in it, but were obliged to eraſe them (18).

(18) This happened to be falſe. See below Num. VI. of this Remark.

This Monſieur Ancillon was a Miniſter of Mets, and a very worthy man. See his Article (19). His ſon has been very angry at what I have ſaid in this Remark [G], and has publiſhed his complaint. I. He pretends (20), that in order to ſhew how much Monſieur Ferri was reſpected, I have ſaid, that they ſuffered that the words, Miniſter of the R. R. ſhould be put in his print: and that they, who ingraved Monſr. Ancillon's picture, having given him afterwards the ſame title, the Magiſtrates would not ſuffer it; and ordered it to be eraſed, becauſe they had not the ſame regard for the latter, as they had had for the former (21). Was it not poſſible, continues he, to make the illuſtrious Monſieur Ferri appear as great as he really was, without depreſſing Monſieur Ancillon? Could not the former be extolled, without being raiſed on the ruins of the latter? This Diſtinction appears to him (22) odious and affected. He ſays, that one endeavours without a cauſe to aſperſe Monſieur Ancillon's reputation (23). II. He is angry (24) with the perſon, who ſent me materials, and wonders (25) at my credulity, and at the uſe I have made of them. He ſuppoſes, that as I have been a great while in the neighbourhood of Mets, I muſt know pretty well how things went there, and that I was not ignorant of the general eſteem and inexpreſſible love they had there for Monſieur Ancillon. III. He mentions (26) the literary correſpondence there was for ſeveral years between Monſieur Ancillon and me. IV. He does not think (27), that either his father or any perſon of his family ever offended me. V. But he is of opinion (28) that for the ſake of my own reputation I ought not to have taken ſo much care . . . to

A COMPLAINT of Monſ. Ancillon the ſon.

(19) Vol. I. pag. 672.

(20) Diſcours ſur la Vie de feu Monſ. Ancillon, pag. 307.

(21) Ibid. pag. 308.

(22) Ibid.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Ibid. pag. 312.

(25) Ibid. pag. 313.

(26) Ibid.

(27) Ibid. pag. 314.

(28) Ibid.

« Miniſter of the Goſpel ;" which it was not permitted to make uſe of ſince with regard name Monſieur Ancillon both in the Body and in the Index of my Work, ſince I deſigned to give him only a place in it, which is ſo little worthy ſuch a great man as he was. VI. Coming to the matter in hand, he aſſerts that what I have ſaid is falſe, and acquaints the public (29), that the Sieur Philippe engraved Monſieur Ferri's picture ſome time after his death, and called him Miniſter of the R. R; that the King's Attorney excepted immediately againſt that title, and proſecuted the Engraver for it. That Monſieur Ferri's heirs refuſing to be concerned in that cauſe, the Engraver (30) fell into a paſſion againſt his own Work, and, if ſome perſons of note had not prevented him, he would have broke the plate in pieces, out of ſpite, becauſe they ſhewed ſo little concern for him, though when he engraved that picture, he deſigned only to do honour to Monſieur Ferri and to his family; that therefore he only corrected the title, and in order to ſilence the King's Attorney and the Roman Catholics, he put a P between the two R's, meaning thereby the Religion Pretended Reformed. That (31) the ſame Sieur Philippe did ſome years after engrave Monſieur Ancillon's picture, and to avoid the troubles he met with on account of Monſieur Ferri's picture, he put in the other David Ancillon, Miniſtrorum Metenſium Decanus. That no exception was ever made by any perſon againſt theſe words, that they remained without any oppoſition, that the publick has always ſeen them in that print both at the time it was drawn and ever afterwards. That he has the plate actually in his poſſeſſion, and that (32) he is ready to ſhew it to all them that deſire to be convinced there is at leaſt one blunder in my large Work.

(29) Ibid. pag. 308.

(30) Ibid. pag. 309.

(31) Ibid. pag. 310.

(32) Ibid. pag. 311.

I never was more ſurprized in my life than when I read that part of the Work of Monſieur Ancillon's ſon. I did immediately two things. Firſt I wrote to him, that he might be in the right with regard to the matter of fact, but that he could not but be miſtaken with regard to the intention he ſuppoſed one had had. I explained ſome things to him, and deſired him to ſet matters right in the firſt Book he ſhould publiſh. I alſo promiſed him, that I would explain all this in the ſecond Edition of my Work. He ſent me a very obliging anſwer, and aſſured me, that he would very ſoon ſend a Book to the preſs, in which all this would be corrected. The other thing I did was to write to the perſon who had communicated ſome materials to me concerning Monſieur Ferri; I deſired him to let me know whether the two facts I had aſſerted, and which I had from him, could be proved, or whether we ought to confeſs that they were falſe, ſince we had ſeen the Book, in which Monſieur Ancillon's ſon maintained that Monſieur Ferri's print had been excepted againſt, but that his father's had not. We ſhall ſee below what anſwer I received, but let us firſt make ſome obſervations upon the five Articles of the Complaint,

A CONFUTATION of that complaint.

I. I proteſt with the utmoſt ſincerity, that I had not the leaſt deſign to inſinuate to my Readers any notion of ſuperiority or inferiority with regard to theſe two Miniſters of Mets, Monſieur Ferri and Monſieur Ancillon; nor do I believe, that the honeſt man, who ſent me the memoirs, had any ſuch thought. I have read them over again ſince I have been informed of this Complaint, and found nothing in them that may raiſe the leaſt ſuſpicion. The affair is related in a very plain manner, juſt as I have reported it; and it appears evidently, that he deſigned only to mark the exact time when one of the cavils of the Popiſh Miſſionaries againſt the Reformed were ſet on foot. There was a time when they only vexed thoſe Miniſters, who ſtile themſelves Paſtors, but they were not put to any trouble on account of the title of Miniſters of God's Word; at laſt they reſolved to vex them on that account alſo. I imagined that it was this the Gentleman who ſent me memoirs, deſigned to obſerve with regard to the city of Mets and its territories, and it was only with this view that I made uſe of the obſervation relating to Monſieur Ferri's picture. If I had been told, that ſome perſons would pretend, that I intended thereby to raiſe Monſieur Ferri above Monſr. Ancillon, I would have anſwered, that this appeared impoſſible to me. However I remember very well, that it never came into my mind, that ſuch a conſtruction might be put upon my words; if I had ſuſpected it in the leaſt, I would have poſitively declared what was the deſign of my Remark. Judge then, how amazed I was, when I ſaw a perſon complaining publickly, that my deſign was to depreſs and diſgrace Monſieur Ancillon; and that I had ſaid, that the words Miniſter of God's Word were ordered to be eraſed out of his print, becauſe they had not the ſame regard for him as they had had for the other. This is not only charging me with a deſign, which I had not, but alſo imputing words to me, of which there is not the leaſt tittle in my Dictionary. I have obſerved a thouſand times that thoſe who write the Lives or Elogies of illuſtrious men, take a delight in obſerving that ſuch or ſuch a practice began or ceaſed to be in uſe with ſuch or ſuch a Profeſſor, &c. Theſe are Epochs of ſingularities, which are thought to be remarkable; and accordingly the Author of the memoirs mentioned above, was obliged to let me know, at what time the liberty of putting Verbi Divini Miniſter in the prints of the Miniſters, ceaſed, and at what time the prohibition began. But if he had deſigned to hint that there was in this ſome diſtinction to the honour of Monſieur Ferri, he would have been obliged to ſet down exactly all the circumſtances, and to prove in the cleareſt manner, that ſuch circumſtances were really honourable to that Gentleman; otherwiſe he could not ground upon the bare fact any right of ſuperiority. Let us explain this. They who ſay in general, ſuch a one is the laſt who enjoyed that liberty, ſuch a one is the firſt to whom it was refuſed, mark thereby exactly and diſtinctly an Epoch, or fixed time; but ſtill they ſay nothing that can ſhew any difference of merit between the latter and the former. The circumſtance they ſpeak of is a very equivocal ſign. There may ariſe ſome factions, which may undertake to aboliſh a certain cuſtom, and which for three or four years following are not powerful enough to accompliſh that deſign. If a man be promoted to a Profeſſor's Chair during that time, he will enjoy the privileges of that cuſtom: but if the fifth year the factions happen to be powerful enough, a Profeſſor who is choſen then will be debarred of thoſe privileges. Does this prove that he has leſs merit than the other? By no means. It only proves that the power of a party was greater the fifth year, than it had been in the former years. It may even happen, that a faction does not care to exert its power againſt a certain perſon, becauſe they deſpiſe him; they will not introduce their innovations, till a man of the greateſt merit be choſen Profeſſor, becauſe the alteration of a cuſtom is of much greater weight, when it begins with a very eminent man. There are a thouſand and a thouſand caſes, in which the dates which the Author of the memoirs pointed out to me, would be a proof of ſuperiority for the Miniſter Ancillon, and of inferiority for the other Miniſter. But the truth of the matter is, that on this occaſion there was no deſign to hint any kind of ſuperiority neither with regard to the one nor to the other; the only intention was to ſhew the progreſs of the inſults and vexations which the Miniſters ſuffered. Obſerve that the Judges ſtirred up by the Miſſionaries, or thro' their own ambition (33) choſe rather to vex a Miniſter who had eminent qualities, than one who was but little conſidered. They imagined that the perſecuting of one who was thought to be the ſupport of ſome Reformed Church, would ſooner ruin the whole Party, than the perſecuting of one who had but little merit. Therefore Monſieur Ancillon had been more excuſable, if inſtead of pretending that there was a deſign to diſgrace his father, he had imagined that we intended to extol him. For what is there more honourable for a Miniſter, in the opinion both of the Refugees, and of all the Proteſtants, than to have been the firſt inſtance of a particular vexation of the Miſſionaries (34)? Does not ſuch a choice of the Perſecutors ſeem to prove, that they deſpiſed thoſe with whom they did not begin, and that on the contrary they thought that the injury done to thoſe with whom they began, would be a moſt effectual ſtroke? It may be remembred, that thoſe whom the Clergy employed as their Tools, ſuffered ſome Miniſters of villages, or ſome indifferent Authors, to ſtile themſelves Paſtors; but when they ſaw that the Miniſters of Paris took the ſame title in an excellent Book written by Aubertin a Miniſter of the ſame Church (35), they made a very great ſtir about it. It will be found upon the whole,

(33) An eaſy and infallible method to pleaſe the Court of France, and to obtain favour and preferments, was by ſhewing a great eagerneſs to vex and teaze the Miniſters, &c.

(34) It is an honour to be the firſt victim of perſecution; this is the brighteſt gem in St. Stephen's crown: Proteſilaus's death became remarkable by ſuch a circumſtance in the Trojan war. Hectorea PRIMUS fataliter haſta Proteſilaë cadis. Ovid. Metam. lib. 7. ver. 67.

(35) See above, remark [B] of the article AUBERTIN.

regard to his fellow Miniſters. He left ſome children behind him [H]; and ſome manuſcripts (b) [I]. I do not know whether any of his poſthumous works will ever be publiſhed.

(b) This and moſt of the particulars which the readers will find in the remarks, are extracted from the Memoirs, which the obliging, learned and curious Author of the Remarks on Sanci's Catholic Confeſſion, printed at Amſterdam in the year 1693, has communicated to me. N. B. The Author of thoſe Remarks was Monſieur Le Duchat, who died lately at Berlin. CRIT. REM.

whole, that if the Author of the memoirs and I had had the ſtrange deſign, which is imputed to us, we ſhould have followed a very bad method to compaſs it; we ſhould have been the moſt unſkilful men in the world: we ſhould have hid our intention ſo well, that it would have been unperceivable to all unbyaſſed Readers; and a great many perſons might have inferred from our words quite the contrary of what we intended. Thus much with regard to the firſt head of the Complaint. I ſhall be much ſhorter upon all the reſt.

II. The credit I gave to the Memoirs was not a groundleſs credulity. I had all manner of reaſon to believe, that a man, who had but lately made the moſt exact and diligent enquiries he could upon the ſpot, was not miſtaken with regard to the ſtories of Monſieur Ferri's and Monſieur Ancillon's pictures. My living ſome years in the neighbourhood of Mets could not but help to perſuade me. I arrived at Sedan towards the latter end of Auguſt 1675, and I found that the Reformed enjoyed a much greater liberty there, than they did in the other cities. But I obſerved that things grew worſe and worſe every day, and I was a witneſs to the firſt riſe of the vexation concerning the Verbi Divini Miniſter. A Proponent (36) was to hold a publick diſputation, and had dedicated his Theſes to ſome Miniſters of that place: he ſtyled them Verbi Divini Miniſtri according to the cuſtom, which had been always practiſed without the leaſt oppoſition; but the Prieſts of Sedan made a very great noiſe about it, and obtained that this title ſhould be eraſed. As I remembred this, could I doubt but that they had alſo ſeen at Mets ſuch an innovation ſoon after Monſieur Ferri's death? The particular eſteem which the Magiſtrates might have for a Miniſter (37), did not prevent their complying in this with the humour of the Miſſionaries, who applied to them. It was the humour of the Court, and conſequently it muſt prevail over all other conſiderations. III. The literary correſpondence I had with Monſieur Ancillon was very acceptable to me, and I am proud of it. We uſed to write to each other the literary news we knew. I intended to ſpeak of him in my work, and to boaſt of his friendſhip to me. But I waited for materials, or at leaſt for the opportunity, which the article of Ferri, whoſe Life he wrote, would furniſh me with. Now this article was referred to the Supplement to the two volumes of my Dictionary, to which I had alſo referred ſeveral important articles. IV. To ſuſpect that becauſe the relation of a perſon had injured me, I would vent my reſentment upon that perſon's memory, is doing me an injuſtice, and charging me with a conduct, of which they, who know me, will never think I am guilty (38). I acknowledge here, that I had not the leaſt reaſon to be diſpleaſed either with the late Monſieur Ancillon, or with any perſon of his family. V. If I did not think it proper to digreſs from the Memoirs concerning Monſieur Ferri, in order to expatiate on the merit of his collegue, it was becauſe I was certain I ſhould not want other and more proper opportunities to ſpeak of him. I have given the publick notice, that I did not draw up the Index of my Dictionary. It was drawn up by a Refugee Miniſter, who no doubt gave the late Monſieur Ancillon a place in it, becauſe he would mark the date of the particular vexation concerning the Title of Verbi Divini Miniſter, which is a remarkable and extraordinary fact.

VI. Let us come at laſt to the chief point. The Author of the Memoirs wrote to me, that he was miſtaken in one circumſtance. It is not true, that the words Verbi Divini Miniſter were put in Monſieur Ancillon's print, and conſequently it is not true, that there was an order to eraſe them. But for the reſt he was in the right to aſſert, that this title was ſuffered in Monſieur Ferri's print. He has ſent me a copy of it, in which I have read theſe words. PAULUS FERRI V. D. MINISTER ECCLESIÆ P. R. METENSIS OBIIT ANNO 1669. ÆTAT. 79. i. e. "Paul Ferri Miniſter "of the Word of God in the pretended Reformed "Church of Mets died in the year 1669, in the 79th "year of his age." The inſcription was at firſt, MINISTER ECCLES. REF. METENSIS; but they were obliged to eraſe the letters R E F, as being contrary to the Edicts of Pacification, and to put, inſtead of theſe three letters, P. R. which are now to be ſeen in all the prints of that Miniſter. Monſieur Ancillon was therefore miſtaken when he ſaid, that there was originally R. R. in Monſieur Ferri's print, and that when they corrected it, they only put a P between the two R's. From all this we may infer, I. That it is exactly true that the title Verbi Divini Miniſter was in Monſieur Ferri's print, and was ſuffered to remain there, even after the Ingraver had been proſecuted. II. That ſince that time it never appeared in any Miniſter's print, and that the Ingraver durſt not put it in Monſieur Ancillon's. Such was the anſwer of the Author of the Memoirs. I omit ſeveral obſervations he made, the tendency of which is to diſtinguiſh the pretence from the true cauſe of the injury that has been done to us both. It is not neceſſary to trouble the public with them.

[H] He left ſome children behind him.] He was twice married, and had a ſon and a daughter by his firſt wife. The daughter is at Mets with her whole family. The family of the ſon conſiſts of one ſon and ſeveral daughters. The latter, except the eldeſt, have all taken ſhelter at Berlin. The ſon is in England. The eldeſt daughter is at the Hague with Mr. du Vivier her huſband, who is a Miniſter there. By his ſecond wife he had but one daughter, who is married to Monſieur Bancelin, formerly a Miniſter of Mets, and now of Berlin.

[I] And ſome Manuſcripts.] As for inſtance, an anſwer to the Hiſtoire de la naiſſance & la decadence de l'Hereſie dans la Ville de Mets. i. e. "The Hiſtory of the Riſe and Fall of Hereſy in the city of Mets." Monſieur de Madaure, Suffragan to the Biſhop of Mets, is the Author of that Hiſtory. Monſieur Ferri recommended to his heirs in his laſt will, to print his Anſwer to that work; and yet it is not publiſhed (39). They keep ſome other works of the deceaſed, beſides an infinite number of Sermons, amongſt which there are eleven hundred, by computation, only upon the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

(36) A native of Sedan: he is a Miniſter in Ordinary in the Walloon Church at Dort; he is ſtill alive, and can bear witneſs to what I here aſſert.

(37) The Author of the complaint muſt own this, ſince he acknowledges, that the Engraver of Monſieur Ferri's picture was proſecuted, and that this Miniſter was very much eſteemed.

(38) See the article of ANCILLON. It was written ſince the diſobliging complaint of that Miniſter's ſon; and yet I ſpoke of that Miniſter in a very advantageous manner, without any regard to this ill-grounded and unjuſt complaint.

(39) Compare this with Monſ. Ancillon's Melange critique, tom. 2. pag. 271.

FERRIER (ARNOLD or ARNOUL DU) Preſident in the Parliament of Paris under the reign of Henry II, who was employed in ſeveral embaſſies by Charles IX. See Moreri upon this, for I deſign to dwell only upon a circumſtance which he has omitted, and which is that Du Ferrier was for a great while a good Proteſtant in his heart, and at laſt declared himſelf ſuch openly [A]. If he had not made his eſcape he would

[A] At laſt he declared himſelf openly a Proteſtant.] This circumſtance, which has been unknown to ſeveral learned men (1) deſerves to be related here with its proof. The paſſage I ſhall quote is ſomewhat long; but it contains nothing but what ſerves to acquaint the reader with the hiſtory of this illuſtrious man. Monſieur Du Pleſſis Mornai going into Guienne (2), "met "at Artenai with Monſieur Du Ferrier who was re- "turning from Venice, where he had been Embaſſa- "dor; Du Pleſſis had been particularly acquainted "with him there in the year 1570. After having "embraced each other, they retired to a private place; "and ſpeaking of the good health which Du Ferrier "enjoyed by God's bleſſing in his old age, he hap- "pened

(1) See the remark [C].

(2) Vie Du Pleſſis Mornai, pag. 65. under the year 1582.

would have been put in priſon as a man ſuſpected of Hereſy, after the famous Mercuriale of the year 1559 (a). The ſtorm was ſome time after appeaſed with regard to him, and he was choſen for an Embaſſy, which gave him an opportunity to ſpeak a little according to his own heart. He harangued (b) in the Council of Trent, whither he was ſent Embaſſador by the moſt Chriſtian King; he expreſſed himſelf in a very ſtrong and bold manner, which vexed the zealous Papiſts. He went afterwards Embaſſador to Venice, where he continued ſeveral years, during which he could not diſcover his real opinions. Laſtly, Monſieur Du Pleſſis Mornai, who knew his thoughts, preſſed him ſo earneſtly on his return from that Embaſſy, to acknowledge the truth, that he obliged him publicly to declare his opinions (c). The King of Navarre made him his Chancellor [B]. The partizans of the Pope's unlimited authority have charged him with a deſign, which might very well be true either in the whole or in part [C]. This excellent man died

(a) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. m. 721.

(b) In the year 1562.

(c) See the Remark [A].

" pened to ſay, that he drew near his ſeventy ſixth " year; upon which Du Pleſſis taking hold of this " opportunity, told him, Why then, is it not time now " to mind your conſcience? To think of thoſe pious diſ- " courſes, which you held with me formerly at Venice? To " remember that reſolution ſo often repeated both by word " of mouth, and by letters, of profeſſing publickly that " truth ſo long known to you, and ſo long concealed? He " preſſed him ſo earneſtly, that he made him pro- " miſe, that he would declare himſelf; yet he gave " him to underſtand, that he could have wiſhed to re- " ceive firſt fourteen thouſand crowns, that were owed " to him for the expences of his embaſſy. Du Pleſſis " wrote to his friends at Paris, deſiring them to keep " him in that good deſign: and in order to put it out " of his power to delay any longer, he perſuaded the " King of Navarre, to whom he was lately gone, to " make him his Chancellor. Whereupon Du Ferrier " left all other buſineſs and went to meet Du Pleſſis, " and publickly profeſſed the Reformed Religion. He " was a great and eminent man, well verſed in all " uſeful learning, an excellent Civilian, who had been " honoured with ſeveral Embaſſies, even with that to " the Council of Trent, and who in his old age had " choſen the holy Scripture and the Hebrew Tongue " for the ſubject of his ſtudy. It was for this reaſon " that Monſieur Du Pleſſis, as appears from ſeveral of " his letters, entreated him to make a more ſolemn " declaration (3), by which it might be known in the " countries where he had made ſome ſtay, why a man " of ſuch reputation, and in ſuch an advanc'd age would " forſake the Roman Catholick Religion. But he " could not obtain this from a man, who had been a " Courtier all his life-time, and feared the cenſure of " the world too much. Monſieur de Montagne was " never tired with ſaying to Monſieur Du Pleſſis, You " have gained a victory over us, by the acquiſition of that " man; you have honoured his virtue, which we made " no account of."

(3) See in Du Pleſſis Mornai's Memoires, the form of Abjuration that was offered to him: the Reformed wiſhed that he would have publiſhed the reaſons why he changed his Religion; and they deſigned to diſperſe them every where in ſeveral languages.

[B] The King of Navarre made him his Chancellor.] As he thought, that the affairs, which Du Ferrier had to manage at the Court of France, would not ſuffer him to reſide with him, he intended to give him a place that ſhould oblige him to ſtay at Paris, and deſigned Pibrac's employment for him; that is to ſay, the making him Superintendant of the affairs he had in that city (4). This Prince had a Council at Paris, at Toulouſe, and at Bourdeaux: the buſineſs he had before the Parliaments of all theſe Cities required it. But let us quote Monſieur Du Pleſſis's own words (5). Becauſe the aforeſaid eſtates are ſituated under the juriſdiction of three Parliaments, namely, thoſe of Paris, Toulouſe and Bourdeaux, to whoſe cogniſance belong ſeveral affairs and law-ſuits relating to thoſe eſtates, he (the King of Navarre) has ſettled a Council in each of theſe Parliaments, which he pays, and in which one of the Chiefs of the Parliament preſides. He choſe Monſieur Du Ferrier, lately the King's Embaſſador to Venice, to preſide in his Council at Paris; he is one of the greateſt men in Europe, and whom the late Chancellor de l'Hoſpital judged the only perſon worthy to ſucceed him in the dignity of a Chancellor, for his honeſty and ability. We fear that he will not dare to accept it, becauſe he is reſolved openly to profeſs the Reformed Religion for the future, and would chooſe to live in a place, where he might do it with more liberty and leſs danger. I believe indeed that he did not accept that poſt: He went to the King of Navarre to be his Chancellor; for I find the following paſſage in Du Pleſſis's Memoirs (6). " I " have been acquainted all this time with only two " Chancellors to the King of Navarre, the late Mon- " ſieur Du Ferrier, a very eminent man, the ſecond " Cato of France, who died a year ago with grief " for this war of the League; and Monſieur de Gla- " teins, Pybrac's eldeſt brother, who fills that poſt at " preſent with great reputation." The writing, from which theſe words are extracted, is dated in Oct. 1586.

(4) Memoires de Du Pleſſis, tom. 1. pag. 158, and 165.

(5) Ibid. pag. 187. in a writing dated in May 1583.

(6) Ibid. pag. 644.

[C] The Partizans of the Pope's unlimited authority have charged him with a deſign, which might very well be true either in the whole or in part.] The Author of the Journal des Savans was angry with Raynaldus the Annaliſt, for aſcribing this deſign to the Chancellor de l'Hoſpital and to Du Ferrier. " A certain pro- " ject of the Legates occaſioned ſome remonſtrances " made by the Emperor, by the King of Spain, and " by ſome other Princes, and the famous proteſtation " made by the Preſident Du Ferrier Embaſſador from " Charles the ninth, at which the Court of Rome " was ſo much diſpleaſed. There cannot be imagined " any thing more injurious to the memory of this fa- " mous Magiſtrate, than what Raynaldus has the " boldneſs to aſſert; namely, that he conſpired with " the Chancellor de l'Hoſpital to break the knot which " united the Moſt Chriſtian King with the Holy See, " to aſſemble a national Council, in which the King " of France, after the example of the King of Eng- " land ſhould be declared to be Head of the Gallican " Church, and to uſurp all the eſtates of the Church " of France (7)." If the Preſident Couſin had remembered that Du Ferrier was already a good Proteſtant at that time, and that he publickly profeſſed the Reformed Religion when he died, would he have denied what Raynaldus ſuppoſes? Is there any thing more probable than ſuch a project (8)? Was it poſſible for two ſuch able and excellent men, who were ſo well acquainted with the errors and abuſes of the Roman Catholick Religion, and who were ſo zealous for the true grandeur of the French Monarchy, to have no thoughts of a Reformation, by which France would have become formidable to all her neighbours, and which would have delivered her from a dependency, which even at this time is ſo prejudicial to her?

(7) Couſin, Journal des Savans, for February 28, 1689, pag. m. 118.

(8) Compare this with the Remark [F].

There are ſeveral other learned men, who did not know that Du Ferrier died a Proteſtant: Here follows what Davila ſaid, ſpeaking of a conference between the Duke of Epernon and the King of Navarre, upon which Roquelaure one of this Prince's favourites adviſed him to comply with Henry the third's intentions. Contendeva in contrario Arnoldo Monſignore di Ferrier ſuo Cancelliere, il quale huomo di finiſſimo ingegno, e di excellente dottrina dopo la legatione di Venetia, nella quale era ſtato molti anni, tornato in Francia, e poco reconoſciuto alla corte, s'era ritirato appreſſo il Rè di Navarra. Queſto temendo, ſe il Padrone ſi riduceſſe alla concordia e alla ubbidienza del Rè di remanere abjetto, e abbandonato, s'era BENCHE CATTOLICO accoſtato all' opinione di Filippo di Morné Signore di Pleſſis (9). i. e. " Ar- " nold du Ferrier, his Chancellor, was of a contrary o- " pinion: he was a man of a very acute genius and ex- " cellent learning. Being returned into France, after his " Embaſſy to Venice, where he continued many " years, and being hardly known again at Court, he " retired with the King of Navarre: and fearing leſt " he ſhould be deſpiſed and neglected, in caſe his ma- " ſter ſubmitted to a peace with, and obedience to the " King (of France) he, THO' A ROMAN CATHOLICK, " voted AUTHORS who did not know that Du Ferrier died a Proteſtant.

(9) Davila, Delle Guerre Civili di Francia, lib. 7. all' ann. 1585, pag. m. 377.

died in the year 1585, aged about seventy nine years [D]. Brantome relates a surprising particular of him [E]. I mention it below; nor shall I forget Cardinal Palavicini [F].

I enlarge this Article a little in this second edition, in order to observe, that Du Ferrier was admitted Doctor of Law at Padua, and from a Professor in the University of Toulouse was raised to the dignity of Counsellor in the Parliament of the same City (d). Read upon this one of Bunel's Letters (e), in which he observes that Cardinal du Tournon had very much contributed to this honourable reward of that learned Civilian's merit, and that Francis Ist's generosity appeared in this. This Letter is not dated, but we find in it, that Castellanus was at that time Bishop of Mâcon. Whence we must infer, that Du Ferrier obtained that post between the year 1543 and the year 1548. He had been one of the learned men, whom Cardinal de Tournon used to take with him, and to admit to his familiar conversations (f). Thuanus makes an observation upon this, which is very much to that Cardinal's honour (g). Du Ferrier's Elogy is amongst those which Sainte Marthe wrote [G]. Consult also the remarks on the Confession Catholique de Sanci (h).

(d) Sammarth. in Elogior. lib. 1. pag. m. 90.

(e) The 42d.

(f) Thuan. de Vita sua, lib. 2. pag. m. 1085.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(h) In pag. 391 of the edition published in 1699.

"voted with Philip du Mornay." Monsieur de Beauvais-Nangis (10) has censured this blunder of Davila. I imagine that Cardinal Palavicini would have been very much obliged to a person, who had told him what I relate in the remark [A]; it would have added great strength amongst those of his own party, to the exception he makes against Father Paul (11), grounded on the great correspondence there was between this Friar and the Embassador Du Ferrier. It is unquestionable that this Cardinal knew nothing of the latter's abjuration, since he has not mentioned it in the passage I have quoted. See the Remark [F].

(10) In his Remarks on Davila at the end of his Histoire des Favoris.

(11) Palavic. Istoria del Concilio di Trento, Introduzione, cap. 4.

[D] He died in the year 1585, aged about seventy nine years.] Two passages from Monsieur du Plessis Mornay, quoted above, prove this assertion. In the first it is said, that in the year 1582 Du Ferrier was near seventy six years old (12,) and in the other that he died in the year 1585 (13).

(12) Vie de Du Plessis, pag. 65.

(13) Memoires de Du Plessis, tom. 1. pag. 644.

[E] Brantome relates a surprizing particular of him.] "I should like the President Du Ferrier as well, who "has been so long Embassador at Venice, and who "used now and then to go and read publick Lectures "in the Colleges of Padua, which was a very great "disgrace to a man in his station, and to the King's "authority, who did not approve it, and look'd sowr-"ly upon him, when he returned, both on that ac-"count, and for the Religion he was of: so that af-"terwards he was made Chancellor to the King of "Navarre (14)."

(14) Brantome, Mémoires, tom. 1. in the Elogy of Francis I, pag. 248.

[F] Nor shall I forget Cardinal Palavicini.] He quotes (15) Father Paul's Life, in which it is said, that this Father had a very intimate correspondence with Du Ferrier, and that Du Ferrier had collected a great many Memoirs and Letters. Hence the Cardinal infers that Father Paul had drawn his materials from a poisonous spring; for it must be observed, says he, that Du Ferrier was one of the Embassadors, whom the Court of France sent to Trent (16), when during King Charles's infancy most of those who governed in the Royal Council were possessed with the new heresies. Du Ferrier discovered his sentiments so openly, that there were three persons of distinction (17), who testified in their writings that he passed for an Huguenot. The third of these witnesses is the Embassador of Venice, who in his Account to the Senate asserts, that Du Ferrier, who was suspected of being an Huguenot, used to read Lucian when he was at Mass. The Cardinal adds, that Du Ferrier intended to get an estate by making a trade of Religion, and that for this purpose he negotiated secretly with the Pope, by the mediation of Bastiano Gualtieri Bishop of Viterbo. He endeavoured to persuade his Holiness to dissolve the Council, and to call together a meeting of the Gallican Church, of which the Pope should be the Head, and in which he (Du Ferrier) hoped to be a Deputy from the King. As he expected great matters from the Pope's favour, so he promised all manner of kind services to the Court of Rome, and shewed himself intirely persuaded of the Pope's authority in all those points, which the Sorbonne has called into question. But finding that the Pope would not follow his scheme, his avarice turned into a madness, and made an advantage of the absence of Cardinal de Lorrain, and of Lansac the Chief of the Embassy, as also of the conditional power of Protesting, with which the Court of France had invested her Embassadors; and knowing that his collegue would approve his conduct (18), he delivered before the whole Council a satyrical Oration against the Popes, and against the members of that Assembly, and ascribed to his master the same authority over the Gallican Church, as the schismatick Kings of England claim over their Church of England. He did not appear any more in the Council, being sensible that he had made himself odious; but he went some time after to Venice, whence he wrote the worst he could to the King, and gave him to understand, by the most subtle state-arguments he could imagine, that his Majesty ought not to send his Embassadors again to Trent, nor to admit the Decrees of that Council, since they were prejudicial to the Royal Authority. It is from thence that Father Paul drew the base coin, which he puts off for true gold. Thus Palavicini concludes this subject.

(15) Palavic. Introduzione all' Istoria del Concil. di Trento, cap. 4.

(16) They sent three, Lansac, Du Ferrier, and Pibrac.

(17) Consalvo di Mendoza, Bishop of Salamanca, Muzio Callino, Archbishop of Zara, Niccolo da Ponte, Embassador of Venice to the Council of Trent, and afterwards Doge of the Republick.

(18) Essendo rimasto per Collega al Ferrier solo Guido Fabri palese Ugonotto in quel tempo, come il nomina la mentovata Relazione dell' Orator Vineziano. Palavic. Introduz. all' Ist. del Con. di Trento.

[G] His Elogy is amongst those which Sainte Marthe wrote.] This Writer of Elogies has very well expressed what he says of this great man, but he does not give us a full account of his life. Let us observe, that till this time (19) they have quoted him in Moreri's Dictionary thus, In Annal. Which will make several persons think, that Scevola de Sainte Marthe wrote Annals. On which occasion I shall observe a blunder of the same kind. which has not been corrected even in the Paris Edition of 1699. At the end of the Article Eugenius IV they quote in Moreri, Æneas Sylvius Eutrop. c. 58. This may persuade several readers, that this Æneas Silvius, who was Pope under the name of Pius II, wrote a Book intitled Eutropius, or a Commentary on Eutropius the Historian. These blunders, and several others of the same nature, have not been committed by Moreri, but by his Printers. I do not doubt but he wrote Sainte Marthe, in Elogiis: Æneas Sylvius, in Europa. Thus at least he ought to have written.

(19) That is till the edition of Paris 1699 inclusively.

FERRIER (JEREMY) (a) was a Minister and Professor of Divinity at Nimes towards the beginning of the seventeenth Century; he changed his Religion afterwards, and was made a Counsellor of State. In the year 1602 he maintained in a public disputation, that Pope Clement VIII was properly the Antichrist (b). This caused a great disturbance [A]. Who would not have thought, that a man who took such a bold step, would

(a) And not Benjamin, as he is called by St. Romuald quoted by David l'Enfant, month of Sept. pag. 174.

(b) Ferrier, Preface to his Traité de l'Antichrist.

[A] This caused a great disturbance.] The Parliament of Toulouse ordered a Warrant out to take him up because of this Thesis. The Members of the Chamber of Castres were divided in their opinions; at last the King made a Decree by which all persons were prohibited to prosecute this Minister for that proposition (1). The Provincial and National Synods of France used all their interest for Ferrier very zealously (2), for he had had the art of making the whole body of the Reformed to be concerned for him: so far that the National

(1) Ferrier, Preface du Traité de l'Antechrist.

(2) Ibid.

would always be very hot, and the adverſary of all moderate Divines? yet he was one of the firſt who began to yield [B] in the political aſſemblies of the Reformed in France. He did not countenance thoſe that voted that it was proper to ſhew a great deal of ſpirit. On the contrary he oppoſed, as much as lay in his power, all the bold and reſolute ſchemes, which the moſt zealous members propoſed. This made him be ſuſpected to ſuch a degree, that he was looked upon as a penſioner of the Court, as a falſe brother, and a traitor to the Churches (c). The national Synod held at Privas in the year 1612, forbad him to preach within the City of Nimes (d) [C]. Whereupon Ferrier obtained the poſt of Counſellor in the Preſidial * of that City; but there aroſe a popular tumult againſt him, which occaſioned his changing his Religion [D]; after which he ſettled at Paris,

(c) See the remarks [D] and [L].

(d) Mercure François, tom. 3. pag. 156.

* A ſpecial Court of Judicature.

Synod held at Gap in the year 1603, and in which he was aſſiſtant to the Moderator (3), ordered that a new article ſhould be added to the Confeſſion of Faith, ſetting forth, that the Pope was properly the Antichriſt, and the ſon of perdition mentioned in the Scripture. See in Monſieur Du Pleſſis Mornai's Life (4), how Henry the fourth took offence at this innovation; and obſerve, how the intrigues and the intereſt of one private perſon can influence a whole body.

(3) Hiſtoire de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 1. pag. 396.

(4) Pag. 296, &c.

[B] He was one of the firſt who began to yield.] It is aſſerted in the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes (5), that he ſuffered himſelf to be bribed by the cajoleries of the Court, and that the Jeſuits boaſt that as early as the year 1600 their father Coton being at Nimes . . . entered into a correſpondence with Ferrier, whom even at that time he diſpoſed to betray his brethren. However it be, continues that Hiſtorian, he perplexed all the affairs, in the political aſſemblies in which he was preſent, which obliged the Synod to forbid him ever to meddle with them any more. The Mercure François (6) tells us, that there aroſe ſome jealouſies between the Deputies to the Aſſembly held at Saumur in 1611, and that the Miniſter Ferrier retired from it, alledging for his pretence the ſickneſs of his ſon and his mother-in-law. The ſentiments of that Aſſembly were divided (7); ſome members of it aſſerted that they ought to have the benefit of the Edict of Pacification as it had been firſt drawn up: The others, (amongſt whom was Ferrier,) maintained that they ought to keep to the terms of the Edict, (according to the King's will and pleaſure) as they had been recorded in the Parliaments.

(5) Tom. 1. pag. 395.

(6) Mercure François, tom. 2. pag. 302. edit. of Cologne.

(7) Ibid. tom. 3. pag. 156. See alſo tom. 2. pag. 496, where it is ſaid that Chamier was at the head of thoſe who were of the firſt opinion, which was that of the Party-Huguenots, and Ferrier at the head of thoſe who were of the ſecond opinion, which was that of the State-Huguenots.

[C] The Synod held at Privas forbad him to preach within the city of Nimes.] The Author of the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes gives a full account of this affair. It was on Ferrier's account, ſays he (8), that in the Synod held at Privas they paſſed an Act, by which the Profeſſors of Divinity were excluded from the political Aſſemblies. But they went farther with regard to Ferrier; they tried and condemned him in a very mortifying manner. The means he had contrived to ward off the blow, ſerved only to make it unavoidable. He took ſeveral ſuſpicious journeys to Court, without the knowledge or conſent of his Church. He accepted immediately the poſt that was offered him in the Church of Paris, and being reproved for his faults, he ſeemed to be very penitent: but after he had promiſed never to forſake his profeſſion, and to exerciſe it at Paris, he went back from his word in a very unhandſom manner, and returned into his County without taking his leave of the Miniſters of Paris. All this was taken into conſideration at Privas; and Du Moulin, who gave the Synod an account of what paſſed at Paris, when Ferreri had ſhewed a proud, inconſtant, and faithleſs mind, ſaid ſuch things of him, that his conduct was found to be very irregular. They added to all this ſeveral accuſations concerning his former conduct, which was very ſtrictly examined. They charged him with acquitting himſelf very carelesly of his functions as a Divinity Profeſſor, with preaching doctrines, that were not very orthodox, with meddling with the management of the money belonging to his Church, and of which he had kept diſhoneſtly a large ſum, of which he never would give any account; of having either forged himſelf, or conſented to the forging of ſome letters, which had intangled him in diſgraceful affairs, and made him prevaricate very diſhoneſtly. He was ſeverely cenſured on all theſe accounts. But beſides this verbal reproof, the Synod commanded him to write to the Church of Paris to make her ſatisfaction, forbad him to aſſiſt at their political Aſſemblies for ten years, and ordered him to perform the functions of a Miniſter only without the limits of the Province of Languedoc. The Church and the City of Nimes ſent Deputies to the Synod, who uſed all their endeavours to have this ſentence reverſed, but they loſt both their time and labour. Nay the Synod gave them to underſtand, that they were not pleaſed to ſee that ſuch a ſolemn deputation ſhould have been ſent to ſupport a man, who betrayed the common cauſe. The Miniſters who had joined with the Deputies were cenſured for their complaiſance; and the Memorials, which they took upon them to preſent to the Synod, were declared to be ſlanderous. But as they could not but foreſee, that Ferrier would not ſtop there, and that having the Magiſtrates on his ſide, he would ſtill act as a Miniſter, ſince he had not been prohibited to perform the functions of a Paſtor, they declared to him, as an addition to his puniſhment, that he ſhould be ſuſpended ipſo facto, if he did not ſubmit to his ſentence. However, as they would not make him deſperate, they ſent him to Montelimar in the room of Chamier, who was going to Montauban, where he was choſen Profeſſor of Divinity. Hereupon Ferrier took other meaſures (9), and obtained the office of Counſellor in the Preſidial of Nimes, in which he was inſtalled notwithſtanding the oppoſitions of the Conſiſtory, who after ſeveral proceedings excommunicated him July the 14th 1613. We ſhall ſee in the following Remark the diſorders which followed upon this by a popular tumult.

(8) Hiſtoire de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 84, &c.

(9) Hiſt. de l'ed't de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 122.

[D] A popular tumult . . . . occaſioned his changing his Religion.] The Author of the Mercure François has given a particular account of this tumult. Ferrier's adverſaries, ſays he (10), ſeeing that he was a Counſellor in the Preſidial, excommunicated him after their manner, and ſtirred up the populace of Nimes to aſſault him as he was going to or coming back from the Preſidial. Ferrier having had notice of his deſign went nevertheleſs to the Preſidial with the Provoſt July the 14th, 1613. He was not aſſaulted as he went; but as he came back with a deſign to go home, he found his adverſaries with the populace, who, pointing out to him, ſaid to one another, vege lou, vege lou, lou traitre Judas. i. e. "Do you ſee him, do you ſee him, the "traitor Judas." Then they began to pelt him with ſtones, and to purſue him, with a deſign to ſeize him. But he ſheltered himſelf in Lieutenant Rozel's houſe. Being exaſperated at his eſcape, they went to his houſe, which they plundered, and burnt a great deal of his furniture and ſeveral of his books before the door. The 15th and 16th of July they went alſo and plundered what he had in the country, and rooted up his vines; after which they returned to Nimes every one of them holding bits of vines and ſmall trees in their hands, which they had plucked up out of Ferrier's cloſe. He found means to make his eſcape to Beaucaire, after he had been three days ſhut up in a tomb (11). Ferrier aſſerts (12), that he was almoſt pelted to death with ſtones, and that he eſcaped only by a miracle out of the hands of thirty fellows of the Conſiſtory, who had bound themſelves upon oath to kill him. That his mother, a woman of threeſcore, the widow and daughter of a Miniſter died with the horrour of this ſad ſcene, during which theſe murtherers threatened her a thouſand times to burn her alive. That two ſmall infants were miraculouſly ſnatched out of the fire, by the prudent conduct of the Magiſtrates, whom theſe furious zealots threatened with death. That his poor wife, who was nine months gone with child, was ſtruck with halbards. That his mother-in law, who was near fourſcore years old, received the ſame barbarous treatment. That all his houſhold-goods were burnt before their Temple, and the greateſt part of his books and papers either plundered or burnt, and the beſt part of his eſtate carried off or ruined. That by the ſentence given at the Chamber of the Edict of Caſtres, and by the advice of all the Judges who were of the pretended Reformed Religion, ſeventeen of thoſe poor

(10) Mercure François, tom. 2. pag. 156, 157.

(11) Ibid. tom. 12. pag. 495, 496. Ferrier ſays the ſame in the Preface to his Traité de l'Antechriſt; I have been buried three days, and really put in a tomb.

(12) Ferrier, ibid.

Paris, where he endeavoured to make his fortune. He publiſhed in 1614 (e) a book of Controverſy concerning the diſpute about the Antichriſt. The King employed him in ſeveral important affairs; and in the year 1626 he was commanded to attend his Majeſty in his journey to Britanny, where he was honoured with the title of State and Privy-Counſellor (f). Cardinal de Richelieu had a particular eſteem for him (g). Ferrier on his return from this journey was affected with an hectic fever, which grew worſe and worſe every day; he died of it September the 26th 1626 [E], and was buried in the Church of St. Sulpicius, which was his pariſh (h). During the latter days of his life he gave ſtrong proofs of his zeal for the Roman Catholic Religion [F], and made all his children promiſe that they would live and die in the ſame faith [G]. I cannot exactly tell how

(e) The Dedication to the King is dated from Paris September 1, 1614.

(f) Mercure François, tom. 12. pag. 496, 497.

(g) Ibid.

(h) Mercure François, tom. 12. pag. 499. He lived in the Suburb of St. Germain.

poor wretches were condemned to death, they (13) having perſuaded them to kill him for the advantage of their Religion, promiſing them that they would all go to heaven for ſuch an abominable action. This laſt circumſtance has all the appearance of a mere impoſture and a downright calumny, which may raiſe ſuſpicions againſt all the others (14); and after all no conſequence can be drawn from all this againſt the Doctrine or Principles of the Reformed. It is well known, that an exaſperated mob, of what country ſoever or Religion it be, has not the leaſt regard for any thing in the world. Ferrier himſelf acknowledges, that the Judges, who were of the Reformed Religion, voted for the puniſhment of ſeventeen of theſe rioters. To finiſh this Commentary on my Text, I have only to obſerve, that Ferrier pretends, that theſe violent proceedings againſt him conquered the obſtinacy, with which he ſtrove againſt the truth. It is, ſays he (15), the conſtant reproach, with which the enemies of my ſalvation load me, that I am a Roman Catholic againſt my will. This is very true, I confeſs it. God has granted me this favour againſt my will, when I reſiſted him, when I fled from him, when I abhorred the ſalvation which he offered me. My calling has been attended with violence, becauſe my obſtinacy in continuing a Heretick was very great. Thus in order to ſave the Perſecutors and moſt bitter enemies of the Church, God has been obliged to thunder from heaven, to lighten, to beat them down, and to ſtrike them blind by his powerful hand: He ſuppoſes, as you ſee, that the vexations he ſuffered broke the chains by which he was tied to Hereſy, and led him to a ſecond Ananias, that is to ſay to Cardinal Du Perron, who introduced him into the Pale of the Church. This Cardinal was the great Converter in thoſe times.

(13) He means the Miniſters and their agents.

(14) The Author of the Hiſtoire de l'edit. de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 123, 124, owns that the populace, without having the leaſt regard either for the Judge, or the Conſul, or the Miniſters, broke open the doors of Ferrier's houſe, plunder'd or burnt his furniture, and omitted nothing of what an exaſperated mob uſed to do; they committed all poſſible diſorders in a country-houſe belonging to Ferrier, and broke open the priſons to deliver ſome of the rioters, whom the Magiſtrates had ſecured.

(15) Ferrier, Preface du Traité de l'Antechriſt.

A REFLECTION upon this maxim Compelle intrare, Compel them to come in.

I ſhall obſerve here, without regard to any particular fact, that as there is a Compelle intrare, COMPEL THEM TO COME IN, there is alſo a Compelle exire, COMPEL THEM TO GO OUT. Imagine a Clergyman, who has made one of his brethren a great enemy to him, it may very well happen that they ſhall make him be a Heretick whether he will or not, and that they ſhall force him to paſs over to another Religion. He ſhall firſt be charged with Heterodoxy; afterwards it will be aſſerted, that he keeps a ſecret correſpondence with the enemy, that he is a penſioner, that he is diſaffected to the State, and capable of infecting the whole Church: they will render him ſo odious, that his very relations will not dare to converſe with him; ſo that finding that it is no longer in his power to edify as a Paſtor, he ſhall be forced to look for employment ſomewhere elſe. But where will he go? The letters of his adverſaries fly much ſwifter than a whole family can move; he cannot go to any place, but he will find, that he has already been defamed there (16). So that after he has endeavoured to ſettle in ſeveral places, without being able to remove men's prejudices and raſh judgments, finding himſelf almoſt at his laſt penny, and not knowing how to get a livelihood, being beſides full of indignation to ſee, that two or three clamourers ſhould ſo eaſily prepoſſeſs the mind of ſo many people and entertaining an ill opinion of a party, which ſuffers itſelf to be ſo eaſily frighted, he caſts himſelf into the Pale of another Church. And this is exactly what his enemies deſired; they have then the full enjoyment of their wiſhes; they are never more vexed than when they ſee that thoſe, whom they have accuſed and traduced, do not confirm their accuſation by forſaking their Religion (17). This is a kind of perſecution deſigned not to compel men to come in, but to compel them to go out.

(16) See upon this the Remark [E] of the article ALCIAT (John Paul).

(17) See above the remark [K] of the article ARNAUD (Anthony) Doctor of the Sorbonne.

[E] He died .... September the 26th, 1626.] The error of thoſe (18) who place his death on the 27th of September 1626 is not very conſiderable. They (19) who place it under the year 1625 are a little more miſtaken.

(18) Peter de St. Romuald, Father l'Enfant, Moreri, &c.

[F] During the latter days of his life he gave ſtrong proofs of his zeal for the Roman Catholic Religion.] They publiſhed a Pamphlet intitled De l'heureux trépas & mort du Sieur Ferrier. i. e. "Of the happy death of Ferrier;" in which they relate what he ſaid when the Prieſt brought him the Holy Sacrament and the Extreme Unction, &c. The Mercure François (20) has given an account of ſeveral things contained in that Pamphlet: I refer the Reader to that account. But I ſhall tranſcribe here two of thoſe things, becauſe they ſeem to correct ſome miſtakes. "When the Holy Sacrament came to his "houſe, Mrs. Du Ferrier his wife being on her knees "near his bed, cried out; Lord, I am not worthy that "thou ſhouldeſt come under my roof. He, being deeply "affected with thoſe words, ſaid to her, Alas! my dear, "let him, who put theſe words into your mouth, im-"print for ever his love and faith in your heart (21)." This proves evidently, that this Ex-Miniſter's wife was not of the Reformed Religion at that time; and that therefore the Monk St. Romuald, and after him the Dominican Friar David L'Enfant were miſtaken, when they ſaid (22), that Ferrier could not perſuade his wife to follow his example, and that nevertheleſs they lived very well together. Some time before his death he dictated his epitaph in the following words (23). Hic jacet Hieremias Ferrier, qui anno Domini 1613 Catholicam Apoſtolicam & Romanam fidem firmiter amplexus, ad extremum uſque vitæ ſpiritum firmiter retinuit. i. e. "Here lyes Jeremy Ferrier, who em-"braced the Catholic Apoſtolic and Roman Religion "in the year 1613, and conſtantly perſevered in it "to his death." This will ſerve to refute Moreri.

(19) F. Jacob. Biblioth. Pontificia, pag. 349. Konig, Biblioth. vet. & nov. Henninges Witte, in Diario Biographico.

(20) Mercure François, tom. 12, pag. 496, &c.

(21) Ibid. pag. 497.

(22) See the Hiſtoire generale de tous les Siecles, by David l'Enfant, Month of Sept. pag. 174.

(23) Mercure François, tom. 12. pag. 499.

[G] .... and made all his children promiſe, that they would .... die in the ſame faith.] As he aſſerts in the Preface to his Treatiſe of Antichriſt, that he has a large family to provide for, we ought to think that he had a great number of children. There was but one daughter amongſt them. Here follows the diſcourſe he held with her, when he exhorted her to perſevere in the Roman-catholic Faith; And you, my daughter, who have had the happineſs above your brothers, that you were baptiſed in the Church, do not you make me alſo the ſame promiſe (24)? Monſieur Patin has mentioned this daughter. The Lieutenant Criminal here is very ill. His wife, who is a ſhrew, has beat him, and ſhut him up in his cellar. She is a worſe Devil than Pilate's wife was. She is daughter of Jeremy Ferrier, formerly a Miniſter of Nimes, but who abjured his Religion. Thus Patin ſpeaks in a Letter dated Auguſt the 25th, 1660 (25). In all probability he ſpeaks alſo of her when he ſays in another place (26); "Men "talk here of nothing but of the murther of Monſieur "Tardieu Lieutenant Criminal, and of his wife. The "two murtherers were immediately apprehend-"ed... The whole people go, as it were in a pro-"ceſſion, to St. Bartholomew's Church, to pray for "the ſoul of this unhappy Lieutenant Criminal, and "of his wretched wife. She was ſo prodigiouſly "covetous, that ſhe had neither a footman, nor coach-"man, nor maid-ſervant. She choſe rather to wait "on herſelf, in order to ſpare her bread.... Prayers "have been ſaid in a ſolemn manner in St. Bartho-"lomew's Church for the ſaid Lieutenant Criminal "and for his wife; but if ſhe had no ſoul, what will "become of thoſe prayers? For as to the wax-tapers "they are burnt and conſumed (27)." A ſon of Jeremy Ferrier was killed by ſome footmen, whom he would

(24) Ibid. pag. 498.

(25) It is the 196th in page 175. of the 2d vol.

(26) Letter 366. pag. 95. of the 3d vol. dated Auguſt 26, 1665.

(27) Letter 367. pag. 99. dated Sept. 10, 1665.

how old he was [H]. They made him hope that he ſhould be ſent Embaſſador into Holland, if we may believe Moreri [I]. I dare not aſſert poſitively, that it was he that wrote the Catholique d'Etat [K], or State Catholic, a work which was much eſteemed in its time. The Reformed have given Jeremy Ferrier a very odious character [L]. He could would prevent from ſtriking his own. Dom Peter de St. Romuald (28) places his death on February the 23d 1638. Here is a very unfortunate family. I do not queſtion but Monſieur Tardieu's wife, who was ſo noted for her covetouſneſs (29), and who periſhed in a tragical manner with her huſband, was the daughter of the Ex-Miniſter Ferrier.

(28) Journal Chronol. de Hiſtorique.

(29) See Monſ. Boileau's 10th Satyr, in which this marriage and its conſequences are a very curious Epiſod.

[H] I cannot exactly tell how old he was.] He is not conſiſtent with himſelf upon this ſubject: for in one paſſage of his Preface, he owns that he is very ſorry that he did not employ for the ſervice of the Catholic Church full twenty years, which he had unhappily loſt, ſays he, in ſupporting a bad and ungrateful cauſe. This ſignifies, that he was admitted a Miniſter about the year 1593, ſince he did not change his Religion till the year 1613. But he had ſaid two pages before, that he was but 24 years old when he aſſerted that Clement VIII was the Antichriſt. This is what I find in the words which I ſhall now tranſcribe, and which ſerve as an anſwer to the imputation he was charged with, that he impudently admitted that Hypotheſis in order to diſturb the State, and to enrich himſelf in the war. Their charge of deſigning by this means to occaſion a war belongs more properly to him, that is to ſay, to Monſieur Du Pleſſis, than to me, who at that time had never yet left my ſtudy, and who being but twenty four years old, had not learnt any thing of the affairs of the world, was unacquainted with all their warlike cabals, and thought of nothing but of my books, and of promoting the Religion in which I was born. Let us remember that his Theſis was maintained in the year 1602. If at that time he was but twenty four years old, he could not have been admitted a Miniſter in the year 1593, a ſcholar of fifteen was never raiſed to that function. We cannot therefore lay any ſtreſs upon what he ſays. According to the Mercure François (30), he had preached the Doctrine of the Proteſtants for ſixteen years. Suppoſing then that he was twenty four years old when the Theſis of the Antichriſt was maintained in the year 1602, he would have been admitted a Miniſter at the age of nineteen, in the year 1597, and have died at the age of forty eight years. But who would venture to give credit to the Mercure François, rather than to Jeremy Ferrier himſelf, concerning the time during which he was a Miniſter? It is therefore better to leave this matter undetermined.

(30) Tom. 3. pag. 158.

[I] They made him hope, that he ſhould be ſent Embaſſador into Holland, if we may believe Moreri.] I miſtruſt him very much with regard to this particular; for he did not know, that Jeremy Ferrier lived thirteen years ſince his journey to Paris; he thought that this Ex-Miniſter died ſoon after his arrival into that capital city. He did not know, that his book concerning the Antichriſt is in French; for if he had known it, he would not have ſet the title down in Latin, De Antichriſto. He thinks without any reaſon, that Ferrier wrote a book intitled Reſponſio ad lib. admonitio ad Beg. Lugd. XIII. &c. The Printers have horribly diſfigured this poor title. It ſhould have been, Reſponſio ad libellum cui titulus, Admonitio a Reg. Ludovicum XIII. i. e. "An Anſwer to a Book intitled, A Warning to "Lewis XIII." They who aſcribed ſuch a book to our Ferrier, are certainly Authors, who wrote in Latin, and who have thus expreſſed a French book which is aſcribed to Ferrier. I ſhall ſpeak of it in the following remark.

[K] I dare not aſſert poſitively, that Ferrier wrote the Catholique d'Etat.] There are arguments for and againſt this opinion. This work was publiſhed in the year 1625 under the name of the Sieur du Ferrier (31). It was immediately aſcribed to Jeremy Ferrier; for the Author of the Pamphlet intitled, L'heureux trepas & mort du Sieur du Ferrier, obſerves (32), that two inferences may be drawn from this death; the one againſt the Reformed, the other againſt the Publiſhers of Libels in Flanders. The Reformed or Party-Huguenots had publiſhed, that his converſion was not ſincere ... which, they ſaid, would appear by his death. They were anſwered, that the ſolemn proteſtation he made on his death-bed could not be ſuſpected of inſincerity, or be thought to be forced, nor even to have proceeded from light-headedneſs; ſince ſeveral perſons even of the Reformed Religion had viſited him in his ſickneſs, and could witneſs, that he was not in the leaſt diſordered in his mind, but on the contrary that his judgment continued free and ſound to his laſt breath. As for the foreign Writers who have publiſhed in their Libels, that ſimia ſit ſemper ſimia, the ape is always like himſelf, they were anſwered, that this ſolemn declaration which Ferrier made of his faith, when he died, and this account of his happy death, ought to ſtop their mouth, and is a condemnation of their ſlanderous writings. It muſt be obſerved, that the Catholique d'Etat is an anſwer to ſome Libels which the King of Spain's partizans had publiſhed againſt France (33) upon her making alliances with the Proteſtant powers to the prejudice of the Catholic Religion. The Author of the Catholique d'Etat could not anſwer without ſaying a great many things againſt the Houſe of Auſtria. The Writers on the ſide of Spain replied (34), and charged that Author with continuing to act the ape, which is a plain proof that they took him for the Ex-Miniſter and Ex-Profeſſor of Nimes; and this is the reaſon why the Author of the account of his death makes the reflexion, which I have tranſcribed. Several celebrated Authors who were well acquainted with books, have aſcribed the Catholique d'Etat to Jeremy Ferrier (35). I would not ſcruple to do the ſame, if I did not know that Monſieur Baillet (36) aſcribes this book to John Sirmond (37), who was one of the Writers, whom Cardinal de Richelieu employed to anſwer the Libels which were printed in great numbers againſt him in the Spaniſh-Low-Countries. John Sirmond was uſed to diſguiſe himſelf under fictitious names in the anſwers he wrote againſt thoſe Libels. But it would be a little ſtrange that he ſhould have borrowed the name of an Author who was ſtill alive and ſo much known as the Sieur Jeremy Ferrier was; and beſides, Monſieur Peliſſon (38), who mentions ſeveral anonymous and pſeudonymous pieces of this Writer, does not aſcribe to him the Catholique d'Etat, which is one of the beſt pieces in Monſ. Du Chatelet's collection. Notwithſtanding all theſe arguments, I ſhall not determine any thing, till I ſee what proofs Monſ. Baillet will offer to ſupport his opinion.

(31) It was afterwards inſerted into the Recueil de diverſes piéces pour ſervir à l'Hiſtoire.

(32) Mercure François, tom. 12. pag. 499.

(33) See above, the remark [B] in the article CARTHAGENA.

(34) The Mercure François, tom. 12. pag. 500, 501. gives us a catalogue of ſeveral libels written by the Spaniards, among which there is one intitled, Scopæ Ferrerianæ.

(35) Voetius, Polit. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 2. pag. 531. Spizelius, Scrutinium Atheiſmi, pag. 32.

(36) See the Index to his Auteurs déguiſes.

(37) He was of the French Academy, and nephew to F. Sirmond the Jeſuit. See the Hiſtoire de l'Academie Françoiſe, pag. m. 304.

(38) Hiſtoire de l'Academ. Franç. pag. 306, 307.

